Are You Weak in the Hind Legs?

Waiting for George to do it has kept capitalism going. George didn't get around to doing the things for us that we should have done for ourselves, and consequently the One Big Union didn't get big enough, and hours didn't get short enough, and pay envelopes didn't get fat enough, and labor didn't get educated and organized enough to dump the bosses of our backs.

The new program in America seems to be let Uncle Sam do it. That's probably because when we left it to George to do, it didn't get done, and certainly "something ought to be done about it". Uncle Sam has so many bureaus and office staffs and committees and commissions that there's not much doubt, if it's left to him, something will be done about it.

But what will it be?

Letting the government do it hasn't worked so well for labor in Germany and Italy. Will a smiling face and a fireside voice and the benevolence of Ma Perkins change the picture here? Or will the inexorable necessity of capitalism to exploit ever more and more until it is ended, over-ride their good intentions of sweetness and light? The underlying economic force has always been the master.

Why not stand on your own hind legs for a change? It will get you what neither George nor Uncle Sam can ever get for you—emancipation, security, plenty.

MAY DAY

By

Card Number 102287

May First, 1886, is a day not to be forgotten in the labor movement of the world. It was the first great struggle in America for the eight-hour day.

The strike at the McCormick Reaper Workers, in Chicago, the police brutalities, the consequent protest meeting at the Haymarket, and the tragedy that resulted, all have their place in the history of May Day.

At the Haymarket Square meeting called to protest against police brutalities in the strike, Carter Harrison, Mayor of Chicago, was present. Later he swore on the witness stand that nothing said there was in conflict with the law.

Yes, as soon as he left several hundred police rushed from the Desplaines Street station, half a block away, and gathered around the truck from which Sam Fielden was speaking. They ordered the meeting to disperse. Fielden objected: "This is an orderly meeting."

Someone—no one knows who—threw a bomb. Sixty-six police were prostrated by the explosion, seven never to rise again, and one to die shortly.

Many were arrested, and eight indicted.

After a long trial seven were found guilty of murder in the first degree and sentenced to be hanged, and one—for giving out handbills—was sentenced to fifteen years. They were charged, not with throwing the bomb, but with having produced the circumstances that led someone else to throw it.

One killed himself in prison. (Or was this another part of the conspiracy against labor?)

Four were hanged November 11, 1887, as Spies cried: "There will be a time when our silence will be more powerful than the voices you strangle today."

In 1873 Governor Altgeld pardoned the survivors of the frame-up, and at the same time acquitted the eight hour-day martyrs of the charge on which their lives were stolen.

We honor these men on May Day, and we honor them best by carrying on the struggle in which they were engaged. The social ills against which they fought can be removed only by the organization of the working class in One Big Union. Organize for 365 May Days each year!

The Emigrant

By Gefion

When Esther Visby landed in Chicago, they were still raising hogs in North Clark Street.

It had taken Esther two months to peregrinate from her native bailiwick in Denmark, across its many islands and belts, clickity-clack across Jutland, over the North Sea to Harwich, and six rolling weeks in a mutton and marmalade oozing steerage from Liverpool to Philadelphia.

Now there she stood. And the grunts of the porkers in the North Clark Street gutters were like the friendly greetings of home. Surely, she had heard such a concert before in the winding, linden shaded streets of Nerum back in the old land. Esther set down her battered satchel and appraised with a critical eye a sow and her litter. H'm, not much curl to the tail here. These clever Americans apparently didn't know a great lot about raising pigs. For sure, Bailiff Hahneman in Nerum would have thrown up his hands in holy horror and declared, deuce take it, that folk who didn't have any more sense about pork than to let a sow and her young's wallow in mud and slush ought to go out and cut peat for a living. Ja, mein Herr!

Esther Visby wasn't what the Chamber of Commerce would've termed a buxom descendant of the roving Vikings. Nor would the latter-day Fuehrer have classed her as a Nordic. Not by a long shot. Esther was a willowy lass with capable hands, with deep, questioning gray eyes set wide apart in an irregular face framed by a mop of dark hair. She could milk with any cowherd and get the Frau Bailiff's unmentionables on the line whiter than they had ever wafted in the breeze before. And when it came to plaice and parsley sauce, and delectable, paper-thin pancakes with jelly—well, the wench knew her pots and pans.

Nor was it any outlongings inherited from the rambling Vikings that had prompted her to fold her tent and set out for America. Esther's leave-taking of her ancestral hearth was caused solely by Aunt Bertha's getting herself into the embrace of Hymen for the second time in her blessed life, and accusing Esther of pilfering a fruit cake sent Auntie as a wedding present by Bricklayer Olsen's spouse.

Now Esther didn't consider herself candidate for a set of wings. She could distinctly remember —and with glee—the nights she had tumbled from her bed chamber window and hied herself off to the dances in the neighboring village. And she could vividly recollect other nights that it wouldn't be so very healthy to tell the old folk about. But she would be eternally damned if she had ever in all her lifelong days stolen as much as a pin from anybody! And Aunt Bertha, or any of the rest of the family, wasn't going to get away with that stuff. No, Madame!

So Esther dug to the bottom of her calf-skin trunk and brought to light of day her savings and the few kroner Grandma Avgusta had left her, set out for the King's capital and got herself a ticket for America. She would as soon have gone to Greenland or Timbuktu—it was all one to her. But as America was the part of the world whence all the other lads and lasses had gone, she might as well too fare thither and make her millions. And crabby Tante Bertha could see how she would get her washing done from now hence.

Esther Visby was nineteen when the discordant serenade emanating from the North Clark Street gutters first assailed her ears. She looked about her. A singular land, indeed. And how in the world could the folk here make themselves understood by that droll speech? To Esther's unaccustomed ears, it sounded like the nocturnal opinions of the tomcats back in Nerum. Why, one couldn't separate one word from the next! Well, maybe one shouldn't be too critical of things one didn't know so very much about. One simply had to learn.

Esther felt the pouch in her bosom. The ticket had taken all her savings and Grandma Avgusta's kroner had dwindled considerably since the day in Philadelphia when that fellow had changed them into the strange coin of the new land. Well, she might as well get started making her fortune today as any other time.

II.

The Sharp Corner was a melange of barroom, eating house and hotel. It reared its wooden and fancifully carved gables at the corner of North Clark and Fullerton. At The Sharp Corner, hearses going to Calvary cemetery stopped for refreshments and to accord the mourners a last opportunity to reiterate collectively what a really remarkably fine person the remains had ever and always been. Yes, sir!

The Sharp Corner was under the regency of prodigiously proportioned Widow O'Leary. She it was who held sway in the kitchen. It was the doughty Widow who counted the cash drawer when the shutters had been put up for the night. And it was from the full lips of Widow O'Leary that fell the nightly pronunciamento whether the departed day had been foine or one not so good.

It was at The Sharp Corner Esther Visby began wooing Dame Fortuna. Here she became the factotum of the scullery and the bedrooms. Behind the bar Osvald Hummerman dispensed lager beer and galvanic whiskey. Esther made the acquaintance of the former two the day she first took up her multiferous tasks. Osvald wore a cowlick on his manly brow and a handle-bar mustachio under his straight Teutonic nose. And he said welcome to America, Fraeulein—and would the new girl have a little something to drink? Yes, Esther might partake—a little beer, please. And what beer—Himmel! Whoever made it had better get himself apprenticed once again and learn that beer should be dark and foamy, lingering and tantalizing like the kiss of one's sweetheart.

Widow O'Leary was stirring the morning's hot cakes. Her voluminous breasts were quivering like half-congealed jelly as she bestowed upon the batter all that was in her. Esther never could work up any great intestinal enthusiasm over what she called the Widow's leather cakes—wouldn't she have loved to shove one of those pot covers under Tante Bertha's pert and critical smeller!

Esther thought in fact that it would take a considerable number of runes to explain what Dame O'Leary didn't know about culinary tricks. Well, one simply had to get used to things. But, for sure, things should be done right and things should be done well. And all folk—especially menfolk—should be fed vittels that simply made them want more—toothsome dishes that made them laugh and say jolly nonsense.

Anyway, if Widow O'Leary insisted upon cooking in her own peculiar, way, there wasn't a great lot Esther could do about it. And if folk wanted to get belly-aches from such messes, well, the doctors had to live too. But on days when the Widow drove off to the down-town markets, Ether cooked for herself and Osvald Hummerman paper-thin, delectable pancakes with jelly. And on those days, Osvald hummed Tra-ra-ta-bum- de-aye.

Esther fell in love the day the bays ran away and spilt the remains of Councilman Harrigan in the ditch down Fullerton Avenue. There was hell to pay that day. The bays were under the able guidance of Chris Solberg, than whom there was no better horseman in seven counties, and as experienced a hearse driver as ever graced a pair of lines—and no mistake.

Chris swore up and down that it all happened when the Widow's pooch jumped from behind the hog pen and bit the off bay in the nose. The Widow vociferously declared it a damn loie—Prince would never have done no such a thing! She wouldn't be a bit s'prised—in fact she could smell it—that Chris had taken on a few too many. And pwhat would Drayman Hilderbrand say now? For shure, it would mean Chris' bread and butter! And, oh, me blessed soul, the poor councilman's fam'ly!

Chris said, well, for the love o' Mike, shut up! He got the snorting and rearing bays untangled and the hearse dragged out of the ditch and replaced the councilman's remains as decorously as the circumstances permitted. The cavalcade got under way once again, and the remains of the Right Honorable Harrigan were at long last despatched into the bowels of the good Earth with the lament and praise befitting the final leave-taking of such dignitaries. But on the return journey, Chris Solberg got gloriously drunk at The Sharp Corner.

Chris was singing Oh, Susanna in a fine tenor and saying Skoal and Gesundheit to Osvald Hummerman and letting the rest of the costumers know that it wasn't his fault, damn it all, that the bays beat it and spilt the councilman's carcass.

And through the serving-hole in the kitchen door, Ether was observing Chris and confiding in the Widow, to the best of her linguistic ability, that it was a shame that such a nice looking lad should make a swine of himself just because of a little hard luck. Yes, Dame O'Leary agreed with them sintimints—and he a countryman of Esther's too— but business was business and the Widow would be hanged if she was going to deprive the cash box of its just dues.

They put Chris to bed under the fancy gables and unhitched the bays. And Ether told the Widow that she was goin to the barn to look for eggs—those fool hens never would get sense enough to lay in the nests. And she gave the bays an extra measure of oats and caressed their soft muzzles and spoke tender words to them and let them know how sorry and ashamed she felt for Chris—and she was sure he wasn't a bad lad at all.

And next morning after meat, the Widow discovered that she was low on spuds and drove off for the markets. Esther watched her to the cart and the bobbing plumes of her bonnet disappeared down North Clark Street. Then she brewed a pot of real coffee. And she went to the barroom and politely asked Osvald Hummerman could she please have a glass of brandy? Javohl, Fraeulein Esther could have a glass of brandy—anything her little heart desired—der Fraulein made such shoene pfannkuchen—Mebbe the brandy was for der landsman up-stairs? Ha, ha, ha! And der Fraeulein needn't blush.

Esther hammered at Chris' door until he finally woke from his drunken stupor. He mumbled who's there and come in. Esther opened the door and said Good Morning and was Chris feeling very badly? He was—plum rotten. And where t'hell was he and what became of the bays? Esther explained—but he had better drink the coffee and brandy and he'd be all right—and please, please don't ever do it again.

Chris sat up in bed, his blond hair tussled and eyes drunk-bleary. He gulped the brandy and hot coffee. And Ether let drop the remark that she too was from the old land. The deuce she was! What part? Oh, not much from any part—the village of Nerum. Chris had never heard of it. Personally, he was from Hillerod. Oh, so then he was a kulsvier! Oh, yeah, Chris had turned out a considerable stack of charcoal in his days—in fact, some of the best that ever heated a flatiron.

Well, even if Esther did come from a hamlet unknown to Chris, she certainly knew a decent cup of coffee—and that brandy, well, she should have many thanks.

And Chris Solberg hitched up the bays and drove off to the stables of Drayman Hildebrand to be told never, goddammit, never to disgrace the Drayman's barn with his presence again. And Chris said all right, if that was the way Mr. Hildebrand felt about it, well and good—he had been figuring on quitting anyway. And Chris set out and rustled himself another job setting cobble-stones.

And it came to pass that Chris went to The Sharp Corner of a Saturday night and whispered in Esther's right ear that she was a lovely lass and that he was plum crazy about her—in fact had been so ever since that coffee-and-brandy morning. And he taught her to dance in the way of the new land, and Ether didn't mind his nonsense at all.

Esther Visby had been with Widow O'Leary for many moons when she awoke one morning and felt that she had to vomit—and she never sick a day in all her life! Oh, well, maybe it was those leather cakes. But at a certain period in the lunar month, Esther discovered that the Widow's flapjacks were not to blame for her morning qualms. And on Chris' next visit she told him in her own straight words that she was with bairn.

But on his way home that night, Chris Solberg realized that he had always wanted to see what in the deuce Minnesota looked like anyway.

And one fine day, Dame O'Leary gazed up from her pots and pans to discover that all was not as it should be with the wench—and would she get her trunk packed in a hurry! To be shure, the Widow wasn't going to have her roof disgraced with a bastard brat.

So Esther went her way. And she wondered that maybe the new land wasn't quite so hospitable as her native heath. She doubted if even Tante Bertha would've told her to be off. Well, one had to learn. And one simply couldn't be a crybaby.

And so Esther went her way and on Division Street she rented a small house. And one cold winter's night, Midwife Potrovsky laid in her arms a squalling girl-child that greedily sought Esther's full breasts.

And the days went and Esther rose from her bed and looked upon her child and named it Lisbet. And she went out into the world again to earn their bread, and she bore with the fools in the street who snickered there she goes, her with the bastard.

But from across the street came a black woman to look after Lisbet as she grew into a lanky girl with Esther's questioning, wide-apart gray eyes and Chris Solberg's blond tussled hair. And one day the black woman came and mysteriously held something whimpering under her great coat. And when Lisbet simply had to know what it could be —and she wasn't a bit scared—then the woman opened her coat—and there it was—the ugliest and nicest pug pup one could ever imagine. And Lisbet named him Bowser and she thought the black woman lovely—as beautifully black and lovely as Mumsy's Sunday dress.

And that night when Esther came home, Lisbet secretly told her that Bowser had a doughnut tail.

III.

The years went. One by one, they simply slipped away from under one's nose. One by one, they became chapters in the book of time—chapters to be perused years hence by learned men with horn-rimmed spectacles and bald skulls. Yes, time has a way of its own—it waits for no one.

They no longer raise hogs in North Clark Street. The Sharp Corner has long since given way to other edifices. And those again to others. Widow O'Leary of the generous behind and the prodigious breasts has years past departed this vale of tears. Osvald Hummerman is dust. Chris Solberg had daylight let through him in a gambling joint in Reno. And back in the old land, Aunt Bertha has one fine day in the long dim past found her fruit cake behind a crock of sweet pickles.

Progress had come to the new land—and no mistake. Where before the red man searched the plains for enough buffalo dung to keep his fire going, there now sprout towns and farms. A toiling and sweating mixture of the earth's serfs has spanned the land from coast to coast with a web of railroads. And in Chicago they have hanged men because they told other men of their kind that eight hours labor out of twenty-four were sufficient. Yes, Progress had marched over plains and mountains in seven-league boots.

And Esther Visby—that willowy lass of the gray, questioning eyes and capable hands—she who had lain with Chris Solberg in their young love that night years ago when the girl-child Lisbet was conceived.—What has become of her?

Well, Esther is no longer a willowy lass. She is an old woman. The gray eyes are no longer gay and laughing. But they are still clear and questioning. And they look out upon the world and its scurrying and blundering denizens with the wisdom and toleration that come from suffering and toil.

Yes, Esther Visby, the factotum of sculleries and bedrooms, the scourer of floors and stairways, her with the bastard, she has seen the years rush by. Yes, Esther has seen them pass and she has learned many tings in those fleeing years. She has come to learn that the new land was a harsh land—that it didn't care a whit whether one lived or died. She has seen hungry men mowed down in the streets with clubs and bullets because they in their hunger cried out for bread. She has learned that Justice was not blind—that those who dispense it very well knew on which side their bread was buttered.

Yes, Esther's gray questioning eyes have seen many things and she has learnt much while youth left her and she became old and toil-worn. She has seen thousands of her kind struggle through the thraldom of crumbs. She has seen them become craven and contemptible. And she has seen others sacrifice all—life itself—so that the struggle for light and freedom might not die. She has learnt from books and papers what her own daily toil had already told her in different words. And her heart became linked with those of the other thousands and millions who suffered and toiled.

And Lisbet—and Bowser of the doughnut tail—What became of them? Bowser lies dead and cold under a stone cairn. Yes, he too became old and toothless, and one day Lisbet buried him and was lonely and lost for long days.

And she herself grew up under Esther's and the black woman's care. And Esther taught her about life, of its joys and sorrows, and she stroked the blond tussled hair of the child that had brought love and beauty into her life. And one day Lisbet too went out into the mealstrom of life to earn her bread.

Yes, Esther Visby is an old woman. And when she sits alone her thoughts may now and then flit back to the ancient beech woods and cool lakes of the old land and the days when she danced with the lads at the village inn. And her thoughts come to The Sharp Corner and she asks of the dying day—What became of Chris? Oh, we were young then!

But of a night there comes to the house of Esther a young lanky lass with wide-apart questioning eyes and blond tussled hair.

And the girl Lisbet and Mother Esther talk about this and that in the lamplight. Is Lisbet doing well? Yes, Mumsy, I'm all right. And Lisbet tells Mother Esther of her work—how she is now typing a manuscript for a book that will tell men to take the world that belongs to them, the world that they built. Yes, Lisbet tells Mother Esther this and many other things from her full young life. And she leaves her chair to lay an arm around the old woman's neck and tell her of the man she loves. She tells Mother Esther of the agitator that she loves—one who urges men from a box on street corners to organize—to become as one so that want and suffering may be swept from Earth.

And Esther's thoughts wander to Chris Solberg, and her heart is heavy and worried for her child.

And so the years ago. Millions of men are butchered in a world of insanity. Human entrails hang putrid and maggot-filled on wire entanglements. Men have gone to prison and torture because they loved life and truth. And millions are hungry in a world of plenty.

And one day Lisbet and the man she loves stand before a tombstone in one of Chicago's cemeteries. On the stone is writ:

Esther Visby

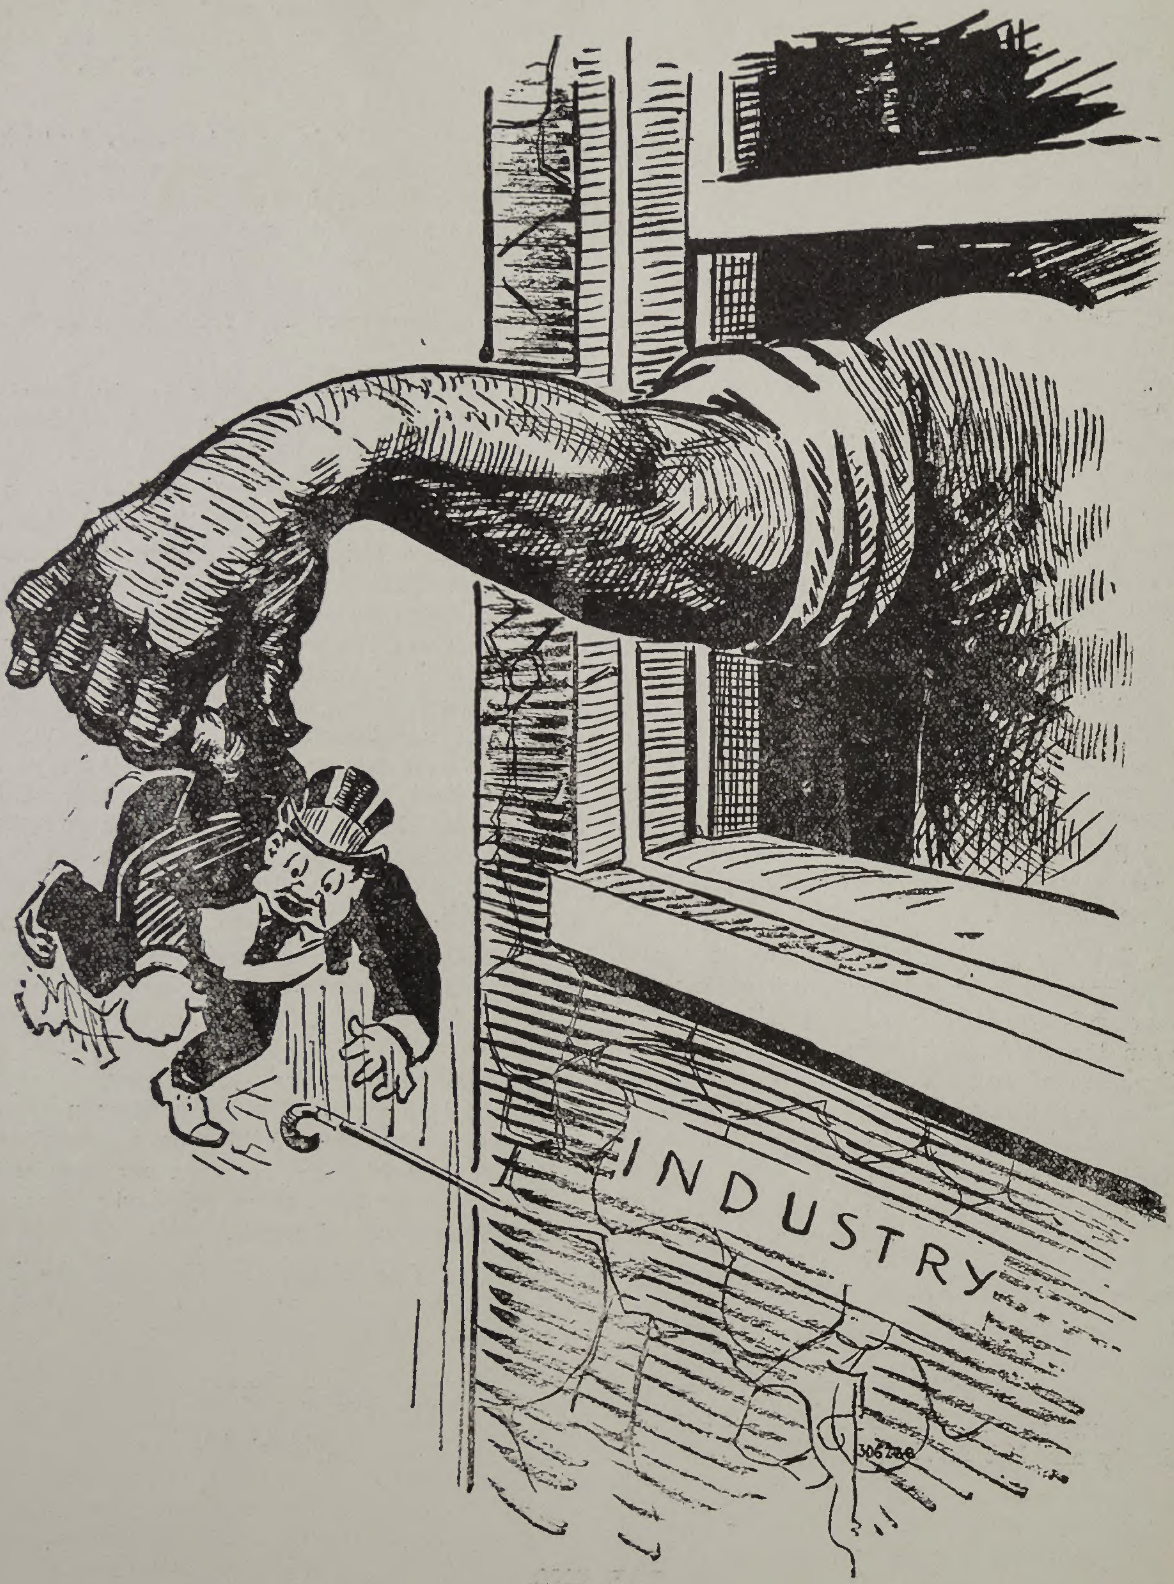
THE END.



The Solution for our Economic Problems

Wanted — One Big Union

A little sticking together has done us much good.

More would do us more good.

One Big Union would solve all our problems for us.

Whatever is worthwhile in this American standard of living is there because workers stuck together and put up some stiff fights to get it. If we are to improve that standard of living, we must stick together on a bigger scale.

That's what's back of all this recent talk of industrial versus craft organization, vertical versus horizontal unionism.

We have found out that sticking together in crafts often completely defeats the entire purpose of unionism. We join unions because we want to act together for our common good. When we join craft unions, we find ourselves pitted against each other, contracted to work while our fellow worker strikes, obliged to break his strike just as sooner or later he is obliged to break ours. Even when we strike together in crafts, we find that one craft is played against another in negotiations, and that the employing class pries its wrecking bar into every crack and crevice of our craft federations to pull it apart and weaken the structure. The seamen's strikes showed that.

So the American Federation of Labor plan of craft federation is out of the picture. We can't afford to have cracks in the solidarity of labor.

Will the C. I. O. plan fill the bill?

First let's see what specifications a union should come up to.

It should enable workers to take whatever joint action they find that they need. That's the primary purpose of unionism.

It should enable workers to come together as the problems facing them require, to decide what to do about those problems.

It should have its policies laid out entirely by the majority rule of its membership, otherwise the whole idea of banding ourselves together for our commong good it pushed aside to make us the pawns of some fellow who may look out for our well-being but who much more likely is looking out for his.

It should give the most effective support to every member in the manner that occasions the least trouble to the rest; that is, its solidarity should be efficient as well as effective.

The CIO does not come up to these specifications. It is a loose structure favoring both crafts and semi-industrial unions, easily pried apart and entering into contracts to scab on each other. The agreements of the coal miners, leaving Kentucky and Virginia still struggling prove that. The agreement of steel workers to furnish steel to scab auto workers shows that. The agreement of auto workers to work with scab steel shows that. And in all these agreements the obligation to quit direct action on the job, and to continue at the current wages no matter how rapidly prices may rise, shows that the CIO in structure and policy does not enable workers to take such joint action as they find they need.

The CIO is not constructed to enable workers to decide what action they should take. Believe it or not, the CIO has 13 members and no more. The thousands of workers who think they are CIO members, are instead members of unions that have made business contracts with the CIO surrendering most of their rights as unionists to this committee of 13 members, How little control they have over their union is shown by the auto and other negotiations, where the workers on the job were not even present. They are told by others where they got off at. It was to stop others from telling us where we get off at, that we organized for our own protection. Organizing as puppets for some one else to direct is not organizing for our own protection.

The structure of modern industry requires job unionism, industrial unionism, and One Big Union. We can afford no craft divisions to split solidarity on the job. We can afford no federation of alleged industrial unions to divide the working class into sections obliged to scab on each other. What we need is this:

One Big Union for all workers;

Industrial Departments, as transportation, manufacture, etc. built of Industrial Unions for convenience of the members in dealing with their specific industrial problems;

Job organization, always free to take immediate action on the job for bettering their conditions, or for practicing solidarity with their fellow workers on other jobs, never aiding the employer to break any strike by working with scabs, or with scab material, or furnishing material to scabs. This is the efficient, convenient and effective way to practice solidarity.

It must be an organization with all power vested in the majority decisions of its members.

It should also have a program of action proportionate to such power. The power to say whether industry shall run or not should not be frittered away in the demand for a few petty concessions while the circumstances of our lives show that labor should run the industries for the benefit of labor. A working class organized in such a One Big Union would be utterly asinine to let its own power to act for itself lie idle, while it expectantly waited for some politician or a few more Supreme Court judges to do for it, what it could much better do for itself. It would be ridiculous for such a One Big Union of Labor to aim at anything less than a world run by the workers for the workers, with that abundance for all that industry and science has made possible, and with the chronic stoppage of production and the perpetual diversion of production to such purposes as war eliminated for ever from the life of mankind.

There is such a union; and there is only one such union for one is enough. It is the Industrial Workers of the World, with 29 industrial unions in one or another of which there is the logical place for you.

Quit building obstacles across the road to emancipation and join with your fellow workers in the one organization by which labor can defeat all its enemies, solve all its problems and create the future for our children that it is your duty to furnish them.

I. W. W. PREAMBLE

THE working class and the employing class have nothing in common. There can be no peace so long as hunger and want are found among millions of working people and the few, who make up the employing class, have all the good things of life.

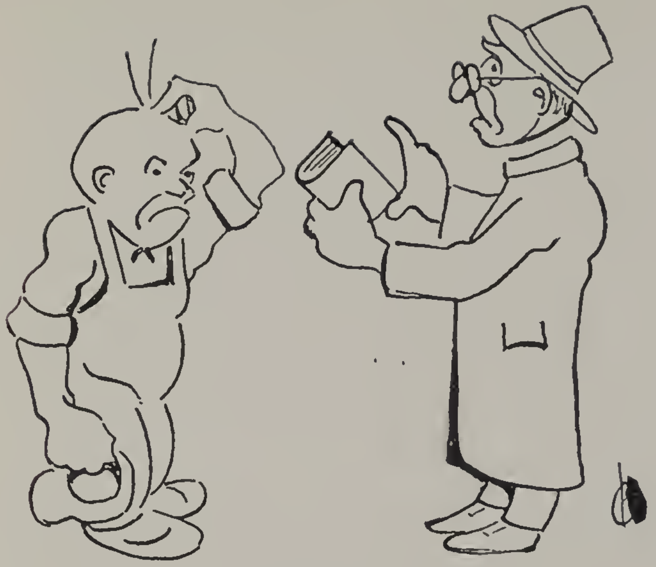
Between these two classes a struggle must go on until the workers of the world organize as a class, take possession of the earth and the machinery of production, and abolish the wage system.

We find that the centering of the management of industries into fewer and fewer hands makes the trade unions unable to cope with the ever-growing power of the employing class. The trade unions foster a state of affairs which allows one set of workers to be pitted against another set of workers in the same industry, thereby helping defeat one another in wage wars. Moreover, the trade unions aid the employing class to mislead the workers into the belief that the working class have interests in common with their employers.

These conditions can be changed and the interest of the working class upheld only by an organization formed in such a way that all its members in any one industry, or in all industries, if necessary, cease work whenever a strike or lockout is on in any department thereof, thus making an injury to one an injury to all.

Instead of the conservative motto, "A fair day's wage for a fair day's work", we must inscribe on our banner the revolutionary watchword, "Abolition of the wage system."

It is the historic mission of the working class to do away with capitalism. The army of production must be organized, not only for the everyday struggle with capitalists, but also to carry on production when capitalism shall have been overthrown. By organizing industrially we are forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old.



Let's You and Him Join the Army

By MELVIN JACKSON

An Old-Fashioned Melodrama of the Deep South in One Act.

Cast: Arabella, a virtuous maiden, but not so dumb.
Pappy, the father of Arabella.
Mister Hiram Anfiram, the holder of the Mortgage.
Benjamin, the stalwart young man of honor, not dumb either.

PAPPY: Well, daughter, you'd better pack your tooth-brush. In a few minutes Mister Hiram Anfiram will be here to collect the mortgage on the old homestead.

ARABELLA: O, pappy, I knew you should never have borrowed money from that skinflint.

PAPPY: Yes, daughter, I see my mistake clearly now, but I thought Mr. Hiram Anfiram was a good man; I never dreamed he would ever refuse to renew the mortgage.

ARABELLA: Boo, hoo, boo hoo (vociferous weeping).

PAPPY: There, there, don't cry.

ARABELLA: But I can't help it—to think we will never see the old homestead again. Boo hoo, boo hoo, etc.

(Loud knocking, and then Mister Hiram Anfiram enters.)

HIRAM: Well, well, well, how are my good friends, today?

ARABELLA: Shut up, you old nickel-nursing skinflint. Pappy is dumb enough to trust a slicker like you who puts grease on his hair, but I know better.

HIRAM: You should not be mad at me, Arabella, I have come to renew the mortgage on your old homestead.

PAPPY: What? To renew the mortgage?

ARABELLA: I don't believe it.

HIRAM: Well, that is—

ARABELLA: I knew there was something fishy about it.

HIRAM: This is a time that tries men's souls and tests their spirits. The Department of War—I mean Preparedness—

ARABELLA: Ha, he said War!

HIRAM: I distinctly said Preparedness. The Dept. of War—I mean Preparedness—has declared that this country is in grave danger of its enemies.

ARABELLA: What enemies?

HIRAM: Shut up. I am making a speech—I mean listen to what I say. Our country is in very grave danger because she is rich and defenseless, while other nations are armed to the teeth. The writing is on the wall that spells our invasion and desolation. These barbarians that surround this great and glorious nation of ours—these savages ready to slaughter American men, enslave the women, and butcher the children—

ARABELLA: Who said so?

HIRAM: Why—everybody—that is, the newspapers—now shut up. We must make our nation the most powerful on earth, prepared to-to-to-to defend it against any and all who seek to endanger our supremacy. Defend. That's it—American wars are always defensive.

ARABELLA: Pish! What has that to do with our mortgage being renewed?

HIRAM: We must be prepared to preserve slavery in America—ding it all! I meant safety in America.

ARABELLA: You said slavery.

HIRAM: I did not, I said safety.

ARABELLA: You did, too!

HIRAM: I didn't; oh shut up! In this great and glorious democracy—in this land of freedom—

ARABELLA: What do you mean, "Land of Freedom", when Tom Mooney is in jail?

HIRAM: Shut up. That's irrevelant. We need every able-bodied man for war—I mean defense.

ARABELLA: Poo. You said war.

HIRAM: Shut up; I said defense. And there is a certain yellow-livered cringing coward in these mountains who says he don't believe in war—I mean defense.

ARABELLA: You can't talk about my Benjamin that way!

HIRAM: Everyone likes to see a stalwart, well-disciplined man. The spiritual sublimity and the glory of wearing a uniform is stupendous.

ARABELLA: They wear uniforms in jail and in the bug house, too.

HIRAM: The army—I mean the R. O. T. C.—needs him. The army—I mean the R. O. T. C.—will make a man out of him.—The rag—I mean the flag of his country is calling him.

PAPPY: Hurry up and foreclose this durn mortgage and get it over with. It is cruel enough for us to lose our home and be turned out into the cold cruel world without having to listen to your hot air, too.

HIRAM: You have to choose now. You can save this coward and make him a man, and I will renew your mortgage; or you can do nothing about him, and I will not only foreclose on your old homestead, but I will see that you are arrested for criminal syndicalism or conspiracy or being unpatriotic or something.

ARABELLA: Boo hoo, boo hoo (more crying).

PAPPY: There, there—buck up, daughter. Maybe Mister Hiram Anfiram is right about the nation needing Benjamin.

HIRAM: Uncle Shylock—I mean Uncle Sam is defending you, and you should be willing to sacrifice something for Uncle Skinflint—I mean Uncle Sam.

PAPPY: There's Benjamin now. Brace up, daughter, and save the old homestead and your pappy from being turned out into the cold, cruel world.

HIRAM: Remember it is for the sake of American investments in the Philippines. Gosh durn it all —I mean it is for his own sake and it will make a man out of him.

BENJAMIN: Oh, Arabella, I have some—Why hello, pappy; and (to Hiram) Phooey on you, you old penny pincher.

ARABELLA: Your country needs you, Benjamin. You should be prepared to defend yourself against your enemies.

BENJAMIN: Why? I have no enemies, except maybe that bird there, (pointing at Hiram).

HIRAM: O, twaddle, boy—sure you have. Japan and Rooshya, and Hitler and Mussolini. And England is a dirty double dealer that can't be trusted. You have lots of enemies.

BENJAMIN: But those fellows over there are working for a boss just like I am, so what's the use of hating them. Besides, didn't the Bible say, "Love your enemies."

HIRAM: Yes, but all the preachers and priests say Jesus said, "Think not that I come to send peace on earth, I come not to send peace, but a sword." And again he said, "And he that hath no sword, let him sell his garment and buy one." That's a lot of twaddle about loving enemies.

BENJAMIN: But what the heck would I do with a sword?

HIRAM: Let's make this world safe for Christianity. We must save it from the heathen, yellow peril.

BENJAMIN: But, but—

HIRAM: I read a book one time, and it said, "He who is not ready with his life to shield the woman of his heart and the loved ones of his home from the unspeakable lust of savage aliens has not red blood enough to blush for shame."

BENJAMIN: But, but—

HIRAM: Look at Arabella—wouldn't you join the army—I mean the R. O. T. C.—to defend her?

BENJAMIN: But, but—

HIRAM: We must have war—I mean preparedness—

BENJAMIN: You said war.

HIRAM: I distinctly said preparedness. How incredibly stupid of you to think I said war. Unless we are prepared for offense—I mean defense—in a few minutes enemy soldiers could wipe our New York, Philadelphia, Washington, and Boston off the map.

BENJAMIN: Who cares? Them damned Yankees! Let them defend themselves.

HIRAM: Don't you want us to slaughter the Japanese, I mean kill our rivals—O, curses, I mean to defend our country and save our homes? Speak up young man.

BENJAMIN: You should talk about saving our homes—you! You are here to foreclose the mortgage on the old homestead and rob Pappy and Arabella of it.

HIRAM: That's not exactly true.

BENJAMIN: You should talk about truth, you lying, insincere, mealy-mouth, deceitful hypocrite. War and preparedness can never be worked up on truth, and the more horrible the lies the better. War Departments and Scissorbills like you psychologise the world into a spasm of distrust and fear with the distortion, perversion, and suppression of truth. You would push a man to war with a bayonet in his back and whisper into his ear, "Patriot! You are volunteering. You are doing this to save your country."

HIRAM: But you should be brave—

BENJAMIN: Don't talk to me about bravery, you sneaking, lily-livered, whining, dunghill cock. You haven't the guts to fight yourself so you wave the flag and try to get others to do your fighting for you.

HIRAM: But freedom of the seas must be defended and preserved—

BENJAMIN: You greedy, rapacious, stingy, miserly mercenary. You own three shares of General Motors and you would have half a billion people slaughtered to preserve the sale of two Chevrolets yearly in Timbuctoo.

HIRAM: But I was thinking of saving Christianity from the yellow peril—

BENJAMIN: You contemptible, double-tongued, infamous hypocrite. You should talk about religion. You have nothing but self-interest and greed in your heart. You act like a Saint, while you think nothing of the manufacture of guns and gunpowder and gas to blast and maim your fellow men and to create widows and orphans and cripples and the cause of untold suffering and human misery.

HIRAM: But we must be prepared to preserve peace.

BENJAMIN: Why, you deluded, unconscious, witless ignoramous. Don't you know it is impossible to preserve peace like you want to do it. It is like trying to fireproof a house by packing gunpowder between the walls. Preparedness inevitably brings war.

HIRAM: But I am Deacon of the church and—

BENJAMIN: You prayer-whining, ritual-worshiping, self-seeking rascal. You seek preparedness, so you will be able to murder others; you use patriotism to keep people from thinking, and you use the flag as a sacred diety. You would even send everyone to prison who does not worship your idols of selfishness, hatred, distrust, and violence.

HIRAM: Shut up, you (to Benjamin). It is now twelve o'clock. The time has arrived to foreclose the mortgage. (He produces the document). You cannot pay for it, so you must leave. This is now my property. You three traitors leave it immediately, and if you don't leave the county by sundown I will have the sheriff arrest you on unlawful assembly, criminal syndicalism, trespassing, conspiracy, and disturbing the peace.

BENJAMIN: Hold on there, Mister Hiram Anfiram. I have brought the money to pay off this mortgage on the old homestead.

HIRAM: What!

BENJAMIN: Here is your money: Gimme that mortgage. (He grabs it and tears it to bits). Now get out (pointing toward the door for the benefit of Hiram).

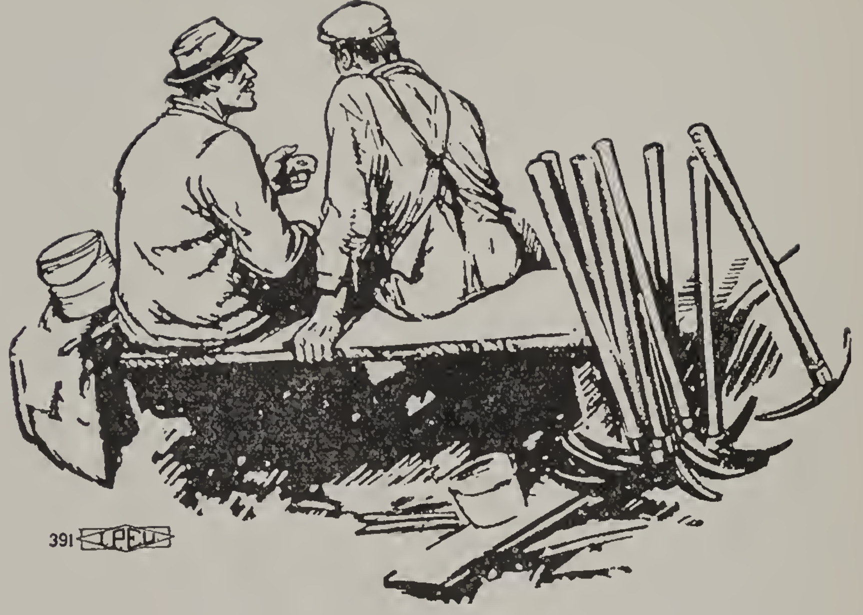
The Life of the Gandy Dancer



Intimate views of the conditions that have accumulated since the strike that did not materialize to stop a wage-cut fifteen years ago.

The word "UNION" reached my ears for the first time, when I was about nine years of age, back in 1916. I shall never forget how unionism was explained to us youngsters at that time. I can well remember what many of our neighbor farmers were saying about the I. W. W.'s They told how fierce they were, how they would balk about doing a full days work, (meaning from Sun-up to Sun-down) that they ran in bands, and many other things. At times I would even have dreams in my sleep, of being attacked by a band of them.

This ignorance stayed with me until I was about twelve or thirteen, when one of my brothers told me of a time when a little trouble started in a gang of workers, of which he was one. He told of how the Company sent in several men to take their places. When the men arrived, my brother met them at the depot and explained to them the reason they were sent to this particular job. When the strangers found out that enough workers were on hand already, they made it quite plain that they did not come to take any one's job, that they would go right back if they had just enough change to pay for a wire for a return pass. A collection among the workers provided the strangers with several dollars, and they left on the next train.

I would like to say, that this little story my brother told me of those strangers, who later proved to be Wobblies, convinced me that I no longer needed to have bad dreams about them.

In the year 1920, several of my brothers were working on a section for a big railroad company. A fake union among track laborers and section foremen was then in progress, in fact it progressed so fast that in less then a year, it was considered a union with a hundred per cent membership for that class of workers and foremen, in that territory, which was no small one. Many meetings took place and the members felt quite proud of their union pins. The company showed enough respect for the boys to issue free passes to them, so they might ride trains to their meeting places. In many cases, time was even paid the boys, while attending meetings.

This thing ran along smoothly for a while, then in 1922 the Company decided to make a wage-cut among the lower paid class. Those thousands of poor ignorant-of-the-facts union men with their bright pins on their caps and hats, decided they would take no cut in wages and voted a strike. The leader of that union was a Mr. Grable. This man Grable, notified all members to stand by for the walk-out order.

One week passed and no word came from Grable. A month passed and still no word came from their gallant chief. Fifteen years have passed and no strike has been called. The sell-out was a complete success. No one seems to know what has happened to the man who so willingly accepted the monthly dues of each of the thousands of workers who belonged to that union.

I can fully imagine what it would have meant to that great force of workers, had they belonged to the ONE BIG UNION, the I. W. W.

Before I change the subject, let me say that the fake union under the leadership of Grable, of which I was speaking, naturally went to pieces. The workers threw away their pins, while the foremen made arrangements to form a union of their own. The Company made it very convenient for the new unionites. They saved them the trouble of having to send in union dues, by deducting from their wages the necessary amount. They also saw to it that they were amply supplied with speakers at their meetings, by sending several of their big officials to do most of the talking for them. In the past few years some changes have taken place and the Company may no longer make deductions from pay-checks for union dues, therefore a good number of the foremen have dropped out of that so-called union.

I am here to say that I think, that I did my share of gandy-dancing, as I put in almost ten years of it. I think I know the bitter and the sweet of it, from one end of it to the other. From frozen lunches, to exhaustion from heat and over-work. From coming in late without pay, to call-outs without time-and-half. From $18. a week, to $6 a week, and from one pay-check deduction to six.

Let us visualize a scene in the life of a section-jerry. A large family dwells near an isolated railroad station. The father, with one arm off, is unable to support the family, so a few of the older sons go to work on the section and give all their wages to the father for the support of the family. As each son becomes of age, the father politely tells him he may from there on keep his earnings for his own.

A few years pass and this family moves to a farm. We will now put all our thoughts to one of the sons in particular. It is Fall and a few extra hands are needed on a section, to rush repair work to road-beds before the freeze-up. A man has a talk with the foreman, moves into one of the bunk-houses with a number of other men and starts to batch. The batching continues for four years and the man gets damn sick and tired of it. He finally decides he would like to become a husband and father. For two years he saves his money, and at the end of that time he finds to his credit the lump sum of $150.00 and a second handed model T roadster.

Marriage takes place despite the fact that it meant vacating not only the Company houses, but the right-of-way as well. It also meant that he would be entitled to no more free coal.

The winter was unusually cold and long. For two months the small camp was snow-bound, and no one could leave the place excepting by train. When Spring arrived the fuel was almost gone. The couple decide to board the fliver drive along the right-of-way, and pick up what scattered coal they might find.

The reward was amazing. Five sacks of coal was on the jitney, when they pulled into their yard that afternoon. The cargo was just being unloaded, when the foreman walked up and asked if they didn't know that it was against the rules to pick up scattered coal on the right-of-way. The couple was so surprised they could hardly think of what to say. The wife spoke up and answered with: "I didn't know the Company would pick up scattered coal like this, when it is so much trouble to gather it." The foreman passed it off by saying that he thought coal dealers were kicking to the Company about the coal that was being picked up on the right-of-way, depriving them of just that much business. Looking at it in one way, it seems indeed rather comical.

We next find the couple sitting by their cook-stove and heater combined. One with a Sears Roebuck, and the other with a Montgomery Ward catalogue, two of their prized possessions, they are dreaming of what they would buy, if they could ever get enough to buy it with. It was decided that if some of the less important foods could be abolished, some of the shoes worn a little longer, and no tickets to the theater for a period of about six months, then maybe they might be able to buy a small radio.

This dream came true after many months of saving and we now find the two, looking at some radios in a store about twenty miles from where they live. The chaepest six tube table model at that time, was found to be slightly over $71. They go back home, but without the radio. A Monky Ward catalogue was then consulted and the answer was found. Now they considered themselves on top of the world. That is, as long as the batteries lasted. Then it was decided that after all, radioing was not so good in Summer-time anyway, therefore it wouldn't hurt to let it stand idle from March till Christmas, for even batteries cost money you know.

The evenings for the next three or four months didn't seem quite so long, even though a three-hour radioing budget was set for each day. As they turn the knob for different stations, it is common to hear one announcer after another, thank different sponsors for relinquishing their time for a wealth-promising politician's speech. One such politician, a Governor, made a mess of his promises to labor, when he failed to act properly in a shooting which made cripples out of several laborers in the northern part of the State. The dial then turns again. This time a comedian is getting rid of a few of his home-made jokes. In one of his jokes he pokes fun at a man making only fifty cents an hour. The wife looks up into the face of her man and wonders of his feelings are hurt, as he only makes about thirty-six cents an hour.

The next scene is where the husband comes home from work on the eve of a pay-day. He had forgotten to tear the deduction slip from the check, before he showed it to the wife. The wife wants to know what that extra slip is for. The husband explains as follows: "We pay each month, a hospital fee, for the purpose of employees who get sick, or get hurt. For example:

"If I should happen to get sick, they would send me to a Company hospital and it wouldn't cost me a thing. But if I would accidently get hurt, and the blame could be shoved onto me, which is most generally the case, then I would not only get the free use of the hospital, but also stand a first class chance of getting a modern up-to-date time-check.

"The other deduction is for the family league. It is where employees donate a certain amount each month, to be put into a fund for the benefit of families of employees who are sick or out of work for any length of time. I don't understand all I know about it, although I know of a case where an employee took sick and was off the job for over five months, spending about two months in the hospital. This man's family was in need of groceries and application for help was sent to the family league. No relief was given this family. The man after recovering enough to go back to work, notified the proper authorities to stop taking out any more family league deductions from his wages. In answer he got a letter demanding his reason for wanting to quit the league."

The husband then goes on to explain deduction number three. "Insurance and all it's advantages". In 1933 the Railroad Company circulated an insurance policy whereby employees would be compelled to pay a certain percentage of the monthly fees, thus relieving the Company of part of the burden of providing insurance compensation for its employees. It used to be free to employees before that.

To make it more clear, force was hinted to make this policy become acceptable. In one case the roadmaster made the remark that he had secured a hundred per cent that far, and he didn't to spoil the record by this gang. Also a remark was made that those who refused to sign up for it, could proably read between the lines. Of course it is needless to say that the placing of this policy upon an unorganized force of workers, was indeed a very easy task.

Listen to the husband tell his experience as policy holder for four years. "Almost four years have gone by and I decided I no longer cared for this policy. I wrote in, giving my policy number, and asked them to discontinue taking out deductions from my wages, for this policy, that I no longer cared to carry it. What do you think happened? I got a letter back telling me that they had no record of me being insured by them. There is gratitude for you. I have paid into life insurance, the approximate amount of $30.00 and the Company claims they pay a certain amount, and all this time I evidently was not insured. If I was not insured, where were my monthly payments going?"

The wife reads on down the list for deduction number four, which is "Income Tax". The husband explains that one like this: "Three and one half per cent of our wages goes to an old age railroad pension, which has so far been called, neither constitutional, nor unconstitutional. If it should finally be declared constitutional, then the lowpaid laboring class are in for it again."

In order to gain any fair amount of benefits from this pension, a man would have to be in service many years, which is almost impossible for a hard working man. Who has seen many sixty-five year old section laborers? A man who has to put out the work the way we have been in the past few years, will not live to be that old, and besides there is an age limit for track. laborers, only men between the ages of 21 and 45 are to be hired.

The majority of employees who will gain by this pension will be section foremen, roadmasters, supervisers etc. All these mentioned are higher salaried men and have a good chance to live out the time.

The fifth deduction is an "Unemployment Tax". One wonders why a tax has to be paid to make unemployment possible, when such a grand job of it has always been done.

Courtesy and respect for employees, by their fellow employers should also be discussed. I will begin with the time when the man and wife were called to the funeral of the wife's dad in another State. Arrangements for the usual free pass were made and they left on an early train. On their return two youngsters became quite restless. The man tries to comfort them, while the wife, grief stricken and tired, tried to catch a little sleep. A porter comes rushing through the cars with an armload of pillows, to be distributed to regular ticket passengers. The pillows flew right and left until he came to two seats with a different slip of paper on the window-shade. He could tell in a second they were riding on a pass, in other words he could tell that the man in the group was a Company employee, like himself. Naturally no pillow found its place there. An elderly man across the aisle, saw what happened and a conversation takes place:

STRANGER—"Pardon me, but didn't that porter who just passed by, forget to leave a pillow for the little boys?"

EMPLOYEE—"No, he didn't forget it, his instructions are: Not to give employees who ride on passes, any free pillows, in other words, I am only an employee and deserve no such luxuries."

STRANGER—"Well, if that doesn't beat all, here take my pillow and let the little boys use it".

PORTER—(Coming back through the car for another load of pillows) "Say mista! Did you pay for that pillow?"

EMPLOYEE—"Why no, this gentleman here, just gave us his."

STRANGER—(Interrupting) "Listen, dark spot, if you take that pillow away from them people, I'll kick you around until you'll need a pillow before you can ever sit down again."

Let us picture a newly-wed man coming home from work later then the usual hour. This would be something like their conversation:

"Honey, you are late to-night, what was the trouble?"

"Oh, we had a job started that had to be finished before it would be safe, and on the way home a couple of freights delayed us some, that's why we were thirty minutes late."

"Will they pay you for being late?"

"Yes, in a good many cases they will, in fact it would be paid in every case if the foreman turns it in, but in our case to-night, the judgement of the foreman was to blame, and he does not want to turn it in, for fear it would look bad on his part." But what is thirty minutes of coming late, so long as it does not happen in the morning. If some in a gang would kick about coming in late, the foreman would soon hate their guts for it."

Some time ago, I overheard a conversation between two A. F. of L. members. One of the two A. F. of L. men, gave to a non-union man in the gang, a "Labor" paper, in which appeared an article dealing with a certain investigation that took place. It seems that some party was investigating the weekly earnings of a big number of extra gang laborers etc. It was found where, in a good many cases, laborers were making less then $13.00 a week. They went on to mention the fact that no track laborer should make less then $15.00 a week. There you have it, from the bottom of some people's hearts, comes the perfect willingness to see you make at least $15.00 per week. Considering present-day food prices, I ask you, is that a sane income for a man with a family?

Fellow section men, you owe it to yourselves, to forget that seventeen year old fake union tragedy and organize in the best union for labor throughout the entire world, the one and only ONE BIG UNION, the I.W.W. Then no longer will you have to be afraid to say a word now and then, as you will no longer be singular in strength. What could be a greater satisfaction then to belong to an organization you could be proud of, one that's interests are wholly in LABOR, and in LABOR alone?

WHAT'S WHAT IN SPAIN

Back of the fight of the mass of Spanish people against the many thousands of mercenaries and conscripts that the Fascist invaders have sent in, is a long struggle for enough to eat, for freedom from exploitation by landlords and capitalists, for knowledge and progress.

It was for these that the Spanish people so thoroughly supported the Socialists and Republicans in 1931 that they ended the monarchy and the dictatorship of Rivera without spilling a drop of blood. People were thrilled at the prospect of constitutional government, civil liberties, the promise of thousands of new schools in a country where 45 per cent were completely illiterate, and above all the promise that the great landed estates would be broken up so that peasants and agricultural wage workers could have enough to eat.

Everyone seemed confident of the future except the then relatively small number of workers who were banded together in the C. N. T. (National Confederation of Labor). They knew that even the best of promises, and those that most urgently needed fulfilling, are not always carried out, in Spain or anywhere else. And so, giving their best wishes to those who wanted the politicians to do something for them, they set out anew after the terrible atrocities to which their union —the Spanish equivalent of the IWW—had been subjected under the dictatorship of Rivera, to organize the workers of Spain to do these things for themselves. Like the I. W. W. they grew, but not fast enough. There were too many people in Spain who spoke of them, as do too many people in America in speaking of the I. W. W.: "They're not practical enough—look how many people we can get to listen to us by hopping on some popular bandwagon, making lots of promises even if we don't organize the power we need."

The unity that ended the dictatorship in 1931 couldn't and didn't last long. The aims of unionists and their Republican employers were directly opposed; the Republicans started playing politics with the church and other land-owning groups. The promise of agrarian reform was not carried out. Direct efforts by workers in the CNT were crushed by force by Caballero. So the reactionary groups started making promises, and in the election of 1933 with the Socialists and Republicans against each other, the reactionaries won out. From December 1933 to February of 1936 these reactionaries were in power. They set aside the constitution. They established a rigid censorship. They turned back education to the narrow confines of the church. The maintained the stranglehold of a few feudal owners over the land of Spain. Women worked for fourteen cents a day on other people's land. Conditions in industry became worse for the workers. Strikes were crushed. In 1934 when a wave of general strikes broke out for better conditions, for division of the great estates, and for regional autonomy as promised in the constitution, some 30,000 workers, largely members of the C. N. T. were put in jail. But the C. N. T. took it all as just so much evidence that the workers of Spain needed One Big Revolutionary Union, and that they could not put their trust in politicians.

The political drift toward the return of Fascism —for that virtually is what Spain had in the days of Rivera—was checked in December of 1935 when political scandals forced Premier Lerroux to resign. President Zamora dismissed the Cortes, and called for elections in February. Republicans and Socialists again banded together in what they called the Popular Action; the C. N. T. that has no hopes in politics wished them well even to the extent of abstaining from all criticism of the electioneering, and most of the members of the CNT went to the polls. It was a big vote. Out of 13,528,809 voters, 9,408,514 cast ballots, giving most of their support to the progressive candidates. The CNT had thousands of its members in jail. It decided not to wait for any politician to let them out, but did its most energetic electioneering ralling masses of people to the jails to free the 30,000 political prisoners. They were completely successful. And the C. N. T. kept on building up its own One Big Union insistently telling the morkers of Spain that if they wanted to be sure that their wishes were carried out they would have to rely on their own organized strength, their own capacity for direct action, and not on the shifting alliances of promising politicians.

The Popular Action politicians set in, restored the constitution, set out again on the school building campaign, their agrarian reform, and their extensive public works for highways, railway electrication, irrigation and housing. Zamora still stayed as president, and all the officers who did not speak out too loudly against the progressive politicians were allowed to remain in command of the army. The CNT repeatedly sounded the alarm that the Spanish people was building its hopes on quicksand. The forces of fascism were quite frank about their plans. Jose Calvo Sotelo, who had been minister of finance under the dictatorship of Rivera, calling all radical proposals "communist agitation" in a country where there were scarcely any communists at all, said: "If there is a moment of great danger from the communist agitation, I believe the army will step in and save it if no politician does." But Premier Azana soothed those who were worried by such threats with the assurance that "fascism is merely the pastime of idle badly brought-up dandies." He didn't even have any of the labor politicians upon whose support he depended in his cabinet, and they, rejoicing now that France too had elected a Popular Front government just like them, said they weren't anxious to run things anyway, as it might frighten capitalism to put radicals in responsible positions.

So by July "this attempt to represent a middle class in a country where there is no middle class to speak of", resulted in the fascists being all ready for their coup. The had their officers all ready to take things over in the various cities, their army basis in Morocco, and their understandings with Hitler and Mussolini all prepared. It was the prompt action of the CNT and their fellow unionists in the UGT that stopped them from an unhindered march to power.

In the gigantic struggle that has gone on since then, the CNT has been in the lead—in the organization of a military force to combat fascism, in furnishing men for battle, in the complete repression of fascist sabotage within the Loyalist territory, in building up Catalonian industry under workers control to furnish the needs of war. Steadily throughout this entire period the policy of the CNT has been shown to be the correct policy. The reason for this is plain. The policy of the CNT is to look straight for the workers' interest only, and not shift from it in search of some compromise with a shifty ally.

In accordance with its straight working class policy, the CNT has kept solidarity with all workers of Spain regardless of their various political preferences and other shades of thought; but it has frequently had occasion to complain that the various labor politicians in whose hands control of national affairs has been placed, has not dealt similarly with it. Supplies have been furnished most injudiciously, attempts have even been made at disarming this armed and organized proletariat, but this has been futile as the industries that the CNT runs, furnish the greater part of the arms that have driven Franco back. The hopes that had been placed in the Popular Front government of France, in the "mother of parliaments" in England, and in the Soviets of Russia, have all met the same fate that throughout this long struggle has befallen all hopes placed in politicians. So the CNT is still saying: Organize for direct action. Organize to control industry. Organize to run things yourselves—for there alone lies freedom. And it has grown to become the major union of Spain.

The support of Spain by workers in all countries has been an important factor in the fight against fascism. Unfortunately this militant, aggressive and most trustworthy National Confederation of Labor has not received much of this support. Most of the unions in the rest of the world belong to the International Federation of Trade Unions, controlled by labor politicians, of the sort that look no further than the French Popular Front that has left Spain the prey of Mussolini. The National Confederation of Labor finds no place for itself in such an aggregation—so the financial support that has been given by workers in the rest of the world, has with the exception of funds sent by the I. W. W. and similar organizations, gone to these bodies who only belatedly have rallied to the fight against their enemy.

Now that defeat faces Fascism, what shall the future of Spain be? Consistently with their dilly-dally policy of compromise, Caballero and his associates say that they aim at nothing more than the nationalization of a few public service industries, and contemplate the return of the industries that Spanish workers have built up and run, to the former employers that left the ship when the workers of Spain refused to lie prostrate before Franco and Mola. The C. N. T. consistently with its record says that to restore this, would be to restore the conditions that begat fascism, that the future of Spain must be one of going ahead with the socialization and workers' control of industry that it has already started.

To our fellow workers in America we submit this frank statement of what is going on in Spain. The record of the CNT is one that justifies confidence in it. Just as its policies in the past have been proven by events to be the ones that warrant working class support, so are we confident that the continuation of its line of straight working class policy, and direct action by workers for workers, will continue to warrant that support. For that reason such donations as the members of the I. W. W. make toward the fight against Franco, have been sent to the Paris office of the C. N. T., care of A. Ganin, 41 Rue de Bellevile, Paris, 19e, France; and we urge that your support, in order that it may go where it will be used by the most reliable element in the present struggle, go to the same address. (Or if sent to the headquarters of the I. W. W. it will be transmitted at the direction of the C. N. T.) Our entire support is unqualifiedly given to this valiant group of our Spanish fellow workers.

For the same reason that we glory in the record of the C. N. T., for the same reasons that we consider it of the utmost importance that as much support as possible should now be given them at this critical time, we similarly urge that all who can see the necessity of such a program of the CNT in Spain, should consider the need for similar organization in America, and becoming members of the Industrial Workers of the World build up an organization such that we may do as well in our fight against any American Hitler, Franco or Mussolini.

IT CAN HAPPEN HERE

By WALTER PFEFFER

One fellow's notion of a stay-in to come.

Aunt Sally was very much perturbed about what the newspapers were saying about the sit-down strikes. Men and women were sitting down in the sawmills out on the coast, miners held the entrances to shafts in Butte and Arizona, and had taken possession of the important pipe-lines from the Panhadle region. Workers were holding parties in the department stores and meat packing plants and machinery factories throughout the east and middle west—and now on top of it all they threatened to go on a sit-down strike in New York's subways tomorrow.

"The government ought to do something about it," said Aunt Sally—and the newspapers agreed with her. (They usually did.) "Unreasonable Demands!" they shrieked in editorial and headlines. "Prompt Government Action Called For" they said while reporting that governors had sent out state troops only to have the troops refuse to shoot or gas their own people. "It isn't just a reluctance to kill" reported one officer but they do not wish to incur the wrath of their neighbors."

Bishops and politicians were offering their services to mediate the innumerable disputes from the pending subway strike to the lock-out of seamen and longshoremen for insisting on the right to back each other up, to the strike on the railroads that the union officials loudly denounced as "outlaw". But their services were everywhere rejected by workers who said it was mediation that had got them into this fix where they had to strike, and by employers who said that until there was a system of responsible unions under government regulation, with sane leaders who could make the men live up to their agreements, there was no sense conducting negotiations. "We cannot give in to their demands. We cannot discuss terms with them while they occupy our property. This is revolution and there is nothing to negotiate." So read a full page announcement by the leading industrialists ending with the standard inquiry "Why Doesn't the Government Do Something About It?"

Labor was equally firm on its own feet according to conversations of sit-down strikers with reporters as given toward the end of the various articles. "Who built these factories anyway?" they asked. "If we built them and work in them, who has a better right than us to live in them if we want to?" "If the corporations can't pay us the wages we ask and run the industries, why shouldn't we take them over and run them ourselves?" That last sort of crack from the sit-downers, reporters regularly referred to as ominous, and pointed out that that was the question the I. W. W. had been spreading across the country in leaflets and stickers when this last wave of strikes began.

"It's an I. W. W. conspiracy to make a revolution," said Aunt Sally in complete agreement with the newspapers, and she lay down the newspaper to say what a bad lot they were. She remembered pictures of them in her younger days, right in the Chicago Tribune, only then they wore whiskers with knives between their teeth and had smoking bombs and newspapers in their hip-pockets. There were pictures of I. W. W.'s in the paper now—decent looking men and women with nothing worse in their hands than brief cases, but she bet that beneath it all they were just as bad as they ever were.

To prove her point there were the statements of all sorts of union officials whose members had gone on strike despite their orders to remain at work. Everyone of them blamed it on the I.W.W. and their propaganda of direct action. There were disclosures by reporters of "secret councils of red professors and government statisticians with I. W. W. leaders" to take inventory of what goods were on hand in the country, what goods could be produced and where, to work out fantastic, Utopian plans of model homes for every family and an income running up to thousands of dollars per year for each. There were even sermons printed in full on the menace to religion and morality that was inherent in this I. W. W. doctrine that everybody could have all that they wanted.

Aunt Sally got so worked up over it all that John who had given up arguing with her way back in the 1920 depression, turned the radio on. But the crooner had got no further than "Next July, in the sky, I'll kiss you" when the announcer gravely said:

"This station has been taken over by the Industrial Workers of the World, on behalf of organized labor in America. The following is an official announcement by this organization:

"To assure accurate information to all regarding the great social changes now under way to assure security and abundance to all, this and every other means of communication has been taken over by the One Big Union of the working class. Because of the unwillingness of the corporations involved to come to satisfactory terms, and because of the general desire of working people to put an end to the confusion and uncertainty in which we have all been living, they are determined not to go back to the conditions that led up to this present stoppage in the production and distribution of goods and services needed by all. To this end, they have asked the General Convention of the Industrial Workers of the World to establish a planned economy of abundance as outlined by their statistical bureaus. To this the I. W. W. has agreed.

"Starting at midnight tonight all industries shut down by strikes or lockouts will resume operations, working on the schedules to which the unions have agreed. These schedules have been worked out by our Committee on Industrial Co-Ordination to fit in with the most urgent requirements of the working class, and will vary considerably in many instances for that reason from the production schedules on which you have been working. Your plant or shop committee will have full information regarding any such changes. Go to work tomorrow morning at your regular place of employment. If you have been laid off for less than a month, report as though you had been regularly employed. If you have been unemployed longer than a month, or otherwise have no regular place of employment report as you will be directed in your local newspapers. Those over fifty and under twenty need not report for work, as they will be paid for not working. If however you who are under twenty or over fifty feel that your absence from your shop would disrupt the present working schedule, you are requested to volunteer your services until other arrangements can be made.

"To all we wish to assure that these great changes are for the benefit of all, and that they will usher in a new era of abundance and happiness for all, and your co-operation in maintaining order and harmony, and your patience with any inconveniences that these changes may entail temporarily, is urged as your contribution.

"There will be regular official announcement over this and all stations day and night, according to their regular hours of operation, and largely according to their habitual language programs. Keep your radio on if you wish to be informed. Lotta Baloney will now continue with his song "In the sky, next July, I'll kiss you."

But John and Aunt Sally did not stop to listen to Lotta Baloney.

For once in twenty years John got to speak first, Aunt Sally was that flabbergasted. "What do you make of that?" he asked. And Aunt Sally was slow in replying: "It does at least sound as though they knew what they were doing." But in a moment the uncertainty dropped out of her voice: "John, run out and get a paper!"

John seemed slow in coming back. She might have known that—it never was safe to let him out of her sight. And as the minutes went by she wondered if some terrible I. W. W.'s had built a guillotine and cut his head off. But no, there was the brute coming up the street now, slow as you please, just as if nothing mattered, reading a paper and stopping to talk to everyone on the way. She went outside and said: "John, come here!" and John completely forgetting that this was the day for the emancipation of the human race came. According to the paper the I. W. W. had a program for everyone except husbands.

Aunt Sally looked at the paper. "PLANNED ECONOMY OF PLENTY BEGINS" it said right across the page, and there were columns of official statements by the I. W. W. and a big announcement in the middle of the page "What To Do Tomorrow Morning" with addresses and telephone numbers for those of different trades if they had no jobs, and for people to call if they needed something and had no money. She held the paper at arm's length saying "Hmph!" while John was trying to tell her what happened at the corner. "Those I. W. W.'s run this too, so you can't believe word of it," she said and began to listen to what John had to say.

"Some fellows tried to rob the cigar store," he said.

"Some of those I. W. W.'s, I suppose," she said.

"No, they weren't it was some I.W.W.'s with white bands on their arms that stopped them."

"Taking the law into their own hands," commented Aunt Sally.

"Well there wasn't any policeman there."

"I suppose those villains have chopped his head off by now. Look here at what they've done—" and she proceeded to read from the paper that there would be no sit-down strike on New York's subways tomorrow, that every thing would run as usual except that the turnstiles into which patrons had to drop a nickle to get in to the waiting platforms would be removed. and everyone could ride free.

"Scandalous!" she said and went on to read that everywhere municipal transportation on regular street cars, subways, L's and buses was to be free; that in New York for instance it took more people to count the change and make sure people paid than it did to run the transportation system, and that they would be given other work to do; that it was considered more economical, and likely to make for greater safety, to have a greatly increased system of municipal transportation giving free service than to have so much use of private cars, and this would discourage their use except for purposes where they were technically better adapted.

"What's scandalous about that?" asked John.

"You know well enough that that two hundred dollars that my aunt Josephine left us is invested in the street car company. If they don't collect fares, how will I get dividends?" she demanded.

"Most likely you won't."

"And that's all we have saved up for our old age. Oh John, what will we do?"

"We won't have anything to worry about. There's going to be plenty for everbody. I'm going to work tomorrow just the same as usual."

"But they don't want anybody over fifty working."

"But there's nobody else can run that steam-hammer right. I'm going to work. In fact I'm going over to Bill's house to talk it over with him." And out he went, Aunt Sally convinced that things had come to a terrible pass when a woman couldn't even run her own husband.

The announcer on the radio interrupted "You're a Honey, You're a Bunny" with news flashes and official releases. First a statement from the Cabinet that while they did not condone the actions taken or announced to be taken as legal, yet they considered it contrary to public policy to use Army or Navy against what was evidently the will of the majority of the people; that the contemplated planned economy was merely an extension of the strike and the stay-in which they had also not considered as legal, and that their policy in this would remain as it had been.

Next came a series of announcements of the enthusiastic approval of the action taken by the I. W. W. Convention from various unions, and the more important factories where sit-down strikes had been in progress, as well as from committees in charge of the various "outlaw" strikes.

This was interrupted by a news flash. Some owner of a rickety wooden sweatshop where a sit-down was in progress had attempted to set fire to the building. The fire had got a start because the fire department had not acted promptly, but it had been put out. The union patrôls had caught the owner and were holding him in a union hall, until it could be determined what should be done with him. Some of the employees had decided to stay in the plant to make sure of its operation under the new One Big Union plan in the morning. They were put on the air to tell their story of what had happened. A girl employee who had got badly burned in trying to put out the blaze explained that he had always been a mean old skinflint, but she never thought he would do anything like this. A union patrol who modestly replied to the announcer's laudatory introduction by saying he had only done his duty explained that, since there had been talk for some time among his fellow unionists about such a step as this workers' control of industry a-coming, they had organized their own patrols to maintain order alike in the industrial, commercial and residential district, just in case the police should be negligent in keeping order in this new order of things, and how he had been suspicious of this man's actions and found him at the back of the building after he had set fire to some rags soaked in gasoline. The local secretary of the textile workers was put on the air to explain that the incendiary employer had been taken into protective custody and kept in the union hall, where on the doctor's advice he had been given a sedative and was resting nicely. He went on to express the opinion that the poor man had found the great social changes going on so rapidly too hard for his nerves, and that as soon as he got adjusted to the new arrangements, he would no doubt become a very desirable citizen. He explained that the unions had considered such instances as this quite likely to occur, and in order to avert any violence resulting from class hatred, had put all the employers and others considered likely to menace security on a parole system; and that should it be necessary to lock them up, they would find the jails much better than they had provided for workers when they had the run of things, for committees in each state were already considering what could be done to decrease the large populations that had accumulated in prison during the declining days of capitalism without menacing the peace of the community, and were planning on making these jails institutions for adjusting men to freer social relations.

Resumption of the regular radio program held no interest for Aunt Sally, and anyway an eye had to be kept on John. It was still light on this early summer evening, so she put on her shawl and went out. It seemed everybody else on that block had done the same—leaving windows and doors open and radios on to make sure they didn't miss what was coming next. They were in groups here and there, arguing and all talking pretty much at once. "Worse than an election," said Aunt Sally "I knew these revolutions never ought to be allowed. I never saw John behave this way before."

There was that windbag Major Woofle in the center of a crowd. "I was always for the workingman," he was saying as someone was jibing him about what the National Guard had done in a strike a couple of weeks ago. She loooked at Mr. Gregarity the undertaker who for once didn't seem to know just what to do, and read in his right eye the hope that somebody would be killed, and in his left the fear that he wouldn't get paid for the burial anyway.

Dwn the street she spied John and Bill in a crowd talking to a fellow who had a white band around his arm and sheafs of different colored papers in his hand.

"Should I stay on relief or report for work?" asked a woman.

"Now that's answered in full on these green pieces of paper, or no, that's the one about personal property, it's on these blue pieces," said the man with the white band. "Let's see, how old are you?"

"None of your damned business," said the woman.

"Well, here a green piece of paper, you figure it out for yourself then."

"I heard some of those I. W. W.'s talking a while back and they said that when the workers ran things, there wouldn't be any more money, that we couldn't get any wages, and that we wouldn't have to pay anything for what we wanted. How about that?"

The pestered man with the many pieces of paper pulled out a white slip headed "Report of Committee on Distribution" and said: "That's the one about that."

"Yes, I know, it was in the papers. They've going to have a new kind of money, and you won't be able to buy anything with the old kind. They're going to make a lot of things free where there's plenty of them and people aren't likely to waste them, but you'll have to pay for clothes and porkchops."

"It's this way" said Bill while the man with the white band and the many pieces of paper took advantage of the opportunity to go ahead with his patrolling. "They had a big discussion whether to let everybody have what they wanted free, or to divide things up amongst everybody, or keep on paying wages and charging prices. They figured it would take eight years to grow enough fruit trees to give everybody all the fruit they were likely to ask for, and so on with a lot of things; that they couldn't pass a resolution for the cows to have more calves without upsetting the milk supply temporarily for instance, and they figured rationing things out would be a nuisance and an interference with liberty and would deprive some people of what they really wanted to make sure that somebody else got his fair share of something he didn't like anyway. So they figured that for the time being they'd make most amusements and all sorts of regular health service, and street car rides and such things free, for you can't get a picture show or street car ride or operation and throw it away without using it very well. But for other things for the time being they'd charge so that if some fellow didn't care much about his house but went in for fancy clothes, he could have his fancy clothes and let somebody else that wanted a good house and was satisfied with the regular line of duds, have the better house . . . that is of course until they can put through their whole building project.

"How come you know so much about it?" asked Aunt Sally.

"Well," says Bill, "I've been an I.W.W. for a long time now."

Aunt Sally figured it was time to take John home, but he wanted to know about this building program.

"Oh, they've been figuring on that for a long time. Read your paper, and you'll see how they want to modernize this town, lay out the streets so there's traffic on some, and just a place for the kids to play on others, so that the factories are all put down by the canal and the railroad tracks, and the people to live out where the air is better. They figure it will take fifteen years to fix up every place in the country like that if we all work a six-hour day and a five-day week, and a bit over 11 years if we work the 40-hour week, and nine years if we work nine hours a day and five on Saturdays. That's what we're to vote on in all the shops tomorrow, whether we want to work harder and get this old world fixed up quicker, or take our time about fixing it up."

People stopped listening to Bill to listen to some more radio announcements. A message from Mexico assuring their co-operation in working out the new American plan for abundance for all. Cables and radiograms from unions in many parts of the world pledging the support of labor in this great undertaking of American labor. An official statement from the Council on World Economic Relations that as circumstances had required a new order of things in which dividends would not be paid, it was technically impossible to separate foreign-owned industrial equipment from the rest of the productive properties, and to avoid any international complications over such matters a special commission was to be established to consider what action it would be necessary to take on this matter; and that those who had any complaints under this score should make them to so-and-so. Then some more about orders placed abroad—these would be paid for in gold on delivery in this country, and, except where it was contrary to the new foreign policy, orders on hand to be filled here would be filled.

Aunt Sally and John went home to listen to a sort of inquiring reporter program. It brought in a group of stockholders insisting that a certain factory was theirs. They were debating with a shop committee. "We own this. See, here we have our stocks, our bonds, our debentures, to show it," said one excited man. "Sure enough," said another, "you just keep your stocks and bonds and debentures in a good safe place if you want to. We'll just keep the factory."

He brought in some place where complaints and inquiries were being made.

"I've worked hard and saved every penny I could to send my boy to college," complained one old lady, "and now you're taking the railroad away from me that I invested my money in."

"Your boy and everybody else's boy that wants to go to college can go there," was the answer, "and we haven't moved that railroad one inch. The only difference is that now if you want to take a trip on it, you can do so, and you won't have to skimp along while your boy is at college."

"But is it fair to let all those other boys go to college when their parents didn't save like I did?" she persisted in asking.

"Most of the boys that have been going to college went there because somebody whose boys didn't go to college did the skimping and saving. Run along now, and don't worry about how you'll spend all the new money you'll be getting."

"I'm not kicking," said a man, "but here's what got me. For years I've been wanting to buy a certain cello, but everytime I thought of taking my money out of the bank when I had enough to buy it, I began worrying about the years when I couldn't earn any more, and so I never bought the cello. Now my money will be no good. If I had bought the cello, then, according to these new regulations on personal property it would be mine so long as I had any use for it; and now I have money that's no good, and no cello."

"If you'd been run over by a street car and gone to Heaven with your money in the bank, I suppose you'd be making the same complaint about your cello," he was told. "You're in the same fix as a lot more people who have been encouraged to save and save and save by our late but not lamented crazy economy. The more you saved, the harder it was to find markets for goods, and the harder it was consequently for you or anyone else to get work. Now you want a special reward for having made your own lives and the lives of others drabber than they need have been. But we don't blame you—we blame the crazy system. And while I can't guarantee you your cello, especially if it's some particular cello and not something that can be manufactured in quantity, you'll have plenty, and no worries, and a better chance to hear all the good music you want, and a better chance of getting what instruments you want than ever before."

"I've got a boy in jail," complained another woman, "because he was always stealing things. Now I know the only reason he took them was because he either wanted them or wanted to sell them. Now that he won't be able to sell them if he took them, and won't want to steal things when he can get them without stealing, why won't they let him out of jail?"

"Maybe they will. They have ordered the release of all labor prisoners already, and they are going over every prison inmate's record carefully to release all that they can without endangering the community. You wait a week or two, and you'll probably hear about your son if he isn't home by that time."

Then the radio brought in a group of bankers in the county jail singing, "Hail, Hail, the Gang's All Here."

"Hmph. A pretty situation," opined Aunt Sally, "turning dynamiters like Tom Mooney loose, and putting the bankers in jail overnight. I'm going to bolt every window in this house before I go to bed. I was going to do the washing tomorrow but with this pesky revolution going on, I suppose I'll have to stay up here and keep my ears open."

"Why don't you take your clothes to the laundry, Sally?"

"What—and have my petticoats socialized! I should say not!"

And so the revolution went on. The new authority in the land was labor. Labor organized in One Big Union. Here and there a few maniacs who considered it sinful for everybody to have plenty had to be put into "protective custody". Berghoff violated his parole conditions and had to be locked up. Some farmers had figured in accordance with the plans of some secret society to which they had belonged for years, to come into town and overthrow the wicked cities to protect the virtue of their wives and their pig-pens, but when they came they were taken to see some new farm equipment to pick and choose from, and sent home with some dresses and bonnets for their wives, and given a lecture by the new county agent about how they could run their farms the way they had been if they wanted to, but could get a much better standard of living if they would conduct farming as a great co-operative enterprise the same as the workers in the cities were conducting manufacture. Lumberjacks cut Douglas fir on the Olympic peninsula, workers in sawmills cut it to the standard sizes and shapes that were needed, miners dug copper in Butte and Arizona, oil wells were pumped in Oklahoma, railroad men brought cattle to Omaha and Chicago, in every city whole blocks of hovels were wrecked and new homes erected in accordance with new city planning schemes (that had really been gathering dust in city engineers' offices for years). And it was all done to fit in with a tremendous schedule that had been approved by the workers in all these industries.

Some weeks later an inquiring reported scratched his head to think up something for a feature story that nobody else would ever think of. He stirred with a bright idea and grabbed the phone to get a general information bureau. "Say, what's happened to the government, anyway?" he asked. "Oh, it's still around somewhere, though almost everybody has forgotten about it. Some of the officials came around to look for new jobs, and the big buildings with all the social security records

Hitler Over Russia by Ernst Henri.—2.50.

History of the Russian Revolution by Leon Trotsky.—Simon and Schuster, New York.

As far back as ten years ago the communists were talking of the dangers of a capitalist invasion of The Soviet Union. At that time I discounted much of this as alarmist and exaggerated hysteria. With no change in domestic political thought but with a wider world perspective, I now concede the threatened war upon the USSR as highly probable within the next year or so. Germany is in the forefront of this projected drive.

In Hitler Over Russia we do not have a recital of unsupported statements, but rather a volume of substantiated facts, pages documented with footnotes.

For the first time the reading public is given the inside facts regarding the Hitler blood purge of June 30th 1934. At the time it was said that it was a forcible cleansing of undesirable elements, degenerates, from Nazi ranks. Now we learn that it was a ruthless extermination of the leaders of the expectant middle classes, from within the DSDAP. A sellout to the Thyssen Steel Trust.

With the middle class supporters betrayed, the workers trampled under foot, rearmament for the crusade against Bolshevism began at a feverish pace. An economic battle was fought with Mussolini for the iron ore of Austria with all its political reflections, Hitler lost. Alliances were made with the semidictatorial states of Europe for a Fascist League.

The Schlieffen Plan for advance on France is abandoned in favor of the Hoffmann Plan for an Eastern crusade on Russia.

General Hoffmann was the commanding officer of the German Army in its defeat of the Tsarist armies on the eastern front during the last war. Emulating Napoleon, this general conceived a plan for the conquest of European Russia with all its mineral and agricultural wealth. The plan was discounted by the best of Germany's military brains. Yet the madmen of the Nazi regime, Hitler and Goering adopt it and are zealously working toward its fulfillment. Will Germany win with the help of their Fascist allies? The economic resources and military and civil morale of the Soviet Union are unsurpassed. Genuine facts marshalled by Henri makes his conclusions seem logical.

History To Taste

This three volume in one history by Trotsky is on the quality list of the publishers. It is the policy of leading publishers to publish at a loss, non-fiction of an enduring character in order to maintain their prestige.

For years the publishers have been pushing this history by Trotsky. Its sales have never been large, and certainly have shown no profits, or royalties. Now comes the 1400 page issue at a bargain price. Simon and Schuster may yet find a large reader public for this partisan history.

During the past fifteen years I have followed the history of the new Bolshevik nation and have read much of its history. Yet Trotsky writes his facts different than all the rest. One writer who cannot be accused of animosity or partisanship, William Henry Chamberlain, in his history of the Russian Revolution as far as he has gone, differs widely from Trotsky. Chamberlain was Moscow correspondent for the Christian Science Monitor from shortly after the October Revolt of 1917. I would suggest that both works be read and then decide for yourself.

in them have been turned over for the use of the current inventory records and production schedules of the Committee on Technical Co-Ordination. The Bureau of Patents is at work checking up on a lot of good ideas that had been bought up to make sure that they weren't made use of . . . and the weather bureau hasn't missed a single report during the entire revolution."

"But haven't we any government—any congressmen to protest to—any Senators to demand that something be done about it all?"

"Oh no, they all got themselves good jobs tinkering around at some hobby of theirs right after the revolution started. They made some queer choices, too. The vice-president joined a circus, four senators and three representatives went into jazz bands, a bunch more went farming, and, oh yes, this might be copy for you—five of them at last are satisfying long suppressed desires to be smokestack painters."

THE END.

AMERICA MUST HAVE ITS NEWS

By

Eugene M. Fisher

You hear the sullen, warning mutter of the mob before your battered little car ever reaches the courthouse square. You hear it rise and fall, like the measured beat of stubborn waves on a harsh, bare shore, and you step on the gas to get there before that mutter swells to an angry roar. You've come to report a trial, and no mob is going to cheat you out of a story by seizing its victim before you arrive.

Then you swing into Main Street and see that your fears are baseless. There may be a lynching, in spite of the khakied troopers who hold the courthouse steps, but at least you're in time for it. You try to force your cheap coupe through the press of men and women and kids, and a few make way for you, resentfully. You stop, climb down, and try to push through the crowd on foot, but now no one opens a path for you. You have to fight for every step you take. One big, thin fellow with a dirty felt hat pulled over his colorless eyes curses you for prodding him.

"God-damn' bastard!" he snarls, and you're mad enough to hit him, but you don't. He's big, and hard, and among his friends, and you're not. You wouldn't have a chance. Someone else chimes in.

"Who 'n hell 's he think he is? Slap 'im down, Jerry."

That someone else isn't Jerry's type at all. He's short and round and well fed, with thick rimless glasses above his queer button nose. Well dressed, too, and his cheeks are red and fat, unsearred by the wind and sun and want that brand Jerry's face. But Jerry doesn't slap you down. He merely sneers, and you're not sorry.

Then a sudden hush whips you in the face, and above the brief hot silence of the mob you can hear a cardinal trill his gay song. You stop, startled, and almost miss the reason for this break in the crowd's mutter. Right at your side an armed gang tramps past. Six men in soiled and rumpled clothes. They all wear black felt hats, wide-brimmed; butts of long-barreled six-guns show above holsters and hip pockets. Sheriff's deputies, and they shuffle along with eyes on the ground like men ashamed of what they do.

For one hopeful second you think they're ashamed of their fellow-townsmen, ashamed of the blood-hunger that grips this mob. Then you get a good look at one of them. He's as big as that fellow Jerry, only his shoulders are wider and his body's filled out more. Behind you a woman shrills: "Lookout Jim Bell, will yuh? Reckon he'd shoot down his own kin tuh save a damn' nigger."

Jim Bell must be the one you've been watching. He raises his head and you can see misery deep in the wide gray eyes of him.

"I can't he'p whut I got tuh do, Sis."

The woman's at your elbow now. Scrawny she is, and none too clean. Her yellow hair hangs ragged about her thin face, and the yellow teeth she shows are ragged, too.

Then you see a squad of soldiers close behind the deputies. Soldiers? Well, they're wearing soldiers' clothes, anyway. Mere kids. Boys. Eighteen. Nineteen, maybe, or twenty. Not one of them any older, except that swaggering bravo with the shiny belt over his shoulder. These kids feel their importance; you can see that. They don't belong in this town, so they can be a little tougher than Jim Bell dares to be. Sometimes they shove too-eager natives aside with hard rifle butts. One blue-eyed youngster isn't doing any showing, however. His face is dead white and you can guess just how scared he is. He's biting his lip. He notices you and sees the sympathy you feel. He thinks that sympathy's for him, and he tries to grin, and fails, and bites his lip again.

Now, inside the square these uniformed kids have made, you see a colored boy stumble. He isn't very large; the soldiers almost conceal him from you and he crouches lower, trying to hide. Big eyes bulge in the pasty gray face and his cuffed hands are clenched, held tight against his thin chest as if in prayer. You try to catch his eye, let him know that he has one friend here, but he won't look up.

You find time to wonder why this picture comes to you in jerky scenes. You want to see it whole, to seize the meaning of it, but you can't because you're a part of it. Then you don't want to see it at all. You know a sudden nausea that makes you fight to get out of this crowd, out of this town, out of this whole damned country where men hunt men like wolves after a cripple deer. But you can't get out. This is your country, and if this isn't your town, it's a town just like yours. These are your people. They salute the same flag and smoke the same brand of cigarettes.

Cigarettes! God, for a smoke right now! The fragrance of tobacco might cleanse the air of some of the stench that's in it. You don't just smell that stench; you feel it. The stench of stale sweat, of unwashed bodies thrust against your own. Even these creatures' greed for murder has a stench that you can feel.

But you've a job to do. You fall in behind the last khaki-wrapped kid and follow the path that's being cut toward the courthouse steps. You see Jim Bell and his fellow deputies mounting those steps. The crowd sees them, too, and now as the climb begins the crowd can see that frightened black boy where he cringes among his guards. The mutter you've heard leaps into the roar you knew was coming. Words are being shouted, but you can't distinguish them. All you can hear is that terrible formless roar like the deep-chested thunder of storm on the Florida keys.

The madness of that chorus chills you and you try to push on faster, but you can't of course. You're on the long flight of stone steps now yourself. Above you wait the uniformed youngsters who have been holding the courthouse doors all this while, and you breathe more easily, thinking that surely the danger is past for a time.

Then, like storm winds whipped from a ready sky, the mob drives you forward. Howling men swirl past you. Arms beat against you like flails. You catch one glimpse of that scrawny woman with the yellow hair; she's screaming like all these other beasts, and you're cursing, too, just as they are, even though it be for another reason. The khakied kids about that young Negro hold fast for one short, hideous instant before they break and run. One of them goes down under that hurricane of booted feet.

From them doorway rifles bark, just once, and you wonder dimly if anyone's been hit. Your hat's gone. Your coat's in ribbons, and you try to remember how that happened. Something in faded blue overalls knocks the breath out of you with a bare, sharp elbow. You battle to keep from being trampled and try to climb toward the doors that second squad is guarding.

But not even those kids are there any more. They've all vanished. Scurried inside the courthouse doors and bolted them shut. Jim Bell and his mates are gone, too. You wonder what has become of the handcuffed prisoner; then the mob's roar tells you. There's a new note in that roar —a note that's not so new, after all. You know what it means, well enough.

The crowd about you melts as swiftly as it grew. There's no one near you but a whimpering kid in khaki nursing a broken arm. It's the blue-eyed youngsters, the one that bit his lip and couldn't grin. You turn to help him; then you remember why you're here. You came to get a story, but a long string of cars is carrying away the story you came to get. Cars of every known make and vintage. The people in those cars are making news, too— news that other people like them will want to read at home tonight while the steak's being fried. Read, and tell, and roll on their tongues like rich food.

You curse again, half aloud, and the cardinal's carol comes gaily once more from the trees on the courthouse lawn.

"CONSPIRACY TO RAISE WAGES"

By M. W. JACKSON

When this country was younger, a legal weapon used against the struggling workers was conspiracy to raise wages.

In 1741 the first trial of which there is record for this crime occurred. In New York city certain journeymen bakers were tried and convicted for conspiracy not to bake until their wages were raised. Records do not show what their sentence was.

The next case of which there is definite record took place in Philadelphia in March, 1806, before the mayor's court. The indictment stated that the eight defendants "not being content to work and labor in that art and occupation at the usual prices and rates for which they were used and accustomed to work and labor; but contriving, and intending to increase and augment the prices and rates usually paid and allowed to them and other artificers, workmen, and journeymen in the said art and occupation, and unjustly to exact and procure great sums of money for their work and labor in the said art and occupation, etc." The jury found the defendants "guilty of a combination to raise their wages," and they were fined

$8 each, with costs of suit, and they were to stand committed until paid. The defendants in this case were boot and shoe makers.

Beginning December 16, 1909, DeWitt Clinton, mayor of New York City, and two associate justices heard the case of James Melvin and others. One count of the indictment stated, "That the defendants did conspire that none of them should, after the 18th of October, work at any lower rate than for any master or employer." The defendants in this case offered to show: 1. That long prior to the strike or turn-out there existed a combination of the masters to lower wages. 2. That the wages and rates contended for were reasonable and no higher than to afford them a bare subsistence. 3. That the masters made excessive profit on the labor of the workmen.

The first and third of these offers of the defendants were not received as evidence on the ground that the action of the masters would not justify the workmen, and the second was not allowed because the prosecution had not charged otherwise. The defendants were found guilty and fined $1 each and costs.

In December, 1815, in Allegheny county, Pa., a number of cordwainers were placed on trial for a conspiracy to raise their wages. The indictment charged the defendants, "Unlawfully conspired and agreed together to form and associate themselves into a society, . . . that they would not do or perform any work as journeymen cordwainers unless for such prices as they, the said conspirators, should agree upon and regulate; that they would not permit any journemen cordwainers who were members of said society to work in the employment of any person, unless for such wages as the said society should agree upon and regulate, and that they, the aid conspirators, would withdraw from the service and employment of any master cordwainer in said borough who would not pay them such wages as they in their said society might agree upon and regulate . . ." The defendants were found guilty.

In a trial for conspiracy in Philadelphia in 1821, Judge Gibson ruled, "Every association, therefore, is criminal whose object is to raise or depress the price of labor beyond what it would bring if left without artificial excitement."

In 1827 in Philadelphia, 25 journeymen tailors were indicted for conspiring to demand higher wages for themselves and others and with conspiring to compel the re-employment of five journeymen who had been discharged by Robb and Winebrenner for demanding higher wages. The defendants were found guilty on the third count of the indictment, conspiracy to compel Robb and Winebrenner to re-employ the five discharged journeymen, and not guilty on seven other counts. The case was appealed and the final result is unknown.

According to a newspaper account in 1830, "A trial of journeymen shoemakers has lately taken place in Franklin county, Pa., on a charge of conspiracy. The testimony adduced established the facts that there was a society existing in the county, which, by its members, had given great vexation during the last summer to their employers; had attempted to raise their wages; had compelled their employers to fix on a bill of prices from which none dare vary; that they compelled their employers to agree that they would employ no one who was not a member, etc., etc. The jury found the men guilty, and the court fined them in the mitigated penalty of $10 for one and $5 for the other.

In 1836 in New York city 21 journeymen tailors were brought to trial charged with striking for higher wages and preventing others from working except for the prices fixed by the tailors' union. A Report of the Bureau of Statistics of New Jersey published in 1885 reported regarding this case, "Judge Edwards in his charge impressed on the minds of the jury that the case was not to be considered a 'mere struggle between master and journeymen.' It was one on which the harmony of the whole community depended. 'Let these societies only arise from time to time,' he said, 'and they will at last extend to every trade in the city, and there will be as many governments as there are societies. 'There was', he continued, 'no necessity for such societies. Combinations were not necessary in this country for the protection of mechanics or any other class. They were of foreign origin, not in harmony with our institutions or the character of the people.' He believed they were mainly upheld by foreigners. The jury agreed with the court and the defendants were sentenced to pay fines ranging from $150 for the president of the union to $100.00."

One hundred years ago the same type of narrow-visioned persons as today were hurling the same epithets that are being hurled today. At that time when the President of the United States, himself, was not an American by birth patriots were saying, "Unions are of foreign origin, not in harmony with our institutions or the character of the people."

Mankind has progressed much in the last one hundred years. Where a century ago two men would stand up and demand higher wages, and be arrested for "conspiracy to raise wages"; today the militias are inadequate to cope with the men who say, "Sit down and watch your wages go up"; and tomorrow no army on earth will be able to stop the working class when it says, "We are ready to claim our own!"

Murmansk

By A. YOURNIEK

An I. W. W. seaman completes his sketch of misadventure as a prisoner of the Allies in their undeclared war on the Soviets.

The Norwegian border was about six miles away, and the woods were a mile or so in that direction. The place where we gathered wood would be the ideal spot to disarm the Serbians, and the trip to the border would take us no more than two hours, may be less. By the time our escape had been discovered, we'd be half way across.

Another plan was to start our break in camp some neight, for only a few soldiers stayed awake. We'd overpower those on guard duty, take their rifles, and the rifles from the rack in the hallway, imprison the rest of the Serbians who were asleep in the other end of the building, and start our walk to Norway. We wouldn't be discovered until morning.

The trouble with both plans was that something more than guards and rifles held us prisoner. Most of the men had family ties, and feared that their families would suffer. Moreover the hope was always held before us that the English would look into our cases individually, and free us, as some had already been freed. So we kept discussing these plans until 500 more Britishers marched into camp. The border patrols were strengthened, and our hopes of escape fizzled into a dream.

With the Armistice the white guards were sent to Finland but the rest of us were kept. It was cold and miserable. The Britishers were wrapped up in so many clothes that they could hardly move. They had specially made Arctic shoes which they put on with twelve pair of socks. Over everything they pulled the long American sheepskin coats, and then their own overcoats.

A group of men were given their freedom and sent away. They never got home. They were killed by the white guard Russians. Eventually the news of our comrades' murder leaked into camp. The next batch of prisoners to be released refused to go. The British understood that we were wise to their trick; they had thought that they could send the men away and have them shot, and thus wash the crime off their own hands by blaming it on the inability of the Soviets to give adequate protection to their citizens.

Conditions kept getting worse for us prisoners. Some talked of a hunger strike. In Archangel or some other large town it might have attracted attention to our plight and had some effect. But in Petchinga, at the tip of the World, and thousands of miles away from any civilized center, it would be futile. We would all starve to death, and nobody would know or care about it.

The newspapers that the English soldiers were getting from "dear old Blighty" were now full of world news—Hungary, Bavaria, and Latvia had become soviet countries. We were shifted to another prison camp at Alexandrovsk, taken there in trawlers. Here flogging of the prisoners was common. The buildings were overcrowded, and we and a host of newcomers had to sleep on the floor. Many of the late comers were former members of the soviets that had supported the Allies against the Bolsheviki. There was an old Jew in the camp, a watchmaker by trade. He had been deported from England where he had lived for thirty years. He landed in Musmansk and opened a small shop for repairing watches. When the Allies occupied Murmansk, the English had him arrested again, and sent him to this prison at Alexandrovsk. There he died of exposure, the kind of exposure that we experienced.

The other end of the camp was occupied by French and Italian soldiers, prisoners too, because they had rebelled on the Archangel front. They were sick and tired of fighting. Many had been sent to other camps and later transferred to Petchinga. We heard too that the Americans were withdrawn from the front, because they were also considered "untrustworthy". This left the British, Serbians and Russians to do the fighting, and the British weren't in very high spirits either. I could see that from actual contact with the soldiers over us. Standing guard over their former allies was evidently distastful, yet they readily enforced discipline.

A few days later a number of us were returned to Murmansk, but not a single acquaintance of mine was among them. The battleship Chesna was laying to her dock. She had been reconverted into a prison ship, and had already become known for her torture chambers. All third degree punishment was carried out on her, because no moans or shouts could escape her hold. On the Chesna were a couple of old friends from Petchinga. One was Dashkow, a former officer in the Tsar's army who had turned Bolshevik. He had run away from the prison camp, secured a false passport, and was living in that region. When he was caught he was given an awful beating because he would not tell where he had got the passport. The other old acquaintance was the sailor Borisov. He was beaten up too, and when he recovered he was sent to Alexandrovsk.

We were put in a camp in the back of the town. I was made a sort of foreman over the Russians. We worked under English carpenters building more barracks, and were always kept within the enclosure. Others though, whose job was to fetch the material in the camp, were going all over the town, though of course under guards. This gave them a chance to run away, and many of them skipped.

The camp was under the charge of an officer, formerly a London policeman. He was a pretty fair chap, and all of us got along with him pretty well. He in turn was under the military commander of Murmansk, Dunstan, who was noted as a strict disciplinarian. Every time anyone skipped, Dunstan would barge into camp, bawl us out and threaten to punish us all. One day he carried out his threat by withdrawing our daily rations. We countered by refusing to go to work. The rations were quickly re-issued, for the commander wanted the barracks finished.

Some friction existed between the British and Americans. The American consul took a bunch of men from the camp and put them to some kind of work on a railroad, and everybody wanted to work for the Americans. I wrote a letter to the consul for I wanted to work for him too. It wasn't answered. I wrote another letter, and neither was it answered.

A while later, after I had turned down a proposition to go on sergeant's pay as translator, because I suspected there was something fishy about it, the guard was taken over by a Captain Woods. He told us that he had been a prisoner of war in Germany and knew what it was like, and would treat us the best he could. He confided to me about the two letters I had sent the American consul. They were kept back because of charges against me. According to him I was charged with being an agitator against the Allies, and charged with Admiral Kellinsky's murder, and that anyway as an organizer for the I. W. W. I was therefore not the kind to be let loose.

One day Major Dunstan came with a young Russian officer to let us know that henceforth any runaways would be severely punished. He threatened the death penalty. Too many were running away. At work there was only one guard for every ten or twenty prisoners. Some had a chance to slip away to the nearest barracks. There they managed to shave off beards and issue forth new men with the proper permission of residence in their pockets.

In the camp there was a former road engineer at Kem, Pesnikov, who, though opposed to the soviets, turned against the Allies when they disbanded them, and not daring to persecute him as a defender of the soviets, they tagged him as a German spy. For a couple of hours, every night, he would be taken out, asked questions to which he could give no answers, then led by soldiers to an open grave, then back to the barracks.

One of the oddities of the camp was a national monarchist. He had served in the navy, and like many others he had come to Murmansk to escape the Bolshevik authorities. For a while he worked on the railroad to hide his identity. When the Allies occupied Murmansk he discovered his laborer's garb and became one of the town's leading lights. He wanted the soviets abolished; but once his wish was fulfilled, he abhored the fact that the British were the real masters of the country, and his countrymen only figureheads. Uultimately his carping and disagreements brought the wrath of the new authorities on his head. He was arrested and tossed into this camp filled with his enemies, the Bolsheviki and their sympathizers. At times in his opposition to the Allies he talked like a Bolshevik. One day the prosecuting attorney came from Archangel to look into our cases, and this monarchist had his chance to lay his case before him. A few days later, he and some others who had been imprisoned for minor offenses, were released. When he came back to pick up his pack he let me in on what he thought was a secret: "Our men," he said, "are going ahead and in a short time they'll be in Petrograd." By "our men" he meant the Allies, against whom he seemed to feel no bitterness now that he was released.

As we began to get more news from the outside world, escape became all the more urgent. It seemed plain the British would not be able by themselves to hold out very much longer; and in the evacuation they would turn things over to the monarchists, who in their hatred and return to power, would make short shrift of us. We had to get away.

By this time discipline among the soldiers was at a very low ebb. Many were punished daily for laxity, and particularly for paragraphs in their letters on matters that their superiors considered none of their damn business.

On Sundays we carried our blankets out in the open and aired them, and we were permitted to stay outside too.

This Sunday none of the soldiers felt any too good. All night they had been carousing and celebrating the signing of peace with Germany. Here was our chance. When we had our blankets stretched out, no one a thousand feet away could make out what was taking place behind them. The bedding would serve as an excellent screen for the first break. We held a conclave, and found that only two were ready for the break; others were willing to give us a hand.

We placed some planking over the barbed wire fence. I was the first to leap over it. Reno came after. When I jumped and hit the ground, I passed out. When I came to, I thought I had been shot. With the barracks only 500 feet away that could easily have been done. But it seems I must have just landed on a rock and been injured at bit.

After a few minutes we made for the woods. The further we got, the deeper the brush was. In time we climbed over the first mountain and made our way to the South. We had already agreed to make for the Norwegian border.

We came to a river. It was pretty wide for a river it narrowed, though, somewhat, further down and we thought we could get across in that point.

We stepped into the river and began to wade across, and when we got to our chest in water the current became too strong. Doubtless if we went further, the current would buouy us up and carry us to the Kola nearby, where the river emptied into the bay.

We turned back. We went a bit further and picked a safe sunny spot. There we undressed and laid our clothes out to dry in the sun and went to sleep.

When we were awake again we decided to walk only during the nights, though the nights were as bright as the days and the sun was always shining. But in the nights it was always cooler and there weren't many people around.

We had heard of that river from our comrades in the camp.

Further up the river there was a railroad bridge. It was guarded by the British and we had to give it a wide birth.

In the evening we saw a boat scudding on the widest part of the river coming toward us. Presently it stopped and the two men in it began to fish.

Here was our chance. We discussed the proposition we'd make to these men. We called them over. We had a gun apiece and about 60 bullets between us.

The best we would agree upon was: that they being good, simple people, the chances were that they would take us over without demanding any explanations from us. But in the event they demanded papers or such stuff from us, we'd do the next thing possible and row across ourselves. We were becoming quite desperate. By now, we surmised, our escape would have been discovered and Murmansk would be upside down.

We agreed beforehand that when we got into the boat Reno would sit on the bow so he would have a better chance to draw; and I would take my place between the two men facing the other man on the stern.

They came over. We asked them if they would take us over to the other side. They immediately agreed. We stepped into the boat and took the stations we had agreed upon beforehand.

The fellow sitting on the stern talked first.

"We saw you fellows this morning and thought you might want to get across. But we were afraid to come over to you because there were too many people on the road. Now everything is alright."

It turned out that this man was a Latvian engineer on the nearby railroad. He lived there too, with some other workers.

When we got to the other side they told us the direction we should take. We told them we were on our way to Kandalashka. But when out of sight we walked the opposite way.

The bay above Kola was pretty long and we walked all night. At the end of it we could make out a few houses. Finally we came to a stop before another river.

On the other side of the bank there was a house and a boat graveled on the shore. Nearby there was a man. We shouted to him. He came over and took us to the other side. He was a native Karelian and spoke Russian poorly. He was a good fellow and told us the natives hated the British because of their tax collectors. He said, "The Bolshevicks left us alone but now every chicken is marked in a book and we have to pay taxes for them."

He gave us breakfast and told us to follow the river until we came to a village where they would tell us how to get over to Vaidacube. We did as he told us. We came to the village but couldn't talk to the inhabitants at all. Nobody could talk Russian. Finally a boy came to us. He could speak Russian. We told him where we wanted to go and he told that to the standers by. But they only shook their heads, and talked among themselves. We could see there was something wrong here. The boy then told us that there was no road there and that the country past the village was wilderness and that if we tried to go over that we'd never get over to the coast. Finally they began to see who we were. They spoke among each other for awhile. Then the boy said: "We're from Drenevo. We have a boat moored here and we are going over tonight," and that they would take us over with them and put us on the right road.

We were a bit hesitant about this offer because going to Drenevo we would have to go by Kola, and Drenevo wasn't far from Murmansk but just on the other side of the bay. We told them we didn't want to go to Murmansk but they assured us that the dock guard was one of their own men and that everything would be alright.

We accepted their offer and shortly after we were glad that we did. We landed at Drenevo about two in the morning. We came down the bay pretty fast. We passed the English garrison at Kola no farther than a stone's throw.

Landing at Drenevo we were met by a militia man on the dock. They said a couple of words in their own language. The militia man nodded his head which we took to mean that everything would be O.K. We helped the fishermen carry the food they fetched over from the farms to their home. And the women made up something, quickly enough, to eat and about an hour later we were on our way. The boy followed us out to show the way.

We walked nearby Murmansk. The warships were quietly laying on the bay. A balloon was up, and we became actually frightened that they might spy us. About six o'clock we came off the road and picked out a safe spot where we went to sleep. Towards evening we started off again and kept a good lookout behind us.

We had to climb up mountains again. One had snow on the top. The walk was hard. Up the mountain and down the valley again, and up the mountain and down the valley. And every top we climbed, the other one got just a little higher. Finally we came to the snow capped one. And not until we were on our way down we began to see the nice things that the mountains are supposed to have. Yet we would have to climb some more before we came to the seacoast. Then we picked the telephone track. This we followed until we again came to another river. It was a large one and with a strong current.

There we had to build a kind of a raft from a couple of logs. We tied these logs together with some branches, piled our clothes upon the raft and swam across holding with one arm onto the raft.

We landed not very far away from our road and the raft was better than getting our clothes wet. This was the only time we had to do this. The other rivers across our way were small and shallow.

Finally we came within the view of houses. It turned out to be a small village. We got some bread, butter and milk.

At last we came to the shore. Many motor and sail boats were there. We went into a house and inquired where we could get a boat for Norway. We found only women in the house. We introduced ourselves as Norwegian and American journalists. They gave us something to eat.

After a while a man came in. The woman told him about us. He looked at us with suspicion and wouldn't talk. He shunned us. Finally he said the boats they had were only for fishing and they weren't permitted to go to Norway. "But," he said, "you may find somebody further down, where the boats are larger and have permits for Norway." As soon as we got through eating we left.

Towards evening we came to another village. We made for the first house. To our surprise we found one of our former brother prisoners. He had been released and was sure glad to see us. It happened to be Saturday that day and he was visiting his relatives. He was living in another village. We told him we wanted to get over to Norway and he promised to help us. "Some of our boys are going over there tonight and they'll take you over with them," he said. We told him of the house in the last village and described the conduct of the master and he looked worried. He said that that man was the local representative of the present government and that he was largely responsible for his arrest, along with that of the other members of the soviets.

We felt sore that of all the houses we had to stumble in that stool pigeon's.

Our task was now to go as far and as fast as possible. They gave us supper and after that he informed us that the boys had decided not to go to Norway this week. This news sounded phony to us. We suspected they were in this smuggling business too. But we couldn't make them to go if they didn't wanted to.

They gave us plenty of food to take along with us, and a young woman of about 20 years of age came with us to show us the way to the next village. The village was about 10 kilometers away. She walked with us for about a half an hour and we talked about the new society with her. We bid her bood-bye and she wished us all the luck in the world.

We came to the other village about one o'clock in the morning. There were many sailboats laying at anchor in the harbor. Many light skiffs too gravelled high and dry on the beach. Without delay or hesitation we decided to push one of the skiff to the water and row out to one of the sailboats, make sail and make for our destination.

But a dog made such a rumpus that we feared it would wake the whole population of the village. Everytime we put our hands on the skiff he would bark. We'd have him shot but the pistol's report would rouse somebody and that saved him.

We were about to give up when we heard the squeak of an opening door. A man came out of it and walked towards us. He recognized us right away. We had met at Petchinga where he was digging trenches for the Allies. He invited us inside and warned us that the militia man was in town, but he was staying for the night in one of the houses further up the creek. This wasn't welcome news and the least thing that we desired just then was to come face to face with an officer of the law. But our host assured us that we weren't in danger and that everything will be all right. He said that this village was about seven miles from Petchinga and no telephone connections between the towns; and that the militia man had to be very careful because none liked him. He came here to recruit men for the White Army and all the young men had taken it on the run; they were in hiding among the woods.

We let him know that we wanted to get to Norway. We had no business in Petchinga. We were looking for a boat to take us to Norway and we were willing to pay the price.

He promised to do all he could to help us. In the morning a fellow was leaving for a village close to the border and he would try to straighten things out for us so we could go with him. Then he handed us a reindeer skin. We were dog tired, stretched the hide out on the floor and ourselves upon it. It felt comfortable and we went to sleep.

In the morning the fellow who was to sail for the village next to the border came to the house and consented to take us along, and we sat down to have a farewell breakfast with our friend.

By the time the breakfast was over the news of our presence was spread and I was surprised at the large group that had gathered outside of the house to have a look at us. Among them I recognized the militia man.

I talked with some of the people about the Allies, Kolchack, Deniken, the Bolshevicks, for some time, when our boat showed up. We were picking our things from the floor when I noticed the militia man's face turn white, blue and red.

He was on the spot. As the representative of law it was his duty to have us arrested. But he knew that such an attempt would be his unmaking. Reno's gun was strapped hanging down his side in plain view. He had to put up some kind of a show, though.

He made what he considered a bold stand: he asked for our passports. I pulled out of my pocket the American seamen's certificate. He looked at it, professionally like, but I knew he couldn't understand a word of it. Then he pulled a note book out of his pocket and asked my name. I said it. As he was jotting it down his hand was shaking like a leaf in the wind. Then coming right up against me, with low voice, he said: "I've to do this as a bluff. I got to show these people my authority. Then he asked me of my partner's name. He scribbled something under the names and shouted out aloud: "Alright, gentlemen, you can go on your way. Your papers are in order."

We got into the boat and as we sailed away the people were standing up in bunches on the shore.

We didn't come to the next village until two hours later. We went ashore and had something to eat and some of the townfolk invited us to stay for the night. But no militia man could be trusted. He knew where we were headed for. Petchinga was only a short distance from here and he could have been there by this time. We decided to keep on on our way.

We paid the boatman the sum that was agreed upon, 500 rubles, and left. The way over was hard walking. We had to climb over many hills. Finally we decided to look for a place for the night. We found one and there we lay until the morning.

At dawn we started off again. There was a village ahead of us, the Warima. This village was closely by the Russian border and it was best that we should keep clear of it. On the border about Warima six patrolmen were stationed.

Just after descending a steep mountain we crossed a river. The water was cold and we waded over with it on our shoulders.

We had an idea that this river marked the border line, but we weren't sure. We followed along the stream on the bank down a little way and came to a road and few houses. Some women were standing outside the houses. But we didn't greet them. We kept on our way and made out we didn't see them.

Now we were noticing that the telephone posts weren't like those we passed. Their bottoms were soaked in creosote and the ground around them was covered with stone. The sight of these posts made us feel better. They were signs, to us, that we were over the border. Shortly after we came to another village. Reno, who spoke Norwegian, inquired of our whereabouts and we were five kilometers inside of the border and about 25 kilometers from Kirkeness.

THE END.

Behold in Spain the Symbol of May Day!

By JUSTUS EBERT

1937 May Day is a May Day such as labor has never enjoyed before. It is a May Day calling for enthusiasm and a mighty movement forward. A real May Day with international labor triumphantly fighting international fascism, the last resource of a decaying capitalism.

Years ago we rejoiced in the Paris Commune, the first attempt of the working class to rise to power. Next came the great Russian revolution. Now, as a glorious climax, comes Spain. Each successive historic episode records, barometer-like, the upward climb of the world's workers.

No longer do we dream of working class ascendancy. We see it becoming a fact before our very eyes, on a scale, too, impossible of either denial or frustration. Behold in Spain the symbol of our 1937 International May Day. There converge workers from many distant parts of the world, saying to Fascism "Thou shalt not pass"; and pass it does not.

Observe the anti-fascist armies of Italy in Spain. They flee, rather than fight their working class brothers in Spain, a fore-runner of the day everywhere when the workers will desert Fascism, and, in deserting, destroy it! Observe the Nazi bombs dropped on Madrid; forty per cent of them were duds. Some contained the salute of the anti-fascist German workers to their Spanish comrades. Observe the German, British, Italian, Belgian, French, Russian, Canadian, yes, and our own American comrades of the International brigade, all marching abreast to the defeat of Fascism in Spain, and the beginning of the social revolution throughout the world.

May Day of 1937, the real International Labor Day, we salute thee! Onward labor! Forward to the new day; to the new time no longer coming, but well on its way.

Turn now to the glorious United States, as fine a land as nature ever made, and, as ever, capitalism-defiled and devastated. What is it that makes the front pages of its servile press, and intrudes itself into the affairs of its capitalist state? It is the myriad working class, pushing its way up out of corporate exploitation into the august legislative chambers of the country's owners and controllers, the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives. Especially impressive are the sit-downers, in their prologue to the lockout of the capitalist masters of industry and America.

Never before have the naturally wonderful and capitalistically blighted United States been as profoundly stirred.

It is agitated, from its economic base up to its political and cultural reflexes. Labor is moving. Well it should, for in the language of the day, "the worst is yet to come"—the worst of, and for, capitalism, with labor involved as never before.

With 42,000,000 workers employed and 10,000,000 unemployed, with output, prices and profits rising out of all proportion to employment, wages, and purchasing power, with the war industries making the country a part of the European war system and U.S. participation in another world war and its disastrous aftermaths a certainty, with the present industrial boom heading for another and more ruinous bust, an aroused working class will be a necessary requirement to further working class ascendancy—to the social ownership and operation of industry, by and of labor, industrially organized.

Thus our 1937 May Day is not only a day of real working class internationalism, and it is not only a day of encouraging historical review and contemporaneous rejoicing, but also of future constructiveness. Ours is the working class duty, not only to rise to the mastery of our social destiny, but also to make our rise on a foundation that will admit of no destruction or overthrow. Such a foundation will be found in industrial democracy—in the real, revolutionary industrial unionism propagated and practiced by the I.W.W.—the Industrial Workers of the World.

The I.W.W. is erecting the framework of the new society in the shell of the old.

Education ★ Organization ★ Emancipation

Knowledge, like energy, is power only when it is put to work to get results.

All together, the working class knows how to make everything, how to do everything, how to create abundance and the necessary conditions for happiness for us all. But to put that knowledge to work requires organization. To get the full results that can come only from using all of it, requires organization as a class—One Big Union.

Science is knowledge organized. The I. W. W. is the working class organized—just the working class, with everybody from the coal miner to the chemist who figures out how to make a new flavoring extract out of the coal, organized to use our brains for ourselves. And it spells emancipation and a new era of abundance and security.

To start the process takes scientific industrial union education—such as you spread when you get new readers for the I. W. W. periodicals and pamphlets, pass-out I. W. W. leaflets, or put up I. W. W. stickers. Educate to organize, and organize to educate—that's the road ahead to freedom. That's where the I.W.W. is marching, and you are cordially asked to hop into the parade.

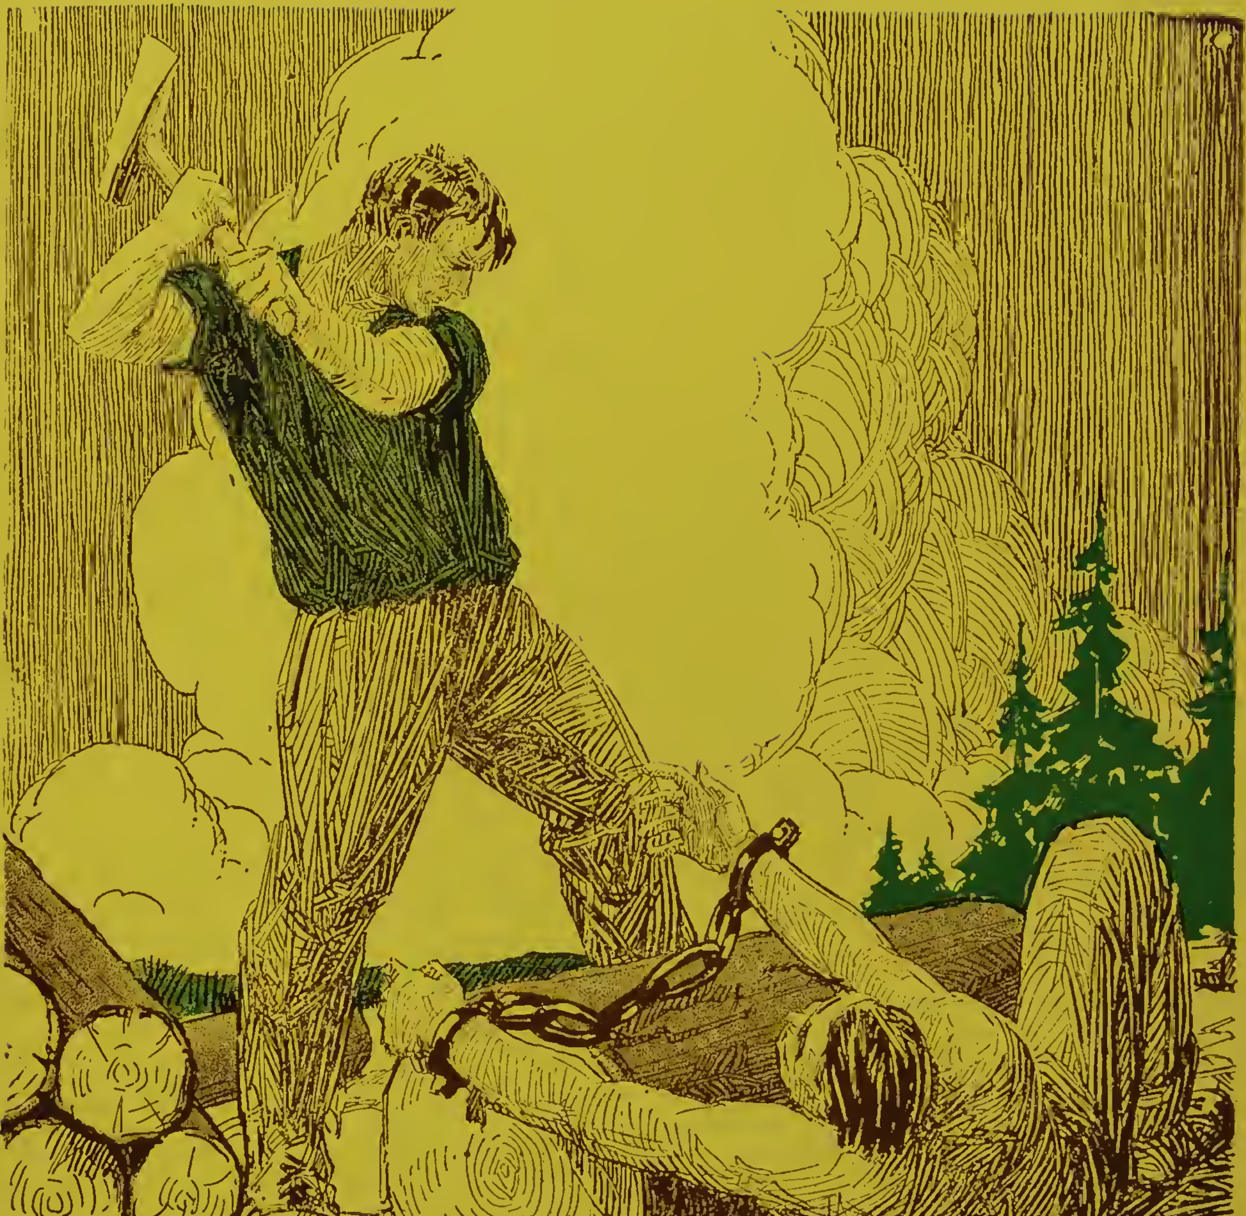
The ONE BIG UNION Monthly



New Series: Vol. I—No. 6 JUNE, 1937 Price: 15 cents

Too Many Organizations?

Sure—that's why we've been arguing for One Big Union all these years. One's enough. Any more is a nuisance.

We want to ask you fellow workers who do not as yet belong to the I.W.W., a question.

Laying aside all your organizational prejudices and alignments, just suppose that the American working class stood before you, asking you what it should do.

Would you counsel them to divide their forces? Would you urge them to build craft and separate industrial organizations that would lead to jurisdictional wars with each other? Would you tell them to let their own invincible power remain unborn for the lack of compact organization and advise them to content themselves with the hope that somebody might be elected to do for them a part of what they could do much better for themselves?

Or would you tell them: let's ALL organize together, making merely such subdivisions in our organization as circumstances make practical; let's rely on our own organized strength; let's undertake doing for ourselves what that power enables us to do in the way that we by majority rule decide to do it.

The American working class is standing before each one of you asking your measure of advice and example what it should do. Think it out clearly, with all honesty to yourself and futurity what advice and example you shall give them—and we are satisfied that you can adopt no other course of action than to join us in building a One Big Union of the Working Class.

The Labor Movement in Mexico

By Card Number 372561

Ever since the CROM was replaced by the CTM as the predominant union movement in Mexico, there has been much bewilderment as to what is going on in the unions to the south of us, and in their relations with the Mexican government.

Now that President Cardenas has ordered the recognition of the CROM, and Morones has returned to Mexico, and railroad workers, electricians and communists have made a split in the CTM, the situation is probably the more bewildering.

For this reason we believe our readers will welcome this study by a member of the I.W.W. of the Mexican labor situation and its historial background.

On the eve of May Day, the big drive to bring Mexican labor under a centralized leadership met with a setback that seriously lessens the prospect for unity in the immediate future. At the fourth National Council of the CTM (Confederation of Mexican Workers) the delegates of the railroad workers and the electrical workers of the Federal District walked out together with representatives of the Mexican Communist party. This split, according to "Mexican Labor News," will possibly cost the CTM a full one-fourth of the nearly 600,000 members.

Unquestionably the loss to the Confederation is greater than is indicated by the number of workers involved in the split. The electricians, the railroad workers, and various state organizations which may also be involved, are organized in powerful unions which have supplied the CTM with much of its genuine, steadfast labor union character. It was the Electrical Workers Union that won a brilliant victory in an eight-day strike last July during which Mexico City, the Federal District, and five neighboring states were without lights and power.

Vicente Lombardo Toledano, General Secretary of the CTM, seems to blame the communists for most of the trouble, charging that they imposed their own party discipline on their members within the trade union movement. He condemned in the strongest terms the action of the party in precipitating a break in labor's ranks on the very eve of the First of May, the labor anniversary which should have found the Mexican movement more united than ever.

On the other hand the seceding non-communists, no less than the party adherants, charge that the CTM is mismanaged by its leaders. They accuse Lombardo and his associates with attempting to set up a "bureaucratic, personalist control over the CTM to the exclusion of all those elements unwilling to submit themselves to such dictatorship." They claim the ruling clique overrides the wishes of the rank and file, that it has excluded bona fide delegates to the Council, and seeks generally by all possible means to use the organization for its own personal advantages. They are especially critical of the actions of Lombardo.

The conflict first came out in the open last February at the Third National Council in Vera Cruz when the electricians protested the seating of delegates from unions that were in arrears in the payment of dues. Claiming this was in violation of the by-laws they refused to participate in the deliberations but took no further action at that time. The immediate cause of the break in April was the refusal of the Council to seat the delegation from Nuevo Leon on the grounds that it had been improperly constituted. It is in the State of Nuevo Leon that the communists are charged by the Council with having applied their disruptive tactics. Hence when these delegates were unseated it was the signal for the communists to leave. However, it does not follow that the union delegates who joined in the walk-out were necessarily lead out by the communists. As already indicated the unions had grievances of their own.

What is the CTM?

The Confederation of Mexican Workers or, giving it its native name, Confederacion de Trabajadores de Mexico, is a new federation of Mexican labor unions formed in 1935 and claiming now to embrace 90 percent of the country's organized labor. It is affiliated with the Amsterdam International, favors industrial rather than craft unions, declares itself 100 percent for the Spanish loyalists, and has sent fraternal greetings to John L. Lewis's CIO. It has proven itself more militant than its predecessor in action against the employers, it has promoted workers' education on a grand scale, having established the Workers University at Mexico City which enrolls over 500 students; it has demanded confiscation of private property for the workers in certain cases, and supports general revolutionary propositions in principle.

In short, the CTM is many things that its immediate predecessor as the dominant Mexican labor movement, the CROM (Confederacion Regional Obrera Mexicana), was not—especially in its later years. Yet for all that the new movement is, in a sense extremely important to labor, new only in name.

The CROM from the very first was enmeshed in politics. It was born in 1918 when the trade unionists joined hands with the Carranza government in opposition to the Mexican I.W.W. which, in the labor union convention of the preceding year, had been the leading organization. Under the leadership of Luis N. Morones the CROM continued as it started, the labor front of the government. Later, in 1920, the CROM was used to help make Obregon president of the republic. Morones used his position as the capitalist government's favorite labor lieutenant to entrench his organization at the expense of independent unions and, of course, to enrich himself.

Under Obregon he fared fairly well in spite of some double-crossing by the president who developed a fine technique in playing one labor group against another. Obregon evidently did not feel it necessary to divide the plunder with labor bosses. At that time the new statesmanship which requires government-labor co-operation for the sake of more peaceful and effective exploitation had not yet been fully worked out.

But in 1924 Calles, the "labor" president, was elected, naturally with the help of the CROM. This time Morones' reward was great indeed. He was given a position in the government, that of Minister of Commerce, Industry and Labor. Next to the president he became the most powerful man in the government. His opportunities for cashing in on his labor racket were immensely increased and it is a matter of record that he did not fail to take advantage of the opportunities.

Skipping a few years, we come to 1932. Calles was no longer president but he was still the big boss in politics and Morones was still the big chief in the labor movement. These two combined forces to rule Mexico. They selected Cardenas for the presidency and put him into office in 1935. Then came the big surprise maneuvre which is supposed by some to have suddenly cleared the way for the industrial commonwealth in Mexico.

Calles and Morones Exiled

Early in April, 1936, the government exiled both Calles and Morones to the United States "in order to forestall fascism and save democracy for the workers." While Calles was grooming Cardenas for the presidency, the latter was building a few fences for himself and while labor leader Morones was helping Calles, a new star was rising on the horizon of the labor world. The new hope of the working class, Dr. Vicente Lombardo Toledado, managed so well that when the decisive moment arrived he was able to supplant Morones as the labor chief.

Thus out of the CROM grew the CTM. The CROM has not been completly obliterated; it still retains some union allegiance, notably in the textile industry.

Since personalities play such an important part in Mexican labor affairs, a few words about Toledado, the new head of the movement, may not be amiss.

"He came into the labor movement as a teacher and student of economics, history, sociology and law. And he came calling himself a Simon-pure Marxian. He is a slight, handsome, sad-eyed and sad-faced Creole, a typical Latin intellectual. He is, though closely seconded by Xavier Icasa of the Mexican Supreme Court, the outstanding intellectual of the Mexican labor movement." (Wm. E. Zeuch in Common Sense.)

From 1915 onward every aspirant for political office in Mexico has known that he must have organized labor backing to win. And labor in Mexico has learned to hope for its reward for support given to successful office seekers. This mixing of politics with unionism goes on now just as under other administrations. Carranza and Calles had their Morones and now Cardenas has his Toledano.

It is not intended to infer here that Toledano is a crook, as Morones certainly was and is, or that Cardenas aspires to be a dictator. The point is that guided by politics and influenced by party policies, the splendid combative and socially creative powers of the Mexican workers are not allowed to develop.

Unions ought to be and must eventually be complete, independent, self-running institutions: they must learn to move along under their own direction as well as under their own power. The main course of development is not along that line in Mexico today. Instead of less government interferance in union affairs there is more than formerly. President, governors, and courts are repeatedly called upon to intervene in disputes between workers and employers and to settle differences between unions. There is a Federal Board of Conciliation and a labor court; and there is a "standard collective contract" which is favored by the government as being just the thing to protect the interests of labor and to promote industrial peace. This contract is now in effect in several industries.

Laws Regarding Strikes

When the Mexican worker wants to strike, he follows a course laid out for him by the government. Here are some of the rules established by law:

1. When workers make any demands of their employers that may lead to a strike they are required to present their demands in writing at least six days before the strike. In the event they are employed in a public utility they must give at least ten days' notice.

2. At least 51 percent of the workers employed must vote in favor of the demands in order that they may be legal; 51 percent of the workers attending the meeting at which the vote is taken may not be enough.

3. In presenting the demands a showing must be made that the demands are within reason, that they can be granted under existing conditions. A copy of the demands and arguments in favor of them must be presented to the government as well as to the employer. The government then refers the matter to a board of arbitration composed of three people, one representing the government, one representing the employer, and one representing labor. If this board fails to conciliate the parties to the dispute it issues a public statement with a declaration that the proposed strike is legal or illegal according to its findings.

4. Even when the strike is declared illegal the workers may go ahead with it. But in case it is decided that the grievances are fully justified and that the strike is a legal one the employer is required to pay wages to the workers while they are out.

Sympathetic strikes may be legal. Court injunctions in labor cases are prohibited by the constitution. But recently the government has banned teachers' strikes, the Minister of Education declaring that such strikes are a betrayal of the teachers' obligation to the children of the working class. Postal workers have also been denied the right to strike but President Cardenas has promised them a wage increase beginning January, 1938. The official announcement in the case of the postal workers states that no federal employes are allowed to strike under the law.

Undoubtedly the Mexican labor laws are more advanced than those of any other country, except Russia. But whether this state of "advancement" will ultimately be beneficial to the workers may certainly be questioned. Capitalism the world over is busy devising new schemes to keep the working class under control and there is nothing in the Mexican model that seriously threatens the position of the employers. Like the Roosevelt legislation in the United States, it makes a great show of being fair to labor, but this is sound diplomacy and not a retreat on the part of labor's enemy. There is no point in using force against workers when they can be fooled by soft words.

Compared to the United States the Mexican labor policy appears to be extremely radical. This, however, is due largely to the conflict between native and foreign capital in the country. The Mexican ruling class is not adverse from exposing the foreign exploiters to the wrath of the dispossessed wage slave and peasant. Meanwhile there is no great harm to the ruling class and no great gain to the workers in taking off the ban from socialist and revolutionary talk. It is even an advantage to the capitalists to have the government use the language of rebellious workers. One talks gently to the restless horse that is to be harnessed for a hard day's work.

In justice to the leaders of the CTM it should be stated that they are aware of the weak spot in the movement, even though they do nothing about it. Mexican Labor News which expresses the official CTM view states in this connection:

"There appears to be good reason for supposing that a large part of the present difficulties are at least indirectly due to maneuvres and intrigues fomented by certain members of the government attempting to use sections of the trade union movement for their own political purposes . . ."

In another statement of the CTM it is declared:

"We will co-operate with the government in every respect so long as the government responds to the social needs of the workers. When the government ceases to respond to our needs we resume the right to be for the revolution."

On Reformer Boulevard, one of the principle thoroughfares in Mexico City, an arch bears this inscription: TO THE REVOLUTION OF YESTERDAY, TODAY AND TOMORROW.

Again it must be said that all of this means little more than momentary inspiration as long as the workers are wage slaves, pitifully paid and living in the utmost squalor.

As in other countries the hope of the Mexican workers lies in a rank and file movement such as was started there 25 years ago. This movement was shattered but the elements of which it was composed are still present, active and powerful throughout that stratum of the population in which is generated the force of the social revolution, that is, in the working class.

The I.W.W. in Mexico

Back before 1910 there wasn't much of a labor movement in the country. Practically everybody that had any liberal, to say nothing of radical, ideas kept them strictly to himself. There were a few exceptions, among them Librado Rivera and Ricardo Flores Magon, who ventured to tell the workers the whole truth about the dictator, Porfiro Diaz, and about capitalists and governments. Their agitation bore fruit and the revolt started. But seeing an opportunity to aggrandize himself, Madero, a man with plenty of money, capitalized on the propaganda of the radicals and on the poverty of the people and made himself leader of the movement. Diaz was overthrown and the "liberator" put in his place.

At this time there were thousands of Mexicans living on the American side of the border who were either I.W.W. members or strongly influenced by its teachings. In Phoenix, Arizona, alone there were at that time over 500 Mexican I.W.W. members. When the revolution broke out these workers moved back across the border almost in a body to take part in the great event in their home land.

One group of Mexicans living in Texas armed themselves and under the leadership of Captain Cline started their march to the border. They were stopped on the way by Texas officers whom the marchers promptly took prisoners. There was nobody hurt and when the officers promised not to molest the men they let them go. But later a reinforced gang of deputies attacked the Mexicans again. This time there were dead on both sides. Rangle, Cline and several others served many years in Texas prisons as a result of this affair.

In 1911 there was another invasion of Mexico by I.W.W. members. This was in lower California where on January 29 an I.W.W. "army" under the leadership of Wm. Stanley took Mexicali. In the engagement Stanley was killed and General Pryce elected in his place. Another successful engagement was fought at Lee Little's ranch on April 8, but the battle of Tia Juana did not turn out so well and soon thereafter the rebels retreated across the American border.

But by 1911 the character of the struggle had changed. After Diaz had been disposed of, Madero turned against the principles and ideals that had inspired the workers who did the fighting. In February of that year, Magon denounced Madero in his paper Regeneracion as a traitor to the revolution and added some good anarchist philosophy to the effect that "there is not and cannot be a good government."

The revolt against Madero was not successful, but the labor movement had at least some chance to grow and express itself. In July, 1912, there was organized the Mexican I.W.W. under the name Casa del Obrera Mundial, the House of the Workers of the World. By 1917 this organization together with other syndicalist movements adhering to it constituted the leading force in the Mexican movement. How it was defeated in 1918 by the reactionary union leaders in co-operation with the Carranza government has already been noted in this article.

What the next move in the Mexican situation will be is hard to predict. It may be taken for granted that if the workers refuse to remain sufficiently docile and if they refuse to restrict their more drastic efforts to attacking those employers who don't happen to suit the government too well, this same government, now so friendly to labor, will find ways and means to restrict its further growth. At least it will try to do that.

It may even be that the current split has been occasioned by fear that the CTM is getting too big. It is worth noting in this connection that the arch labor traitor, Luis N. Morones, has come back out of exile and is now in Mexico. It is also worth noting that in the recent dispute between unions in the textile industry the president did not deside in favor of the CTM.

Whatever may be the immediate outcome, the future belongs to the workers—when they have learned to organize the I.W.W. way.

ESCAPE!

By a Convict

"A jail is a poor man's home," said Gene Debs, and he said a mouthful. Here is a story of the hopes of escape from one such "poor man's home," where thousands of the working class are locked up for the folly of trying to get back the world that has been stolen from them in individual pieces, instead of taking it all at once.

Cruel as the world outside may be, the dominant idea of men in prison is to get out. It's better to be hungry and not have a guard looking down one's back than to be full of beans in the big house. If one doesn't have hopes that some pull will be exercised on a parole board, or some assurance of a tolerably short section of one's indeterminate sentence, the saving thought that stops him from going nuts is the notion that he may escape.

Since those in charge of the prisons are well aware of this there isn't much chance left for it to be accomplished. But the fact that there have been escapes from even such fortresses as San Quentin makes hope persist.

How? Successful escapes usually do not leave any record behind them of how it was done. San Quentin is on a peninsula with a narrow causeway connecting it to the mainland, and that's too well guarded. On the one side are the mud-flats where those who have got past the many walls have floundered around until they were either sucked to their death or captured. On the other sides too far a stretch of water to swim. One fellow who got past the walls tried swimming and holding on to the ferry going to Richmond, but he was caught and then died of pneumonia. A convict crew longshoring on a barge of supplies for the prison once commandeered the tug that brought the barge in—but airplanes were circling them long before they could get anywhere with it.

In the nature of things, it's only of the escapes that do not succeed that much of the ins and outs are known. There are so many cases of those who almost made it.

There was the Swede who worked in the tailor shop. As prison jobs go it wasn't a bad job, and there was always the chance of getting a little extra "weed" (Bull Durham) for some little extra service on the convict garb of some fellow who wanted to be well-dressed even in stir, or on making a "going out" suit so that every policeman in the land wouldn't recognize the wearer as one just released from the big house. There was work to be done for the warden who lived in a fine house just a bit outside the furthest wall. The civilian suit that the Swede had to take out with him fitted him pretty well. He had secured a cap to put in his pocket, and somehow had got hold of some dark grease paint such as an actor would use to convert himself into a Mexican or Spaniard. On the way out past the visitors' room, he managed to slip into a toilet placed there for their convenience, put on the clothes and the grease paint. He had a few dollars (which was also contraband) and stepped out to the bus stop. He had to wait awhile, and the guard it seemed kept watching him though evidently seeing nothing out of the way. It was warm, and he got nervous pacing back and forth waiting for the bus. He began to sweat, and took out his handkerchief to wipe his face. So one side was dark and the other was light wherever his handkerchief had touched it. That something was wrong was evident even to one with the I.Q. of a prison guard—and so that was that.

And then there was the fellow who worked in the library. When books needed rebinding, they were shipped in large boxes to the Public Library in San Francisco. He managed to get himself crated in with the books. It was a strenuous trip to San Francisco, sometimes head up, sometimes feet up. He survived—but when they opened the box, his muscles were too cramped to move. And so that was that.

About the only successful get-away where much is known of how it was done was the beautiful lam of Simple Simon. He faced life, and it was too much for him. His nerves broke, and he went screwy. That happens quite often in the Big House, and one of the most dismal sights in San Quentin is "Crazy Alley," a fenced off court between two old jail buildings, where the sun seldom hits, and where those who have gone simple minded are locked up with those who have gone insane, as though to make sure that their nervous disorders get worse. That's where they put Simple Simon. He got worse and worse, singing and howling despite all the punishment that could be inflicted on the poor fellow. There is a law against using the old strait-jacket in the State Penitentiary ever since the exposure of the horrible days of old in San Quentin that Jack London made in his "Star Rover." Ex-convicts went around the State with the Oregon Boot to show it to people, lecturing on the punishments inflicted and so the law was passed. So the extremely insane are sent to the state asylum further up the line at Napa, where of course strait-jackets are permitted.

Simple Simon was to go to Napa. A guard was going on his vacation past Napa up to the beautiful red wood forests. So the guard wore civilian clothes—for who could have a good time among decent folk if it was known that he was a prison guard?—and carried a gun and a star, commitment papers for Simple Simon, handcuffs, a valise, his two weeks' vacation pay, and what else he had taken along for his fling, and got in the train with Simple Simon who was also dressed in civilian clothes. It was a hot summer afternoon. The guard dozed. Simple Simon got the key to his handcuffs, unlocked them, got the gun, the star, the commitment papers, the money. It wasn't so hard—picking pockets had been one of his trades before. There were other passengers in the train, but they hadn't noticed.

The train gave a lurch and the guard woke up. Simple Simon pressed the gun on him. The guard let out a howl:

"This man is a convict and a lunatic! He's taken my gun! Look out!"

The astonished passengers looked around, not certain which way to move. Simple Simon put them at ease, telling them in the most re-assuring tones:

"Don't be alarmed, folks. I didn't like to keep handcuffs on this fellow unless I needed them, for sometimes he's all right, and then sometimes he goes berserk."

He handcuffed the guard whose continuous howling was enough to convince anyone that he was dangerously insane, while Simple Simon politely expressed his deep regrets for annoying his fellow passengers.

At Napa they got off, and Simple Simon took the guard to the asylum. Again the guard protested with all the vigor in him. Again Simple Simon was calm and collected. The doctor in charge of the receiving office took it all with a serious countenance and informed the guard, that it was quite right for him to be the other fellow, that he'd meet Caesar and Napoleon and General Lee in there anyway.

Nothing since has been heard of Simple Simon, where he went or what he is doing—so he remains a sort of legend around San Quentin, filling lifers' souls with hope, evidence to them that after all it can be done, and probably saving a good many of them from nervous breakdowns and a trip to Napa.

The guard didn't get his vacation in the redwoods. He spent it in Napa instead. The commitment papers were properly signed and mailed back to the Warden's office, and there was no occasion to look into the matter until the guard failed to show up at the end of his holidays. The asylum at Napa was called for any chance information they might have of where he went. "Oh yes," the Warden was informed, "there's a fellow here he insists that he's him—you can talk to him if you want to."

A Traveler Makes Camp

This isn't a story. It's a very matter of fact account of a typical day in the Clearwater section of Idaho for a traveling delegate of Lumber Workers Industrial Union No. 120 of the I.W.W.—a man whose job it is to make contact with workers in these camps and carry on the work of building a union in the lumber industry despite the blackball and intimidation of the sawdust kings.

Remember, his success requires your co-operation.

A traveling delegate walked up the flume to the big camp on the hill. He stopped at the rag barn to rest his weary carcass before proceeding to the bunk house.

It was quitting time and the crew were just coming in from the woods. The delegate had worked in this camp the summer before, up until the strike. So he was naturally interested in seeing who was on the job, especially since C. L. Billings, and Fellow Worker Bradbury, two fascist-minded officials of Potlach Forests, Inc., had inaugurated the blackball system through a clearing house in Orofino.

Down the trail toward the barn came a heavy pair of horses. The traveler knew them well—old Rock and Baldy. Behind them came something dressed in the clothes of a man, but a second look revealed that he looked more like a cross between a rat and a weasel. When this weasel-faced ape saw the traveling delegate sitting on the stump, he wheeled for the barn on double quick, forgetting in his haste to take the bits out of old Rock's mouth so that he could get a drink of water.

But the traveler went over and removed the bits so that the horse could drink. Old Rock turned around with as much of a look of scorn as he had in him at the retreating figure, and winked at the traveler as though to say: "You son of a gun, so you're here again."

The next pair of horses to make the trough were Jim and Dan.

This is a sample of the camp conditions that will disappear as lumber workers organize in the I. W. W.

The Traveler knew them too. Behind them was a rather good looking young fellow, though the traveler, long in this part of the country, could easily enough tell that he was a stranger to the forests of Idaho and among the men who make their livelihood in these forests. He had come from the Dakota prairies. Most of his life so far had been spent around barns and cows and calves. Only lately had he joined the caulked shoe brigade. He was out to make a big stake this summer, then go back to Pumpkin Center, marry Susan, and be damned to the "big fellow" who had bawled him out the day before for dropping a log off of the skidway on to the running chute where the "big fellow" was rolling in. He didn't have much use for that big fellow anyway, for he was always talking about Industrial Unionism, and the 1936 strike, and finks, and men who would not organize but who were willing to take advantage of the conditions and wages that someone else had got for them. That sort of talk made the fellow from Dakota feel uncomfortable—for he did have a bit of conscience, and it hurt, for he knew right well he wasn't doing the right thing by remaining unorganized.

The traveler arose from the stump and started up the trail. On the way he met several stuttering and sputtering caterpillars with their crews. As he passed the office out came the "push."

"What business have you got in my camp?" asked the hoary headed old son of the forest. The traveler informed him that his mission was most peaceable, to fix up those of his crew who wanted to join the I.W.W. for more of the good things of life with the little red card that every self-respecting workingman ought to carry.

The "push" let out a bellow or two like those of an angry bull. In one breath he expressed the wish that all the I.W.W.'s were in a place a lot hotter than it ever gets in Idaho. In the next he was lamenting that the Wobblies at least knew how to trim these Idaho peaks of the virgin white pine, and he'd be damned if he wasn't getting tired of that sorting gap in Orofino, and consequently having to get out timber with this green, raw labor.

The traveler stayed overnight in camp. He had business there all right. There were lumberjacks whom he knew, and whom everyone there knew to be Wobblies, who wanted their cards stamped up, who wanted to kick in with a bit extra to keep the ball rolling, and who had meanwhile convinced others that it was time to stick together in One Big Union to get better camps, better chuck, better wages, better hours.

There were some who wanted union cards and were a bit hesitant about showing their hand—and the traveler obliged them too. There were men hungry for something fit for a self-respecting worker to read, a pamphlet to think about, a magazine or paper that was more concerned with the troubles workers have making ends meet than with the troubles of Edward and Wally.

Yes, clearing house or no clearing house, the Lumber Workers Industrial Union, the reliable old "120" that had left the brand of the I.W.W. on every improvement the lumberjacks had ever got, was going to grow. It showed that early in the spring when things were not going full blast—and the traveler had his own notions of what it would show later in the summer.

Next morning he started down the trail for the end of the steel. He had worked in these woods for thirty-five years, so he took stock of his surroundings and the methods used to get out the timber. It was easy for him to tell whether efficient methods and skilled labor were being used or not. And it was plain to him that in this Clearwater country where the sawdust barons are destroying the last stand of virgin white pine in these United States, they are using neither efficient methods nor efficient labor—and he knew well enough what the explanation was—companies will use all means at their disposal to freeze out such organized labor as shook the teeth of the Weyerhaeuser timber trust there last summer. As a man who had long taken pride in his savvy how, it was a bit depressing to see millions of feet of the finest white pine that ever laid out doors being destroyed by inefficient slack methods of logging. He knew the story well enough. Machinery unnecessarily broken up every day. It wasn't that he was sorry for the machines — but it meant horses and man power crippled.

A "wannagan" such as is used on the spring log drive in Idaho.—Note conditions under which cook performs.

These men are the sort who know how to get out the white pine —but in an effort to keep the Idaho camps non-union, company hospitals are filled with inexperienced men crippled in the company's greed for profits and desire for no union on the job.

Down in Orofino every bed in the hospital has a lumber worker in it from this Clearwater country. No need for that. When there is a union control on these jobs there will be more empty beds in the company hospital. Men have been induced to come from other industries and other parts of the country to help discourage organization and produce more profits for the Weyerhaeusers. But without the men who savvy how, the sawdust kings find they produce cripples and not the profits they wanted. And as fast as the men learn how, they seem to learn something else—that organization can make the lot of the lumberjack something that stacks up against the hazards of his strenuous employment.

It's a beautiful country this Idaho, thought the traveler as he went along getting the smell of the bunk-house out of his nostrils and filling them with the aroma of the pine. An infinite variety of greens and gold wove as fine a picture before him as the eye of man has seen. Should such a country remain the prey of parasites? Should men needlessly get killed converting this fine stand of timber to the needs of man? Should some two-by-four would-be Hitlers attempt to tell these loggers whether they could have a union of their own?

He thought of what some of the men had told him around the bunk houses last night. He thought of his fellow workers that would sooner or later be in here logging despite hell, high water, and the office in Orofino, and he thought of "Old Country Mike" and Al Gentry lying on two white cots, victims of the company gun thug's dum-dum bullets in the strike last summer, their bodies broken, but the light of genuine revolutionary industrial unionism shining in their eyes. You might as well try to root up these mountains as root up the I.W.W. he figured as he went his way with the confidence that is known only to a man who knows what he's about and knows that it's well worth while.—X242667.

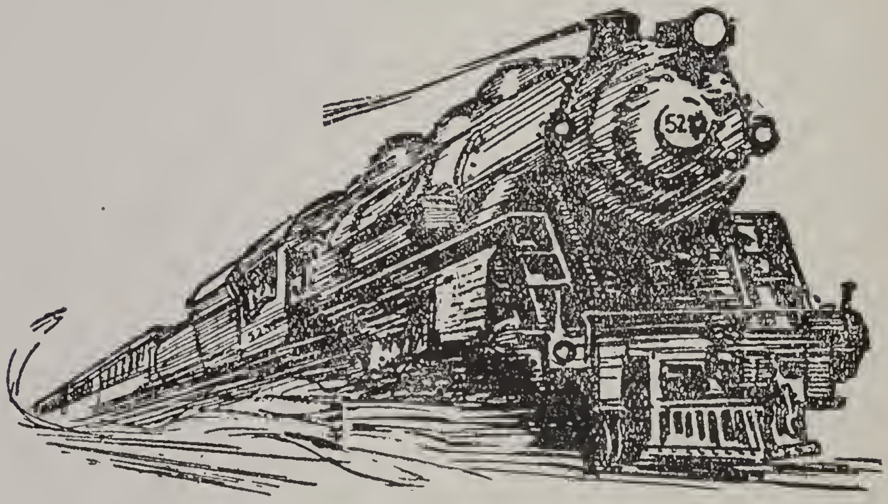
"No One Shall Go Hungry"

By

PAUL KOLINSKI



You see them at the edge of town flagging a ride or dangling their legs from a box car—the rising generation of America. In this travelog of a hitch-hiker you read the typical experience of these millions for whom capitalism offers no job. It's no lark even for adventurous youth, and the author writes: "Knowing that the I.W.W. is a working stiff's organization, I submit this article in the hopes that some youth living in a poverty-stricken home may heed and stay off the road."

This is a story of seeing America the American way—a journey of three thousand miles across ten states on a sum of two dollars. It took twenty-seven days, hitch-hiking, riding freight trains—and walking—with a piece of canvas the size of a blanket, tooth brush and a shaving kit.

The journey began one wet morning in San Francisco. To save car fare I walked seven miles to the city limits. I soon got my first ride, about thirty miles. It was raining when I got out, so I wasn't able to hitch another ride very soon. My day's thumb wagging ended about a hundred and fifty miles from San Francisco. It was still raining so I had to get a room for the night. That cost fifty cents. For dinner I spent a quarter. That left a dollar and a quarter of the two dollars I had set out with.

The following day was clear, and after several short rides, I got a ride with a truck into Bakersfield. That ended the day. I had seen a number of auto accidents these two days. The first was between a passenger car and a truck. The second was an overturned truck in a very deep ditch at a cross road. There was another truck that had skidded off the road deeply imbedded sidewise in a mud bank. I asked the driver who took me into Bakersfield why there were so many truck accidents. He explained that trucks were wheeled as much as eighteen hours a day, that sometimes he didn't see a bed for a week at a time, snoozing a bit while he was waiting for some pick-up or delivery; that if drivers kicked about such conditions they were likely to be fired, but that unionization was going ahead and would end such conditions, and do away with many an accident.

My expenses for that day finished my funds. In the morning I caught a single ride all the way to Los Angeles.

The police of Los Angeles are a curious sort. They devote an amazing amount of their time to the search of hungry and indigent wayfarers. Once they find one, he is so cordially invited to partake of the city's hospitality for two days in jail that he cannot refuse, and then he is told to get out of the city. As I didn't want to get acquainted with these guardians of the hoboes, I started at once to walk out of town of my own free will. I was hungry, and went to a restaurant and asked the owner if he had any work I could do for a meal. He didn't have any work, but he gave me a meal. (It may be that his generosity was inspired by the fact that several customers were eating.)

I devoted the following three days to a diligent search for work, eating very little and sleeping in an abandoned house. Giving up the quest for work, I started south in search of it. A meal and twenty-five cents in cash earned washing some windows gave me an encouraging start. A day's thumb wagging landed me in Indio, a desert town about a hundred miles from Los Angeles. I put in a comfortable night in a refrigerator car, and got a loaf of bread and some lunch meat for sweeping the walk in front of a store.

For several hours, and without success, I tried to catch a ride. So a freight train pulling out of Indio had one more uninvited passenger in an empty box car. In the car I became acquainted with several others. One boy, about sixteen years old, told us that he had spent the last two days in Indio jail. He had got in Indio after two days' hitch-hiking across the desert with nothing to eat. In Indio he asked a lady for something to eat. The lady called the police, so he got bread and water for two days. Before we got to Yuma, Arizona, we had finished the bread and meat.

The train leaving Yuma had an increased passenger list with some fifty riding. There were no empty box-cars, so we rode in cattle cars. The boy who had been in jail had managed to get a head of lettuce and a grapefruit, which he offered to share with me.

There was a Mexican boy about twelve years of age with us. He wanted to know how long it would be before we got to El Paso, Texas. When we told him about thirty-six hours, he smiled. He had had nothing to eat for three days, and El Paso was only sixteen miles from his home.

The night turned cold, but my piece of canvas kept me fairly warm. The others paced the car all night long. Before daylight we were in Tucson, and a grass fire kept us warm until the sun came up. Then everyone scattered for food. A little restaurant by the railroad yards got my quarter for breakfast.

Out of Tucson we rode a bit more comfortably in an empty box car. In the same car rode a family of three, the mother, about thirty, and quite hefty, nursed a four months old baby while the hoboes looked on.

In El Paso I went to the jungles to wash and shave. The gossip there was that it was pretty hard to catch a train out because of police interference. Two boys had been shot by railroad bulls, and plenty of help was needed on a newly started pea farm; the state was to be made the most beautiful in the union by train riders visiting Texas.

Someone informed us that all trains stopped at a town twenty-nine miles east, and many decided to hike there. Foraging several breakfasts, I started hiking there, too. Thumb-wagging was useless for about twenty were already parked on the outskirts of town. Every mile I walked found a few more resting alongside the highway. Night came without a ride and nothing to eat.

As I walked into town a group of people told me that they had just been ordered to get out. "We had a fire going alongside the railroad tracks to keep us warm," said a woman, "and for that the cops chased us out." I walked six more miles to the next town and got a box-car to sleep in. So ended another day with me still hungry after thirty-five miles of hiking.

In the morning I tried to get something to eat from the stores but didn't succeed. Then I got a bit of breakfast from the people living in a small unpainted shack. It had but two rooms. One contained two full-sized beds. The other had a full-sized bed, a stove, and a dining table. The place was filthy and the bedding ragged. Seven grown people lived in the hovel. This was a small town surrounded by desert, and the most valuable possessions of this family seemed to be a skinny cow and two automobiles of questionable age.

I got tired of waiting for a train to stop for they seldom stopped at this small town, and again tried the highway. Luck—a well-loaded topless car stopped. Between baggage, a young boy, several dogs, and three grown-ups, I found a precarious seat. The grandmother told me their story. The family consisted of seven grown-ups and six children. The rest of the family was in another car with more baggage. "The oldest child is eight years old, and I am sixty-eight," she said. "Grandfather is seventy-four. We couldn't make a living picking cotton in Arizona, so we are going back to Oklahoma. We have gas for about a hundred miles, but we haven't eaten anything yet today. We were told that there was plenty of work picking cotton, but work was scarce and grandfather and I could earn only about ninety cents a day." Local officials refused them aid, and they were begging their way back.

On the outskirts of a town a freight was standing, so I left these people who didn't mind adding me to their troubles. But the train was going the wrong way, so I hit the highway again. Six days of traveling brought me to Fort Worth, Texas. I had a ride with a blind man and his wife who were begging their living. (Those who are up against it always seem the biggest hearted.) Another ride was with the truck driver for an oil company; he was paid a dollar a day and expenses for unlimited working hours. I earned a half dollar and a meal for cleaning a chicken house. It was eleven days since I had slept in a bed, so with my fifty cents I became extravagant. A mission-run hotel had beds for twenty-five cents. My shoes were worn out, and I asked the clerk if he had any old ones. He had an almost new pair of army shoes that he let me have for my remaining two bits. So I was broke again.

In the morning I had an early ride with an oil worker. He bought me breakfast and lunch, and took me as far as Oklahoma City. By evening several short rides got me some fifty miles nearer to Tulsa. The night began cold, and there were no box cars to sleep in. A friendly Marshall let me sleep in the town jail. It was a stone building about six by ten with an iron cot and a pot bellied stove. I kept a wood fire going all night and slept very warm. In the morning an owner of an oil drilling outfit picked me up. He gave me a lecture on the oil industry and sit-down strikes.

"The workers in these oil fields don't have to organize for better wages," he assured me. "We pay them the highest wages given to skilled workers . . . These sit-down strikes are illegal and un-American . . . The strikers have confiscated the factories. The next thing they do will be to take everything you have . . . Do you want somebody to take everything you have worked for? . . . Do you want a dictatorship? . . . In America everyone has a chance to get to the top . . . Don't you want your children to have a chance?" etc.

It amused me to listen. I wondered what I had to lose. What chance had I to make a decent living? I recalled the ride with the oil company driver, and conversations with laborers in the oil fields of Texas who were paid forty to fifty cents an hour. The homes of these workers were not even painted, and I didn't see any of them drive $2000 cars. The ride ended in Tulsa.

That day I had ridden sixty miles and walked twelve. I was cold and asked a policeman if they had a place I could sleep. They did. It was a basement floor of concrete. Two boys came in, sixteen or seventeen years old, unwashed and hungry. They asked how I am making out. They are headed for California and were having a hard time of it. They had taken bread from in front of stores in the early morning hours, and milk off porches. At two in the morning a policeman came in and said a dishwasher was wanted up the street. I worked about an hour and then the cook said "That's all." He gave me a meal for my labor, and I went back to the jail basement until morning.

From Tulsa to Saint Louis I put in seven days across a poverty-stricken country of farms and lead and zinc mining districts. The army shoes were too heavy, and I got blisters on my feet; but the weather was too cold for me to stand still, and rides were far between. When I asked for something to eat I got little except complaints about their own poverty. Between St. Louis and Indianapolis I was more fortunate; it took only two days. I was tired, and seeing several men standing in front of the Salvation Army Citadel, I asked if the beds there were free. They told me I had to go through the transient bureau. As they were giving me directions about the procedure for obtaining a bed one fellow listening said he had a room paid for that he wasn't going to use, and that I could have it.

Next morning was cloudy, and it sprinkled as I left Indianapolis. A ride in rumbe seat almost froze me. At a likeable restaurant I asked for a cup of coffee, and a young girl told me to go to the city community house. I wasn't interested in that suggestion and went on my way. Another ride got me to Fort Wayne by two o'clock. Toledo is my destination—could I get there today was the thing uppermost in my mind. A ride at fifty miles per, and I'm in Findley, Ohio. It's five o'clock and forty-five miles to go. I walk to the edge of town flagging cars, and wondering whether it will be a through ride to Toledo or just a short one that prevents me from making home that night. A car stops. "Are you going to Toledo, Mister?" I ask. "Yes," he says. So after three thousand miles of traveling in all kinds of weather the trip ends.

Current Lessons from the Experience of Labor

The record shows that unions cannot be turned into the forward road by changing officials; that old line unions make old line leaders of progressives put in office.

Reaction in these unions is embedded so deeply in constitution and traditional procedure, and the perpetuation of their policies is so enforced by their general relations to society and their current business as going concerns, that an aggressive labor movement can be built neither by boring from within these unions, or re-aligning them in new federations, but only by a clean start from such a foundation as that of the I. W. W.

If unionists looked more to the past to avoid repeating the errors in the trial and error method by which labor progresses, the future would look and be much better. It is only by memory of some type that any new capacity is acquired. That labor does remember something, and does eliminate some of the blind alleys up which it has gone before, is shown by the fact that we don't find the boycott mania, the colonizing panacea, the change-the-currency cure-alls enjoying the vogue they once did. Even in our own times the bitter lesson that we can't usher in a new social order by clipping coupons or by labor banking has been learned so that even should some return of prosperity be coming, we cannot expect our fellow workers to fall for that bait.

Bait for which our misguided fellow workers do repeatedly fall is the notion that "electing good men to office" in the unions that have failed them, will make these unions the aggressive and progressive institutions that they desire. Yet that this notion does not work out is one of the most conspicuous lessons to be found in the history of labor.

There is scarcely a labor official damned today as a "reactionary" but what got in office as a "progressive". And this is as it has been all along. There is scarcely a labor organization engaged in red-baiting, or disavowing all radicalism and all policy looking forward to a new social order, but what it has been started and kept alive by these self-same radicals.

Outside of a few choice chances for unadulterated racketeering, unions have not been built by conservative minded workers. It is the radical ready to start something that has started the unions too. A man so devoid of social vision and far-reaching purpose as to qualify as a conservative would neither have the incentive or gumption to build a bona fide union in opposition to employers, nor the human appeal to get his fellow workers to act together through it and get it going. Even the long dead Samuel Gompers, long the symbol of craft scabbery on craft, of class collaboration, and of every form of treachery to the working class that the term "reactionary" implies, boasted of the radicalism of his youth, of his study of German to read the works of Karl Marx in their original purity, and was well able to talk radicalism when it served his purpose. (Many another, lacking this training of Gompers, has had to secure professional radicals to talk radicalism for them when occasion required it.)

The unions in the garment industry well enough illustrate the point. These various "needle trades" unions are often referred to as the left wing of the trade unionmove ment, and the degree of class-consciousness shown by them has been attributed to the predominance of non-English speaking members. But the early struggles of these unions show that so far as any such "foreign" influence shaped their policies, it was to make the lot of the little business man easier as these people hoped to be little business men themselves, and they had selected America because of their preference for its business and political practices. Always it was the worker with some socialistic tinge who started these unions. Largely because of the seasonal nature of the industry, and its previously small scale of operation which often made it a sort of family affair, there had ben no opportunity to crystallize the sporadic struggles into a union until 1891 when socialist workers in the industry formed the United Garment Workers. In the hopes that by doing so, they would avoid frightening others away, they put non-socialists in control from the start, joined the A.F. of L., and adopted very conservative policies based mostly on the sale of the union label.

In 1901 the International Ladies Garment Workers was formed, given birth likewise by radicals and from the same philosophy of creeping before you walk, turned over to conservatives at once. Since conservatism wins nothing, its first success was forced upon it in 1907 in a nine weeks strike of reefermakers led by refugees from the Russian revolution; their militancy lasted long enough to encompass the 1909 strike of 30,000 waist and dress makers, the greatest strike of girls and women known to that time. By the end of the "great strike" of 1913, this militancy had been replaced by the famous Protocol, which sounded like a treaty but actually meant the subjection of the workers to innumerable types of petty graft.

The United Garment Workers remained aloofly conservative, specializing in men's clothes and the sale of the label to Hart, Schaffner & Marx until 1914, when an ousted left wing formed the Amalgamated Clothing Workers on a program of replacing all this with a supposedly militant and socialistic union, but in reality to take up the label business where the United Garment Workers had left off, and twelve years later to consumate an agreement with "Golden Rule" Nash that to many of its members looked like a company union contract, entered into at the request of the employer.

The various needle trades unions, while we are mentioning them, might as well be drawn upon for another lesson, the complete failure of political radical groups to make such unions progressive. In them the issue of progressivism has almost always been bound up with some political sect, and its wars with some other sect, and resulted, as in the long fight between the Socialists and Communists for control in making confusion worse confounded, in pocket books emptier and dividends fatter. (Anyone interested in following up the record of the needle trades can find fine slices of it in Budish' "New Unionism", or in a series of articles by Solberg on "The Collapse of the Needle Trades" in the New York Nation back in 1929.)

That labor should aim high has been felt by other organizations than the I.W.W.—and the presence of the radical in their founding is often enough recorded in their preambles — about as effectively as the radical exhortations that perhaps the self same people have inscribed on the walls of jails. The preamble of the Cloth Hat and Cap Makers (organized in 1901) includes among its purposes: "to co-operate with the national and universal labor movement for the final emancipation of the wage earner, and for the establishment of the cooperative commonwealth." The 1914 Preamble of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers goes even further, and says: "The same forces that have been making for industrial unionism are making for a closer inter-industrial alliance of the working class. The industrial and inter-industrial organization built upon the solid rock of clear knowledge and class consciousness will put the organized working class in actual control of the system of production, and the working class will then be ready to take possession of it." (One might well ask: If you know that much, why not join the I.W.W. and do something about it?)

The railroad workers have had the experience also of electing progressives to make unions of their organizations. The first of the railroad unions, "The Brotherhood of the Footboard", formed in 1863 by the enthusiastic efforts of an engineer, Robinson, and the ancestor of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, remained radical for just one year, and changed its policies with its name. Charles Wilson, an engineer on the New York Central, aware of the fact that that road was favorable to the idea of a conservative union for its engineers, schemed to get control by charges against Robinson, and convinced the members that it would be a clever policy to assure the roads that the union would be concerned with raising the efficiency of its members. In 1866 and 1868 strikes were forced on the men, but the union officials would have nothing to do with their strikes. Wilson's denunciation of these strikes was followed by a similar denunciation of the strike on the Pennsylvania in 1873 when the company cut wages without so much as a day's notice—and that straw broke his back. A convention was held in Cleveland, Robinson cleared of charges, Wilson forced to resign, and P. M. Arthur elected as an "insurgent" in his place. But he followed the policies of the "reactionary" over whom he had triumphed to such an extent that the labor historian, Commons, says he "made conservatism the permanent and distinctive characteristic of the Brotherhood." Their progressive candidates since then have given them similar treatment, and led them into the fiasco of banking and real estate. The story is the same from these aristocrats of the road to the poor gandy dancer in the Maintainance of Way. Their 1922 convention got rid of Barker for pocketing some $222,000 of their union treasury and squandering some $770,000 on business union ventures. Then it got rid of Grable who had dictatorally called off the strike that year, contrary to the vote of the members, and thus contributing in no small degree to the general mess of mutual scabbery into which railroad labor got itself. Then it elected the progressive candidate Fljozdal to find him fit in the same groove from which they had ousted their previous leaders.

One might almost think that men who knew enough, when their cars won't steer straight to look to the mechanism of the steering gear and not content themselves with putting on one tire after another to go the way of is predecessor, might know better how to get satisfactory results out of their union.

The record of the coal miners is particularly important in these days when Lewis of the UMWA is selling the CIO to the American working class on assumptions that he can give them some bona fide industrial unionism that the coal miners certainly have lacked themselves. Of course, Lewis did not start the Mine Workers in their ways of district scabbery or internal corruption. That goes back to the days when the regard for public opinion changed Mitchell from the battler who practically built the miner's union to—well here is how Debs painted the transformation:

"There was a time when I admired and applauded Mitchell's leadership. I thought I saw the coming of a man. But, alas! little by little I have seen him succumb to the blandishments of the plutocrats. He is today their beau ideal of a labor leader."

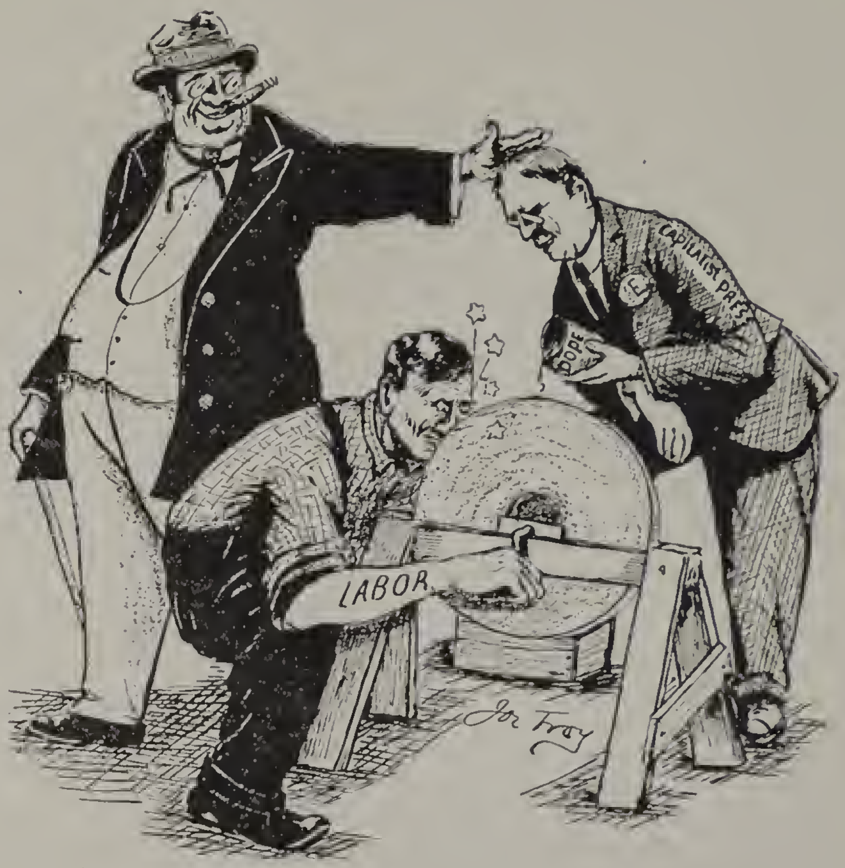
It was regard for public opinion presumably that led Mitchell to stop the bituminous and anthracite miners from striking together in 1902, and next year split the southern field of Colorado from the northern, so that this breach of solidarity was never healed until the successful strike of the I.W.W. in 1928 when north and southern fields were out together again. It may even have been this same esteem for public regard that made him conspire in 1904 to have a wage cut accepted when the union had voted to strike. But his similar actions in later years most likely were influenced by other regards as well, for he left extensive personal property already transferred to his family besides assets of $244,295.

There is often so a high regard for dead labor leaders as to remind one of the definition of a statesman: "a successful politician who is dead." But it does no good to labor to disregard the lessons that can be learned from labor's past. While Mitchell Day is still celebrated back in the anthracite region, his deals with the National Civic Federation (whose preamble includes as its chief object "to show that capital can be taught the practicability of securing industrial peace in accordance with business methods and that the twin foes of industrial peace are the anti-union employers and the socialists") resulted in the UMWA ruling that no member of that union can belong to this class collaboration institution. That keeps Lewis out of the NCF and has kept Green outside it, despite his Rotary Club speeches that surely established his eligibility otherwise. After the miners got rid of Mitchell as president they had a rapid succession of presidents who temporarily filled their hearts with the hope that a real miners' union might be built—Tom Lewis, John P. White, Frank J. Hayes, and then John L. Lewis himself whom the miners have never been able to rid themselves of since, despite the resentment aroused by his betrayal of the miners who came to the aid of the UMWA in 1922, and his autocratic control over the union with the payroll vote and the blue sky local and the complete disregard for how votes are counted anyway.

The record of what happens in unions that are not controlled by the majority decision of their members would fill a book of tragedies and hopes turned sour. The current scene on every front brings to the mind of the student of the record another case that somehow should be pointed out. In Chicago a murderous jurisdictional war between the independent Chicago Teamsters' Union and the International Brotherhood of Teamsters recalls Phillip Taft's summary of the Chicago independent union in his continuation of Professor Common's uncompleted history of Labor in the United States:

"Originally a reform movement against the survival under Shea of the Young-Driscoll methods, this union ended by adapting these methods in full and improving on them."

Or the evening broadcast contains a eulogy of Major Berry of the Pressmen's union, now associated with John L. Lewis in heading Labor's "Non-Partisan" politics; and one is reminded that while the Major came into the labor movement when a card was given him while he was scabbing in St. Louis to get him to quit scabbing, still he rose to power by overthrowing the previous administration with a minor rebellion when it wanted to agree with the United Typothetae for the eight-hour day and an open shop. Since then alike in his exalted position in the American Legion and in his command over his union, he has sent in "union" scabs to break many a strike, even working with the Burns Detective Agency to secure scabs at $20 per day.*



The Capitalist Press Has Corrupted Many a Labor Leader

Why is the record what it is? Is it that human nature is not to be trusted? Is it that only the exceptionally crooked become the leaders of labor? Fortunately it is neither. People aren't bad—they merely have conditioned reflexes. And as the A. F. of L. quite honestly said in defense of the charge that its officials have grown rich with bribery and corruption, its officials are by and large as honest as any officials in the public life of America — and neither this or any other country is a safe place for leaving your week's pay envelope on the front door step overnight.

The perpetual hope of workers that somebody would get elected to some office and fix things right for them is what is to blame. No doubt many of the most corrupt of union heads set out in the labor movement as class conscious workers who felt that it was up to them to get the boys to stick together and make the boss shell out with bigger pay checks. They didn't corrupt the labor movement. The labor movement corrupted them. Even such a character as Tobin of the Teamsters reminisces of the days gone by: "In the old days," he says, "when men fought for their unions there was a certain militant spirit pervading the air, and you heard of the union around the freight houses, wharves, and other places, you found men at meetings, you heard them out among your friends discussing the plans of the union. Today you seldom hear members discuss anything of serious importance about the union."

What makes the record what it is? It's the way the unions are built. It's in their written constitutions and in their traditional procedures. It's in their established relations as going concerns with the entire social and economic life around them. It's in the ruts and grooves into which these unions have worked themselves. It's in the make of the car, and not merely in the driver—and changing drivers will leave the rut and the steering pretty much as it is.

The militant elected to office in one of these unions, even though his intentions may be of the best, finds himself very much in the position of the fellow who buys out some store. Both are going concerns with customers and salesmen coming in, so to speak, expecting business to be conducted pretty much as it was—and accordingly it is conducted pretty much so. Union members accustomed to a type of business unionism that has bred fortunes exceeding the officer's salaries, and employers accustomed to avoiding trouble by offering the hard cash or securing good will by more adroit means where such crudeness seemed out of place, and union constitutions and procedures that left important decisions regarding working practices and conditions in the hands of business agents and higher officers, all breed the labor racketeer, and no doubt have twisted honestly inclined men into such racketeers.

Where a union is looked upon solely as a business venture for "collective bargaining" it is by no means illogical that the "brokers of labor power" will seek and secure their commissions; that the consciences of Farrington's will not be hurt by an additional $25,000 per year from a coal company, or a T. V. O'Connor hop from presidency of the Seamen's Union to a position as Chairman of the U.S. Shipping Board where he did everything against the union that he could do. In the light of business practice it is viewed as no more unethical than the switching of an ace salesman to the service of some competitor. Even Lewis no doubt is not as embarrassed by the disclosures of his deals with Myron Taylor of U.S. Steel as most people were surprised by them. It is the logical tendency of business unionism, and almost certain to come about wherever contractual practices and constitutional provisions enable labor leaders to sell their services to employers.

* Major Berry has now been appointed to the U. S. Senate by the Governor of Tennessee who comments on his success as a capitalist and gentleman farmer.

But it is not always a matter of hard cash. It is reasonably certain that Gompers got no more out of the labor movement than a salary that enabled him to live luxuriously, even though not as much as might have been paid in other positions offered him, and the glory and praise that was lavished upon him as the nation's safe and sane labor leader. It was this regard for public opinion—the sort of public opinion that the economic masters of America create through their daily press — that started the railroad unions on a policy of obnoxious conservatism, that led Mitchell to establish the practices of sectional scabbery among the miners, that made Powderly of the Knights of Labor give up the battles that well might have made that Order the means of solidarity that American labor has long been seeking. The role of this same factor of public opinion is so obvious in the current case of Lewis that to mention it is almost to rub a sore toe — and the newspapers play the game as they though recalled and relished their previous triumphs in the seductive power of a headline.

The dangers in the perpetuation of this record are great. But they are not those most emphasized by the press. It will do no great harm to American labor that some fellow who lacked the backbone to go look for a union is compelled to join one, or to accept some increase in pay forced by others from his boss even though he has to pay most of it back to the union, or even go on strike and act like a man when he would prefer to scab. That in actual fact is the excuse for labor racketeering that gives it reason to endure. It is that we need unions, and these blamed things aren't unions no matter how they are dressed up. We need a means of acting together, and these are devices to stop us from acting together. We need arrangements for coming to majority decisions for ourselves, and these are contraptions to make any such majority decision still-born. We need weapons of offense and defense in the struggle for existence, and organizations that we do not control can certainly furnish us no protection.

The hazards and oppression to which labor is subjected are in no small degree the by-products of the sort of thing that has passed for labor unionism in America. The rustling card in Butte by which a blacklist is maintained, was established with the connivance of union officials, partly out of a racial "consciousness of kind" to keep the Finns out of the Butte mines because they wouldn't swear in plain English, and largely to get rid of those who in their sense of what a labor movement ought to do, were a nuisance alike to the union and the company officials. That Butte rustling card is a material embodiment of the relationship into which accepted practices put worker, employer, and union official in the majority of industries. It is the sort of arrangement that we can expect to see fostered in these days of increasing regimentation and attempt control over labor. "The One Big Company Union"—the C.I.O.—is laid out to function very much in accord with such a policy—and the workers are few and far between and exceedingly dumb, who will like the results when they get it.

The remedy? Start off fresh and clean. Get out of the ruts in which unionism has been cast. Sever completely the "established business and going concern" of business unionism by starting out on the matter of fact premise that worker and employer, no matter how collectively they may bargain, are in the position of owner of the earth and wage-slave existing by permission of the owner, until, and unless we dump him off his throne. Remember that the aim of a union of wage slaves is emancipation from wage-slavery—and that will never be achieved by getting the boss to sign a contract providing for our emancipation and our concomitant recapture of Mother Earth. Build unions for solidarity, and there will be no jurisdictional points with which business agents can juggle. Build a union in which the majority of the members exercise as complete a control over all policies and decision at all times as is at all possible, and then the boss will have to buy the whole works out, for the union officials will have nothing to sell. And if you want your union officials to be of you and not over you, to see things as you see them and not as your boss sees them, change them from time to time, get them back on the job as a wage earner occasionally, and keep their salary down with your earnings, so that their environment is yours too—for a man is as filled with his environment as a sausage skin is filled with whatever it is they stick in it.

It is because of these facts that the record of the I.W.W. is so vastly different from the record of the rest of the labor movement. And the point, if you please, is not merely that we have a past in which we can glory, but a process in motion, and a highly advantageous starting point from which to take off for new achievements in the battle for the good things of life for us all.

What Excuse for Capitalism?

By

FRED THOMPSON

From Adam Smith to Thorstein Veblen the successive apologies for capitalism and exploitation, and the successive punctures that these excuses have received, are reviewed in the hopes that they may stop someone from falling for some of them.

Those who have ruled us have always tried to assure us that it was all for our own good, that the interest of the race, the interest of all things we held good beyond our own lives, the interest of society, and what they found good to do, were all one and the same. As we have rid ourselves of one master after another, one set of economic notions after another has been scrapped as absurd; but today, in the long-winded economic arguments that get people seemingly nowhere, these outworn and rejected notions are brought up to "make confusion worse confounded."

When kings and emperors ruled for their kind it was simply taken for granted that whatever economic policy brought them the most revenue without immediately killing the goose that laid the golden egg, or hurting the upper crust on whose favor they held the reins, was a good economic policy. The fact that these policies made deserts of their wheat fields, widows of their subjects' daughters, ruins of their cities, until their very gods were forgotten, did not bring into question the premise: What is good for the state is good. And today without hesitation it is the test of an economic policy: Will it help balance the budget without soaking the rich? Science goes ever ahead to new achievements, but the economic thinking of a ruling class never.

So long as the great fortunes of the world were in landed estates, going from father to son, it was considered a great sin to charge interest on money loaned to the owners of these lands, for then some of the products of the serfs' labor went to rank outsiders. Today this usury is a very highly honored business of banking and finance capital and it is no longer sinful to charge interest.

When the fortunes in shipping became great enough to dominate over all others, it became the accepted view that the nation itself was a great mercantile concern. It was believed that when more money came in by the end of the year than went out, it was good business for the entire nation, even though to accomplish this, millions of the nation had to be changed from relatively happy cotters to miserable vagabonds. And we still hear learned men talking of this "favorable balance of trade."

When the business class in England, America, and France thought it time in the light of their growing importance as a class to start running the world themselves, they had to challenge much of the arguments that the nation was a great mercantile concern, and that the test for an economic policy was how it affected government revenue. In fact this new class made its revolution largely because it wanted government to attend to just two things: to grab the world for its exploitation and to stop the working class from organizing and grabbing anything for itself. By its revolution it not only established capitalism, but it gave birth to the young science of economics as well.

An "Unseen Hand" Discovered

Adam Smith looked at the stirring world about him, grew enthusiastic about the division of labor in the manufacture of pins, and in all things else. He saw in this division of labor two objects to study. One was the fact that men working together in this way turned out far more than they would if each worked for himself. The other was that this division of labor meant at the same time the dependence of each on the other. It was a tie that held them together. It indicated to him that the parts of the economic world were held together by this division of labor and the consequent mutual dependence of man on man, much as the parts of the physical universe were held together by the gravitational attraction of mass to mass. And it occurred to him further that the economic relations of man to man, if studied and found to yield general truths similar to those "natural laws" whose discovery had so caught the fancy of the times, would dispense with the notion that these economic relations could be maintained only by the ever present interference of the state. This fitted perfectly with the ambitions of the business class. So the world was soon properly impressed to observe the division of labor between country and country, between city and rural districts, between city and city, between shop and shop, all busy working apparently indifferent to what the other was doing, bent each only on his own profit, all in apparent chaos, and yet somehow all dovetailing together, doing the work that they could best do for others because that was what it was most profitable to do. In fact the only thing, in this scheme of things, that could disrupt perfect harmony, was some interference with the operation of self-interest.

On this basis, from Smith's "Wealth of Nations" (published in 1776) the idea of some benevolent "unseen hand" guiding our destiny so long as some state interference didn't stop it, was elaborated by a host of writers, who while developing theories of rent, currency and ways to raise revenue made it their chief business to show that the working class should be content with long hours, low wages and the starvation of unemployment.

"The Dismal Science"

Labor was stirring, and its condition was so wretched that even the decent-minded of the ruling class felt something ought to be done about it. But the economists all urged that to do anything about it or to permit labor to do anything for itself, would destroy the natural harmony that self-interest would work out by itself. Reform was damned as "misguided idealism."

Malthus proved to the satisfaction of every coupon clipper and politician, that if higher wages were paid, the workers would just marry earlier, raise larger families, produce more unemployment by their larger numbers, reduce wages again by their increased competition, and meanwhile so press on the margin of cultivation that it would result in starvation and ruin for all. (And meanwhile the notion that workers should check this competition by organizing unions was held to be such a disastrous interference with natural economic law that was forbidden by the laws of Great Britain.) This masterpiece of reasoning came out in 1803, and it was the accepted doctrine until quite recently despite the readily observed fact that those with higher incomes usually have smaller families, and if anything, are later in settling down in marriage.

It was a time when the first epoch making impetus was given to the productivity of labor. Every day new machines were changing the face of the world. It was the steady boast how much more could be produced with them than with the old hand methods. Yet the standard of living of workers in England was definitely going down. It took no theory to convince any sensible workingman that he was being gypped—that the rent, interest and profit that others lived on was something that he turned out but didn't get. What were the economists to say in explanation of this income of the upper classes?

The answer given by the capitalist economists was that wealth was producted by the combination of land, labor and capital, and that each earned its share as rent, wages, and interest—and, of course, as payment for the specific earnings of the manufactureer or industrial capitalist—the wages of superintendence and the reward of enterprise. Rent, Ricardo had explained, was payment for the advantage of the soil over the margin in use—that, if land could be had for nothing that produced four bushels an acre, then it was worth while to pay the price of three bushels to use an acre that would raise seven. So as cities grew and gave advantage to locations, or as the expansion of agriculture brought poorer land into cultivation, the owner of the land earned a larger and larger share of the national production by doing nothing but owning it.

Interest—why certainly it has to be paid as a reward for abstinence or people would not save money to invest in business enterprise; and so those who could not use up their incomes accumulated bigger and bigger incomes as the reward for an abstinence practiced only by those who received no interest.

It was explained further that capital produced most of the wealth, and not labor; that if a man with machinery could turn out ten times as many socks as he could without the machinery, then certainly the machine turned out nine-tenths of the socks and the owner of the machine was actually being exploited by the exorbitant demands of labor if he did not get nine-tenths of the product. They didn't check their calculation by figuring what the machine would produce without the men.

And the simple fact upon which Adam Smith had so elaborated—that men co-operating and dividing the work among them could do much more than they could without this co-operation and division of labor—this fact was used to argue that if an employer hired a hundred men to work together under his direction then the excess they produced in this way over what they would each working alone, was really his product and should go to him as the "wages of superintendence." And enterprise should have its due reward even though it be enterprise that cast thousands into poverty.

In short, with such splendid arguments for rent, interest and profit, it seemed that the operation of industry and the employment of workers was a philanthropic enterprise to give people work, and that for workers to insist upon any wages at all was an ungrateful way of biting the very hand that fed them.

The Marxian Analysis

Such reasoning was forced to take a back seat by the analysis presented by Karl Marx. The assumption of "freedom of contract" that workers offered their services of a free will and from no coercion, was blown up by pointing out the actual slave-like status of the modern wage worker. He is no more free while others own the means with which he must work to live, than if others owned him outright. Like the serf and slave, the wage-worker works with material owned by others, with equipment owned by others, and the product is owned by these others. His standard of living, while it may have doubled between the horrors of 1820 and 1929, certainly did not keep pace with an increase of several hundred fold in his productivity.

The entire explanation of modern economic facts, Marx urged, was therefore to rest on the surplus that labor consequently produced but did not get. The premise to start with is not some assumption of freedom of contract, natural law, and what not, but the readily observable fact that man's labor, applied to natural resources, produces all the goods and services on the market. Those who do this work for those who own the equipment get their subsistence or as much more perhaps as their organized strength may win for them; the rest of what they produce goes to the owners of the equipment to be divided up as rent, interest, profits, taxes to support non-productive workers, as in the "legislative, executive and judiciary" branches of government, etc.

This Marxian slant that these various items of "unearned incomes" are not directly filched, but are derivatives from the surplus produced by industrial labor, indicates that the host of reforms to decrease rent, alter the basis of taxation, or limit interest, are of no substantial concern to the worker. His battle is with the employer; the job where he produces this wealth that he does not get is his battleground. Thus one practical advantage of this Marxian outlook on economics has been to focus the attention of those workers who have understood it, on the points for effective attack against their exploiters.

The view of Karl Marx on these fundamental questions of economics have become much more widely accepted in recent years largely because the historic trend of capitalist economy has followed the predictions that naturally follow from them, and certainly have not followed the predictions natural to any economic thought that disregards the exploitation of labor as the forward pushing force in this economy. To the "natural harmony" way of thinking, crises were accidents; to Marx they were inevitable recurrences of capitalism. The general course of the history of our times, is all implicit in such a line of economic thought as he advanced. So today he receives the credit that comes to a scientist whose forecast works out. The test of truth is: "Will it work?"

Since the time of Marx the apologists for capitalism and for profits have worked on other lines. The old alibis for profits were supposed to fit in with the "labor concept of value" taught by Smith and Ricardo and the other founders of economic science, but now quite taboo because of the logical conclusions Marxians have drawn from it. In its place has been reared the notion of "marginal utility." It is considered, as one such approach, that in a competitive market, as long as a profit is made by producing any article, others will try the business, until those who turn out this article at the highest cost find that they make a loss instead. Thus the price tends to equal the cost to the marginal producer. Should the price drop, many marginal producers would be wiped out. Should the price rise, the margin would be shifted to others who produced even at a greater cost. So the formula while no doubt true enough, really means nothing, so far as an explanation of price is concerned. So the question is also offered that as the consumer has marginal wants and may switch from potatoes to rice if the price of spuds rises, that the marginal use of an item to its marginal consumers also sets the price. And so, of course, it also follows that price in a competitive market is such that the marginal use to the marginal consumer balances the cost of production to the marginal producer, if all that means anything more than a picture of the higgling process of the market.

"The Disutility of Working"

In regard to wages in particular this viewpoint (which pleases a consuming class because it implies that values exist because of these dear parasites' desire for things) is worked out this way. From the worker's side the utility of the wage is supposed to balance for him the disutility of working. From the employer's viewpoint the services of the worker are a "utility" only in so far as he can derive a profit from him. He has certain equipment and material, and certain orders to fill. If hiring more workers will give him more profits under these circumstances, he will do so. If he finds that it is more profitable to lay some of his force off, he will do so. And thus the wage the worker gets is said to be, by such economists, equal to the extra production of the marginal worker. (This, of course, doesn't seem to fit in with the experience that you have to get out the same production as the next man or go down the line. But such economic theories aren't to be expected to fit in with the facts of life.)

However, it all sounds plausible, and since it really has no meaning, it can not very well be proved untrue. It expresses the actual experience of the business man tolerably well, and also his muddle-headedness, and so has been accepted as the current and orthodox economics. It creates the impression that a society where industry is run for profits is really after all run for service, for that is the way to make profit, and that what the banker and landlord and businessman and industrial magnate get, is determined by the usefulness of their services to others; and that if the worker does not get very much, it is because his services are not very useful. Hence for workers to get more, they should make themselves worth more to their employers. This has been handed out in many editorials in times of industrial disputes without the attendent explanation that the strike, creating a shortage of labor and of its products was the one and only way to make labor "worth more" to the employers. Economics has thus been lifted to the plane of Rotary Club ethics.

Veblen's Observations

While the more obvious and arrant nonsense of this system of margical utility and its conclusions —and preachments—were being modified and replaced by the more factual observations encouraged by such economists as Taussig, Seligman and Nearing in America, and as Hobson in England, the pin that put the hole in the balloon of marginal utility was put there by a rather erratic professor of economics in Chicago, Stanford and Missouri by the name of Thorstein Veblen. His first major work made a simple observation from which the rest of his precious logic readily flowed. He made a simple and obvious distinction—between business and industry. Industry is the process of producing things; business is the process of buying them cheap and selling them dear —if it is possible. Industry is owned by businessmen. The business men hire technical experts to supervise production and to see that the process is carried on in a somewhat efficient and workman-like manner, and that the product has at least sufficient serviceability to be vendable (Veblen's favorite term for saleable). No further degree of serviceability is desired by the businessman, and any greater degree of service is to be viewed as a waste of service, interfering with the wearing out of the thing sold, and thus interfering with a future prospective opportunity to sell it again at more than it cost. Here the purpose of business and industry conflict.

Again the object of industry, as taught by the technicians hired by the business men, is to turn out plenty, to establish mass production, to create an abundance at low cost. This will not do for the business man as his profit is contingent on keeping the supply down enough below the demand to make sure of a profit. And in consideration of this demand, the conflict of business and industry again comes out—for where it is the industrial outlook, the requirement of the technician that supplies be accurately labeled and be definitely up to specification. the business man hires the business man's apostle, the advertising agent, to put the wares on the market as though they were something far more excellent than they are.

To summarize the relation of business to industry, Veblen borrows a term of reproach that had been hurled at radical labor, at the I.W.W. in particular—the term sabotage—and, defining it as the willful withdrawal of efficiency, states that the function of business is the sabotage of industry.

But the business man's sabotage of industry and the conflict of business with industry does not end in these simple restrictions that the business-like owner imposes on his hired technicians and through them on the workman-like crew he has hired. This is the age of Big Business and therefore of more intricate and more colossal sabotage.

This is the age of the corporation, where over 90 percent of the wealth is owned by corporations. And these corporations in turn are owned by those who own stocks in them, pieces of paper entitling them—if they are preferred shares—to a fixed income taken out of the profit, and if they are common shares, to an income varying with the profit. The corporations may perhaps also be owned by bond-holders who are also promised a fixed percentage on their bonds, though these bond-holders can really not claim any single piece of the corporation's property and have dubious rights in controlling it. The actual property probably belongs, if it belongs to any one, to the owners of debentures and mortgages. In fact the ownership of many corporations is so dubious that it is almost impossible to affix responsibility for damages done by the corporation; but when the I.W.W. proposes that labor "takes possession," or workers sit down in their plants, these responsibility dodgers let out a howl.

Such being the set-up, the big business is the peddling of these shares of stock. There are the most golden opportunities.

In this businesslike process of buying cheap and selling dear, far more can be done to put stocks up and down than can be done to put the price of pork or pig iron up and down. And it is in these ups and downs that the businesslike process of buying cheap and selling dear finds its advantages. It is not always good business to have an industrial enterprise succeed; it is not always good business to have new capital funds flow to those industries where there is a need for expansion; it is not good business for example to provide good housing. It is good business to provide frequent disturbances in the economic process, for this makes up-and-downs that those who know where and when the ups-and-downs will oc-

MR. JOHN PUBLIC: CONSUMER

The Decline and Rise of the Consumer by Horace M. Kallen D. Appleton-Century Co. 484 pages $2.75.

After we were neck-deep in this last depression, or economic crisis, many of our thinkers and philosophers began to discuss ways of avoiding future ones. The President sent a commission to the Scandinavian countries to observe the producers and consumers coöperatives. Many people are now believing that consumer coöperation offers the vehicle for peacable transition from capitalist to consumer economy.

Mr. Kallen is among those who hold this latter belief. The subtitle of his volume is "A Philosophy of Consumer Coöperation". In his building of such a philosophy he gets far astray and into deep water. His liberalism grants him little understanding of either socialism or communism. In discussing their relation to consumer coöperation he flounders terribly. Neither does he have a real conception of the causes of Fascism.

In the first few chapters, Kallen is decidedly dull. Therein he attempts to establish the primacy of the consumer over the producer; the idea that society should be chiefly concerned with satisfying the wants of the consumer rather than nurturing the wishes of the profit-seeking producer.

Kallen briefly sketches the evolution from serfdom scarcity through to the guilds and to early manufacturing; from the days when the producer had actual relations with the consumer, to the time when the circulation of goods separated producer and consumer. This latter period produced goods in greater quantities but of inferior quality. Developing capitalism was producing for sale and caveat emptor was the rule.

In England experiments were being made in consumer coöperation and were resulting in failures until the Rochdale Plan was established. In tracing the rise of coöperatives in England and on the Continent, Kallen stresses that successes were due to strict adherence to Rochdale principles. Despite the theories of the Owenites, Christian Socialists and manufacturers coöperatives, the real strength lay in retail and wholesale consumer coöperatives. Credit unions came at a larger date. Today in England their resources total $400 millions and 70,000 accounts. Gradients in the relations between coöperative employees and management are discussed.

In the United States the coöperative movement had a varied and hectic carreer—hectic with post-war frauds costing the gullible millions, and varied with divergent sponsors. However, American individualism kept down growth here. In its beginning consumer coöperation was associated with the National Grange, Farmers Union and the Farm Bureau. Today most of the coöperatives are among the agricultural populations. Those in the industrial centers are almost entirely among the foreign groups.

It can be believed that these co-ops have saved their members and customers millions of dollars. Among the petroleum co-ops the amount saved is fifteen cents on a dollar purchase. In this era of rapidly rising prices and receding real wages, there is a growing interest in consumer co-ops. However, to believe as does Mr. Kallen that consumer coöperation and credit unions in collaboration with the trade unions can subtly change ours into a consumers' economy is gazing through rosy spectacles. It is Kallen's belief that co-ops should steer clear of any political alliances in order to succeed. Without an infusion of other ideas they are to change our economic setup. There is a bibliography of data on cooperatives and an index.—James DeWitt.

A SAILOR WRITES OF BATTLE

Tsushima by A. Novikoff-Priboy. Translated from the Russian by Eden and Cedar Paul. Alfred A. Knopf. 425 pages $3.50.

Reading history, to most of us is like raking in the dust heaps. Accounts of great battles are usually glorifications of the strategical genius of some commander.

Here is the dramatic narrative of one of the world's greatest naval battles by one of the common sailor participants. For twenty years this account of a decisive battle of the Russian-Japanese War lay hidden in a forgotten place. Hidden originally from the eyes of the Tsarist police they were found again by the author and made into a volume that sold a million copies in the Soviet Union.

Upon the defeat of the First Pacific Squadron off Port Arthur by the Japanese fleet, the Russian Ministry of Marine hastily assembled the Second Squadron at Kronstadt. From the time it sailed on October 2nd, 1904, until the destruction of its 38 ships eight months later in Tsushima Straits by Admiral Togo's fleet, one can sense along with the author the impending disaster.

Novikoff-Priboy was a political suspect before his naval assignment. That is he presumed to dispute the divine authority of the Tsarist rule. Like many other political suspects in the navy he was sent to the Far East in the hopes that he would never return. It was truly remarkable that these aging and rusty hulks withstood the 18,000 mile voyage from the Baltic to the Sea of Japan. It was still more remarkable that the ship's complements with the knowledge of their inevitable doom preying upon them, were able to restrain themselves from mutiny.

It was not discipline that held the squadron together on this long voyage, but servility. A bootlicking servility to admirals and commanders who rose to rank because they were court favorites or because they were landed gentry. This servile dependence upon empty-headed commanding officers, afraid to accept responsibility even in emergencies, and a morale that cracked and brought about confusion at the first shot from the enemy's guns, was the immediate cause of the ignominous defeat.

The author dramatizes his action and writes with a clear insight that sets him aside from the older school of verbose Russian fiction. Being himself from the poorer classes he does not have to pretend to feel what he has never experienced. True understanding of his shipmates with an amazing grasp of naval practice and navigation allows him to write the best book on naval warfare that has ever been printed. Novikoff with many of his fellow seamen understood perfectly the part they were playing, fighting valiantly for a lost cause under handicaps. The utter destruction of the Tsar's naval forces at Tsushima was the symbol of the decay of the Empire and one of those defeats that led to the abortive revolution of 1905, and a decay that paved the road to the events of 1917.

There is a map, charts and tables of comparative strength of the Russian and Japanese naval forces, but no index.—James DeWitt.

cur can use very much to their advantage in loading up with stock and letting it go, with gambling on the price of next year's wheat, or betting on foreign exchange.

Wars and peace are both excellent devices for producing profitable ups-and-downs; even the rumors of war can be turned into profits in handling the fictitious values of the stock exchange—and even should the rumors of war and the dumbness of those people who, because they couldn't become stock-brokers became statesmen instead, should this result in a real war where a few million workers were killed, it really creates a remarkable market for goods of dubious vendibility with few questions asked, and thus makes the floating of new issues of stocks, bonds, debentures, the promotion of new companies all possible, and above all makes shares in munition plants good stock worth holding on to.

Where Adam Smith 150 years before had looked on the stirring world about him and seen the working of an invisible hand providentially producing harmony and efficiency and progress through the search of each for his own advantage, the modern economist looks on a capitalism gone mad and sees a very sinister hand offering inferior and often harmful goods under bright disguises to a gullible public, another sinister hand of the same monster stopping the wheels of industry to insure that a tribute be paid; another sinister hand reaching out to stop capital being invested in the necessary repairs to a railroad bed, with the result of a smash-up and death, another sinister hand producing a depression, and an even more sinister hand of the monster ringing the tocsin of war and sending millions to their death.

There is but one excuse for capitalism—only one excuse for profits and the other fruits of exploitation—and that is "that the suckers will stand for it." It's time to end that excuse, too.

Big Back East Banker — He swaps shares instead of paying income taxes.

Local Banker and Pillar of community — wishes he had done the same.

Local Manufacturer — He swears that when better times come business will bring them.

He makes parts for the local manufacturer and still hopes to rise.

John Workox who really does the work, and is on the pay roll of the man above him.

John Workox's boss insists that he carries John on the pay roll. The local manufacturer boasts that he carries John's boss with his credit and orders, and the bankers boast that they carry them all.

Do they carry John, or does John carry them? If you insist that they carry John you may beome a professor of economics, but if you insist that John carries them you should join the I.W.W. to dump the bosses off your back.

When conditions get a bit tough, and John's knees get shaky, his local paper advises that it's time to get real radical, and form a united front of everybody from the local banker down to fight the big banker back east. Should John unite with the first four parasites on his shoulder to get rid of the back east banker—or should he get out from under the whole pile of them by ditching his own cockroach boss?

If you still think John should unite with all the little bosses to fight the big ones, you might as well join some political party until you wake up. If you're for dumping all the bosses off your back, join the I.W.W. and let's do it.

Someone told John that what made his back ache was that the bosses on his back were too big, and that he should have a law passed to have more bosses and smaller ones on his back instead of these big ones.

Who makes the laws—John or the folks on his back?

If the fellow on top represents a billion dollars, and the next high represents a million, would John be more comfortable with a different boss to represent each $10,000 involved in the picture?

John's boss has promised him that if he doesn't join the I.W.W. to dump the whole skedadle off his back, and sticks with him for ten more years, and business picks up, he will make him a foreman so that he will have someone to ride.

If business picks up, and John sticks, and his boss lives up to his agreement, will this make the load any lighter on John's back? (We didn't ask about his feet.)

Now it's time for you and John to join the I. W. W.

How We Got This Way

There are about two billion people on this earth. About a third of us live in countries where railroads, machines, and factories make us call ourselves civilized. We live in continuous worry about how to make ends meet without a job, or worry how to hold the job we have, and are beset with the menace of wars in which we may have to kill each other off. The rest of the two billion inhabitants of Earth, though they see much less of railroads, machines, electric lights, and porcelain bathtubs, are caught in the same trap of economic insecurity, and face the same danger of military annihilation. A world-wide depression has put wrinkles in the foreheads alike of the Detroit mechanic, the Lancashire weaver, the South-Sea Islander, clad in a necklace and loin-cloth, and earning a living by gathering copra shell, and the African elephant hunter who finds that the radio, displacing the piano, has wrecked the market for ivory. We are all in a mess—a mess into which we have wandered in our search for security—for safety, and enough.

The Search for Safety

The human race has spent thousands of years, fought thousands of wars, devised thousands of inventions, conferred and deliberated on thousands of plans to achieve safety and security, that we might live to a ripe old age and see our young ones grow up around us. We started out in a world where every creature was armed to attack us and to resist our attack, while we poor human beings could neither fly like the eagle nor live in the water; we could not run as fast as the rabbit nor had we the strength of the bear; we had no tough hide like the elephant, no horns like the bull, no sharp teeth like the wolf, no fighting tusks like the boar; nor could we even defend ourselves, like the skunk, with a foul stench. But we had our heads more erect than they, for we had hands with which to grasp things and re-shape them to our fancy; and we had a voice-box that could develop language, and thus enable us to benefit from the experience of others, and become the wisest of all the inhabitants of earth. So we fashioned stones to hurl and cut, we conquered fire, we rolled great stones in front of our caves, we made clothing of the skins of the animals we ate, we learned to throw the javelin and spear, we drew the cord over the bow and sent the arrow on its flight, we made us armor, and built walled cities, we built us boats to go on the water, we conquered all the bears and elephants and tigers combined, we built submarines and torpedoes with which to sink our boats, Big Berthas with which to smash down the walls of our cities, great airplanes with which to bomb them. Our tanks were far tougher than the rhinoceros' hide; our aircraft outflew the eagle; our poison-gas outstunk the skunk. All this we did to make ourselves safe—and for four thousand years there has scarcely been a year of peace in which we were not killing each other; in 1914-18 we killed ten million soldiers and twenty-four million civilians; and ever since in a world in which there has always been a war we have been living in continuous dread of the far more terrible devices for slaughter that have been invented since—radio-controlled rackets; death rays; more powerful explosives; more deadly gases; and most terrible of all, the bacteriological warfare by which our drinking water is to be infected with typhoid, our clothing with anthrax, and our cities infested with rats to carry the dread bubonic plague—all to be dropped by aircraft. Such has been our progress toward shafety.

"The Conquest of Bread"

We have made similar progress in feeding ourselves. We sought the most fertile river valleys in the hope of always finding something to eat. We found we could grow our food and not have to hunt for it; we found we could raise our own meat. We settled and built ourselves towns—and the huntsmen from the hills raided our fields and herds and made themselves masters of the great river valleys. We were slaves and they were masters, except when in the wars they wages to levy tribute from other conquered valleys, the defeated lords of one valley became the slaves of the victors. We built irrigation systems so that our crops could always have water; and even faster our overlords built great empires, using us as pawns in their empire-building. They built and wrecked—they wrecked the cities they conquered and they likewise wrecked their native lands, for the tribute of grain they levied made it useless to grow our own crops. The land we had cultivated went waste; wind and rain made much of it desert; famine, pestilence, and the slaughter of our young men in war, all left ruin behind them. Where our labor and sweat and suffering for thousands of years had built gorgeous civilizations, we have left the sands of the deserts, and the great tombs that thousands of us died building, so that a few royal corpses might rot less slowly.

Once again on the ruin of these ancient empires, our class, though now of different race, set out in the quest of security. Once more we were entrapped as slaves and serfs, growing crops and building strong castles to house and feed those who laid waste the fields of our neighbors. Our wives and daughters spun and wove; we smoked and pickled herring; and merchants came to trade their spice and silk for these goods that we made for our masters. These merchants grew rich, and the richer they grew, and the more wars the kings and lords fought, and the more they borrowed from the merchants, the more favors the merchants exacted of them, until it came to be that the merchants either ruled through the kings, or had us, the working people, overthrow them. And we believed the tale of the merchants that if we would but let them rule, we would have peace and equal opportunity, freedom, and justice.

So we improved the farmlands and raised new crops, and learned to rotate them. We devised windmills and better water-wheels. We went forth in the merchants' ships and brought back to Europe strange things from many lands; and with the Chinese compass we sailed first over what we thought was the edge of a flat world, and discovered and conquered America. Our more adventurous sons went sailing everywhere, planting flags for the merchants, and bringing home rich treasure to them, or killed each other in the wars that the merchants and kings of one country waged with the merchants and kings of another. But despite their waste and wars and destruction, despite the horror of seeing our homes go up in smoke and our loved ones slaughtered, the world we were building grew richer; our knowledge grew richer; and our industrial arts surpassed those of the ancient world on whose ruins we had built a new one. That the merchants might have more cloth and trinkets to offer for pearls and gold and diamonds to the savages on the edges of the world, we built great factories where we spun and wove with the power of water. Our country homes were destroyed so that sheep could be raised where before we had raised gardens and children; and we with our children went into the great new cities, living in filth and wretchedness, making our tiny tots slave sixteen hours a day in their mills, or burn themselves crawling through their chimneys to clean them.

We built steam engines to run the machines, and dug mines to furnish them coal, taking down our women to crawl through the drifts on their bleeding knees as beasts of burden, while our children sat alone in the dark tending the trap doors of the mines. We worked as no slaves before had ever worked, and we lived in ever greater misery and squalor. We heard the boast that the machines we had built had made it possible to produce a hundred times as much as our fathers; yet we alternated our twelve and sixteen hour shifts with long out-of-work stretches, roaming the country, seeing our children die of hunger, and some of us, brutalized enough by this progress, ate our very children. We blamed the machine; and those of wood we burned, and those of steel we wrecked, even as centuries before the first knitting machines had been burned in the market-places to ward off what today we call "technological unemployment". But faster than those out of work could destroy the machines, those who had jobs built new ones that went faster. Secretly, and against the law of those days, we built unions, hoping thereby that some of the great flood of wealth that we were pouring out would come to us and bring us happiness; and though ever it was that the tale-bearer in our ranks worked against us, and men weakened under promises and threats and the sight of the hunger of their children in our long-fought strikes, yet the fact that we fought and were banded together to fight freed most of our children of the worst of their slavery, removed our wives from work at night and as beasts of burden in the mines, cut down our hours until we could endure them, and gave us hovels less disgusting than those we had before. Our unemployment of today is less wretched than our prosperity of a century ago—and whatever brightness and joy we have in our lives has been achieved by the fight we have made banded together.

But for every trivial increase that we got, our ever more wonderful machines turned out a hundred-fold increase for others. From the workshops of England and France, as from a seed-bin, we sprouted factories and machinery the round world over. We made steam carry us across oceans against the wind; we made steam carry our loads across continents on road-beds that we slaved in the sun long hours to build; we made steam, and even falling water, drive a mighty electric force through the cables that we made of the copper dug in Butte and Africa and Chile, and with which we had girdled the globe. With these mighty modern means we built empires such as Alexander could never have visioned—empires that circled the earth, and yet where messages could be sent to any point in an instant. Our sons went thousands of miles to kill other workers' sons, to build these empires and to die with the torment of the damned. And even as the empires of old gathered tribute from the territory conquered, and thus killed industry in the very seat of their power—so too in these empires of the great capitalists, conquest and expansion meant that jute was woven for a penny a day in India while jute weavers in Dundee went on a shilling a day relief; that copper was mined in Chile so cheap that miners in Butte went hungry; that the work of the world was done more and more where men wore only loin-cloths and brought up their children on rice.

Our class that for centuries has slaved for Pharaohs, Kings and Emperors, for lords and princes and merchants, now slaves for great corporations. The wealth we built in machinery, in mines, in railroads, in power and pipe-lines is so great that seldom does anyone attempt to own any piece of it. Instead the possession of a piece of paper—a share of stock, a bond or debenture—entitles him to more tribute than did the possession of a whole army or whole fleet in the days of old. So today the greatest merchant princes of all are those who buy and sell these tribute-bearing pieces of paper. A handful of these men make war or peace to benefit by the change it makes in their stock-market; they close down whole industries and blight the hopes and dreams of whole nations of people, to make sure that no wheel turns and no motor hums without paying them their tribute. So here we are—two billion people on this earth whose ancestors have been toiling and giving up their very lives these thousands of years to win safety and security for our kind; two billion people whose skilled hands and ever keener brains have harnessed the air, the wind, the water, the oil and coal from beneath the earth, and used this power to drive great arms and legs of steel to work that our bare hands could never undertake; two billion people whose skill and science and invention could readily produce all that these two billion and many more billion people could ever use; and these two billion people living on next to nothing, always in want, always imperilled by war and famine and pestilence, all because they let a hundred of them control the machines they have built and the power they have harnessed.

It is a blight that fell on us thousands of years ago when the hunters from the hills raided our garden plots in the valleys, and we let them remain over us as lords and masters. We who do the world's work, who have made this wild world over into a veritable Aladan's lamp that we need only to rub in order to have what we want, will not be safe, and will not be secure so long as we let any lord and master hold this Aladan's lamp that we have fashioned of oil and copper and steel for him, and permit him to tell us when we can rub it.

The great economic problems of today—the age-old quest for safety and enough—the endless urge to make our dreary lives full and rich and satisfying—these are problems that only our class can hope to solve; and our class is skilled and competent as no class of workers, slaves or serfs before us ever was, to solve them. And if our class does not free Aladan's lamp from the clutch of this modern Midas, then the hopes of mankind these many hundred years, and the chances to build on this decaying capitalism a new and splendid social order, will go down in war and pestilence and famine to the fate of Babylon and Greece and Rome.—7-GO-8.

A PAGE OF REBEL VERSE

IN LUMBERLAND

The time has come, the Logger said,
To talk of many things,
Of One Big Union in the camps
To fight the Lumber Kings.

Of men who went to prison
Because of Laws unjust;
Of how the Loggers held their own
Against the Lumber Trust.

Of the murderfest in sunny France,
The money-baron's war,
Of how men fell and did not know
What they fought each other for.

And last of all, but not the least,
Of the time not far away;
When men of worth shall own the earth
On "Emancipation" day.

HIS NAME:

I go into the lumber camps
And log drives on the river;
In camp and mill I'm never still,
My message I deliver.

In mining and construction camps;
To migratory workers;
I preach my creed, the crying need
To do away with shirkers.

In sweatshop and in crowded slum
I'm restless as the ocean;
I'm not dead, I raise my head,
Where'er I take the notion.

Although oppression weighs me down,
I'll never, never perish;
In every clime, through endless time,
I'll live and thrive and flourish.

Perhaps you know who I am,
I'm known to every nation;
Each tribe and race have seen my face,
My name is AGITATION.

DOOMED

A system is crumbling and tumbling once more,
As systems have crumbled and tumbled before,
Hark! can you hear the rumble and roar
Like the breaking of surf on a rock-riven shore.

A system is dying of age and decay,
The props that uphold it are rotting away,
A system is losing its terrible sway
O'er the minds of millions of workers today.

As clergy bow down to an altar of gold,
As pagans bowed down to idols of old,
Their hearts, like the hearts of the idols, are cold;
They've wandered afar from the Nazarene's fold

Labor omnipotent! Rise in your might!
Organized: disciplined, eager to fight;
Hasten the morning of Justice and Right,
And usher in Liberty's glorious light.

"When Better Times Come Business Will Bring Them"

A very short story

By Walter Pfeffer

You can't kid Suzanne. She works for a big shot who has a big mouth while she has big ears.

She dropped in one Thursday afternoon—that's her day off—while some of us boondogglers were arguing whether this here depression was coming or going. We asked her straight which way it was.

She took out her knitting and says: "Both."

"Now Suzanne," said I, "that's no way to answer a straight forward question about whether this damned thing is going or coming."

"Well then," she says, "it's going."

"You mean Bill is going to get a job?" piped in the missus.

Suzanne went on with her knitting so complacently that it was downright annoying, and looking us menfolk over opined: "I wouldn't say for sure that Bill is, but I'd gamble that inside of two months two of these five bums will have an honest-to-god job."

Biff moved about a bit uneasy and wanted to know how she figured that out.

"Last night" she says, "His Nibs was arguing with his father-in-law. It was about that strike down at Creosoto Motors—the Old Man owns most of that. His Nibs was telling him to make some kind of a settlement, and the Old Man got furious—you know the old line about who got fifty cents an hour when he was a boy, and what's the world coming to. So His Nibs told him what it was coming to. He says: 'We've got to create some prosperity,' and the Old Man wanted to know if his daughter had married a New Deal Democrat. So His Nibs told him there was a lot of things they didn't own yet, and the only way to get hold of them was to make some prosperity sort of spread around generally.

"The Old Man said that was the most cockeyed logic he'd ever listened to, and His Nibs told him how it's done. "We make a boom,' he says' 'and we tell the blooming world they can all get rich. We make contracts with the unions and perhaps even give them a bit now of what they'd get later anyway as business picks up, but peg it with time agreements so they don't get so much—and then we make them all buy cars on the easy payment plan. And we'll sell real estate to those we can't clean otherwise, and tell everybody to be thrifty and not waste anything but invest it so as we can get it later, and we make everybody happy and lend them money, and give them mortgages, and take their notes, and keep selling them stock, and showing them all how much richer they are, and . . .

" 'Where do we come in at?' asks the Old Man. 'Why, when we've got it all sprung, and everybody so prosperous,' says His Nibs, 'we'll tell them that the one thing holding back prosperity is this boondoggling, and that all relief and PWA and WPA ought to be cut out, and taxes cut down, and have the editors and Little Orphan Annie explain to them that that wouldn't take anybody's bread away from them because if the government didn't take our money from us to put people on the payroll we'd have that much more to put them on a payroll where they'd stand a real chance to rise in the world, and when we get that through we'll talk about unsound credit structures, and money being loaned too freely to speculators, and put the screws on, and leave the suckers selling the stock to each other until we pick it up for nothing, along with everything else that we have a plaster on, and . . .

" 'Have the blamed government on your neck,' says the Old Man, 'and have everybody raising Cain with us saying we're the ruination of the country. I want some peace in my old age.'

" 'The government won't be on our necks, it'll be in our pockets,' says His Nibs, 'and everybody'll be praising our generosity in picking everything up and saving the blooming country—and you know the only way to run anything is to run everything'."

"So they think they can do it just like that," says Biff.

"Oh, no" said Suzanne, "they're building higher fences around everything and putting juice in them."

"One Whale of a Difference - -"

It's less than one in five of the American Working Class that carries a card in any sort of a union. The aim of the I.W.W. quite naturally is to concentrate its organizational efforts on the four out of five who "belong to nothing". But meanwhile one can't help reflect occasionally on what a whale of a difference it would make if the one out of five that is organized, was organized right, the I.W.W. way.

For instance take this movie strike. If it had been organized in Recreational Workers Industrial Union No. 630 we wouldn't have this separate bargaining of some twenty crafts in the first place. We would have one union of all engaged in the making of motion pictures to fight out the issue. And if it came to a strike under such circumstances, we wouldn't have to ask the public to refrain from going to the movies—the workers in the motion picture palaces just wouldn't show any pictures if the union decided to fight the movie magnates from that end of the line. Under such circumstances there probably wouldn't be any movie strike in the first place.

Or consider our solidarity with our fellow workers in Spain. If transport workers were organized as they should be, taking I.W.W. direct action on the issue, would any supplies get to Franco? In fact would the Loyalist have run short of supplies? In fact would the fascist rebellion have ever got to first base?

Of course, with a start of several million I.W.W. members, the labor movement wouldn't have stood static at the proportion that it has roughly maintained to the working class at large over these last several years. It would have become truly a One Big Union of the Working Class. And we'll gamble that with that sort of a start, instead of us wondering how to win strikes, we would be putting across labor's own planned economy of abundance in mighty short order.

Why bother with substitutes? The I.W.W. is what is needed.

I. W. W. PREAMBLE

THE working class and the employing class have nothing in common. There can be no peace so long as hunger and want are found among millions of working people and the few, who make up the employing class, have all the good things of life.

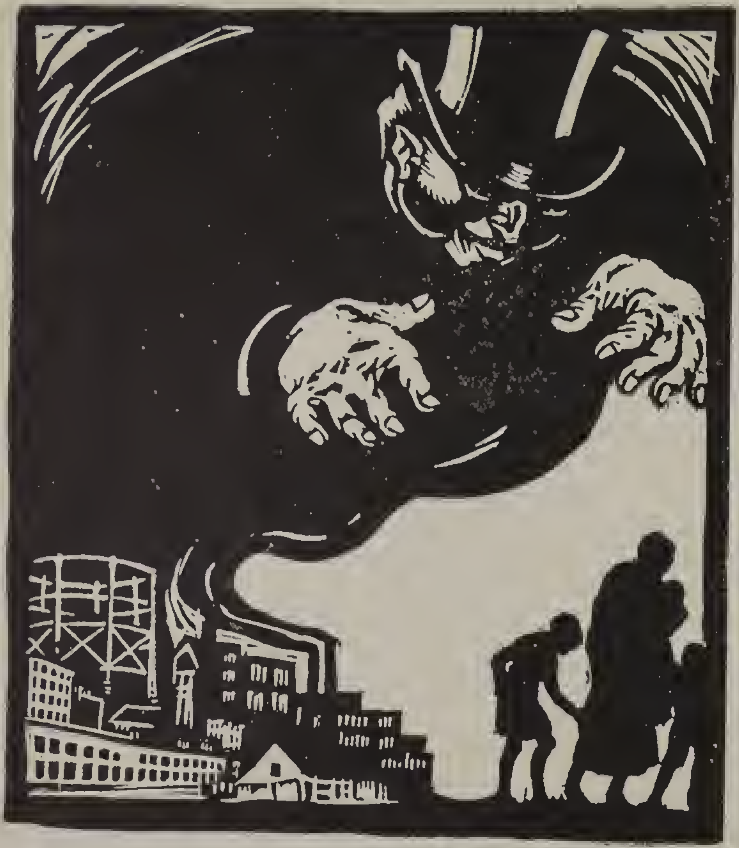
Between these two classes a struggle must go on until the workers of the world organize as a class, take possession of the earth and the machinery of production, and abolish the wage system.

We find that the centering of the management of industries into fewer and fewer hands makes the trade unions unable to cope with the ever-growing power of the employing class. The trade unions foster a state of affairs which allows one set of workers to be pitted against another set of workers in the same industry, thereby helping defeat one another in wage wars. Moreover, the trade unions aid the employing class to mislead the workers into the belief that the working class have interests in common with their employers.

These conditions can be changed and the interest of the working class upheld only by an organization formed in such a way that all its members in any one industry, or in all industries, if necessary, cease work whenever a strike or lockout is on in any department thereof, thus making an injury to one an injury to all.

Instead of the conservative motto, "A fair day's wage for a fair day's work", we must inscribe on our banner the revolutionary watchword, "Abolition of the wage system."

It is the historic mission of the working class to do away with capitalism. The army of production must be organized, not only for the everyday struggle with capitalists, but also to carry on production when capitalism shall have been overthrown. By organizing industrially we are forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old.



What of the Coming Generation?

That great glory of capitalism, the labor of children is not yet ended. In the fields of agriculture, in the street trades of the newsboy and the boot-black, even in many a manufacturing industry, and in the sweatshop work done at home, the labor of children still goes on for the enrichment of bankers, and publishers, and the other worthy citizens who preach morality to the community at large while they ride on the backs of mere kids.

The great menace that hovers over children is not merely that they are exploited, that they are working when they should be playing, that the earnings of their parents deprive them of the proper food to give them the right start in life. The failure of the older generation to organize in revolutionary industrial unions menaces this coming generation with even greater handicaps, and puts even greater obstacles in the way of their receiving the heritage that should be theirs.

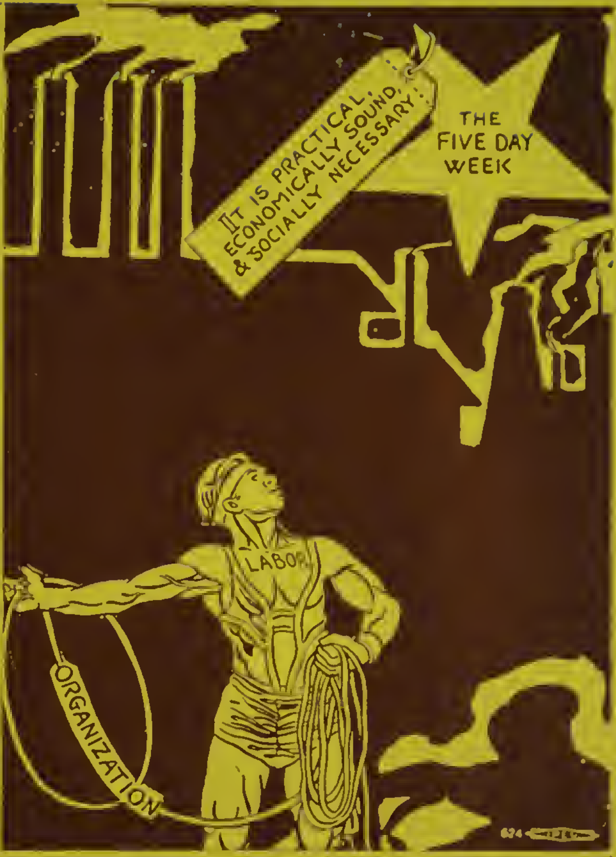
What is to go to this rising generation? We do not ask how many sticks and pieces of green paper can you pile up to bequeath your own progeny—we ask in what shape will this world be left to come after you? Will the insane exploitation of our natural resources have left the forest a waste and the fertile prairies a desert? Will the capitalist code of operating only for profit have left the mines flooded, and the physical equipment of production a menace to those who work with it?

It is bad enough to leave a social revolution as a task for this coming generation that should have been performed by our own, without adding to it the almost insuperable burden of restoring the potential productivity of the world they take over.

What are the social conditions under which they are to struggle? Do you expect them to do what you hesitated to undertake under a scheme of enabling civil liberties, under the handicaps of some fascist dictatorship? What do you leave them to undertake the struggle with? A "labor movement" over which the members exercise no control? A set of union racketeers fighting with each other like Kilkenny cats for the rake-off? An assortment of "radical" political parties that have discarded all radicalism in opportunistic subservience to the "big shots" that they know well to be the greatest enemies of labor? Are you priming them for the struggle with the prompting that each should look for himself and the devil take the hindmost?

You might do something to make up for all this by sending some of labor's kids to the summer courses at Work People's College this summer. (You can get full information by writing to Box 39, Morgan Park Station, Duluth, Minn.) But to live up to your responsibilities properly, it is time to build for them what they need above all else—One Big Revolutionary Union of the Entire Working Class.

That Five Day Week
Some Have It – Why Not All?



IT IS PRACTICAL, ECONOMICALLY SOUND, & SOCIALLY NECESSARY!
THE FIVE DAY WEEK LABOR
ORGANIZATION

The Saturdays and Sundays that a workingman spends at the beach, picnicking with his families and friends—the sunshine—the fresh air—the beauties of nature—the good fellowship—the rest and relaxation of two days spent anywhere away from work—these are truly part of the good things of life. When they are had and enjoyed they are ours, and by no scheming and conniving can they be taken away, by taxes or price increases or any other maneuvers of the employers from whom we escape when we have the five-day week.

The shorter working day and the shorter working week for these reasons are among the most substantial gains of labor. They constitute the sort of gains that enable us to work to live instead of living to work. The five-day week should be made standard in all industries.

With 1929 production levels, but with millions still jobless and millions more working either for Uncle Sam or in private industry only because of the "make work" expenditures of Uncle Sam, it is time for shorter hours, shorter working weeks, higher wages.

Shorter hours make for higher wages. Two men looking for one job put the wages down. One job looking for two men puts the wages up. The fight for a shorter working week is an intelligent course of action from which many benefits can flow. It tends to raise the standard of living, the cultural level, the intelligence of our class as well as the wages that we receive.

The five-day week has been achieved in various industries already. Let's battle to win it in the rest. Let's go ahead to make the six-hour day and the five-day week the minimum standard everywhere with conditions still better where we can achieve them.

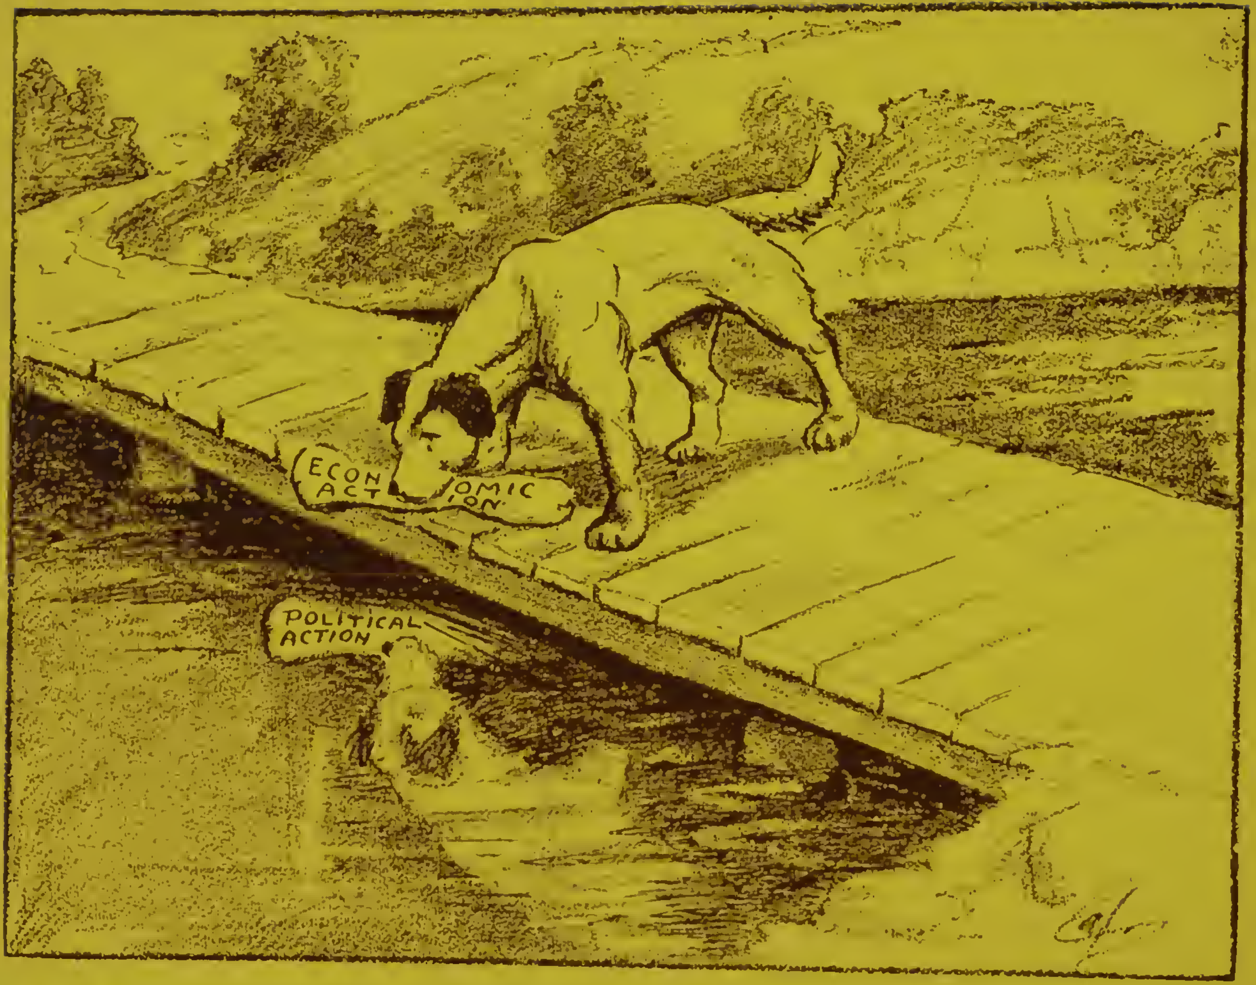
The five-day week is practical, economically sound, and socially necessary. To make it general in all industries requires the effective organization of One Big Union of the workers in all industries. The I.W.W. is such a union, and the only such union—Make It Grow!



He Dropped a Bone to Seize Its Image

It was a fine juicy bone that Fido had in his mouth—but that one in the water was even bigger and juicier.

So he dropped the bone in his mouth and went after the one in the water.

The current took his bone away, leaving not even a smell by which he could recapture it, while he struggled in the water with a phantom dog to get a bone that somehow he could never reach.

A workingman produced many times what he got as wages, and often had no work and no wages at all as the result of it. When he worked he worked long hours with his boss bawling him out. When he didn't work he stayed in a mean shack where his wife bawled him out because she had no new dresses.

He listened to an I.W.W. organizer who was so honest that he said he could do nothing for working people because they were the only people who could do anything for themselves—that they had all the power there is on the face of the earth. All that they needed was to organize this power.

Then along came a great friend of labor who promised him laws, and more judges, and bigger and fatter and better judges, and justice and emancipation.

The workingman grabbed at the promises—and he still works long hours for a domineering boss who pays him so little that most of the time he and his fellow workers are home getting bawled out by their wives because they haven't bought them a new dress yet.

Don't be like the dog that has been the symbol of folly ever since Aesop, the hunch-back slave, wrote about him 2500 years ago. Organize in real power that you and your fellow workers have by building the I.W.W.

ORGANIZATION CONTROL

American labor is up against a proposition that requires clear thinking and drastic action—direct action. The thinking no less than the acting will have to be done by the workers and not by the new crop of professionals who are undertaking to handle labor problems.

Labor leading has become a bigger and better profession than ever before in history. Many men are taking it up as others take up medicine or engineering, they expect to grow prosperous out of it. And, it must be admitted, any number of workers are ready, and in some cases even anxious, to place their organizational worries in the hands of this or that set of leaders.

On the surface these tendencies seem harmless enough. When people need a plumber they try to get an experienced one, and they let him do very much as he pleases on the job that is his specialty. Why not, then, take the same attitude when there are unions to be organized and strikes to be managed, and settlements to be negotiated?

The cases are vastly different. The specialist in the one case is placed in charge of mechanical, inanimate things, in the other he is placed in a position where he directs humans who, while they learn how to obey orders, soon lose the capacity of self-direction.

The chosen leaders in the end become tyrants whom they cannot shake off without extreme difficulty. This is the lesson history teaches.

Workers as they build their organization today, must be firm in their determination to run it, and diligent in their efforts to learn how to run it efficiently, otherwise they will be taken over by a leader who needs a job.

THE CONSTRUCTION WORKER

By PEO MONOLDI

The construction worker is in the vanguard of the army of production. He builds the roads along which civilization moves, and he constructs its most enduring monuments. His occupation is most hazardous and often takes him into places where for months he is compelled to get along with less than the ordinary necessities of life.

For his service to society the builder of roads, dams, and tunnels gets pay that is wholly inadequate.

Necessarily his work is irregular, for once a job is finished he has to move away in search of another one, sometimes traveling across the continent to find employment in the line to which he is accustomed.

The experiences and necessities of these men has developed in them a spirit of independence that makes them good material for membership in the I. W. W. which fosters individual freedom and initiative in its rank-and-file controlled unions.

The workers in the construction industry, next to those in agriculture, have been the pioneers who have developed virgin territories to the point where they are today. Their industry has made it posible for new population to flow and find means of life. These builders, the vanguard of progress, have gone into the far places to build trails and wagon roads, and to provide the houses that sheltered the pioneers. They have bridged the streams and pierced the mountains in order to give us the railroads and highways.

Without the construction workers millions of acres of desert waste would have remained unreclaimed. The city of today would have been impossible if the construction worker had not applied his brain and muscle in the construction of its water system, and sewers to take away its waste, and in the building of houses and streets, and the road beds for its fast transportation. Water transport would still be a slow motion process without the docks, deepened channels, and modern vessels that the constructor has given society. Aeroplanes would not be able to take off or land without the service rendered by the construction worker in building run-ways.

These builders of progress have made it possible for all of us to travel from one end of the country to the other in comfort by rail, highway, water, or the air. They have gone into the far places to harness raging waters to be converted into power and to irrigate the desert waste for the further advance of the cities and so the good of one might be brought to the other.

From the exercise of brute force and more or less haphazard figuring the construction industry has changed in a short span of time into one of complicated and minute calculation carried to an actuality by gigantic and powerful machinery operated by a handful of men as compared to the number necessary under the old methods. What were considered Utopian dreams yesterday are today simply some more engineering facts. Mile-long bridges span immense chasms, towering dams hold once raging streams under control, forming vast new lakes to be put to the use of mankind for irrigation purposes, for water transportation, for city water, for flood control and electrical energy; concrete roads thread the continent in a magic web of transportation channels, and electrically driven motors haul seemingly endless serpentine strings of box cars over steep mountain grades diving into tunnels many miles in length to emerge once again on their cross-continent journey.

One might suppose that the hardship of remote scene undergone by these workers would be compensated for by higher financial return for labor and less stringent working conditions. One may also suppose that with the vision of the physical wonders he builds and the advancement of civilization he promotes the construction worker would also carry with him a vision of social advancement to keep pace with the physical improvements he is creating. But not so with the great majority of construction workers.

The Construction Wonders of the Age

The gigantic projects of this day and age would have been impossible with the old shovel-board methods of construction. Such mighty undertakings as Boulder Dam, the Tennessee Valley project, the Bonnerville Dam, the Grand Coulee Dam, the San Francisco Bridges, the Tri-Borough Bridge of Greater New York would only remain a dream without the means and methods evolved in our own day.

Due to scientific research labor saving machinery has reached the construction industry and we no longer see a beehive of humans engaged in building highways, railroads, drainage systems, etc. The construction laborer is becoming more and more just a machine tender. The steam shovel, concrete mixer, road grader, steam roller, dump trucks, drilling machines, mucking machines, track layers, and countless other modern implements too numerous to mention have made possible these wonders of the age. These modern construction projects, big in every way, are being carried on with the greatest precision and efficiency.

We know how great a part concrete and steel play in the erection of dams, bridges, and skyscrapers. The modern concrete mixer is electrically driven and controlled. Huge trucks dump the sand and gravel into giant hoppers. Bucket elevators convey the sand into one bin and the gravel into another. From these bins the sand and gravel being automatically stopped when the correct measure has been determined. The material is then carried into the mixers. Water is likewise measured automatically. If it is a skyscraper job the concrete is carried by chutes, buggies, buckets, or hoppers to the floors required.

On dams, such as the mighty Bonnerville, Grand Coulee, or Boulder, down a few thousand feet in a canyon a man waves his arm or rings a bell to signal another man who pulls a lever in a grotesque traveling crane. The crane reaches out like a heron spearing a fish, trolleys whine and cables jerk, a bucket-shaped steel receptacle moves downward, concrete pours from its jaws, and one more timbered frame has been filled. Block bv block, level by level the dam rises from the river, already the water foams furiously against massive foundations and piers.

The herculean task is almost complete. The surging stream is about to be vanquished. Huge gates of iron and steel will slide between the spillway piers. The river will be diverted into yawning penstocks, generators will start to roar, turbulent rapids will be inundated beneath a smooth lake, ready to be used for any desired purpose. The product is hundreds of thousands of kilowatts of electrical energy and available water for millions of acres of desert and waste land—and the possibility of homes for millions of people.

But as we read about these wonderful accomplishments little do we realize the hardship and degradation that these construction workers have been up against, standing on a girder of a skyscraper or hanging on the side of a mountain chipping away rocks or hewing a base for the steel and concrete out of the rocky banks. Always facing the danger of a line snapping, a rock falling, a scaffold breaking, or a whole embankment coming down to bury them alive. And while these workers are sweating and bleeding, losing limbs or lives—for there isn't a dam, a bridge, a tunnel, or skyscraper that has been built or is being built in which the sweat and blood of these workers is not buried in its concrete, brick or stones—we find parasites lurching around, pushing and driving these workers to greater and greater speed so that their sweat and blood can be turned into profits in the quickest time possible.

While the construction workers who build homes and skyscrapers have a semblance of freedom with boarding houses, restaurants, homes, and stores to choose from, the workers on dams, bridges, tunnels, railroads, levees, or irrigation projects are at the mercy of belly-robbing company eating camps and commissaries. Generally the feeding and housing of these workers is left to a sub-contractor who has to make not only a profit for himself but also has to pay so much a day to the contractor for the right to exploit the workers' bellies.

Recreation in such construction camps is, as a rule, non-existent. Only where the number of men employed is large enough to run recreational features at a good profit is it given a thought. Liquor of course, is easy to obtain and there are always opportunities to gamble. Gambling and liquor help keep the workers broke and submissive. The isolation of these jobs makes existence there virtually exile.

The chief cause of the low wages in construction work, the dangerous working conditions, the poor food and housing, the endless speed up, and all the other misery the workers suffer from is that they lack proper organization to take care of their interests.

Organization

All operations on construction projets are simple and direct. All unnecessary movements are eliminated. Each and every classification of work is carried through with an eye to strict coordination. Each individual operation is performed in conjunction with some other. Cooperation is the keynote that is sounded through the whole project. United effort and the subordination of the individual to the whole makes it possible to complete the project. Woudn't it be great if we workers could run our affairs in as efficient a manner?

If we workers could organize as well as the bosses and forget our differences while striving for some gainful end how much better off we would be. We would then have no more use for a couple of dozen craft unions but would unite in one union of construction workers. And not in a state controlled union, or in unions such as those affiliated with the C. I. O. and directed by Lewis and company, but in a union directed and controlled by the workers themselves.

The working class must watch and prepare its every move so that it will not fall into the same trap as did the workers of Italy, Germany, or Russia where they must either be yes men or go to the dungeon, or be placed against a wall and shot for expressing their opinions or demanding some of the good things of life.

The C. I. O. was born at the A. F. of L. convention of 1933 when General Johnson was sent there by the powers that be to [illegible] the delegates that they must organize industrially—a move to control labor a la Mussolini, Hitler, or Stalin. Before the close of 1936 not less than ten company unions were turned over to the C. I. O. by the steel trust. Who ever heard of a leapord changing its spots?

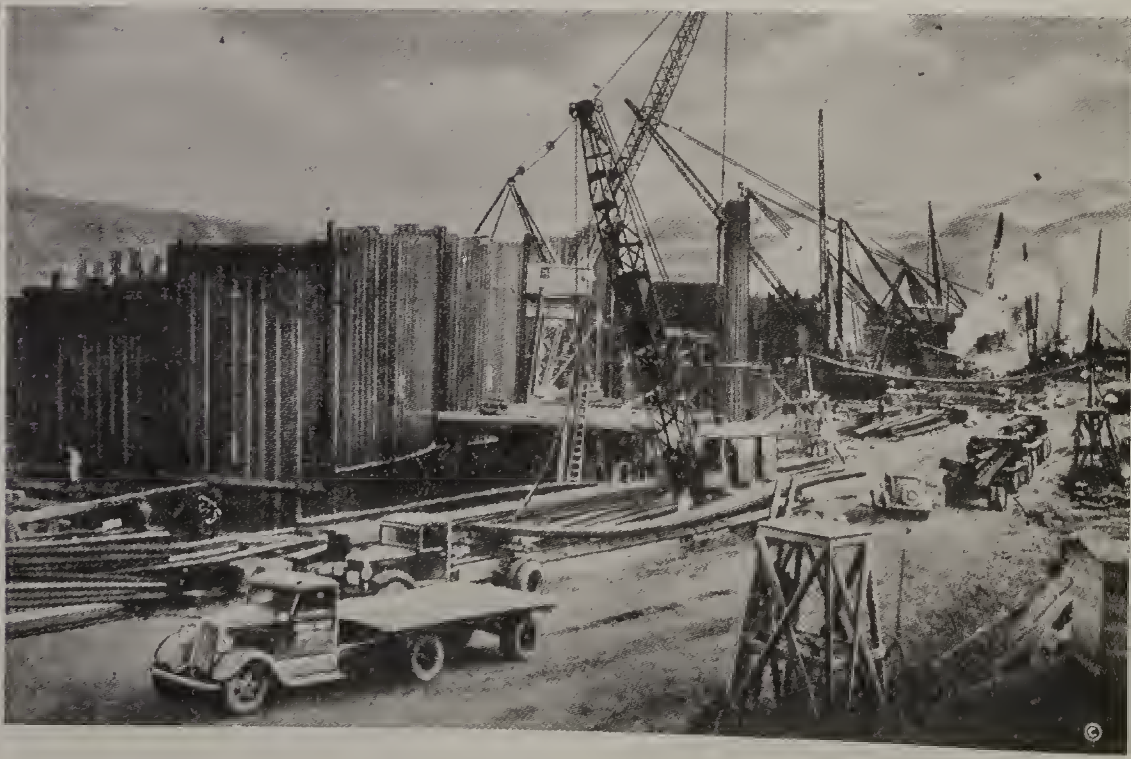
Neither must we be fooled by the C. I. O. activities in the automobile industry in Michigan and other states. Mussolini called strikes and supported others in Italy. In this country Lewis is the tool of capital and as soon as labor is brought under its control a sit-down or any other kind of strike will be a thing of the past unless labor refuses to be bridled. Fascism expresses itself in the employers' cultivating of a one big union without class- consciousness. No one can deny that Lewis and company want to retain the system of exploitation; they have stated so in unmistakeable terms from the house tops. How soon this American fascism will show its fangs is a question that only time and conditions can determine.

It also may be possible that the industrial conditions of 1932 and worse may take longer to reach us again than we anticipate. In that case the C. I. O may develop along the lines of the British unions—just a tool of the political manipulators. In any case it will not be the tool for labor to use to emancipate itself from this damnable system of exploitation.

In order for the construction workers to enjoy the beauties that they create it is necessary that they develop their own organization so that they may determine their own line of action and purpose. Industrial union without class interest is no union, nor will it get us anywhere. It will be only a makeshift to keep capitalism on the backs of labor as long as possible.

Our industrial union must be based on the revolutionary interests of the working class. It must bind all the workers in powerful revolutionary organs to the end that the power of these industrial unions be used to regain for labor the means of production of which it has been robbed and which are being used to sap our energy to aggrandize and enrich the few. The time to call a halt is at hand. Shall we keep on building projects for the few to keep on exploiting, or shall we in one mighty wave of solidarity take over the industries and the means of production and build the future monuments of the construction industry for the working class to use and enjoy?

If so, the I. W. W. is the union that is needed. It is the only industrial organization in this country that has never deviated from the revolutionary working class mission—to fight for our every day needs and to prepare for our ultimate aim, the abolition of capitalism. On with the class struggle!



Papa Schaefer Is a Man Again

A Short Story

By S. I. Stephens

"Papa! You're going out!" Mama Schaefer's voice rang accusingly through the flat, soared out the open windows into the soft May air, and fell, no doubt, into the startled ears of her neighbors on the street below.

"Papa Schaefer!" she repeated.

Scraping sounds issued from the bathroom but otherwise nothing that resembled a human voice.

"Papa Schaefer! I'm speaking to you!"

There was a pause in the bathroom. "I heard you the first time, Nettie." The scraping sounds continued for Papa Schaefer was in the process of shaving himself. It was Saturday morning, the first of May.

Nettie Schaefer, clad in a faded lavender housedress, turned in exasperation toward the coffee pot she was washing at the kitchen sink. "I know you're goin' out or you'd wait to tomorrow to shave." She glanced sharply at her second eldest daughter. "Elinor—put your leg down from that chair! Is that anyway for a lady to sit?"

There was a movement in the next room, the linving room.

"A lady? Did you say something about a lady, mother?" And a tall, dark, thin, flat chested like her mother, appeared in the doorway, a heavy book under her arm. As she considered her younger sister through heavy rimmed spectacles, her large mouth twisted upward in an ironic smile.

Elinor, pert, ruby-lipped, saluted her with an outstretched tongue, and then carelessly flipped another page of the fashion magazine she was examining beside the kitchen table.

Someone near the window giggled—a gaggling fourteen-year-old with blond bangs that seemed a trifle too heavy for her small, pale face. She was struggling with needle and thread, trying to attach a button to a ragged sweater of flaming red.

Scraping sounds still continued in the bathroom.

"Babe—throw that ragged mess away—I'll buy you a new one when I get my first check from the Youth Program."

Babe turned stubborn eyes upon her eldest sister and shook her head vehemently. She loved the flaming red sweater.

Margaret addressed her mother again: "You were saying something about a lady."

"Nev' mind, Margaret—don't make fun of your sister."

"But you were criticising her yourself."

"Nev' mind—"

"Well, you would have minded—if you'd seen her last night coming out of that Third Avenue beer parlor—"

Elinor tried to interrupt, "Say, mom, there's the darlingest sun-back dress here—can't I have one when pa gets his next WPA check?" She held the book up, pointing to the dress.

"She was coming out of that beer parlor with the Miner boy," Margaret went on.

Papa Schaefer in the bathroom spoke up: "The one whose uncle scabbed in the street car strike?"

Nettie Schaefer, drying the coffee pot, raised her eyes to the smoky ceiling, "Now you got papa started."

Water gushed from the bathroom tap. Papa Schaefer was cleaning his shaving apparatus.

"And," persisted Margaret, "he was so drunk! I was walking along with the assistant librarian from the branch—and Elinor was just as brazen as you please. Imagine my feelings!"

Mama Schaefer uttered clucking sounds, like a hen, "No other woman's ever put up with what I've had to—when I think what I give up—your grandpa owning the biggest store in Hayfield, and Uncle Torrance with the tile factory—" The clucking sounds continued.

Elinor slammed the fashion magazine down on the table and glared at her sister. "Well, smarty, Ray doesn't think any more of you—the first time he ever saw you, he asked who that freak was—an' I had to tell him you was my sister!" Elinor grimaced, "I felt like a damn fool—"

"Don't swear, Elinor," interrupted her mother. Regardless of WPA and the Youth Program she still clung to a few empty symbols of respectability—ladylike speech was one of them.

Margaret advanced into the kitchen with head high and tears in her voice, "Haven't you any control over your daughter—I won't be insulted."

"An' look at the way she talks," Elinor's voice rose, "so smart alecky—one year of college was too much for you—you'll never get over it!"

Margaret burst into tears. "No, I won't get

INDUSTRIAL UNIONISM IN THE I. W. W. THE JOB BRANCH

A Functional Organization of Workers

By RAYMOND CORDER

> "The army of production must be organized, not only for the everyday struggle with capitalists, but also to carry on production when capitalism shall be overthrown. By organizing industrially, we are forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old."

A genuine industrial union is a syndicate of workers or unions, organized around the production of a commodity or the rendering of a social service, such as the construction of a building, the transportation of people and goods, or maintenance of health and sanitation. Craft unionism, on the other hand, is organization of workers grouped according to tools used, or functions on the job. Fake or compromise so-called industrial unionism, though it may be organized semi-industrially in certain mass-production industries such as coal-mining, steel and automobile production, still recognizes craft division in the industries especially among skilled workers and the white collar element. The CIO falls into this category. The CIO has inherited a top-heavy load of craft-union labor-leaders, craft-consciousness and a belief in the profit system, and the equality of both workers and capitalists within the democratic state, and, as such, it avoids and condemns revolutionary action.

The CIO, to begin with, resulted from a rank and file revolt against antiquated craft unionism and sell-out leadership, which was taken advantage of by John L. Lewis and his lieutenants. These fakers, viewed in the light of their slimy histories, are rank opportunists. Although the CIO may be workable in a clumsy manner as a bargaining agency between bosses and workers, its most outstanding earmark is that it is one of the most efficient instruments ever devised for the Fascist regimentation of a misled working class.

The CIO carries a hangover from the reactionary AFL: its lack of class consciousness, the fact that all organizing is done from the top. In spite of all the smoke of a three-cornered sham battle between Lewis, William Green and the moguls of industry, the time will come when the rank and file in the CIO will taste the bitter disillusionment at being sold out and led into Fascist regimentation by their smug and scheming leaders.

The so-called liberal section of the capitalist press is saying nice things about John L. Lewis. They even hint that he has presidential potentialities! Experience teaches us, that when the capitalist press begins to speak well of a labor leader, it is high time for the workers to dump him overboard. The line-up of CIO affiliates will convince any intelligent worker that it is not real industrial unionism, that it is satisfied with the capitalist system as such, and has no revolutionary principles.

This article was not primarily intended as an argument against Lewis or the CIO, but to show how a rank and file controlled Revolutionary Industrial Union is built and how it should function in the everyday struggle with the capitalists, and become, automatically, a working class administration of industry after capitalism shall have been overthrown. Such an industrial union has its roots in the job. The job is the basic or fundamental unit of revolutionary industrial unionism. The producers of goods and services are the rulers, the highest authority.

Let us consult the accompanying chart. Two jobs in the building industry have been chosen to illustrate our point. Of course, there may be several building jobs going on at the same time within a given district, but for the sake of simplicity we select job "A' which is, let us say on

First Avenue, and job "B" a few blocks away on Sixth Avenue. For the same reason we have chosen three different groups of workers on each of these jobs as members of our job branches. On job "A" for instance, we have graphically portrayed carpenters, plumbers, and painters. Now, in a craft union setup, each of these groups of workers, including the workers on job "B", would be members of separate craft unions. In the IWW however, all of them, regardless of craft, or the kind of tools they use, belong to Building Construction Workers' Industrial Union Number 330. The IWW does not organize the workers according to whether one man uses the hammer and saw, another a brush or another a pipe wrench. The IWW organizes according to the product, and in this case the product is to be a building.

The craft unions would not only have these workers organized separately, but each craft would, more than likely, have differently dated contracts with the boss, each contract expiring on a different date. Thus, we have often witnessed carpenters on strike and picketing a building while the painters and plumbers are "compelled" to work with scab carpenters because they have been tied up for six months or a year longer by contract. While we are on the subject of contracts, let us not forget that the CIO is entering into contracts with he bosses —more evidence of the old craft-union hangover. The automobile workers in Detroit and elsewhere, have signed up with General Motors and Chrysler; and John L. Lewis, just recently, signed a contract with the coal barons for the "industrial union" he carries around in his pocket, the "United Mine Workers of America." The UMWA is the largest union in the CIO but they are bound by a two-year contract and thus cannot strike, unless it be an outlaw strike, to help their fellow workers in the steel and automobile industries.

But let us get back to an IWW job. Here on job "A" and job "B", as well as all the other jobs from "A" to "Z", all the workers carry the IWW card showing that they are members of B.C.W.I.U. No. 330. It is, at the same time, the same card carried by the workers in all other industries, but which, for the sake of simplicity, we will not go into here. As a unit, they face the boss in Industrial Union Solidarity, and as a unit their aim is to overthrow capitalism and the wage system, and to erase the circle in which you see the boss, and put him to work as a producer. The first thing the workers on the job did, was to hold a meeting, perhaps on the job, or perhaps at their local branch hall, and elect a job committee. In order that full representation be obtained, a committeeman is elected from each group according to his function. Referring to the chart, you will note that there is a job committee of three. One of them, a carpenter, another a plumber, and the other, a painter. The same kind of representation on the committee is found on job "B". The committee elects, from among themselves, a chairman. As they work, they keep their eyes on the job and the boss between shop meetings. The job committee is under direct control of the rank and file. They themselves are workers and we have here the nucleus of industrial democracy. The boss doesn't like this, but what can he do about it in the face of working class solidarity?

It will be noted, that, at the convergence of the dotted lines from the functional groups on jobs "A" and "B", there is shown a Local Branch of B.C.W.I.U. No. 330. Jobs "A" and "B", in common with job units in all other industries, enjoy full job autonomy within the structure of the IWW. This autonomy is used by the rank and file through their democratically elected job committees, regarding matters purely relevant to each job. But in matters concerning the workers on both jobs, or on all building projects within the local area, the building workers find their common meeting place within the Local Branch. It is here that they discuss and vote on matters of joint local concern, and call for local joint action. It is from here that delegates are elected to represent the workers in the Industrial Union District Council, the Industrial Department District Council, and, though not depicted on the Chart, the General Industrial District Council. Delegates to the Industrial Union Convention are also elected from the Local Branch. The Local Branch is composed of all workers in a given industry, in this case the Building Construction industry, within a local area. A branch secretary, nominated and elected from the floor for a term of six months, takes care of branch correspondence, receives dues from job delegates, or job committee chairman and generally oversees the affairs of the local organization, and is subject to recall for cause at any branch meeting. An IWW official, from branch secretary to general secretary, is a servant of the rank and file.

Let us assume that this branch is in the city of New York, and that it is the local branch for the borough of the Bronx. The Bronx is a large area in which many workers are engaged at building work, and it is at the same time, quite a distance to Brooklyn or Staten Island. Therefore other local branches, not shown on the chart, are located in the boroughs of Manhattan, Brooklyn, Queens and Richmond, and in Yonkers and the upper Westchester communities. Now let us suppose that an issue has arisen, such as the contemplation of a city wide or general strike in the building industry or in all industries, on which the membership must vote. Through what agency would it be put into motion? Naturally, if the issue pertained only to the building industry, the matter is discussed in the Industrial Union District Council by delegates elected to the I.U.D.C. from the Local Branches, and recommendations carried back to the branches. At the left, on the chart in the shaded section, we find I.U.D.C. No. 30 It is a deliberative and coördinative body for the Building Construction Workers Industrial Union No. 330 within the Greater New York district. The I.U.D.C. No. 330 may look as though it is far away from the job. But it is not. It is an assemblage of delegates from your own branches.

In the right hand shaded section is the Industrial Department District Council No. 300. This is a deliberative body of elected delegates from the Industrial District Councils or branches of the three industrial unions,* within the Department of General Construction No. 300 of the IWW: Railroad, Road and Tunnel Workers I.U., No. 310; Shipbuilding Workers I.U., No. 320; and Building, Construction Workers I.U., No. 330. In the Industrial Department District Council No. 300, the delegates compare notes and discuss conditions within the General Construction Department, and carry back to their branches and Industrial Union District Councils, recommendations and resolutions acted upon by the delegates. The I.D.D.C. No. 300 acts as a clearing house for information of general organizing activities within the Industrial Department. The same applies to I.U.D.C. No. 330 except that it confines itself to District 330 business. In forthcoming articles the functions of the I.U.D.C.s, the I.D.D.C.s, and the General Industrial District Councils, will be taken up, as well as representation from the local branches to the Industrial Union and General Conventions.

For 32 years the I.W.W. has propagated Revolutionary Industrial Unionism and it is certain that the effect will tell in the end. Where I.W.W. members have job control, as in the metal industry in Cleveland, in the Northwest woods and other localities, they are satisfied with their organization as a bargaining agent, but better than that, it points the way to the new society, to a Workers' Industrial Democracy. We of the I.W.W. have been a whip, lashing at the flanks of reactionary unions and we must continue to be the Revolutionary Industrial Union whip against C.I.O. reaction and misleadership. The workers are on the move. They wanted Industrial Unionism but have been headed away from the real thing by reactionaries, and their tools the political radicals. The Commies and the Socialists, are backing Lewis as zealots back a Messiah, but the time will come when Lewis will kick them all out, that is, when he feels that he has no further need of them. In time the C.I.O. workers will come to the realization that the I.W.W. is their Union. In the meantime the I.W.W. is the whip. The C.N.T. of Spain is not only an arch foe of, but also the greatest bulwark against Fascist dictatorship, as well as all other dictatorial isms. It is likely that the I.W.W. may very soon have to take charge of a like situation that is fast coming to a head in this counthy. We must keep to our principles; organize for rank and file job control, and abolition of the wage system.

* Last fall Railroad, Road and Tunnel Worker Industrial Union 310 and Building Construction Workers Industrial Union 330 held a joint convention, and decided that since much of the current construction work requires their joint operation to function as one consolidated industrial union. This article writes of the structures of the I.W.W. in this specific industry as provided before this step, or as they would be should circumstances cause the members in this industry to make Industrial Unions 310 and 330 function as they did prior to the last convention. The Future of Spain:

Industrial Democracy or?

By CON DOGAN

Con Dogan, member of the I.W.W., soldier and scholar, and worker with the fighting spirit of the Irish in him, weighs the forces at work in the scales of history to determine the future of Spain.

Philosophically society can be divided into two classes—those who in their ignorance are unable to recognize the operation of social forces, and those who in their enthusiasm translate the bellyache of a group into a clarion call to a new era. But it is part of our equipment as true Wobblies to be able to guage correctly every movement and its potentialities to weigh every social factor in a given situation, and to remember always that what happens tomorrow is the continuation of the workers' activity—or inactivity—of today.

Spain is in a period of transition. The old order where industrialism had made its peace and operated only by the grace and consent of medieval feudalism, is definitely a thing of the past. It is well to stress this point. The political union of all parties in La Frente Popularia has as its goal victory to maintain the Republic. The operation of industry by the workers is called a "temporary measure dictated by military exigencies." As with the Gironde in France in 1789, there is a conscious and unconscious attempt to minimize the emergence of the Mountain, to restrain as far as feasible the ideology and terminology of the old order. But France witnessed the transference of power from the States General to the Jacobin and Cordellier clubs, saw the Mirabaeus fade as the Marats and Robespierres emerged. So also with Spain, standing now much where France stood at the time of the second election to the States General.

Let us face the facts calmly. All the heavy industry and most of the light industry in Spain is being operated by the workers under sanction of the government. Every Church in Republican Spain has been damaged—(This is because the churches were so built as to dominate the villages from a military point of view as well as from any other point of view—and consequently they have been the targets in the civil war.) Never again will a feudalistic religion regain its power.

A third fact is the organizational unity between the large socialist party and the communist party which has grown during the war. Fourth, the requisitioning of buildings, factories, etc., has been done in the joint name of two unions, the C.N.T. (the syndicalist organization) and the U.G.T. (the political unions). Fifth, and not least, is the military training of the vast majority of the workers. These are facts that are also big factors in the coming struggle for power in Spain.

It is an axiom of history that every dominant class has been opposed by a movement that in essence was two movements: one, the group desiring to replace the power of the old regime by the power of the new; the other groups, truly materialist, believing that the abuse of authority was inherent in authority itself and not in the individuals wielding the same, attempted to usher in a thorough democracy as the result of the revolution. Even a superficial reading of history will reveal the fraternity and common interests of such diverse characters as Lilburne, the Leveller in the Cromwellian revolution in England, Marat and Babeouf in the French revolution, or Jefferson and Shay in the American revolution. The working class movement is no exception to this historical law. No resolutions of good will and unity, no conscious act of abnegation by individuals, can conceal the chasm between the syndicalist and socialist concepts of a free society, or of the methods to achieve the same. The various socialist parties and communist parties may unite—indeed, logically, there never was any reason for disunity among them. But honest and logical adherence to the philosophy underlying the syndicalist position precludes forever the organizational and ideological unity called for by designing or half-witted politicians. "Dictatorship of the Proletariat", "the Socialist State", and "Industrial Democracy"—these are not mere phrases. They are the very hearts of the groups using the terms—crystalizations of all the philosophy, strategy, and tactics of the varying forces of the movements. Moreover, they are terms that entirely overshadow everything else in modern Spain. The very fact of the war itself pales in significance with these terms.

Make no mistake about it. The "civil war" in Spain is already won. No intelligent person can doubt that the only alternative to a Republican victory in Spain is a World War which will engulf not only bourgeois society but in all probability everything that man has produced in the long upward climb from the jungle. Granted that economic forces within Italy and Germany may force Mussolini or Hitler to "bet the limit", to transform "friendly aid" to "hostile intervention"(*)—but presuming that both pseudo-Alexanders have the sanity of half-wits, and that the present non-intervention pact is even one per cent efficient, then Fascism in Spain will be defeated before Christmas.

What then? Is it possible for a backward feudal country to enter the capitalist sphere in an industrially sated world? Will the Spanish people be content with the cultural level and economic standards of the little "banana republics" of South America? Spain, with no industrial machine, with only fruit and mercury as raw materials for exchange! Spain, with its splendid syndicalist traditions, its parliamentary socialist majority, its people imbued with the recklessness and camaraderie of one of the most bitter "civil wars" of history!

Eschewing every iota of "wishful thinking", we can arrive at only one conclusion: Modern Spain MUST attempt one or the other forms of Collective Social Civilizations. Here, ideologically at least it the finest country in the world for testing the three main channels of workers' revolutionary hopes and ideals: Socialism as taught, Communism as preached, or Syndicalism the philosophy that grew without "philosophers". It is more than an interesting speculation. It is a vital question confronting the workingclass movement. On the answer depends the forms of the "new order" in all countries, and the disintegration or emergence into greater strength of all working class organization in the modern world. It can be symbolized roughly —if we care for symbolism—by the two countries that have been the only true friends of the Spanish workers in the hour of need—Mexico and Russia —Mexico with an inkling of an ideal of a country of Industrial Democrats—Russia with a practice and precept of "freedom through Praetorianism". It revives again, with new facets, the Plekhanov-Lenin debates. It calls for exact knowledge of the economic status not only of Spain but of all the modern world, together with the political factors arising from the economic basis. It demands an accurate appraisal of the strength and weakness of all working class organizations throughout the world. It cries for a refurbishing of our "knowledge boxes" of dialectical materialism, of revolutionary history, of our economic and determinist premises. Can an Industrial Democracy exist in a void? Can this particular Industrial Democracy survive? Can a communist led Spain exist, with or without the help of Soviet Russia? Can a truly Socialist Spain exist—with a practical monopoly of such a necessity as mercury, and lying athwart the "life line" of the British Empire, and controlling the front door of fascist southern Europe? Is the world working class movement strong enough and willing enough to force the parasites to leave Spain alone? Is the economic wealth of Spain sufficient to establish a criteria of any form of workers' social organization? A criteria acceptable even to the Missouri scissorbills who will accept anything so long as "it works". These are important questions, questions that we as Wobblies must be able to answer. I sincerely hope that some fellow worker, more in touch with conditions than I am here in the trench in Spain, with greater deductive powers, and with more opportunity to brush up on the "forgotten knowledge" we all have, will try to answer.

There had been a rift in the Warren household. Sam Warren had always been a conscientious husband and father but since unemployment had sorted out all classes of workers en masse he had become bitter and irritable. He had previously been employed as steadily as the average. While with four children to feed and clothe it had been a constant uphill climb, thanks to his wife's thrift they had kept up somehow. Although at times he had become discouraged with the effort it took to just keep going it had been a satisfaction to know they had a home. He used to look down from the hill at nights and it was good to see how his place stood out from all the rest. The lawn and the flowers were always so trim and fresh. Three more years and they would own it completely, he had figured. Naturally, it was pretty hard to stand by as useless as a withered limb and see everything go. He tried to recall the details of the final surrender in the lawyer's office but everything seemed cloudy and unreal. It was a Frankenstein that he couldn't quite comprehend.

That had been several months ago and the beaten expression had turned to one of cynical defiance. He could explain everything now—it was all so clear. He'd gone to meetings and he had read—yes, long after the family had gone to bed he'd read until his eyes were bleary. He was naturally a thinker and it puzzled him why he hadn't seen it before. "Hm! God's country!" he muttered. "Well, He ought to know, He and the racketeers had it!" He had become disgusted with all political panaceas as he'd watched their bubbles swell and burst consistently into nothing but further disillusionment. But out of labor's age long struggle he had gleaned one fundamental on which to set his feet; organization! organization!—that was the key—but, it had to be right.

His wife had become impatient and was too busy to absorb much except the fact that something had to be done. They had moved to the country as she felt the relief would go farther where they could have a garden. "Organization—hm—she said to herself. I'll show him organization that means something!"

Spring was in the air and she drank in its freshness. She had been born and raised in the country and the smell of growing things stirred her. She recalled the green acres of her father's farm and the peace of the cattle grazing. At sixteen she had won the prize for the county's best garden. That was a long time ago but when the ploughman came that afternoon she stood out in the tract and eagerly watched the turning of the moist furrows with equal enthusiasm. No, you couldn't fool her on soil—she was like her father. She enjoyed spreading the manure and handled it as she had always had to handle luxuries—dividing it with machine-like precision. Daily, after the seeds had been planted she watched for the sprouting shoots. When thinning and hoeing time had come the children had entered into the spirit of it wholeheartedly. Vaguely they sensed her resentment. Frequently they had heard her say to Sam, "I'll show you!" until Timmie who was scarcely four, was repeating it after her.

How the months had flown. It was almost fall and the harvest had been a full one. Everything had been in her favor and Sarah Warren had experienced a certain spiritual uplifting. She had always known that the country was her rightful place and it almost seemed as though God had helped her. As she opened the door of the bulkhead to add a few jars to the already crowded shelves, she glanced over the assortment arranged meticulously according to color and size. The appraisal having been made she closed the door and hummed a familiar tune. There was still plenty to do. She had to pack for the blueberry picnic. It was to be a two-day excursion and the children could hardly wait. She guiltily wondered if she should share their secret. After all there were many other people who needed food. But of course, their family was large she reassured herself.

THE STRAIT AND NARROW

A Short Story

By Walter Pfeffer

"When did you get out and how did you get in?"

"I got out today, and," Bob paused to take in the lay of the apartment, "I got in this way." He held up a little wire bent in various angles and curves.

"That's interesting. What is it and where did you get it?"

"It's a paper clip. I dropped in at a bank and picked it up on the writing desk."

"I'll be damned if it isn't; but where did you get the trick?"

"Oh, just some post-graduate big-house work. Rather neat I thought."

"I'll say it's neat. Show me how."

"What good'll it do you? You've always played the legit."

"Still do. Nothing beats it. But I can use that and it'll do me more good than it will ever do you. You'll only use it to get in again."

"Well, there's nothing suspicious about having a paper-clip in one's pocket. No, Dave, can't show you the trick. I got it confidential. It's just for a few of us boys and not for absentminded followers of the straight and narrow path who forget their latch-keys."

"Say, kid, that thing means big money to us. We can make a thousand times as much, and no trouble, playing that inside the law, as you ever can with your petty larceny glommin'."

"No kiddin'; spill the big idea."

"That can be used on all latch-locks, can't it?"

"Sure."

"There's money making locks, isn't there?"

"Suppose so; but I don't want to make them."

"You don't have to make them; we'll fix up a lock that won't work on."

"That sounds more like work than like money to me."

"Then we'll patent it."

"What, the paper clip?"

"No, the lock, you fool."

"What then?"

"Then we'll put all the other locks out of business by showing how they can be opened."

"You're not so dumb."

Bob showed the mystery of the clip. "You straighten it out and then you put it in the crack there. Then you bend it this way. Then you push it that way. Then you put this kind of a crook on her. Then you give her one more turn and push. Then you make a little handle on the end for leverage, turn it, and there your latch is sprung back. See?"

Dave tried it again and again until he had it perfect. "Yes, it's very neat; now what would we have to do to make a lock proof against it?"

"That's simple. Just make the projection of the latch past the door jamb a bit longer than the height of the metal box into which it slides, and then you can't turn your hook."

"Then it's all fixed. I'll make the model and get the patent, and you I will be sitting on swivel chairs, smoking good cigars and giving orders to a bunch of beautiful dizzy blondes."

"Don't talk about 'em, Dave; I've been in the monastry for two years now."

"And come out with a five-spot, I suppose. Well, here's a hundred. Go make up for lost time. I'll show you that the straight and narrow path beats your kinks every time.

Dave sat and scrached his nose. "Yes," he mused, "Bob's right. This is too damn much like work." He laid down the pencils that he had been trying to use as triangles, rulers and T-squares for his sketch and reached for the phone.

"That you, Jim? . . . You're up on things in Lasalle Street. When does the board of directors of the Ralston Lock Company meet? . . . Alright . . . Tomorrow afternoon? Good . . . Yeh, I was just obligin' a lady friend Her meal-ticket said he had to attend that meeting and she wanted to make sure that there was one . . . Thanks . . . Yeh, any time."

Dave left the elevator at the seventh floor. In front of him was a spacious office where sleek young men, observant of all the ads about clean shaving, clean collars and halitosis, were patiently waiting their appointments. Dave had been particularly careful not to shave and to dig up a dirty collar out of the laundry bag. He walked down the hall until he read a sign, "A. C. Rumlidge, President, Private." He took a paper clip out of his pocket, bent it, pushed it, bent it, pushed it, bent it, pushed it, turned it and walked in.

Mr. Rumlidge turned away from his seated visitor with a "How did you get in?"

"With this," and Dave held up the wire.

Mr. Rumlidge coughed. It was a cigar that he reached for, but nevertheless he was nonchalant. "Oh, yes, just a minute."

He soon dismissed his visitor and inquired further into the mystery of the mysterious stranger.

"Yes," said Dave, "I've always admired Ralston Locks, even though they have been a set-back to the profession. This little paper-clip is almost handier than a key, and well, more uh, more universal."

"Indeed, indeed," mused the executive as Dave showed him the trick. "I'll have to show this to my engineers."

"I don't think so."

"But I surely will."

"It would be poor business."

"How so?"

"First, it isn't necessary, Second, it would cost money to change your type of lock—just think of all the new dies! Third, it would ruin your reputation if it became generally known that you've equipped most of the homes in America with locks that can be opened with a paper-clip."

"It is a predicament. Now just what have you on your mind?"

"Just to let you know about it and not tell anybody else."

"That's very considerate of you indeed. I'm sure that the company will be pleased to give you some mark of its appreciation."

"How much appreciation?"

"Well, I can't just say. The Board of Directors meets this afternoon. What would you think right?"

"Oh, five-hundred thousand."

"Tut, tut, man that's exorbitant."

"All right then."

"All right, what?"

"Well just picture to yourself all the hardware stores in the nation with nice window displays showing a burglar as he opens all your locks with a paper-clip. Just picture big display ads in all the papers showing that only a lock with a cut in the jamb deeper than the height of the latchbolt can stop this little clip from opening doors. Just picture the nice copy explaining that IXL locks alone have this feature, and that it's patented."

Mr. Rumlidge was an imaginative executive and he did picture it. Dave was a stubborn salesman and wouldn't drop below his original figure. The deal was put through.

A month later Bob came in after the night before.

"Say, Dave, the taxi driver is waitin'. I didn't have anything in my pockets when I woke up this morning."

"Here, pay him then," snapped Dave.

"Say, what's the matter, snapping and giving me a measly five-spot?"

"Don't argue, Bob, we've got to economize. I've spent a thousand on you in the last month—but hurry, pay that driver; then I've got some bad news for you."

Bob hurried like a slow motion picture and came back slower.

"The deal's off, Bob. Ralston Lock has our stunt patented."

"You're not spoofin', are you?"

"I never do. Here's the letter from the Patent Office. Read it and weep."

Bob read it but didn't weep.

"All my work gone for nothing, Bob. Well, let's not cry over spilt milk. If you want to do anything with your paper-clip you had better make hay while the sun is still shining. But for me the straight and narrow path. And here's a hundred to give you a start and keep you out of temptation."

"Say, Dave, I always knew you were a square shooter. La, La."

They were gone the full two days. They couldn't resist filling all the containers. As they turned up the driveway Sarah noted as she persued the garden plot that the corn would be ready before long. Sam would have to add more shelves to take care of the later things. Sam got out first and was about to put the key in the door when he saw the lock had been broken. He went to the bulkhead but the door was open. He had never thought he was a coward but he just couldn't face Sarah—at least for awhile. He stood wondering what to say—what to do. But the children had followed him in and it was out of his hands. He turned to watch Sarah but she was climbing back into the car apparently insensible to direction. She clutched the upholstery as if nothing were sure any more. She heard Sam say faintly—"whoever stole it must have been hungry." Everything was blurry and the children were strangely silent. Perhaps in their childish way they realized too that something had to be done but it was more than planting a garden.

In the Name of the Working Class!

By Bert Russell

An account of the mad rush of fakirs and new intellectuals to get a good seat on the backs of the producers.

Mark Twain's remark that "Everyone talks about the weather, but no one does anything about it" applies well to industrial unionism among those in the C.I.O. and federation of craft unions. Their protests that they "are doing something about it," can be placed in the same category as the protests of a primitive witch doctor against those who doubted that he had any control of rainfall when he climbed a tree, sprinkled water and indulged in exhortations in an attempt to get a moist response from the clear skies. When their claims that industrial union exhortation makes for the real thing fail to convince the skeptics, they follow the illustrious example of their sorcerer predecessors and go through the same imaginative process to prove that their unagreeable critics are moved by the spirit of evil.

Foremost among the chanters is the C.I.O. which has seized the limelight with its high powered press agents and tub thumpers leaving only the shadows for the other industrial-union-panacea-patterers. Hitler's sage advice to tell a big lie if you want people to believe you, is heeded by the C.I.O. John L.'s followers tell the big lie and say that it is industrial unionism, but the lesser prophets, such as the federationists among the marine, lumber and film workers, evade the big lie and merely infer that they are industrial unionists. The I.L.A. spokesman during the embroglio, to use John L.'s choice term for such disputes, between them and the teamsters said, "We believe in industrial unionism. Our strike taught us that." Their recent strikes would have taught a halfwit the need of industrial unionism but there are no signs that this great lesson has been taken to heart. The inference that they are industrial unionists fails to find support in the actions of their officials.

This mouthy reverential regard for industrial unionism unaccompanied by any exhibition of its practice is exciting curiosity in the minds of many. There is an attempt to explain this imitation industrial union bogey on the grounds of a misunderstanding of industrial unionism. This is to underestimate the knowledge of the labor leaders. Likewise to approach it as a sinister plot covertly hatched among the labor officials and the capitalist class to lead the working class into a worse state of slavery is to over-estimate the intelligence of the capitalist class and to presuppose a state of harmony between these two predatory cliques that has not hitherto existed, in America at least. That this harmonious relationship has been entertained by some labor officials, to their benefit, and that it may be entertained by a majority some time, is granted but the petty intrigues and tempests in the union pot hardly lend themselves to such a dogmatic explanation. Such dogmatism condemns some, though few, well meaning officials to a part they are not playing and is a blanket vindication for the rank and file as being sinned against but without desire to sin.

Conservative labor leaders with few exceptions are still adherents to rugged individualism. Ambition, power, position and money is their objective. That some times their method to achieve this, advances the interests of the boss or is sometimes accompanied with improved conditions of the workers is interesting to the officials only in so far as it serves their ends. They maintain with the employers and among themselves that friendly disagreement of competitors in the same field of exploitation. Any amalgamation and egreement with their competitors wherein their individual personality is submerged is abhorrent to them. But the "trust" and "amalgamation" days of labor unionism and capitalism are coming and if the C. I. O. is not the first growth of this tendency it is at least the first that has developed sufficiently to forecast its character when, and if, matured. Even here the individual desire for power and prestige is playing a greater part unconsciously than any deep laid plain of the employing class.

Plus Politicians

This line of development of labor union officials exemplified in the C.I.O. and to a lesser extent because less powerful, in the federations of lumber, marine and film workers, converges with the path of development of another group entirely divorced from the struggles of labor unionists: a group, hanging on the fringe of the labor movemovement whenever employment in their chosen lines becomes scarce, made up of students with somewhere to graduate from but no where to graduate to, ministers without parishoners and declasse intellectuals and would-be intellectuals. Down on their uppers they have been thumbing a ride unsuccessfully from the labor unions for years. But their vague plans and far distant utopia of working class freedom from the capitalist class and their subjection to the intellectual class is gradually gaining recognition from the labor leaders who hitherto have scorned their attempts to encroach on the privileged hunting grounds of the ex-workers.

Now, pushed from below by a rank and file growing restless with the unfilled promises of higher wages and better working conditions, beckoned onward by the mirages of political power and prestige painted by the intellectuals (to be shared by the mentors), encouraged by the suggestions of the employers that labor should share in the responsibilities of industry (the losses) during these critical periods, the labor officials prepare for the new era. They welcome the assistance of those intellectuals and would-be intellectuals, without actual contact with the laboring masses but well versed in abstract political theories and political wire pulling when it is offered.

Unity Preached, Division Practiced

All the talk of industrial unionism, solidarity and progress, accompanied by craft and district separation, internal jurisdictional fights, the vascillating and conflicting policies of the tangle of cliques within the federation of craft union movements finds its cause in the struggle for power and influence of ambitious leaders bitten by the political bug. Industrial unionism is but a political slogan with them. It is not only not desired but positively opposed by them. Industrial unionism is packed with dynamite for political aspirations, and so long as it can be talked about and not achieved, further steps do not have to be considered. Industrial unionism to the worker is like a flea to a dog, as long as he fights to get it he forgets he is a dog, but when he does get it his mind dwells on his position in society. With nothing more in their bag of tricks the politicians would have to stand aside peaceably and see this weapon used or denounce it. In either case their privileged positions disappear.

The events within the federation setup offer themselves to this explanation only. In the Maritime Federation more energy is expended building up reputations for one leader and tearing down that of another than would take to build industrial solidarity and take over the shipping of the United States. Patriotism is said to be the last resort of a scoundrel. The exhortation of unity (how that word just rolls over the tongue of the political sect) is the last resort of the same bird in labor unions. It is the stock peroration of orators through the federations and the honeyed flow is followed by an avalanche of charges and counter charges regarding someone's morals, past, present and evermore. Those in glass houses should not throw stones but throwing meadow mayonaise is permissible and advisable. It serves a two-fold purpose; exhiliaratingly entertains the audience in the rank and file, and dims the transparency of their own actions and mistakes. Meanwhile the biblical admonition that he that is without "things" toss the first brickbat, is abided by.

Maritime Federation

Instead of trying to build an industrial union, and practice its most simple essential, all workers in one industry in one union, the divisions between the crafts are made more apparent by their fight over who should collect the dues of a winchman. That a winchman should pay his dues in the proper place is more important than the industrial union principle that he should get the highest wages for that catagory of work. It is only one of many contradictions that keep their official journal full of petty scandalizing and articles on "Ain't I a great guy." Absolute agreement reigns among the officials regarding not using direct action but "send us to Washington," and the conventions of the federations all propose political hookups. The editor of the official Journal sets forth his views in a head "I.L.A. Convention Goes Progressive." Perusal of the article discloses that the convention went "definitely political." His impartial editing while awaiting the election of a permanent editor (for which his application will be considered) is perhaps not so impartial and reflects the aim of the politicians to control the unions.

Woodworkers Federation

Any sense of industrial solidarity evidenced among the rank and file of the Maritime Federation registers a minus in the Woodworkers Federation. The solidarity of only partially organized workers expressed in 1935 has been destroyed by company und district division. The members are promised that they can take action next spring "all together," What progress! They could do that two years ago. Then just as they get so they can act with officials on their shoulders, and their hands tied with contracts, the way they could without these burdens the phonies plan to add another load on them to slow them down—a political one. Their convention endorsed the Washington Commonwealth Federation. Some say that it will be the straw that broke the camel's back but as a camel with a broken back is of little use the outlook it not favorable. The less said of the federation among the film workers the better. Even the federationists have a dark brown taste in their mouth from that one.

Political Prestige Depends On Labor Unions

It has been under this influence of the intellectual saviours of the working class that the craft and company union officials are working to tie the unions to political parties. A labor political party supported by the labor unions offers these college-bred intellectuals and self taught ex-workers all the advantages of the regular parties. Without this backing, a political party of the "masses" lacks that stability essential to successful political careers. Labor political parties in all countries, Germany, England and others are examples, have always depended upon labor union support for success. Mass parties dependent on individual membership are invariably subjected to large falling off of members swayed by the political winds. Witness the Townsend and Epic parties. The control of votes made possible by wooing the labor leaders warrants the labor politicians' demand for some control of political job favors. But in the meantime the loyality of the workers to the politicians depends upon the defeat and division on the economic field.

Poison of Intellectuals' Puppets

Thus the group controlled by the intellectual aspirants for political positions have cried loudest for unity but have done everything in their power to place obstacles in the way of it. To apparently strive for unity and being careful it's not achieved aids them in their propaganda that the easy road to working class unity is in politics with a Farmer-Labor Party and places the "out" politicians under obligations to the stooges when they become the "ins." When S.U.P. had its charter lifted and the I.S.U. convention made changes in the constitution that would have nullified the gains that the sailors made in the '34 strike and installed the fink hall, it was this group that lead the "Back to the A. F. of L." cry. Even until last fall they were still working to this end. Then just on the eve of the S.U.P. accepting their charter again the same group forms a secession "union" called National Marine Union, on the east coast. The decision to launch this new union was made by "the rank and file committee on the Atlantic and Gulf Coast." The power to make this strategy move, as it is called, was vested in this committee by no one but themselves and their intellectual guiders.

It was this same rank and file group that advised the sailors to accept the Copeland fink book and to send the leaders to Washington to fight it out. When the book was withdrawn they claimed it was the spineless finks that took the books who were instrumental in getting rid of it and that if everyone had done as the I.W.W. members on the east coast and as the S.U.P. pledged themselves on the west coast, not to take the book, the ship crews would have been filled with farmers and the real sailors would have been out on the beach. When ships get so that dust bowlers and fruit farmers can guide them over the main, it is time for a sailor to pack his sea bag and get a stump ranch to learn his trade again. Not that the N.M.U. is necessarily intended to last. Nothing formed by an autocratic few ever lasted so long as it becomes beneficial to these same few to disband it, but it is demonstrating to the high and mighties that the ones who breathed life into the N.M.U. have a number of sheep for sale to the highest bidder.

Home-Grown Product

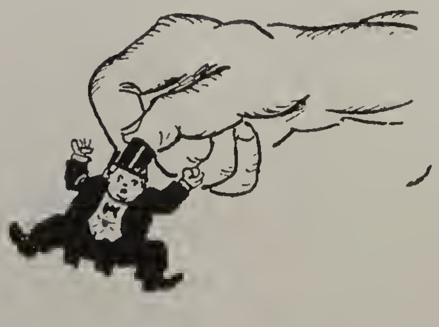
Steering labor unions down the political skidway while chanting industrial unionism is just the American expression of that tendency in European countries of fastening the claws of political parties into labor unions and promising socialism in the far distant future. Socialism is a discredited doctrine in this country, partially because it never gained the control it did elsewhere, but mostly because industrial unionism advocated and practiced by the I.W.W. took the wind out of the socialists' sails. Because of the fighting tradition behind industrial unionism it is today the most revolutionary idea round which the politicians can pin their slogans.

The late appearance here of this movement as anything more than the croaking of a few cranks can be accounted for mostly by the fact that industrial development has proceeded at such a pace as to absorb the local intellectuals as fast as they were made. But in the last ten years the supply has far outstripped the demand for intellectuals as well as workers. The political movement plus industrial unionism is the expression of their discontent; not that of the workers. The New Deal absorbed many of them but it merely whetted their appetite and those that are "in" are desirous of building a bulwark against their early displacement by supporting the lesser intellectual malcontents. Roosevelt doesn't need to be a communist to take lessons from Stalin who blew up Trotzky's greatest support in the U.S.S.R. by merely creating two or three hundred thousand more jobs for the intellectuals. Every liberal, progressive or "revolutionary" political measure has this one end; the increased control and regulation of economy by the state and the state controlled by the intellectual bureaucracy, the brain trust. A substitution of intellectual control for capitalist control. Just another class system.

That in those countries where such political control of unions was exercized the tide of fascism swept without resistance does not constitute a vital objection to their plans. After all the success of the corporate statists offers the same advantages, and if a number of these intellectuals experience a change of affection upon the rise of some fascist power this should be small reason for objection on the part of those who support government control of industry. There is no great chasm between the principle of the government control exponents, whether socialist or fascist. It is merely a squabble over which group shall rule the roost. As for the workers—it is merely a question of whether their children die for one fatherland or another.

But as the fascists upon achieving power have to fear those believing followers who take their promises seriously, so the politicians preaching industrial unionism fear that they may lose a power which may easily get out of hand.

That the workers organized in labor unions do get out of the hands of the politicians and others designing to ride on the workers' backs, is the aim of all revolutionary industrial unionists.



Songs of the Struggle

By Con Dogan

One of the things the working class movement is indebted to the I.W.W. for is the teaching of the value of songs to the struggle for emancipation.

The organization cannot lay claim to the invention of the idea of music as an aid to high spirits —Mr. Monk sang to his lady a few million years ago. Military songs were sung by the Phoenicians in their civilizing missions that made the average Phoenician almost as well travelled as an I.W.W. organizer. Military songs were sung by that half fabulous people the Fir-bolgs in their attempt to keep one corner of Europe free for the Ancient Faiths. But in the modern working class movement the I.W.W. alone has made a systematic attempt to popularize the songs of the struggle.

The songs the workers have sung are an accurate reflex of the struggle at any given moment. More though, they are the accurate reflex of the national and social psychologies of the differing racial groups.

Omitting the legendary songs of the Levellers of the Cromwellian period in England, modern working class songs begin at the time of the French Revolution. The "March of the Marseillaise" was composed in the heroic mood of the day—a people suddenly seeing the dawn of a new era, and willing to fight to retain it. "La Carmagnole" is the courage born of despair of the Paris fauborgs, "we'll dance with death—the Carmagnole," so sang the workers as they danced around the head of the finance minister who suggested people needn't starve as long as there was green grass. "Ca Ira" is suggestive of the debating clubs—the "shoemakers", the "Jacobin," the "farmers" clubs of the period. "What demands the republican? The liberty of all mankind." These songs have lived until the present day.

Of course, the most famous of working class songs was written by a Belgian. With a typical French air and a typical French ideology, it is still international enough to be sung wherever workers forgather.

Toilers from the ships and fields united,
  The union we of all who work;
The earth belongs to us, the workers,
  No room here for the shirk.
How many on our flesh have fattened!
  But if the noisome birds of prey
Shall vanish from the sky some morning,
  The blessed sunlight still will stay.

During the period of the war and the reconstruction the favorite song of the Belgian worker was an adaption of "Marbrouck sa va t'en guerre." Marlbourough was one of the ancestors of the present hybrid Winston Churchill, an English rabble rouser of some notoriety. Marbrouck, according to the original and the adaption was also the ancestor of a good many other people, none of them very much worth while. A bawdy song, a rollicking song with a rousing air.

The only songs the English labor movement has produced are the familiar "Hold the Fort," and Carpenter's "England Arise," and the "New Jerusalem," both of them with unsingable airs and wording never used by the overall stiff. The English workers depend for their songs on the I.W.W. song book and the songs of the Scottish and Irish labor movements.

Burns' songs are the bible of every Scot. They contain a dignity and manhood that is sadly lacking in England where the ideology of the serf remains after all these years of industrialism. "A man's a man for a' that," is the song of Burns most often sung by the struggling toilers.

Jim Connell and Jim Connolly are the two most famous of Irish song writers. Jim Connell wrote the "Red Flag" to the air of the "White Cocade" a marching song of the Scottish clans during the Jacobite rebellion. But because the air of "Maryland," popularized by the American Fenians, was easier for the vast majority of voices, Jim's original idea was changed, even though James to the day of his death preferred the old Scottish air. Connell's "Stand up ye workers" was written to the air of "O'Donnell Abu" which, being written for Irish pipes, is hard on the human voice. Hence "Stand up" has never had the popularity such a fine song deserves.

James Connolly wrote many songs but the most popular "The Watchword of Labor" which is the song of the Irish workers and "Sing a Rebel Song" which is almost the official song of the English labor movement were written in the spirit of the French quotation which Connolly most admired: "The great appear great only because we are on our knees. Let us rise." The music of both was written by an individual named Peter Kearney, who after a life of service to the labor and republican movements, ended his carreer as a governor of a jail during the period when jails were places where a man rested for a few days before saying "good morning" to a firing squad in the days of the Civil War.

Connell and Connolly are not the only song writers the Irish struggle has produced. Almost all the songs of the national movement are couched in revolutionary terms. The songs of Mangan, of Kickham, especially, with a few alterations stand head and shoulders over most of the songs of the modern labor movement. The more so because of the fine harmonic airs, the plaint of the pipe drone that runs through all Gaelic music, makes these songs especially suited to solos and part singing in halls.

My own favorite in working class songs is one of the oldest songs in the world—a song which, as tradition has it, was first sung in the clan wars of the pre-Christian era.

"A rebel heart, a rebel heart,
From taint of slavery free
O grant there still through good or ill
A rebel heart in me"

is a sentiment we cannot have too much of in this day and age.

For the songs most suited to the needs of the struggle the prize must go to two American Scandinavians—Joe Hill and the man the world knows as T-Bone Slim. With pure genius, these boys have taken the songs of the witch doctors, medicine men of the street corner and made of such material songs that are sung all over the globe. Think of the glorious, impudent phrases of Hill's that have passed into the language: "Halleluiah, I'm a bum," "Pie in the sky," "Why the hell don't you work" —these are phrases used now even by people who holler "cop" when the name of the I.W.W. is mentioned. The puckish humor of Slim—"the wise guy sleeps in hoosier's barn," "they go wild, simply wild over me"—surely no other movement in the world has produced two such individuals with the capacity to use the earthy humor of the street corner and produce songs that are classics of their kind.

The I.W.W. is fortunate too, in having—as far as I can find out—the only song writer who is also a poet. Chaplin must feet honored in the knowledge that "Solidarity" is almost the official song of the comedians of Stalin's Church—English section. The fact that the English comical party is much more of a union busting outfit than their American comrades—though by no means as smart at the racket—adds irony. Chaplin, out of the kindness of his heart should write "a thesis" for the "praesiduum" of the Comintern on Solidarity. I don't suppose for a moment they will understand it, but it might stop them from singing "Solidarity" in public. Those welshers have voices that only Jesus could love.

Workers War To Stop Fascism

Reports on the Events in Spain by the Secretariat of the International Workingmen's Association

Translated by JOSEPH WAGNER

The Development of Anti-Fascist Spain after July 19, 1936

In Spain, as elsewhere, the democratic bourgeoisie proved itself incapable of overcoming fascism. The Azana regime prepared the way for the clerical and military rebellion in the same way as the Weimar Republic had prepared the way for nazism. In the meanwhile, on July 19, 1936 a strong popular movement prevented the success of the military putsch in Spain, and if the traitor generals gained the upper hand in Saragossa, Palma, Seville, it was but due to the failure of the republican authorities. In a large part of the country the rebels were defeated only thanks to the heroic action of precisely that part of the population that was most relentlessly persecuted by the Azana regime: the revolutionary workers. The labor union organization of the revolutionary workers of Spain is the C. N. T. Its tactics resulted in the July 19 victory in Catalonia. The triumphs of the workers in this economically very important region of Spain created the possibility of seriously undertaking the war against fascism.

After the victory in the streets, the column of popular militia, proceeded to the other districts dominated or menaced by the rebels; and in the rear, the social transformation of the economic life was begun. In this, it was the labor unions that took the initative. The social renovation of Spain began at the bottom: it was the workers who took the direction and the responsibility of the economic organization of the region. The only function that the state had left was to give sanction to the accomplished facts.

The Position of the Syndicalists and of Anarchists

With a clear view of the possibilities of the moment, the C. N. T. declared itself for the immediate realization of its own goal; libertarian communism. The C. N. T., through its syndicates, (labor unions), undertook the collectivization of the large and medium sized industrial enterprizes, and declared itself for the substitution for the old State institutions, a new economic, political and cultural organism under the control of the labor unions. The position of the C. N. T. on this subject had been clearly set down prior to July 19, but alone, the C. N. T. could not accomplish this task. Therefore it proposed a revolutionary alliance between the anarchist and socialist labor unions: between the C. N. T. and the U. G. T., in order to be able to carry out these objectives. Starting from this viewpoint, the C. N. T. granted the U. G. T. equal representation with itself on all committees, although the U. G. T. was not a labor union force in Catalonia prior to July 19, and after that date its growth was due to the fact that it became a haven of refuge for a certain moderate layer of the proletariat, and of the entire lower middle class.

At the time the battle was raging at the gates of Madrid and the defense of the capital city had become the crucial point of the struggle (the socialist-bourgeois government had fled to Valencia), the C. N. T. demanded the creation of a Defense Council that should replace the central government. The Marxists and the republicans refused to accept this proposition. The C. N. T. wanted the unity of the people against fascism, at all costs, and considered it its own mission to establish such a union. In order to facilitate the people's union against fascism, the C. N. T. laid aside its own tactical conceptions and consented to be represented in the central government. The workers of Madrid rallied for the second time in order to block the road to fascism and Madrid was saved.

Since July 19, the C. N. T. never ceased making sacrifices; many of its best militants died on the front and the C. N. T. did not insist on the unconditional immediate realization of ts own social aims. In spite of its being a powerful revolutionary organization, it abstained from imposing its own dictatorship, which it could have easily done in large portions of the country. The C. N. T. was inspired consistently by its traditional principle of liberty and free and voluntary collaboration, in its relations with the other anti-fascist organizations that used to consider the C. N. T. as the enemy organization and treated it as such. The disinterestedness of the C. N. T., its generous tolerance towards the others and its readiness to forego, temporarily, the pressing forward of its own particular aims, all this was taken to be a sign of weakness by the old-line professional politicians—republicans, socialists, communists—and they took advantage of this to push forward their own political plans and to lessen the direct influence of the workers on the economic life of the country and to restore the old priveleges. And discontent grew among the masses of workers, particularly in Catalonia. That was the real source of the tragical events of May 3-6, where the anarchists again gave proof of their strength and of their willingness to understand.

The Road Followed by the C. N. T.

The C. N. T. is a labor union organization; it considers that the building of socialism is the mission of the economic organization of producers and consumers, and not of a totalitarian State or of some political party with a dictatorial character. If the C. N. T. had followed, since July 19, a policy of understanding with the other anti-fascist sectors and had made numerous sacrifices in order to allow the common policy to be carried out, this was because it considered that in this manner it is possible to build up the libertarian and anti-dictatorial socialism. Its tolerance, its rapprochement to the U. G. T. had a constructive character and was directed towards a positive goal.

"No other organization works with so much zeal for the economic reconstruction of the country, in a socialist sense," recently wrote Fragua Social, Valencia organ of the C. N. T.

"The collectivization movement developed rapidly as soon as the bourgeoisie lost its economic power. Through the labor unions, the workers seized the factories, the landed estates, the mines and the means of transportation. And that was but the natural outcome of an idea that was maturing in the minds of the workers. The workers were ready to take into their hands the administration and the direction of the national economy at the first opportunity they had . . ."

". . . Another proletariat, placed in the same circumstances but lacking the revolutionary tradition of the Spanish working class, would have lacked the social aim for which they should have striven, because they would have lacked the solid ideological basis which resides in the labor unions of the Iberian peninsula. The problems confronting us are not due to our lack of general orientation as was the case in the other revolutions (in other countries). The Spanish proletariat knows exactly what it wants. But we have to organize our activities, to coordinate them, so that our powerful popular movement, overcoming the difficulties of the embryonic stage of economic reconstruction, could advance towards the concrete forms of libertarian socialism. Pursuing this work, the C. N. T. consecrates its forces to the creation of national federations of industry on the one hand, and on the other hand, to the concluding of an alliace with the U. G. T. for the attainment of the economic and military tasks. The proletariat should solidly organize the economic life. The isolated enterprises and the efforts limited to certain particular spots, should be condemned. The economy should rest on the industry and on the coordination of all industries."

"We should also bear in mind the fast that neither the one nor the other of the two labor union tendencies—the C. N. T. and U. G. T.—can singly accomplish that mission. The two organizations cannot act independently of each other. The U. G. T. cannot impose its will on the C. N. T. or vice-versa. If such a case would occur it would mean civil war.

And neither can exist, simultaneously, two different forms of economy. In the factories, the workers have discovered the practical solution by mutual understanding between the followers of the two tendencies. But that should be realized also on a national scale. By contributing to the creation of industrial federations and to a C. N. T.—U. G. T. alliance, we are laying the foundation of a new Iberian economy, essentially different from all the other social experiments attempted up to now and which is a specialty of our own people."

The C. N. T.—U. G. T. collaboration policy is not a question of opportunism, but it is the very expression of the will of the Spanish syndicalists and anarchists. They are renouncing neither their libertarian aspirations nor their will to accomplish completely their social revolution. The C. N. T. has consistently followed this road since July 19, 1936. It has naturally met with obstacles on its road. The defenders of the old policy: politicians' bureacracy and special privileges, have placed themselves against the categoric postulates of the libertarian revolution.

Counter-Revolution Makes Its Appearance

For the revolutionary workers of Spain, the struggle against fascism is merged into the struggle against the capitalist regime. Neither the hope of the problematic "aid" of the so called democratic states, nor the external political interests of Russia, could divert the C. N. T. from this point of view.

The small and middle class bourgeoisie of the country and of the cities, the artisans who are yet independent, the proletarian followers of reformistic organizations and especially the communists, carried on an active policy for the restoration of the old economic conditions. The corrupt bourgeois parliamentarism was presented as if it was the ideal of the people fighting against fascism. A big offensive was inaugurated against the revolutionary committees composed of representatives of the C. N. T. and of the U. G. T. and often also of the representatives of the anti-fascist political parties, committees that had assumed all the vital economic functions, after the miserable failure of the republican authorities following the fascist rebellion.

All power to the government!

Such was the common slogan of the right and left republicans, of socialists and communists. They made use of the long duration of the fight and of its transformation into a war, necessitating the most modern means of combat and an adequate military organization, as an argument for imperiously demanding the restriction of the revolutionary initiative of the workers. The definition of the "petite bourgoisie" who were left of the process of collectivization, was stretched. The rural landowners were set-up against the workers farm collectives. One of the symptoms of this struggle was the conflict that broke out between the communist minister of agriculture (of the Valencia government) and the farm workers' collective, formed by the C. N. T. and the G. U. T., in the orange plantations of the Valencia region. In the same sense the conflict broke out between the C. N. T. union of Barcelona and the minister of provisions, also an adherent of the Third International, who brutally opposed the socialization of distribution, (limited, as it was, to the food products and against the socialization demanded by the revolutionary workers of Catalonia.

Terroristic Campaign

This situation led to the terrorist campaign carried on at Madrid by the communists against the C. N. T. In the region of the Center, during the last months eighty anarchist comrades were cowardly murdered. The Commissary of Public Order of the Madrid Defense Junta (abolished since), engaged in the most relentless persecutions against the C. N. T., in the region of the Center, where it is not as strong and powerful as in other places. At Almeria, the militia column chief, the anarchist Mareto was thrown in jail and shamefully slandered. He was finally released on May 3. At Murcia, a secret communist Cheka was discovered, which had already done away with several anti-fascist inhabitants, belonging to different schools of thought. The will of domination of the Third International, which never had a real influence over the masses of Spain, and whose centralistic ideology is diametrically opposed to the Spanish mentality, found a field of penetration in the socialist labor unions, the U. G. T. The Executive Board of the U. G. T. (whose seat is in Valencia), took issue against the domination of the U. G. T. by the communists in Catalonia. In the general elections within the U. G. T., the communists were defeated in Madrid as well as in the Asturias.

The contest between the defenders of the old bourgeois democracy, of the propagators of calm and of capitalist order on the one hand, and of the C. N. T. on the other hand, took more and more violent forms, especially in Catalonia.

Already during the last governmental crisis in Catalonia—that lasted three weeks—the extent of the already mentioned opposition came to light. On this occasion, too, the C. N. T. showed itself accomodating, and, for the sake of the anti-fascist unity sacrificed several demands that the revolutionary workers deemed of prime importance. The members of the C. N. T. gave then proof of their self-discipline by accepting the situation. But at that same time, certain incidents took place that seemed to be provocative.

Although the guard of the Pyrenees front was well taken care of by the workers' militia, the Central government suddenly sent several thousands of men into Catalonia as frontier troops for the replacement of the workers' guards. These troops (the carabiniers) were carefully handpicked in the preceeding months by the central government and they were composed, almost exclusively, of the adherents of the two "marxian" parties. Their arrival in Catalonia provoked general astonishment and their placement at the frontier points as a provocation. There were violent frictions at the border. The small, purely anarchist, town of Puigcerda,—where the C. N. T. and the F. A. I. performed a great social and cultural accomplishment, admired even by the foreign visitors—was the center of this new conflict. The president of the Peoples' Council of Puigcerda, one of the most notable representative of the Catalonia anarchist movement, Mart'n, fell under the bullets of the Catalonia separatist, who ranged themselves on the side of the troups sent by the central government.

The Death of Roldan Cortada

At that same time, a new incident took place. A well known militant of the U. G. T., Roldan Cortada, was murdered near Barcelona by some unknown persons who to this day could not be discovered, in spite of all the searches undertaken. The Regional Committee of the C. N. T., in a manifesto that it immediately issued, condemned the murderous act. But, at Mollins, near Barcelona, nine members of the C. N. T. were arrested in connection with this murder. Not finding a shadow of guilt aga'nst any of them they were finally released. A campaign of slander was started against the C. N. T. Large peasant centers, where the C. N. T. was predominant, were placed in a state of defense and public order was maintained by armed workers. In such places where the old police—partly under communist influnece— functioned, the anarchists were harassed, especially in the central quarters of Barcelona. In spite of all that, calm was reestablished in the Pyrenees region, in the agricultural centers of the Barcelona province. A compromise was reached with the central government on the basis of reducing its troops on the Catalonia-France borders to the size it was prior to July 19. The C. N. T. members, arbitrarily arrested, were released. The latent conflict seemed, therefore, disappearing. But, at this moment the provocations that caused the troubles om May 3-6, occured.

In the latest ministerial composition of the Catalonian government, the control of the public order and the interior defense was in the hands of Aiguade, a member of the left bourgeois party. The General Commissar of Public Order was the communist Radriguez Salas. Both of them came from that same political medium, whose main proccupation during the years of 1931-1934 was to hound the members of the C.N.T. and to secure the maximum convictions for them. The petty bourgeois nationalists and Catalonian separatists saw in the struggles of the revolutionary workers the greatest obstacles to their own political program. And there is precious little difference in principle between the left bourgeoisie and the Unified Socialist Party of Catalonia (PSUC), affiliated with the Third International. Both are constituted of the same social layers, pursuing the same anti-revolutionary tradition of the republican politics of 1931-1934. Their representatives in the organisms of the Public Security of Spain, made use of their power to realize their own political interests.

The Telephone Exchange of Barcelona was under the control of the C.N.T., and of the U.G.T., and of some delegates of the Catalonian Generalidad (government). On May 3, at three o'clock of the afternoon, Aiguade sent a strong detachment of police, under the direction of Rodriguez Salas, to "seize the telephone exchange." But the workers did not allow the police to reach the upper floors of the building. There were brawls, there were gatherings of workers in front of the building, and in a few hours the C.N.T. workers of the workers' quarters were spontaneously mobilized." To the streets in the defense of the revolution!" Such was the watchword. Parleys were immediately instituted between the government and the regional committee of the C.N.T. and during the night an understanding had been reached. But the provocation of Aiguade and of Rodriguez Salas had, in the meanwhile, caused bloody incidents, which continued for three days, gravely compromising the anti-fascist unity of Catalonia. From the beginning, the attitude of the C.N.T. was purely defensive, for it was the C.N.T. that had created the anti-fascist front in July 1936 and maintained it since then at the price of great sacrifices. And now again the C.N.T. left its own aspirations and its own particular goals in abeyance, being aware that the very critical situation of Spain required that the Spanish anarchist movement contribute all its strength toward victory over the hordes of Franco, Hitler and Mussolini.

The Workers' Sections with the C. N. T.

Events of May 3 showed once again what the anarcho-syndicalist movement of Catalonia is. As on July 19, there was a total mobilization of the working population within the space of a few hours. This act was a veritable plebiscite of the streets. All the workers' quarters of the city, without exception, were transformed into fortified quarters of the C.N.T. In the workers' sections, where there were barracks, police stations, or republican or communist militia, these either sided with the workers (as was the case at Sans and at San Gervasio), or they declared themselves neutral, as was the case at the communist barracks of Sarria. The workers' sections of Barcelona remained loyal to the C.N.T. and they will continue to remain so. The old police, the republicans and marxists, were in control of the bourgeois quarters and of the central sections, inhabited precisely by that part of the population of which these parties were the emanation. But, as a whole, the police did not go against the workers. A large part of this police remained passive, only a very small part of them allowed itself to be dragged into the fight against the C. N. T. workers when the excitement of the masses and the provocations of certain elements caused the bloody incidents.

The general strike broke out immediately. Only industries producing war material continued to operate. The police and the communists attacked some labor union halls; the revolutionary workers attacked, arm in hand, the police barracks and the halls of the parties and of the reformist unions from where shots were fired upon the workers. The headquarters of the Regional Committee of the C.N.T. was subjected to the fire of the enemy during these days. On this occasion too, the C.N.T. lost comrades of great value. The Italian anarchist, Berneri, was arrested at his home by the communists and one day later, being prisoner, he was murdered, shot in the back. Domingo Ascasi, the brother of Francisco (who had been killed by the fascist bullets July 20, 1936) was killed in the center of the city. The nephew of Francisco Ferrer was killed by the communists, while he was escorting his mother in the street. Having been wounded at the front, he was walking with the aid of a cane.

On May 5 a commission arrived from Valencia, composed of two members of the Executive Council of the U.G.T. and two members of the National Committee of the C.N.T. Although this commission entered immediately in conference with the various anti-fascist sectors of Catalonia, it was not possible to immediately pacify the spirits. After the C.N.T. and the U.G.T. on May 6 issued a joint appeal to the workers advising them to resume work, the communists and the police force took by assault the headquarters of the Leather Workers union of the C.N.T., destroying everything found in the locality. Other C.N.T. union halls, among them that of the sanitary branch, and of distribution were also taken, and everything destroyed within. In the center of the city, members of the C.N.T. and of the F.A.I. were arrested, disarmed and imprisoned, although they were authorized to carry arms the same as the other anti-fascist elements. In the workers' sections of the city, the armed proletariat took energetic measures against the police force intending to attack them. At Sans, after a violent struggle, the barracks of the civil guards was taken and 400 of the police force taken prisoners by the members of the C.N.T. unions. In the barracks monarchist and fascist emblems were found. In spite of that, these prisoners were treated humanly and after calm was re-established, they were restored to freedom, a regular procedure with the C.N.T. in cases of this kind.

On the evening of May 5, a new Catalonian govenment was formed, composed of one representative of the C.N.T., one of the U.G.T., one of the left bourgeois party and one of the small peasant party. When the firing ceased and the barricades were dismantled, on the orders of the C.N.T. and the F.A.I., the Valencia government sent 5,000 assault guards to Barcelona to replace the Catalonian police functioning there up to that time. The constitutional provision relating to the autonomy of Catalonia provides that in case of permanent troubles, the central government has to take charge, temporarily, of the control of Public Order in Catalonia. Minister Aiguade and chief of police Rodriguez Salas were dismissed from their jobs. Thus the two notorious enemies of the revolutionary workers, who considered that "maintenance of Public Order" consists in the persecution of the C.N.T. and the F.A.I., were put out of business. The new responsible heads of the Public Order, appointed by the Valencia government, and who are in charge of the police forces and of the anti-fascist patrols, gave assurance that they will discharge the duties of their office without regard to political tendencies.

We have to warn our friends against the biased versions of these events, circulated throughout Spain as well as in other countries by the Spanish communist and bourgeois parties. According to their version, there was an uprising "against the regular government." This affirmation is absurd since the C.N.T. had its representatives (and it had them before May 3) in the Catalonian government as well as in the Central government. The C.N.T. did not rise against a government of which it was itself an integral part, and which had to be reconstructed during the trouble, with C.N.T. collaboration. The protest movement was directed against the political parties that were using their power within the government, to create provocations against the revolutionary workers. And furthermore, this conflict was not in any manner the action of "irresponsible elements", or provocateurs. Our enemies hasten to qualify as "irresponsibles" not only the militants of the C.N.T., but also the populous workers' quarters of Barcelona during the troubled days; anyone who noted the beginning of the movement on that afternoon of May 3, has to admit if he is not deliberately lying (as they slanderously lied about the Spanish anarchist movement for the last 70 years), will have to admit that this was a spontaneous popular movement, a sudden revolt, a violent protestation of the masses themselves. Any of the slanderers who speak of "Trotzkyist" and fascist provocateur infiltration in certain labor unions, has not been to the workers' quarters of Barcelona in search of proofs, no matter how inconsequential, in support of his gratuitous affirmation.

Documents of the Fighting Days

At the beginning of the conflict, the Committee of the C.N.T. and of the F.A.I. issued a manifesto to the population, describing the Catalonian situation in the following words:

"For months past, hangs over Catalonia such a poisoned athmosphere as to make it impossible to maintain confidence between the different sections of the anti-fascist front. Besides other problems, in the matter of war and revolution, we wish to call the attention of everyone to the facts interesting the Ministry of Interior of Catalonia(Public Security). In the first hours of the revolution, the central government, through a decree, authorized the creation of committees within the police formations, whose duty was to supervise the functioning of the police and to see to the elimination of fascist elements that are still within the police forces. When the present Minister of the Interior (Aiguade) took office, he absolutely refused to recognize these committees notwithstanding their legal standing. At the time, when elsewhere the fascist element was consistently excluded from police functions, in Catalonia, recognized fascists are allowed to remain at their posts, on the police force. because the Minister, in agreement with certain chiefs and officers, is opposed to all modifications. Thanks to this high protection, 62 civil guards from the post of Gerona, fled with ease to the border. Of the Barcelona post, 31 policemen ran away taking away with them important documents, among them the plans of the coast fortifications. And, yet, it was known for months before their escape, that these men were fascists.

"After the Central Council of the Civil Guards, (located at Madrid), was informed that a new batch of 40 men attempted to run away from the Ausias March barracks, the Council demanded a list of the elements with reactionary sympathies that were still in the ranks of the Civil Guard of Catalonia. It was only on April 13, that these elements were excluded by a decree of the Central Government. But the Interior Minister of Catalonia prevented the execution of the central government decree of discharge, and he allowed the fascists to remain at their posts. At the same time he stiffened his opposition to the committees. On the other hand he has done everything in his power to disarm the members of the C.N.T. and of the F.A.I., with the aid of the followers of certain political parties, in order to break the revolutionary power of the members of the C.N.T. and of the F.A.I., power that is the best guarantee for the working people, who are not wishful for the return of the regime of exploitation and for state oppression . . ."

And the manifesto concludes:

"For the restoration of confidence among the anti-fascist forces! For the victory over fascism! Against the systematic provocators, Aiguade and Rodriguez! For the purging of the high posts of the police force! Long live the social revolution!"

This manifesto was signed by the regional committees of the C.N.T. of the F.A.I., of the Libertarian Youth and of the Barcelona local committees of the C.N.T. and of the F.A.I.

An Appeal to the Policemen

The C.N.T. had therefore serious motives to be suspicious of the Catalonian police, which, under the direction of the workers' enemies Aiguade and Rodriguez Salas, were ruling the region. In the meantime, even while the conflict was on, the two libertarian organizations appealed also to the members of the police force: "It is not against you," the appeal said, "that the present protest movement is directed, but against those who are using you as a counter revolutionary instrument of their political schemes." Here is a passage of one of these broadcasted appeals:

"They placed before us the question of force and this has to be now settled. The bloody encounters on the streets are the outcome of a long and painful development of facts, the aim of which is the annihilation of the C.N.T. after this organization has given the strength and the blood of its militants and members in the struggle against fascism. Don't let them fool you, members of the police force! You know, for you have the proof, that the C.N.T. and the F.A.I. are not fighting against you. You are, like ourselves, soldiers in the anti-fascist cause. Your place is on the side of the people as it was on July 19th."

In the appeals published by the different organizations, after calm was reestablished in Barcelona, reference is made in a general way to the necessity of establishing the anti-fascist unity in spite of all obstacles. Ataacks and accusations against organizations of the anti-fascist front were avoided. The May 3 movement in Barcelona was a spontaneous action of the workers' quarters and not the work of some individuals or of an organization, and even less that of the P.O.U.M. Let us give a few facts on this matter.

The communist party could not miss this opportunity of throwing some accusations against its pet adversary, the so-called Trotzkyites, (the P.O.U.M.) a small Marxist fraction that has developed in certain Catalonian workers milieus, and which is opposed to Stalinism. We do not want to wrangle on this subject as we do not feel competent to establish the fine lines of differences between the different opposition communist groups. By its organic form of unionism, by its anarchist ideology the C.N.T. is neatly and sharply separated from the other anti-fascist organizations.

The elements that at present compose the P.O.U.M. belong to that mass, that up to 1936, considered the exclusion of the anarchist movement as an essential condition for any progress of the Spanish labor movement. The C.N.T. and the F.A.I. have nothing in common with them. Since the middle of 1936 that party drifted constantly to the left and today it shares with us certain elementary conceptions of the anarchists in reference to the importance of the civil war.

However, the two tendencies have no come any nearer concerning their essential and positive postulates.

The P.O.U.M. participated in the anarcho-syndicalist protest movement, but to present them as the determining factor of the movement, carrying the C.N.T. in town, reminds one of the tactics used by the nazis, who made political scape-goats of the Jews making them responsible for everything: for the war, the peace pact, the revolution, and the reaction . . .

We have no ties whatever with the P.O.U.M. but the C.N.T. demanded that it be recognized as an anti-fascist organization. On May 9, Solidaridad Obrera demanded that the police return to the P.O.U.M. the print shop it had occupied, which was complied with.

To accord the P.O.U.M. the initiative and the responsibility of the protest movement of Barcelona, is another calumny circulated throughout the international press.

Another version of the tragic events is the following: The position of the C.N.T. in this affair was dictated by the Anarchists of the F.A.I., but that the C.N.T. rebelled against the anarchists and stopped the hostilities. This version also is of the domain of pure phantasy. In the discussions and parleys that have taken place between the third and sixth of May, all decisions taken, all proclamations that were drawn up and published, were by common consent of all the committees of the libertarian movements of Barcelona: the regional and local committees of the C.N.T., of the F.A.I., and of the Libertarian Youth. All decisions were adopted unanimously. The protest movement of the workers did not really come from the C.N.T. and the F.A.I. but from what is known as the "Barridas," of the workers' quarters of the city, from the masses themselves. The committees of the C.N.T. and of the F.A.I. were in constant consultation with the delegates of the workers' quarters ("Barridas") until the danger caused by the bloody encounters in the streets abated when by a common accord, they gave out the watchword: "Stop firing." In no case could there be question of an opposition between the C.N.T. and the F.A.I.

Statements of the Militants Concerning the C. N. T. and F. A. I.

On the night of May 4, speeches were broadcasted by the different representatives of the anti-fascist organizations.

Mariano R. Velasquez, the secretary of the National Committee of the C.N.T., said among others: "Comrades, anarchists, members of the C. N. T., anti-fascist workers. In this critical hour, maintain the same attitude as on July 19th! Do not waste an ounce of the powder so sorely needed at the front! If you are not capable by your own will to do what you should do, Franco will impose on us his law. There will be no other choice for us if we do not defeat fascism, which is our duty to do. The world will spit its contempt on us if we are not masters of the situation and we do not emerge victorious from the battle."

Severino Campos, secrtary of the Regional Committee of the F.A.I., wrote in Solidaridad Obrera of May 10, the following lines:

"We, anarchists of Catalonia, did no want to attack. We were on the defensive as anyone could ascertain. We figured that it was a crime to mutually slaughter ourselves in the rear, while on the front the workers of all political and unionist tendencies suffer and fight together. That we know and we shall not forget. We want the unity of all workers."

All the known militants of the C.N.T. and of the F.A.I. of Barcelona declared themselves in the same sense. The workers of the workers' quarters, in spite of their deep indignation caused by the provocations which are the source of these tragic events, accepted the decision of their committees and quitting the baricades, resumed work.

The Present Situation in Catalonia

An open fight between the different anti-fascist sectors was avoided. The C.N.T. and the F.A.I. have amply demonstrated that they are still the only workers' organizations that count in the workers' quarters. But they also have demonstrated that they are not disposed to allow themselves to be eliminated by the enemies of the social revolutionary development, and by the secret agents of a foreign power.

At the end of this fight there are neither victors nor vanquished. No sanction can, should, or will be taken. But the police forces should finally be purged and the suspected elements excluded. The police forces, sent by the Valencia government, are composed of anti-fascist militiamen of all tendencies, who have fought on the front as volunteers and who are qualified to function as policemen in Catalonia. The C.N.T. and the F.A.I. expect of them and of the present Catalonian chief of Public Order, Torres (who was formerly an officer of the confederal militia column "Tierra Liberta") an impartial attitude. They hope that all fresh provocations will be avoided.

As before, the partisans of the social revolution are opposed by those who also call themselves "communists," but for whom the great sacrifice consented to by the Spanish people, should accomplish no more than the restoration of the political and economic conditions that existed prior to July 19, 1936. As before, the C.N.T. and the F.A.I. will spare no efforts to propagate among the masses the ideas of integral social transformation. The two organizations know, that while the struggle in common of all the antifascists against the common enemy is on, that aim cannot be realized by competition or by violent rivalry, but it has to come as the fruit of the creative policy, of an intelligent, methodical, social and cultural formation.

The Spanish anarchist movement has demonstrated a thousand times that it cannot be destroyed, and the same is true of the C.N.T. It has fought for many decades against the regimes of exploitation and domination. All the governments that have succeeded each other in Spain, wanted to exterminate it. The prosecutions and the murders have not stifled the libertarian aspirations of the masses.

The conspiracies of silence, and the campaigns of slander of the international press of all tendencies, never attained their end. Slanders, like those propagated by the Spanish ambassador in Paris, Araquistan, abusing his official power, concerning an alleged absurd pact between the monarchists and the anarchists, turn against their authors.

The C.N.T. consolidates its positions and its effectives which are increasing, but one can also observe its powerful development in regions where formerly it was in the minority. It is also improving its tactics. It understands today perfectly well the teaching it received from Orobon Fernandez: "The two Spanish workers' organizations, C.N.T. and G.U.T. should never aim to devour each other, they should arrive at an understanding."

The Revolutionary Labor Alliance is the sole road towards an understanding. It is not a question if This or That will prefer to take another road. There is no other road to arrive at a solution.

But the understanding will be difficult. During many long years the two organizations had considered each other enemies, one having been on the side of the oppressors and the other on the side of the revolutionary masses.

It was only when the Spanish socialists began to lose some of their democratic illusions, after 1933, that a rapproachment on certain questions could take place. And there is still a long road to travel before a positive understanding can be attained.

Large layers of the bourgeoisie, scared and anxious to save their privileges, have taken refuge in the socialistic unions. A political current, that is not rooted in Spain, oriented towards a foreign power, that is making a show of its solidarity with the anti-fascist Spain, also profits by the political situation for influencing the U.G.T. to progress backwards. In spite of all, the C.N.T. is ceaselessly appealing to the socialist workers of the U.G.T., who, since 1934, together with the C.N.T. members, faced the same persecutions and who are today attacked by the same hordes of Franco.

The C. N. T. Vital Nerve of Spain

After the tragic event of May 3 to May 6, Solidaridad Obrera of Barcelona, published the following lines:

"Every popular movement brings us a new lesson and the events that are developing have taught us that the spirit of revolt of the Catalonian people has not been exterminated, although they wanted to demonstrate the opposite to us. The Catalonians revolt against all injustices, and it is perhaps for this reason that Catalonia is the cradle of Iberian anarchism, and that it remained always loyal to that movement.

Basing itself on the libertarian tendencies of the Catalonian people, the General Confederation of Labor (C.N.T.) was able to develop here, as it has developed itself in all the other regions of peninsula, in such proportions that no other organization attempting to implant artificial doctrines into our country, will ever attain. And we are proud. For if we are not partisans of a narrow and sectarian Catalonianism, at the same time we are living in Catalonia, and we desire its development and its hapiness and we wish that she should indicate the road leading to the social revolution which is our aim."

In a manifesto, published by the C.N.T. and the F.A.I. during the conflict, we read the following:

"The F.A.I. and the C.N.T. do not want a dictatorship, and do not seek to impose one. But as long as one of its members is living, they will not allow, and they will not submit to any dictatorship. If we are fighting fascism it is not because we like fighting, it is in order to safeguard the popular liberties and to prevent the return to power of those who want to massacre the militant workers and to exploit the working people and of those who, without openly calling themselves fascists, want to institute an absolutist regime, absolutely contrary to the traditions and the history of our people."

In spite of the provocation which endangered the anti-fascist unity for several days, the C.N.T. remained loyal to the line fixed by the May, 1936, Congress, which had already been worked out in 1934 by Orobon Fernandez. He formulated his ideas in the midst of hesitations and contradictions and of the scepticism of these, who, after having made for a long time, common cause with the oppressors, joined the organization which was later to conclude an alliance with the C.N.T. because such are the supreme interests of all the workers, above all special interests. Orobon Fernandez said:

"The Spanish bourgeoisie has thrown off its mask of liberalism. The counter-revolutionary examples, which are presenting themselves in Europe, have given it courage. Today it endeavors to fortify its political and economic monopoly with the aid of the totalitarian state. In order to vanquish this enemy, which is menacingly raising its head against the proletariat, the creation of a granite-hard proletariat bloc is indispensable. The tendence which fails to recognize this truth isolates itself and assumes a heavy responsibility before history. For to defeat—which inevitably will result from isolation—we should, without hesitation, prefer a partial proletarian victory which will lead us (without there being an exclusive domination of one or the other tendency)—to the realization of a minimum program permitting in its turn the realization of the aspirations of all the signatories of the pact of understanding, by the socialization of the means of production and by the first mortal blows against the capitalist domination. Placing itself at the head of the movement towards unity, means the opening of the road which leads to the revolution!"

"We see the things as they are, without glasses, without doctrinary prejudices. It is a question of a revolution and not of an academic discussion on this or that principle. Principles should not be rigid commandments, but subtle forms adapting themselves to the exigencies of reality. Does this platform guarantee the establishment of pure libertarian communism on the day after the revolution?

Certainly not! But it guarantees the defeat of capitalism and the crushing of its sustainer, fascism. It guarantees the edification of a democratic regime without exploitation and without class privileges, and that will open wide the road to a libertarian society in the best sense of the word.

over it. I might have been through—if papa—"

There was a step across the threshold of the bathroom door. The subject of Margaret's conversation stood before them—Papa Schaefer in frayed trousers and a threadbare undershirt and with shaving tools in his hands.

He was a small man with mousecolored hair, looking sixty-five, but was under fifty. A beaten look lingered about his stooped shoulders, and then you noticed his eyes—bright, blue, with a challenging gleam that appeared and disappeared in a most peculiar fashion. It set you wondering about the man. Papa Schaefer crossed the kitchen, set his shaving utensils on the shelf above the sink and faced his womenfolk.

"A prophet," the blue eyes twinkled, "is always without honor in his own country."

"I don't know what you mean," his wife answered tartly, "but it isn't funny."

The twinkle vanished. Weariness fluttered across Papa Schaefer's face. "Where's my good blue shirt, Nettie?"

"Your good blue shirt? . . . Well, something is going to happen!"

Babe dropped the red sweater. "I'll get it for you, dad, it's in the closet."

"Where in heck are you going, pop?" Elinor was relieved that the conversation had taken another turn, "we can't drive you outa this dump other times."

"Where is he goin'? Isn't that what I been tryin' to find out all mornin'?" asked her mother peevishly.

Margaret slumped into a chair on the other side of the kitchen table from Elinor. She stared severely through her spectacles: "You're behaving very peculiarly—why so secretive?"

A grin spread over Elinor's saucy face. "It's got something to do with that young fella that was here last week. What were you two gassin' about all alone in the parlor?"

Silence while three women stared hard at Papa Schaefer.

Papa Schaefer rubbed his skinny arms and looked uneasy.

Nettie Schaefer began to whimper: "Now don't you go doin' anythin' foolish!"

Her husband stopped rubbing his skinny arms. The challenging gleam crept back into his eyes.

"Well, if you wanto know what I'm doing you might look at the calendar."

"At the calendar!" echoed Margaret, turning toward the wall behind her.

Elinor turned too. She was the first to speak. "It's May first!" she shouted.

Nettie Schaefer gave a little scream.

No one spoke. Babe, with the blue shirt over her arm, ran into the kitchen. "What's the matter, mama?"

Nettie Schaefer leaned against the sink, moaning: "I knew it—I knew it! You can keep quiet so long—just so long!"

"Then he has to begin making a spectacle of himself—and us!" There were tears in Margaret's voice again.

A hubbub filled the kitchen now. They all talked at once—protesting, pleading, condemning, accusing—all but Babe.

"Good Lord, you'll be standing around on soap boxes again—the way you used to."

"Every time you have to spoil things for us."

"No woman's ever stood what—"

"And here we thought you were going to be quiet for a while."

Papa Schaefer turned his back on them and stared through the kitchen window at Mrs. Letinky's gray wash in the yard below.

"I've been quiet long enough," he said between his teeth. There were so many things he could say to them, but they were things he had already told them over and over—wealth that a few men had no right to possess, hungry children, underpaid men, pickets shot down in cold blood . . . a better world! May Day brought everything back . . . Yes, he could go on and on talking, but it would be useless. Papa Schaefer's shoulders drooped just a little more. Babe handed him the blue shirt. He accepted it without a word. He must be a rotten propagandizer when he couldn't win his own girls—not Nettie but the girls. He couldn't expect to win Nettie. He never had won her except physically, and that years ago when they both had been very, very young. Yes, it was too much to expect to win Nettie.

There had been her father with the biggest store in Hayfield and Uncle Torrance with the tile factory . . . But the girls—Margaret, Elinor—Babe was too young . . . one of them anyway . . . He turned again to his womenfolk.

"Why do you think I've done these things?" he asked them simply, "if it wasn't to make a better world—"

Nettie moaned again. "A better world—that's what you always say."

Margaret glared indignantly. "A better world—if you'd only behaved I could have finished—college." She lapsed into sobs this time.

The kitchen was quiet, but just for a moment.

Elinor crossed her elegant legs and looked bored. "Where do you come in on today's program?"

Papa Schaefer said nothing.

"I know," Babe said shyly, "Sophie Letisky told me—her papa's on the committee."

"What did Sophie Letinsky tell you?" demanded her mother.

Babe's face shone. "He's going to speak—they asked him."

"No woman in the world—" Suddenly Mrs. Schaefer's manner changed. "You fool!" She screamed, forgetting to be ladylike: "We'd be on easy street if it wasn't for your crazy ways—Yes, I know you helped organize the first union in this town . . . and what did you get for it?"

"I kept my self-respect."

"Your self-respect?" Margaret stopped crying and began to laugh hysterically.

"You gotta kick in the pants," said Elinor.

"You lost a good job!" Mama Schaefer shrilled, "and now you'll lose this one on WPA."

Elinor jumped up: "Now I won't get my dress. Damn it!" She rushed into the bedroom. Babe's small face began to quivver but she checked herself, picked up her red sweater and sat down by the window with her back to her relatives.

Papa Schaefer said nothing.

Margaret stopped laughing. "We might have known he was plotting something when that young fellow came. He's the one who gives out those leaflets near the relief station—and he's always making speeches over in the park." Margaret turned toward her father: "I suppose that's what you'll be doing every day now?"

The old, bold challenging gleam flickered in Papa Schaefer's eyes.

"Herman," Nettie Schaefer's voice grew calmer and her eye more wily, "are you going to start your old tricks again—running around trying to change this world when your family needs so much?" She was pleading with him. He knew it. He was too soft with women but this time — —

Margaret pressed her lips together; her eyes asking the same question as her mother. Babe never turned from the window.

Nettie Schaefer spread her hands out, appealingly: "And here we are—just getting on our feet with WPA—"

Papa Schaefer straightened his shoulders, stared for a moment into his wife's face, and then marched past her into the bedroom with the blue shirt over his arm.

Spring had come early. Small, tender shoots of green, like pale gems, were strung along the tree boughs. Delicate bars of sunlight slid across them. You could not see the grass for the crowd in the park was enormous. The whole place tingled with life, so much life that it overflowed into the streets beyond were stood a row of blue coated skull-crackers as they always stood on May Days throughout the world. Papa Schaefer, on the platform with the May Day committee behind him and the passive crowd before him, saw them

LIBERTY, EQUALITY, FRATERNITY

The Middle Classes; Then and Now. By Franklin C. Palm. $3.50. The Macmillan Co., New York.

In world politics today the middle classes are assuming an ever greater role. With their assistance Hitler came to power and fascist movements all over the world are receiving their support.

Heretofore, little attempt has been made to understand this important social group. The literary ridicule of the pre-depression American Mercury and the novels of Sinclair Lewis do not provide proper analysis. No arbitrary delineation can be made. The best possible definition that can be made is that part of the bourgeoisie whose income is in part derived from their own labor and in part from the labor of others or from investments.

Originally the middle classes were the lowly tradesmen and guildsmen in feudal society. They were in between the lord and serf. As the demand for their craftsmen's products grew, they expanded, and handfashioning evolved into manufacture. As the manufacturing and trading towns increased in importance, the relations of the bourgeoisie with the landed ruling proprietors changed. This new class was in a position to demand greater freedom of action.

The bourgeoisie enjoying a greater share in government, with the French Revolution of 1789 signalizing their emergence as a dominat class, it assumed a gradient form. There were the great bankers, merchants and industrialists, the few; "underneath, struggling upwards, were the petit bourgeoisie.

In this volume, the author traces the rise and the differentiation of this class. Once a unified group struggling for power against the ruling feudal nobility. Later an upper bourgeoisie holding the reins of government and power with a lower strata of independent producers struggling upwards to the higher rungs of the ladder of success. Now the 'uppers' are the dominant clique and the 'lowers' are changed to dependent salaried employees of the great corporations or of the capitalist government.

During the change in the composition of the middle class, accelerated by the post-war economic crises, many have been forced into proletarian ranks. The middle classes have sought the support of the workers and farmers in their struggles against the ruling clique. After concessions had been granted them, the bourgeoisie allied themselves with the rulers in suppressing any further revolt of the masses which might lead to change in property relations.

Today faced with the concentration of monopoly capitalism, which means ruin to many and transformation into hired servants for the majority, which direction does the bourgeoisie turn? Caught between the rising organized workers and farmers and the dominant capitalists, they first ally themselves with the latter to crush impending revolt. Then in desperate efforts to save themselves from the expropriation of finance capitalism or assimilation by the threatening socialists revolution, they go in for nationalism in its most vicious forms.

The striving for culture, to be more like the traditional rulers, their influence on morals and religion, allows us to really comprehend this important group in our changing world.—James DeWitt.

clearly. They were like a blue hurdle, one of the many hurdles over which the working class must leap on the road to freedom. Papa Schaefer looked down into the faces, familiar and unfamiliar below him. He saw the old gang from the power house, the boys who had wanted an industrial union and got a kick in the pants for their pains, just as he had. Then, straight ahead he spied Babe in her old red sweater standing next to Sophie Letinsky and smiling up at him. The smile was one of understanding. It gave him a lift. After all, maybe he'd been wrong this morning about his propagandizing . . . Thoughts tumbled into his brain. There was so much to say and so he began: "Fellow workers . . ."

The sunlight still slid across the tree boughs as he talked; the crowd looked up eager, interested, and there was Babe in the flaming red sweater . . . There was the remembrance of many battles and many scars, the anticipation of many more to come, but the challenging gleam never left his blue eyes. It stayed . . . Yes, Papa Schaefer was a man again.

The Latin people have a genre all their own. "La Cucuracha" is now becoming a movie standby, but the "Cockroach" that was sung by the Zapata men in Yucatan, the song that became the marching song of Villa's army, this Cockroach couldn't be thought of by an industry whose idea of salacity is Mr. Booboisie Babbit with a gold-digging chorine. Very similar in tone is a song which was being sung around "Red Barcelona" just prior to the army dictatorship of Primo de Rivera. "La Regeneracion" told of the regeneration of man—but a good many of its verses confined themselves to the parts of the anatomy in need of regeneration. A wonderful song for men on the march, a great song for a stag party but not—assuredly not—a song for the little ladies. Like Mademoiselle from Armentieres the most famous of all war songs. "Regeneration" had verses safe and sterile for mixed company. But Mademoiselle in mixed company lost most of her charms. I wonder if Red Barcelona still thinks in terms of Regeneration.

Probably no movement in the world's history has called forth so many poets as the American labor movement. Anyone who has contributed to a half dozen of the leading labor paper of the past fifteen years could edit an anthology of poetry far surpassing any now on the market. Every phase of human emotion would be amply covered from the introverted messianism so popular during the "hot" period when hundreds of our fellow workers were in the icebox (the acme is probably "Bars and Shadows" by Chaplin), the bitter irony of the underpaid overall stiff, the street corner humor, the idealistic aspirations the songs of sorrow and lament, here is a real treasure house for anyone desiring to place upon the literary market, the world's greatest anthology. The only labor movement as far as I know coming even a bad second to the North American movement in this field is the Australian. Probably because both are "new" countries, probably because both have the same types of workers.

Even in this field the English labor movement lags behind. Probably R. M. Fox, the newspaper man—not the Ralph Fox who is famous for his communist apolgetics,—and W. N. Ewer are the only two "real proletarian" poets. The world may laugh at the fact that English rebel poetry of this era has been written by two "reactionaries." Kipling who did his best to suppress his "Sons of Martha" and G. K. Chesterton. The world labor movement has failed to appreciate G. K. C. Thinking of him as the author of Catholic apologetics which are unrecognizable to any loyal son of Rome) they have forgotten that in all the history of England only two republicans have ever been born there—Tom Paine and G. K. C. Chesterton is outstanding as THE literary figure of 20th century England. His "Song of People of England," here is a spirit far in advance of the present labor movement in England . . . "The men of tact who arbitrate, the slow reform that kills. Save your stinking grease master! Save it for your wheels," is appropriate today when talk of arbitration is the national mania.

It is the fashion to conclude with Soviet Russia. We must be fashionable. But the writer is the only one in the labor movement who doesn't know "all about Russia." I have heard the "funeral song" of pre '17 days sung by a fine chorus with dramatic effects galore. It was very impressive, but I thought of Russian music as I think of Russian ideology—it certainly is not for export. The "March of the Red Army" is tin pan alley, excellent for the Red Army but not having much bearing on the struggle outside of Russia.

The working class and the employing class have nothing in common. There can be no peace so long as hunger and want are found among millions of working people and the few, who make up the employing class, have all the good things of life.

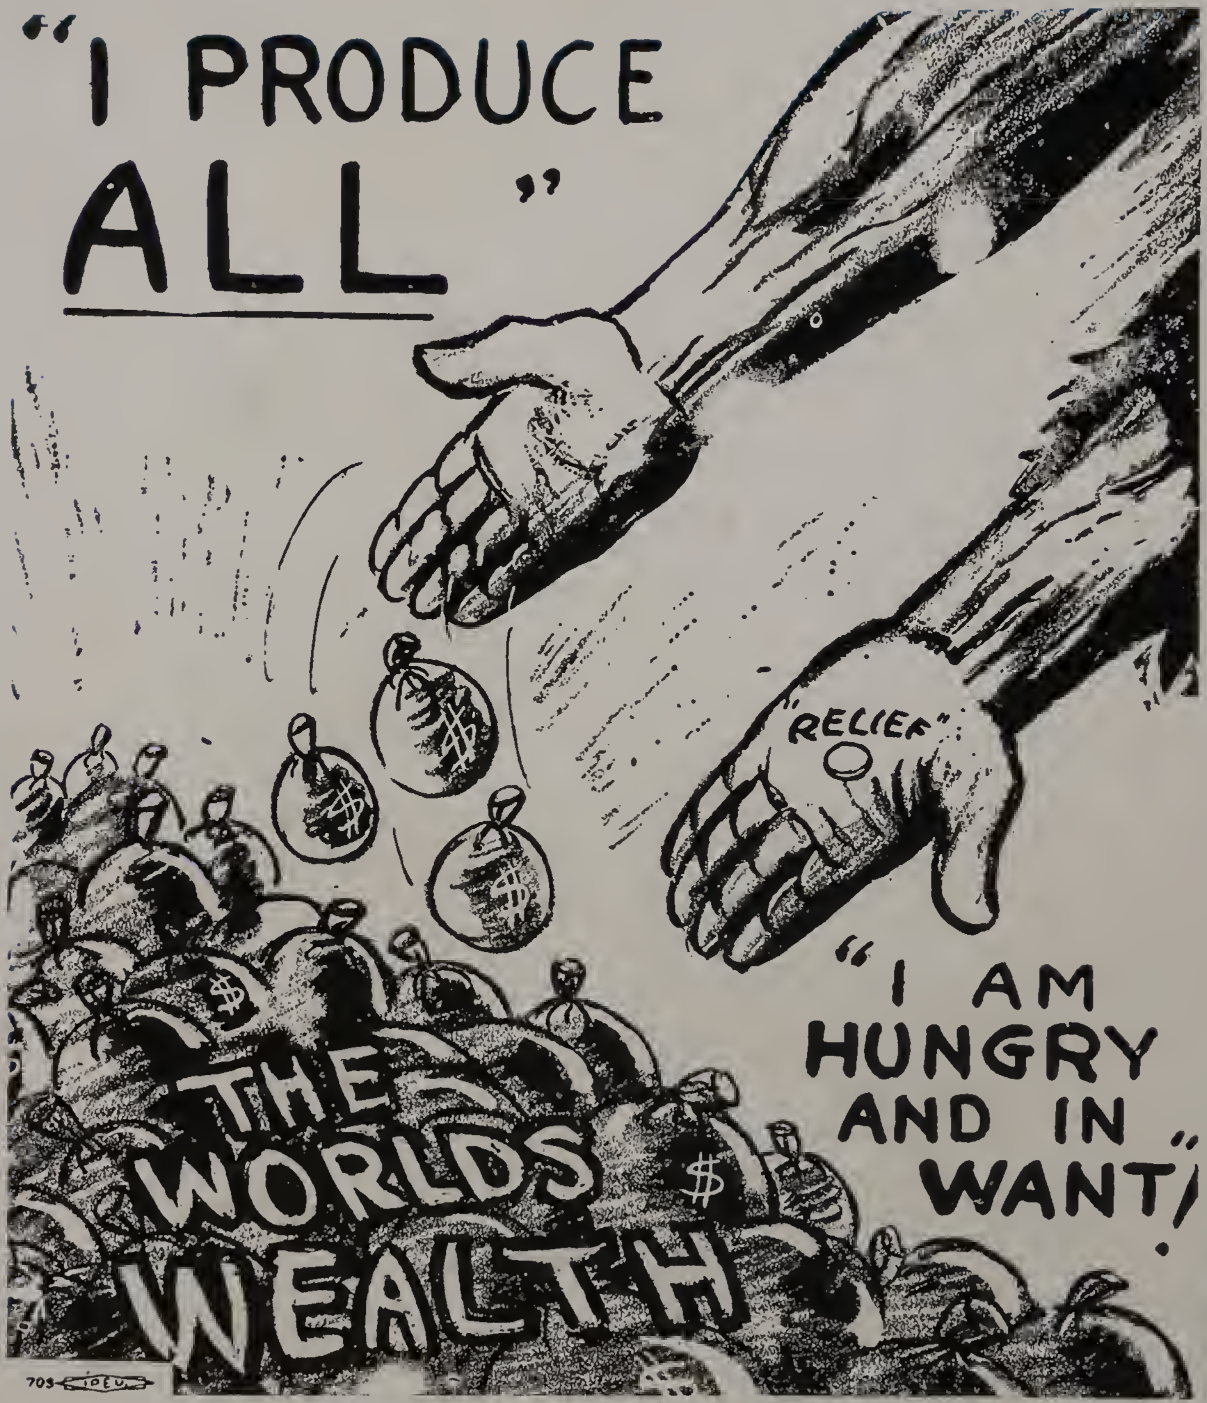
Between these two classes a struggle must go on until the workers of the world organize as a class, take possession of the earth and the machinery of production, and abolish the wage system.

We find that the centering of the management of industries into fewer and fewer hands makes the trade unions unable to cope with the ever growing power of the employing class. The trade unions foster a state of affairs which allows one set of workers to be pitted against another set of workers in the same industry, thereby helping defeat one another in wage wars. Moreover, the trade unions aid the employing class to mislead the workers into the belief that the working class have interests in common with their employers.

These conditions can be changed and the interest of the working class upheld only by an organization formed in such a way that all its members in any one industry, or in all industries if necessary, cease work whenever a strike or lockout is on in any department thereof, thus making an injury to one an injury to all.

Instead of the conservative motto, "A fair day's wage for a fair day's work," we must inscribe on our banner the revolutionary watchword, "Abolition of the wage system."

It is the historic mission of the working class to do away with capitalism. The army of production must be organized, not only for the every-day struggle with capitalists, but also to carry on production when capitalism shall have been overthrown. By organizing industrially we are forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old.



No matter to what extent the intelligence and energy of the working class increases production, no matter how much the wealth of the world grows, it is the purpose and intent of the employers to allow the workers just barely enough to live on. Whether the toilers' share is doled out as starvation relief or as little better than starvation wages the principle remains the same. Like machinery and material the labor force of the world has to be kept in a condition of efficiency reuired to meet the needs of the profit system, beyond that it is supposed to require nothing.

But labor does require more and it demands more. Furthermore it is learning how to get more by organizing in its own rank and file controlled union, the Industrial Workers of the World.

ORGANIZE AND FIGHT!

Our greatest weakness as a class lies in that we do not ask enough for ourselves. We have been trained to be content with what is given us and are not inclined to ask for more, and much less to demand it.

We are too "reasonable" in our demands on society and too tolerant toward those who bar our way to a better, happier living. We are patient with the pig-headed exploiters and the system they maintain; we are tolerant too, even to the extent that we will needlessly sacrifice our lives in industry and battle-fields at the command of those who are our economic masters.

Our class has patience and tolerance—but these are not our virtues, they are, rather, among our worst vices. It's no credit to us that we make sacrifices—live on little and force our children to do the same—when there is abundance available. There is no honor due to those who learn to be content in misery rather than rise in revolt against it.

Being patient with capitalism means to uphold murder, slavery, and starvation. The I. W. W. is not tolerant of those who uphold capitalism or excuse its follies and excesses.

The wage and hour demands of the I. W. W. are moderate, but this is because practical considerations make moderation necessary. The I. W. W. knows that capitalism is outmoded and unjust, and that it must be kicked off the earth before there will be a chance for the working class to really live. Let's organize and fight capitalism.

There is no virtue in submission.

EMPLOYERS USE VIOLENCE

Twenty-one workers killed by company thugs in the first six months of 1937 and the number grows.

Last year fourteen workers lost their lives in the labor struggle in the United States; this year will almost certainly see that number almost doubled.

The dry, cold facts as revealed daily in the contests between employers and workers show with unmistakable clarity that there is no new era, that the masters are today what they always have been: ruthless, cruel, and determined to keep the workers in slavery no matter how many lives it may cost.

In looking over the great strikes of the past six months it is worth noting that in no case were the strikers under the influence of extreme ideas. What they have asked for an "enlightened" capitalism (if such a thing is possible) could have granted without risking the loss of prestige or power. As a matter of fact, it seems to many that the demands made in the current strikes are such that, if granted, might actually be an aid to the employers in the long run. Certainly several of the largest corporations, notably the United States Steel trust, must have looked at it in this way.

The history of the past few months shows that the ruling class is unanimously in favor of only one thing, that is, to preserve the system of exploitation at all costs. They are not nearly so unanimous on the question of what methods to follow to that end, less so now than they used to be. All capitalists will use force, brutal and unrestrained, against the workers but some of them do it only as a last resort while others are ever ready to smear our streets with the blood of workers at the least show of restiveness.

Capitalism is not intelligently guided, it is not a coherent, co-ordinated force and it possesses no annealing solidarity to save it from its own inner conflicts. Capitalists all fight labor but they also seek to devour each other.

If then an individual capitalist or group of capitalists feel that they can improve their position by playing ball with a labor group that in no way threatens their position as masters, and that by so doing they will gain an advantage over a competitor, it is no indication that they have had a change of heart when they recognize unions and sign contracts. Actually they are fortifying themselves against the labor difficulties their more backward competitor is subject to and they are doing it at a very low price.

When other capitalists refuse voluntarily to take this way out to avoid interruption of production through strikes it may be because, being smaller or less up to date in the mechanical development of their plants, they think they can't afford the cost; or it may be because the individuals in immediate control of policy think themselves strong enough to fight it out with labor in the old fashioned way.

Throughout the history of the labor movement it has, with a few exceptions, been the smaller and least modernized concerns that have opposed improvement in working conditions most strenuously. We have, for example, the farmer who employs labor, the small-scale construction contractor, the back alley sweat shop manufacturer, etc.

This does not imply that the cockroach business men are exceptionally bad, as capitalists go; neither does it mean that the big barons are more beneficent in their intentions toward labor. Their different attitudes proceed from the difference in economic status or, less frequently, to personal bias which by no means has been completely eliminated as a factor in the capitalist world.

It would be the hight of silliness to assume that because U. S. Steel made a deal with the Lewis organization it is less an enemy of labor than the Ford Company or the Republic, or Bethlehem Steel. The one no less than the others, is bent on getting the most it can out of its workers. In the class war one capitalist general may find it temporarily more expedient to use poison gas propaganda while another resorts at once to the bayonet.

As for the workers, any direct action they may take in resistance to exploitation is justified provided it leads them toward ultimate victory in the struggle. For that matter any strike the workers engage in is a good one if it developes initiative and confidence within their ranks. The workers who have fought in the steel and other strikes during these past seven months have done wonderfully well considering what they have had to fight against and what they have had to fight with.

A good fighter poorly armed is at the mercy of a much weaker enemy. Workers in the wrong kind of union are doomed to defeat. But those who died in the struggle, no matter in what organization they fought have won a place for themselves in labor's hall of fame. The following is a list of union men killed by the bosses' thugs in the first six months of this year.

The total number of dead for the first six months this year amounts to 21 and the number is growing.

CLASS COLLABORATION — OLD AND NEW

By
JOSEPH WAGNER

A timely reminder of working class political experience, and A. Shapiro's Open Letter to the C. N. T.

Alone, or in coalition with more or less "liberal" bourgeois political parties, the socialists today are in control of the government machinery in a number of countries while yet in other countries they stand in line awaiting in their turn the call of the economic masters to take over the government and to carry on and administer the collective affairs of the capitalists in the respective countries.

The conclusion of the long and destructive World War brought capitalism to bankruptcy, the bourgeois regime stood everywhere discredited physically and morally and in a state of collapse; everywhere the working class was in open revolt. The only organized force, that yet retained some moral prestige was the socialist movement and its trade unions, who, in one country after another, gallantly rushed to the rescue of the moribund regime, until recently their professed enemy.

Naturally, the capitalists very graciously allowed the socialists to resurrect and reconstruct the capitalist regime. They were allowed and even invited to form "socialist governments." Times without number these "socialist governments" proved to the master class that they are in the best of positions to save capitalism and to safeguard all their interests not only by the use of brutal military and police forces, but also by their moral prestige over the working class acquired by nearly a century of socialist party and trade union connection within the working class.

To be sure the master class never was conspicuous by its gratitude, as soon as it imagined itself strong enough to rule without the aid of socialists these were discarded, and their governments turned over to the underworld characters, to gangsters parading in differently colored shirts. A few years of experience with the gangsterdom has, however, taught world capitalism the lesson that the socialists make the more efficient and loyal servants of capitalism, after all, and at the present time the pendulum is rapidly swinging away from fascism to "socialist" or "Popular Front" governments.

Socialists the world over are proud of the role their parties are playing nowadays, and they look upon their present, internationally approved policy as the acme of "Marxism." Yet, this was not always so.

Before the end of the last century, socialists of all shades were violently and unalterably opposed to the very idea of party members participating in bourgeois (capitalist) governments, thereby making the socialist movement, at least indirectly responsible for the acts of their respective capitalist governments. Even the acceptance by a party member of a minor, non-elective government job, was frowned upon as not kosher from social-democratic standpoint.

When, in 1900, Alexander Millerand, who with Jean Jaures, was heading one of the four or five socialist parties existing then in France, entered into the Waldeck-Rousseau cabinet, a storm of protests was raised in the socialist world. National and World Congresses debated and argued the propriety of the action and in all instances the act was condemned as treason to the international socialist movement. "Millerandism" and "Ministerialism" was synonymous with treason. The arguments lasted for fourteen years, until the outbreak of the World War, when the entire socialist world suddenly became "ministerialists" and governmentalists. And so it has remained to this day.

The foregoing is all old history, but it does no harm to recall it once in a while, the more so, as in our days, we are suddenly confronted with a new "Ministerialism." from an unexpected source. This time the anarchist world is stirred with that same old question in the anti-fascist war now going on in Spain.

It would appear, that with the post war experiences, with the experiences of Bolshevism, Fascism, Nazism, we have learned enough to avoid the old and settled disputes. But we must have been mistaken for it seems that we have to overcome the same difficulties and misunderstandings at every instance of serious fight that we, the working class, are confronted with.

The old forgotten "Millerandism" or "Ministerialism" is and has been a burning issue in Spain ever since the present war was percipitated by the uniformed bandits of Spain. The only real revolutionary force in the present Spanish war, was the C. N. T. and its ideological reflex, the F. A. I. It would have appeared an absurdity, for anyone a year ago, to state that the old issue of "ministerialism" could bob up—of all things—in this anarchist and anarcho-syndicalist movement, in the time of the acutest crisis that ever confronted, not only these two Spanish movements (that are really one), but the anarchist fraternity the world over.

Perseus, of mythological fame, wore a magic cap so that the monsters he hunted down might not see him. I would like to have pulled such a magic cap over my own ears so that I may not see the internal fight in the revolutionary forces of the present Spanish fight. Unfortunately, I can read many languages and am in touch with revolutionary literature of many lands, and no magic cap can prevent me from seeing things I would not like to see. I am giving below a translation of an open letter of A. Shapiro to the C. N. T. I read similar open letters months ago, whose authors have fallen since, either fighting on the bloody battlefields, or through cowardly assassination by the Spanish Branch of the Russian Cheka. Shapiro is not dead yet, he is one of the outstanding figures of the anarchist movement of the world. He was for a number of years one of the Secretariat of the International Workingmens Association. Therefore, whatever the readers of the "One Big Union" may think of his statements, I assure them that Shapiro is sincere and means what he says.

OPEN LETTER TO THE C. N. T.

We read with more surprise than interest the minimal program of the C. N. T. "for the realization of a real war policy." The reading of the program raised an entire series of questions and problems, some of which should be called to your attention.

Certainly none of us was simple enough to believe that a war can be carried on with resolutions and by anti-militarist theories. Many of us believed, long before July 19 (1936) that the anti-militarist propaganda, so dear to our Dutch comrades of the International Anti-militarist Bureau and which found, in the past, a sympathetic enough echo in the columns of your press in Spain, was in contradiction with the organization of the revolution.

Many of us knew that the putsches, that were so dear to our Spanish comrades, such as those of December 8 and January 8, 1934, were far from helping this organization of the revolution, it helped rather to disorganize it.

July 19 opened your eyes. It made you realize the mistake you had committed in the past, when, in a revolutionary period, you neglected seriously organizing the necessary frame-work for the struggle that you knew would be inevitable on the day of the settlement of accounts. Yet, today you are shutting your eyes on another important fact. You seem to think that a civil war brought about by the circumstance of a fascist putsch does not necessarily obligate you to examine the possibilities of modifying and altering the character of that civil war.

A "minimal" program is not something to startle us; but a particular minimal program (such as yours) cannot have any value unless it creates the opportunity for the preparation of a maximal program.

But, your "real war policy," after all, is nothing but a program for entering the Council of Ministry (government); with it wou act merely as a political party desirous of participation in an existing government, setting forth your conditions of participation, and these conditions are so bureaucratic in character that they are far from weakening in the least the bourgeois capitalist regime, on the contrary they are tending to strengthen capitalism and stabilize it.

The surprising part of your program is that you do not consider it as a means for the attainment of some well defined goal, but consider your "real war policy" program as an aim in itself. That is the main danger in your program. It presupposes a permanent participation in the government—not merely circumstantial—which is to extend over a number of years, even if the war itself, with its brutal, daily manifestations would cease in the meanwhile. A monopoly of the Foreign Commerce (have the communists whispered this to you?), customs policy, new legislations, a new penal code—all of this take in a long time. In order to realize these tasks, your program proposes a very close collaboration, on all fields, with the bourgeoisie (republican block) and with the communists (marxist block), while almost at the same time you state in your appeal of June 14 that you are sure of triumphing not only against Franco, but also against a stupidly backward bourgeoisie ("the republican block") and against the tricky and dishonest politicians (marxist block").

You see, therefore, that even your minimal program is beset with flagrant contradictions; its realization is dependent on the aid of the very sectors against which that program is aimed. Even the freedom with which you state these two, mutually excluding, programs: collaboration with the bourgeoisie and "marxism" on the one hand and fight to finish against this same bourgeoisie and "marxism" on the other, situates your minimal program as the aim, and your declaration of June 14, becomes a mere verbiage. We would have, naturally, liked to see things the other way.

The problem of Spain's economic reconstruction does not form a part of your program. And yet, you cannot help but know that a civil war, like the one you are going through cannot bring the people to its aid, unless the victories on the fronts will assure at the same time their own victories in the rear.

It is true,— and many of us outside of Spain have known it long before July 19—the Social Revolution cannot be attained in 24 hours, and that a libertarian regime cannot be erected by the turn of the hand. Nevertheless, neither the C. N. T. nor the F. A. I. cared anything about pre-revolutionary organization and about preparing in advance the framework for the social and economic reconstruction. We claim that there is a bridge leading from the downfall of the old regime to the erection of the new regime erected on the ashes and the ruins of the old regime. This bridge is all the more full of dangerous traps and pitfalls as the new regime differs from the old. And it was precisely this period of transition that you have misunderstood in the past and that you continue to misunderstand today. For, if you had recognized that the social and economic reconstruction on a libertarian basis is the indispensable condition to victory over fascism, you would have elaborated, (having in view the aim to be attained) a minimal revolutionary program, that would have given the city and country proletariat of Spain, the necessary will and enthusiasm to continue the war to its logical conclusion.

But such a program you failed to proclaim. The few timid allusions contained in your "war program," are far from having a revolutionary character: the elaboration of a plan for the economic reconstruction, that would be accepted by the three blocks, could only be a naive illusion, if it would not be so dangerous; the municipalization of land is an anti-revolutionary project since it legalizes something that a coming revolution will have to abolish, since the municipalities are, after all, but cogs in the wheel of the State as long as the State will exist.

Naturally, the elaboration of an economic program for the transition period presupposes a final aim. Does the C. N. T. consider that libertarian communism is an unattainable "Utopia" that should be relegated to the museum?

If you still think (as you did before July 19) that libertarian communism forms part of the program of the C. N. T. it is your duty—it was really your duty since July 1936—to elaborate your economic program of transition, without regard to the bourgeois and marxist blocks, who can but sabotage any program of libertarian tendency and inspiration.

To be sure, such a program will place you in conflict with these blocks, but on the other hand, it will unite with you the large majority of the workers, who want but one thing; the victory of the Revolution. It is necessary, therefore to choose between these two eventualities.

Such a program will, naturally, nullify your "war program" which is nothing but the expression of a "true" desire for a permanent cabinet collaboration. But, this proposition, this "war program" of yours is diametrically contrary to the traditionally revolutionary attitude of the C. N. T., which this organization has not denied yet. It is, therefore necessary to choose.

The C. N. T. should not allow—as it has unfortunately done since July 19—the acceptance of the tactics of the "line of least resistance," which cannot but lead to a slow but sure liquidation of the libertarian revolution.

The ministerial collaboration policy has certainly pushed back to the rear the program of revolutionary economy. You are on the wrong track and you can see that yourselves.

Do you not think that you should stop following this road, that leads you to certain downfall?

PERISH ALL TYRANTS

Perish all tyrants far and near,
Beneath the claims that bind us;
And perish, too that servile fear
Which makes the slaves they find us.

One grand, one universal claim,
One peal of moral thunder,
One glorious burst in freedom's name,
And rend our bonds asunder!

Or how a punk politician may become a great statesman

This is "more truth than poetry,"
But here is what I say
To all who would be "Honorables"
And Presidents today:
Keep in the limelight, brother!
Keep, keep in the limelight!
Keep, on a-talking, talking,
Morning, noon and night!

Daily in the "Record"
Your applaused remarks "extend";
Weep a weep for farmers,
The soldier boys defend;
Bawl out all the bankers,
Cuss out all the chains;
Promise all the dust-bowlers
You will send 'em rains;

Glorify the workers;
Praise the horney hands of toil;
Wail because forever
For a living they must moil;
Promise all the aged
You will give 'em what you can't—
Out-townsend Doctor Townsend
When before the old you rant;

Tell all the disemployed
Not one of them shall starve,
But each a fatted gobbler
In the bye-and-bye shall carve;
Tell all the little merchants
You will bust the trust—
Lay it on aplenty!
Raise a heap of dust!

Be sure to "save" our country,
Your faith in it declare;
By Jefferson and Lincoln
Forget you not to swear.
Be interviewed and camera-ed;
Smile and smirk and grin;
Show yourself with Capital
And Labor standing in;

Assert there are no classes
Among the Free and Brave;
The home fires keep a-burning;
The Starry Banner wave;
Give out a gorgeous platform,
One that's promisefull;
Spread the "brisbanalities,"
Go heavy on the bull.

Be lib'ral and progressive,
Conservative and sane,
Syndicalist and Communist,
And something else again.
If by then you are no statesman,
You were never meant to be
A saviour of the people,
Friend, a leader of the free.

THE LAUNDRY WORKERS — THEY CAN BE ORGANIZED

By K. T. S.

"I'm as experienced as they make them. I've been at it 28 years, but I only make $12.40 a week, years ago it was $18."

The worst sweat shops are found in the industries that require comparatively little capital to start. The man with a little money and a strong urge to get rich by robbing wage workers finds himself an old building facing a dirty street or alley where rent is cheap, buys second hand machinery, hires a few workers and goes into business. He works himself, if he can't get out of it, cuts the prices on his product because he has to compete with numerous other budding capitalists who have the same urge he has, and tries his best to grind a little more work out of his employes than anybody else ever succeeded in doing.

The petty cock-roach is found in every city and town, and in the country, too. He is the mainstay of the capitalist system for he inspires hope in the minds of thousands of workers, who ought to know better, that there is a chance for them to escape from the chains of wage slavery and become independent.

One of the most popular of these stepping stones to wealth and affluence is the laundry industry. There are big corporations in the business, of course, but taken as a whole it carries on its miserable existance in that marginal territoy where wages are lowest, working conditions the most miserable, and hours the longest.

The League of Women Shoppers informes us in an interesting little pamphlet entitled, "Consider the Laundry Workers," that the modern power laundry got its start in California way back in 1849. It seems that the thousands of men who went out there without wives to wash their shirts and too much occupied with looking for nuggets to do their own washing, inspired a carpenter to build a 12-shirt washing machine which was run by a 10-horse power donkey engine.

Since then the laundry machinery has become standardized and the operations and departmental divisions, too, so that the nature of the work done by the employes is about the same everywhere in the United States.

The business is highly competitive and, besides, it sells a service, not a commodity, and this service is one that people can dispense with in emergency. When depression strikes, women try to save money by doing their washing at home and this causes an immediate shrinking in the volume of work done by the laundries. But since employers will go to any extreme rather than sacrifice profits they make up by cutting wages down to levels almost unbelievably low, and keep them there as long as they can after the depression excuse is no longer valid.

Another factor that helps to keep wages down is the fact that by far the greater portion of the work is done by women who are not required to be skilled. The old tradition that women work for wages and outside of the home only to earn a "little something extra" is still used as an excuse for low wages and still influences the public attitude toward these workers; even though all the evidence shows that women as well as men workers go to their daily slavery, no matter how unendurable it may be, to ward off starvation and not to by diamonds.

New York State Labor Department figures show that in the latter part of 1936, 73.6 per cent of the women employed in New York City laundries made less than $15.00 a week. But investigators in the same area found wages as low as $6 for a week of 48 hours; and in Brooklyn a man laundry worker was found who was getting $5 a week for 50 hours work, and another who was paid $6 for 60 hours.

In the New York investigation the median wage for women was found to be $13 a week, and for men $14.50. The union wages were found to be somewhat above the average. For instance, while a union shirt folder made $1.95 for 100 shirts, the average was $1.50 for 100; and while a union washer (skilled work) was paid $40 for a 48-hour

America's Greatest Social Disgrace

By

Fred W. Thompson

"Child Workers in America" by Katherine Du Pre Lumpkin and Dorothy Douglas; Robert M. McBride and Co., publishers; 299 p.p. plus bibliography and index; $3.50.

There are some two and a quarter million working boys and girls under 18 years of age in these United States. They have been driven to work by the poverty in their homes. By going to work they have either displaced so many of their fathers, or by competition so reduced the earnings of their fathers, that poverty at home has made it necessary for them to stay on as industrial workers, or has left them so poorly clothed, or with so little money for books and pleasures that even the meagre earnings available in industry appeared more attractive than going to school to receive the scorn of their better dressed schoolmates.

This study of the role of these two million boys and girls in our economic life, and of the largely frustrated efforts to curb their exploitation, seriously attempts to be exhaustive. For this reason it is a study of more than child labor. The opposition to proposed laws to restrict child labor has so entrenched itself in appeals to tradition, in arguments that children work because they are so mentally inferior that they cannot benefit from education, and in political trickery, that those who would end "America's greatest social disgrace" are put in a position where they must either give up the fight or attack the pet prejudices that serve as justifications for capitalism and expose our alleged democratic machinery as the executive committee of the ruling class that radicals have long known it to be.

When those who bring up their own young upon the exploitation of the children of the working class muster the mental testers to show that these working children leave school because they are so inferior mentally that school is of no use to them, it becomes necessary to examine the question: Are the poor poor because they are inferior, or are they culturally inferior because they are poor? The authors have not shirked the responsibility and at length they establish with the utmost scientific objectivity that the working class is not inherently an inferior lot of people; that instead their cultural shortcomings result from the environment that is theirs so long as they yield all beyond a subsistence to those who do not work for a living. Nor do the authors hesitate to ask the pointed question that if industrial employment is the proper treatment for stupid children, then why aren't the stupid children of the rich sent to work likewise? In fact a bracing irony, well barbed with pointed figures, runs through the book, to crop out, for instance in asking, when lobbyists urge that children should not be denied the dignity of labor, why it is, if labor is so beneficial to children, that the children of these same lobbyists are universally denied its much lauded benefits?

The question whether child labor exists because the supply of children looking for jobs requires business to establish employment for them, or whether it persists because of some demand of industry for the labor of children, leads the authors to probe (almost) to the foundations of capitalist economy. That poverty drives them to work is established thoroughly. That the corporations (who by the way are shown to be the great employers of children) exert every pressure to see that insufficient appropriation is made for schooling and for enforcing attendance at school, and employ parents, in agriculture and textiles particularly, only if they put their children to work, is shown repeatedly. They almost get to showing that mass unemployment is the essential condition required for capitalism—that without it the profit system could not tick. But their point—that employment for children is furnished to get bigger profits and not to provide something for the boys and girls to do—it adequately established without getting quite that far.

To those who believe that our college professors, "social scientists", welfare workers, preachers and other leading lights are honest people, and that our legislative bodies hold their deliberations to consider what to do for the majority of people in this country, the chapters on the long fight for legislative restriction on child labor will be most enlightening. These great leaders of "public opinion" do not hesitate to appear both before Congress to urge that such matters be left to the states where, they assure their hearers, the matter will be taken care of, and then hasten to state legislatures to urge that children should not be deprived of the great pleasure, moral benefits, and opportunities to help their unemployed fathers arising from their God-given right to work. Splendid case material for a study of the functioning of the state is furnished in the same chapters. The responsiveness of legislators to the wishes of the owners of the important industries makes the modern state a most serviceable instrument of class rule while presenting the pleasing camouflage of democracy. Such proposals as the abolition of child labor find acceptance only where economic factors have made child labor superfluous. Where it is of advantage to the great owners, any law curbing it provides exception in their favor. Agriculture which absorbs four fifths of the army of child workers is regularly excepted —and the picture built in the press is that of the boy and girl helping father and mother on their own farms.

The facts here given show that such child labor is overwhelmingly performed for the benefit of owners other than their parents.

The nature of the study is such that it is necessarily a kaleidoscope of many views of the misery of America's most submerged families. The pictures of family situations are carefully etched with no waste words, and convey in full the forces that make for submission to the exploitation of children.

We see the home of the sharecropper and the sugar beet worker, the sweatshop home where the family is up till after midnight with the children stringing safety-pins or carding snaps instead of doing their lessons. We see little children in New Orleans picking frozen shrimp until their fingers are numb, and boys and girls of ten years chipping trees for turpentine for twelve hours a day. And we hear President Roosevelt pompously declare "Child labor has been abolished."

What's to be done about it? The authors pin their hopes on federal legislation. There, this reviewer cannot concur with them—they have offered too much evidence to show that we can't rely on that. Even should the amendment get the endorsement of the necessary thirty-six states in the face of a press that is circulated largely by the exploitation of "little merchants", and despite the lobbying and misrepresentation of the corporations that benefit most from child labor, and escape the trickery of those who offer the substitute proposal of requiring all products of child labor to be branded accordingly—even then, what? What standards would Congress set up for the control of child labor? Probably the standards used in the former NRA codes—and these affected only 100,000 children out of the 2,250,000 child workers of America—and it is doubtful at that if they were carried out. So long as there are poverty stricken homes to which work is sent to be done, children will be set to doing it. Outside the home, legislation is hopelessly ineffective in curbing child labor. "In 1928 the New York State Labor Department found over four hundred thousand boys and girls illegally employed in stores and factories." It would seem that legislation is about one third effective from the following figures:

"To show the advantage of regulation, the Children's Bureau cites the fact that whereas in states having no eight hour law for cannery children 96 per cent of the children worked over eight hours, and 78 per cent worked ten hours or more, in the states that did include the cannery industry under their child labor laws, only 66 per cent worked over eight hours a day, and only 40 per cent worked ten hours or more."

Even this estimate of effectiveness is overdrawn, for cannery inspectors report that when they come to canneries at night they find children scampering into the shadows chased away by the foremen.

The proposal to keep children out of industry by making their attendance at school compulsory seems equally ineffective. In the communities where child labor is most used, the school authorities are the chief exploiters of children, and not likely to enforce such legislation. Imperial Country, California, is a great field for child labor in agriculture; it covers a couple of thousand square miles, and has only one school attendance officer, and she is neither provided with a conveyance nor allowed traveling expenses. (The object of factory inspection laws is similiarly defeated by allowing no funds to carry out the inspection).

Child labor is used, and makes for greater poverty, more unemployment, more compulsion to offer one's children for exploitation, because there is a margin of profit in it. The labor union battle for higher wages is aimed directly at the poverty that propels children into industry, and if labor unionism can succeed in insisting either that children shall not be employed, or that their wages shall be raised to the point where it becomes more profitable to hire adults, we will have a much more trustworthy means to combat "America's greatest social disgrace."

Apart from their unwarranted hopes for legislative reform, the authors have woven a picture of working class life and employing class trickery and rationalization, that for completeness of view and readability, deserves to be ranked with the writings on economic history by the Hammonds.

FACTFUL FABLES By COVINGTON HALL

All About The Creature That Mastered Its Creator

Once upon a time there arose on a Certain Planet the most efficient institution ever devised by the mind of the Few for hornswoggling and gypping the Many. It was called "The State." Being itself the outcome of long decades of revolutionary activity, The State, as soon as the Revolutionists won out, immediately Proclaimed and Guaranteed Life, Equality, Fraternity and the Pursuit of Happiness to All, regardless of Race, Creed, Color or Previous Condition of Servitude. So, as All can see, the Forgotten Ones were, as usual, not forgotten.

True, that in Freeing the Serfs and Slaves, the State inadvertently overlooked embodying in Their Bill of Rights any article providing for and guaranteeing their ineluctable Necessity to Work and Eat. But men obsessed with Good Intentions cannot think of everything at once. So, to make Everything all right, the State brought "Law and Order" into Society. Furthermore, its Law was as perfect as Best Minds could make it and its Order was not to be sneezed at. There is no doubt about That. As wise old Anatole has observed, "The Law in its Majestic Equality forbids the Rich as well as the Poor to sleep under bridges, to beg in the streets, and to steal bread." And what could be fairer than That? Nothing. Unlike the Ancient Priesthoods who promised the Mummies something Hereafter, the Priesthood of the State promised the Morons something right Here and Now, if not Immediately, then Pronto after the Next Election. And, what's more, and worse, got away with it. But I digress.

De Jure, if not De Facto, the State is the Sovereign People or Proletariat, as the case may be, in Congress or Parliament assembled. Once Assembled, however, the State became One Thing and Vox Populi quite another. This Unexpected Outcome and Sorry Situation was and is probably due to the Sad Fact that States, like Peoples, must Live, and, to Live, must get the Wherewithal. It is not surprising, therefore, that as the Parasites grow Fat and Fatter the Producers grow Lean and Leaner. The Producers might have thought of that in the Days before the Dole, but it seems evident that they did not. The trouble with the Producers is that they have been so busy, and still are, hardscrabbling an Existence for Themselves and a Living for everybody else they haven't had time to Think. Getting in the habit of Not Thinking Straight, they finally accepted the strange, heretical and unnatural doctrine that men Lived to Work, instead of the other way around—that they Worked in order To Live. Falling under this Hallucination, it was and is perfectly natural that the Great Majority came to the conclusion that the Aim and End of All Production was to pay Profit to the Privateers of Industry and that Production For USE By and For the Producers of The Goods was, somehow or other, a violation of the Laws of God, Nature and the Constitution. So They got what Paddy shot at and the State the rest. And it served them right.

It was by virtue of this queer creed that the State became haughtier and haughtier and the Citizen humbler and humbler as time passed and Progress progressed. As it grew Greater and Greater the Citizen became Less and Less. As It expanded He shrunk. Its prosperity is His poverty. Its glory His meanness. Its might His insecurity. Its salvation His sacrifice. Arming itself Beyond the Limit, It demanded that He Disarm. The Right to Murder it claimed for Itself alone, and, what's more, got away with it again. The State promises and promises, but it is Mr. Average who Pays and Pays. But He seems to like it, and why shouldn't He? He gets all he Voted For and a Lot More that he Didn't Expect, doesn't he? He Does. Then "why Kick?" I Don't. What's got my Goat is the Sublime Gall of the claim the State has of late set up, to wit, as the Lawyers say, that "The State has a Soul of its Own into and under which all other Souls are submerged." I can't swallow that doctrine, not only because it is incomprehensible to sane minds, but because the credo makes the Professional Politician God. And I have too much respect for The Almighty to so insult Him. If that is "Treasonable" or "Counter-Revolutionary," all Right. Make the Most of It. I'm It! And I don't care what the Dictators say!

THE NONSENSE OF PLANNING

By

PAUL MATTICK

"Planned economy and capitalism are irreconcilable contradictions; the one excludes the other. If an economy is planned, then it has also ceased to be a capitalist economy."

The literature dealing with the problems of a planned economy has attained proportions comparable only with those of the depression which brought it forth. In all this welter of thought, we may distinguish three main currents: one which stands for the possibility of capitalist planning, another which denies it on principle, and a third which hovers between these extremes and finds its champions both in the bourgeois and socialist camps.

In view of the depression, the surviving representatives of the laissez-faire principle have a hard time defending their theoretical postulates against the planners. It becomes increasingly implausible that the market mechanism, of itself, can overcome the present difficulties. And even if it could, there still remains open the no less important question of whether society shall submit supinely to the brutal healing process in which the market produces its regulating effects or whether it shall not rather take a conscious part in this process.

In spite of the liveliness of the discussion on the part of the laissez-faires, the fact no less remains that they are historically superseded for their basis in classic competitive capitalism is drawn from under them. The enterprises bound up with free competition fall easy victims to the monopolistic forces in which the process of capital concentration still expresses itself. The resistance offered by these groups to all planning experiments is accordingly not a struggle against any socialistic tendencies of the various governments but the last despairing efforts of weaker capitalist groups against the monopolistic competition by which they are being destroyed. And so, in their agitation, they had to take flight from reality into a mystic fatalism; for monopoly capitalism has undeniably grown out of free competitive capitalism, and thus the representatives of the latter can not attack the first without at the same time striking themselves. The same competitive capitalism which in its heyday never tired of talking about its determining and forming mission in world affairs is today endeavoring to relegate to the realm of fancy any possibility of conscious regulation of the economic life. Its champions see in their own end the downfall of society itself and raise their warning voices with the assertion that no advance is possible except through complete planlessness. However much support they may find for such a position in the past, it remains clear that the future is not destined to follow the pattern of the past but immediately that of the present. And for that reason their cry of protest can inspire no more terror or restraint than, say, that of the hogs in the slaughterhouse prior to having their throats cut. Rather, as the English champion of planned economy, Blackett, writes, "The idea of planning has passed rapidly beyond the stage of being suspect for its communist connotations and has become perfectly respectable."

II.

The champions of capitalist planned economy have the present on their side. Their darts directed against laissez-faire principles strike home, even though they are fired with closed eyes. Of course a number of economists reject the possibility of a partial planning, asserting that such a thing is a self-contradiction and that a planned economy necessarily involves the meaningful and harmonious interconnection of all processes in all economic and social spheres, to which end the most consistent centralization of economic direction is indispensable. But such a position, however correct it may be, still fails to meet the objection that a partial planning in certain circumstances is capable of suppressing some of the economic friction, of overcoming a number of minor difficulties and thus of creating new situations which in their turn can exert a more or less favorable influence upon the economic process. If this is the case, one has a perfect right to speak, if he likes, of "partial planning," and any criticism would practically only be tilting against the terminology which makes this piecemeal planning synonymous with planned economy itself.

Every planned economy has its planless aspects, and every planless economy has also its regulated moments. In the classic capitalism of free competition there were monopolies, and in monopoly capitalism there is competition, even though of a more limited sort. From general competition arose that of the monopolies among each other, which amounts to saying that competition has on the one hand waned as regards complexity in order to wax in other forms as regards intensity. However much the classic capitalism may be differentiated from the monopolistic, still the one can not be set over against the other: monopoly capitalism is the old-age manifestation of laissez-faire, and its planned-economy phraseology is only the makeup which conceals decay.

If we identify the results of monopolization, or of the process of centralization and concentration, with the experiments in planned economy, we get away from the idle and purely conceptual dispute as to whether the planning shall, can or must be carried out completely or half way, at once or gradually. Also the question as to where the planning will lead loses all significance, so that only the question of principle remains open: whether planned economy and capitalism are at all susceptible of being combined.

III.

The major part of the theories of planning hitherto devised can be appraised only as literature, since their authors have refrained from touching upon the laws by which capitalist relations are governed. Their starting point was always discontent with existing conditions. They noted, as anyone may readily do, what was ably set forth by Hoover's Research Committee on Social Trends: that society's capacity for producing commodities is continually increasing at a more rapid rate than the purchasing power of the population, that the ratio of employment fails to keep step with the improvement of the productive machinery, and that the means of communication between nations change more rapidly than the reorganization of international relations. In brief, the rate of growth of the social forces of production is such and the forms assumed by them are such that the social relations can not be adapted to these forms, but are breaking them down. The natural conclusion, namely, that these backward relations must be swept aside, never occurs to the theoreticians of planning and can not occur to them, since they are theoreticians of planning only within the existing social relations. So they try to turn history backward and to arrest this painful growth of the social capacities, after the manner of those lovely Japanese ladies who bandage their feet in order to keep them dainty. In both cases, the actual result is simply maiming.

To the economic planners, it is a question of diminishing the productive capacity and at the same time of increasing the purchasing power. In the course of this two-fold process a time must come when the disproportion now existing between the two will be eliminated and the way prepared for a harmonious interplay. Whatever pains the theoreticians may take to work out their theses down to the least detail, all these pretty games will be very much wasted so far as capitalism itself is concerned. To the capitalists, the problem of planning is a quite one-sided and practical matter, namely, the conversion and adaptation of their productive apparatus and of their business to the automatically contracting relations of the market and to the changes within the economic structure —as brought about through monopolization, cartellization and trustification—in order to win for themselves as much as possible of the social profit. What actual "planning" takes place would take place even without decisive modifications—even if the various brain trusts did not exist—and precisely upon the prescribed basis of the natural market tendecies under monopolistic laissez-faire. The "planning" does not change the social mechanism, but this mechanism functions today in a manner which falls in with the theories of the planners. It expanded the productivity of society in order then, on the ground of this expansion, to contract it. This capitalistic sabotage is not determined by any plans whatsoever,—the plans merely make it known—, but by the planlessness of the existing economic system. Capitalist planned economy is therefore nothing more than "planned planlessness," or more simply stated—nonsense. With the acceptance of the present economic system as the only one for all time there can, of course, be no insight into the fact that any planning within it can only be a fanciful one; the present economic system really permits no genuine conscious economy at all. To talk of planning from the standpoint of commodity production is just as interesting as to hear a blind man lecture on van Gogh.

IV.

The shares of the individual capitalist enterprises in the total social profit being dependent on the magnitude of the capitals involved, so that their owners are compelled to keep on increasing their capital in order to maintain themselves as capitalists when profits are diminishing, it follows that the hindering of the growth of the small capitals means eventually their destruction. And these capitalists are well aware of the fact that control of production means their elimination in the interest of larger aggregations; that the combining process which goes on automatically even during the crisis, by way of bankruptcies, is now to be further promoted by political means, through planned-economy demagogy. That "freeze the status quo" is in reality the planful destruction of small capitals in order to prolong the life of the larger ones. The thing which to some (e. g. Professor Moley) is a new humanitarian adjustment in the economic and political spheres is to the others a downright selfish policy of strangulation, and these latter are justified in appealing to the laws of nature, which do not admit of a "status quo". And while their downfall is a proof of the correctness of this conception, yet in the capitalist sense natural laws operate only by way of eruptions. Although the stagnating tendencies are doomed to remain no more than tendencies, still, so long as they work, they will accomplish their task, and the fate of many outsiders will be absolutely and forever settled through the "unnatural status quo" of monopoly.

No longer, as formerly, does the number of individual capitals increase; rather, as capitalist development proceeds, that number continually diminishes. We are going back, even though with modifications, to conditions like those which existed in the beginnings of capitalist society, when there was little distinction between expropriation and accumulation. And the reason is that at the end of capitalist society, as at its beginning, the thirst for profit and the compulsion to reaping it are greater than during its time of vigor. The primitiveness and unscrupulousness of childhood repeats itself in old age, though with more finesse. The beneficiaries of the capitalist system grow fewer and fewer, so that the struggle for shares of the social profit must grow sharper. While on the one hand there are increasingly greater possibilities for the conscious regulation of the economic life, they are more and more excluded by the property relations. What passes itself off as planned economy, that is, as a conscious taking in hand of the social process of life, is in reality the sharpening of the struggle of all against all.

So long as society is bound to commodity production, it is only through the market that its needs can be satisfied. Any limitation imposed upon the freedom of marketing is a limitation upon the individual entrepreneurs themselves and can only lead to sharpening their oppositions. Limitation of production, which can only be brought about by way of the market, has the same effect. Even if the idea of a capitalist planned economy need not be completely rejected, it can be assigned no more than a limited validity. It is only under conditions in which a certain group of interests succeeds in completely dominating all the rest of society that the idea could be justified in a conditional sense. And yet the unavoidable social convulsions arising under such conditions are probably enough again to exclude the speculation; quite apart from the still weightier factor that under such conditions, with the retention of capital production, its liability to crisis is still not done away with, for that liability is only modified by the market and has its final basis in capital accumulation itself. From this standpoint, it is impossible to see in the current planned-economy tendencies more than a new conceptual formulation of the legitimate course of the monopolistic movement of capitalism in its period of decline.

The endeavor to stabilize present capital investments at their present level, under the pretext of planned economy, is but an expression of the fact that at a high level of capitalist development further technical progress no longer, as before, increases profits but diminishes them. Though the continuance of monopolization can not be halted, this process is at the same time the destruction of capitalist sources of existence, in that it eliminates more and more such things as capital devaluations by which the load of the crisis is lightened. The opening up of the world to capitalist enterprise, while becoming more necessary, becomes at the same time more difficult by reason of the expansion already attained, since here it is not the geographical limits but those of accumulation which are decisive. The more imperative the imperialistic conflicts become, the more dubious also their results. In short, the restriction of the productive forces is at the same time their development and this development at the same time their restriction.

It is only to one who has never delved beneath the surface of capitalist phenomena that this contradictory movement appears to arise from the disproportion between production and consumption. Though it can not be denied that such a disproportion exists, it is bound up with the material character of production and consumption, a character which in the capitalist world, however, has validity only for the individuals and not for the social movement. The commodities regarded as use articles in their material form play in the social sense no part. So that when one speaks of the spread between production and purchasing power, one must first know what all the planners completely neglect; namely, what capitalist purchasing power is. Human consumption capacity and capitalist purchasing power are fundamentally different things. The senselessness of destroying commodities, e. g. from the standpoint of natural consumption, is very "sensible" from the standpoint of capitalist purchasing power, and any one who gets excited about this "insanity" and wants to abolish it under capitalism simply fails to understand the prime motive of this society. The natural necessities of a certain proportionality between production and consumption assert themselves violently in the end against such inverted social conditions and form the content of revolutionary history.

Present-day society does not even concern itself with determining the consumption capacity or needs of society, in order to make a corresponding adjustment of production. It leaves this to the individuals, while the only social concern is the market on which the purchasing power depends. And since the market forces the capitalists to individual accumulation, the only decisive factor in determining capitalist purchasing power is the necessities and possibilities of accumulation. Capital itself is the greatest consumer and forms its own market. To speak of lack of purchasing power merely means that capital is not making use of its purchasing power, and we have to inquire about the reason for this fact. Since profit is the motive of capitalist production, it must also furnish the explanation for this abstention. With this question we come up against the laws of capitalist movement. These laws are wisely neglected by the theoreticians of planning, and hence their theories can not be taken seriously.

VI.

Since accumulation is in practice the continual growth of the apparatus of production and of its productive capacity, its progressive expansion devours a greater and greater part of the newly produced social product, or, differently expressed, of the newly won capital. The same process cheapens labor and changes the proportions in which the capital is divided. General human advance, which consists in the possibility of setting in motion more and more means of production with less and less labor, and hence of turning out greater and greater quantities of products, expresses itself capitalistically in a more rapid growth of the capital invested in means of production and raw materials than of that invested in wages. This fact is evident at once from a comparison of the capital composition of fifty years ago with that of today. Capitalist profit is, however, computed on the total capital, though, since in the final analysis it is nothing but unpaid labor, it varies only with the magnitude of the wage capital. The contradiction between appropriated labor as the basis of profit and the magnitude of the organic composition of capital (means of production and labor power) leads, with the further development of accumulation, to the fall of the rate of profit and, at a high stage of accumulation, to the actual decline of the mass of profit. In a word: a greater social capital produces a smaller social profit. This contradictory movement must lead to a situation in which the diminished profits not only take away the incentive to further accumulation, since such accumulation would diminish instead of promote profitability, but in which accumulation becomes quite impossible. Absolutely, the profit acquired may be greater than before, and yet be too small relatively to the demands of further accumulation.

The capitalist crisis is but an expression of the fact that further accumulation is not worth while or is impossible. The capitalists make no use of their purchasing power, since it doesn't pay them to do so or because accumulation consumes more than is at hand for its purposes. Practically, there then takes place what the theoreticians want to 'plan': the productive apparatus will no longer be expanded to correspond with the hitherto prevailing tempo of accumulation. Of course, profits continue to be made, but those parts set aside for new investments fail to reach their destination, for, however great they may be, they are too small with respect to the demands of accumulation. They lie idle, and one gets the impression that too much capital is present, though in reality this superfluity is a deficiency of capital: an excess of capital arises from a lack of capital. However paradoxical this may sound, scientific truths always appear paradoxical to that "common sense" which never gets beyond appearance.

On this basis it becomes clear that the overproduction of commodities is to be regarded merely as a result and not as a cause of the crisis. Even though accumulation is not continued and the productive apparatus is not expanded in the necessary proportion, still at first production goes on at the previous level. Since, however, there is essentially no new capital invested, so also its material embodiments, the means of production and raw materials, remain unused in their commodity form. Thereupon, production is diminished or quite suspended, workers discharged. The consumption industries also are dragged into the crisis, which soon seizes upon all the social domains. With this, the competitive struggle grows sharper, and this leads to great price drops, bankruptcies and the general predicament.

From this point of view, we see also the factors which may serve in overcoming the crisis. The crisis can be done away with only through the continuance of accumulation. Capitalist purchasing power must be strengthened. Capitalist economists stare in perplexity at the "riddle" of the crisis. If they draw the favorite parallels with the past, they say that 'scarcity' was responsible for economic complications in all pre-capitalist forms of economy, though in view of the productive capacity this factor offers no explanation for the present difficulties. In other words, these economists are looking upon the capitalist world in a manner in which it can not be looked upon, that is, as a world which serves to supply the needs of human beings. This crisis too has its basis in 'scarcity'—scarcity, however, not of use articles but of capital, and this scarcity must be overcome if the depression is to be weathered. Profitability must be reestablished on the basis of continued accumulation. Since, however, profits do not fall from heaven, but are the results of labor, they can be increased only by raising the expropriable quantity of surplus labor which the workers, because of their social position, have to perform for the capitalists. In other words: the raising of capitalist purchasing power, which alone has any importance, presupposes lowering the purchasing power of the workers. Overcoming the disproportion between capitalist purchasing power and the need for accumulation is bound up with increasing the disproportion between production and consumption. And as a matter of fact all countries, even those engaged with experiments in planned economy, show that the purchasing power of the masses in relation to production is constantly still sinking lower. "I JUST GOT INTO TOWN"

By
PAUL KOLINSKY

It's no easy life traveling about from place to place looking for a job, hoping for a chance to settle down but expecting no more than a few day's rest from the hardships of the road.

"Mister, can you spare a dime for something to eat?" Most of us have at sometime or another been accosted on the street and appealed to for a helping-hand. Some people respond by digging into their pockets to help the unfortunate petitioner, others just ignore him, and still others will inform the first policeman they meet about the panhandler. Whatever you do does not solve the problem of the homeless indigent. His problem is a problem of society, and society does not provide measures for his habilitation.

Prior to 1929 there were some half million people on the road. (The country had a million and a half unemployed workers.) Those that wandered around the country were called hoboes, tramps and bums by the public. In the opinion of the public these bums would not work even if they were paid a dollar an hour.

Of course this belief was erroneous for the average transient did work, most often at the menial tasks that the local laborer refused. The transient worked on farms in the harvest time, on construction jobs, and did any odd job offered him. But he did refuse to work at starvation wages, preferring to travel.

His tendency to move on and look for something better often got him into financial difficulties in strange places and he had to resort to begging. Since the public only became aware of his existence when he was broke and asking for help in his need, it was assumed that he was always begging and so the transient laborer became almost universally known as a bum.

With the economic break-down, the transients increased to several millions. Unemployed workers of farm and industry, single and with families, commenced to migrate in quest of employment. Youth from the poverty-stricken homes of the nation were forced to go out on the road. Many freight trains carried two to three hundred riders and the highways were full of thumb-waggers. Many were killed in train accidents and along the roads, others maimed for life.

These superfluous humans traveled in all kinds of weather; always on the move, in rain or sunshine, or freezing cold. They slept in empty houses, in boxcars, in tin-covered shacks along river gullies, and on municipal dumping grounds and lived on reluctantly given hand-outs. And so they do today, though there are not quite so many of them since the worst days of the depression passed.

The indigent wayfarer is constantly harassed by the authorities. The hobo jungles are raided, the hobo's food in the process of cooking on the jungle fire is often kicked over, and the poor wanderer chased out of town without having had a chance to eat and rest.

In the southern states arrested transients are given chain-gang sentences of from 10 to 80 days. In this manner municipalities and counties get cheap labor for road and street work. Often they are put to work on farms to work out the fines that have been levied against them.

In 1936, according to Labor, journal of the railroad brotherhoods, 2,300,000 train riders were arrested. Civil authorities apparently hope to eliminate the movement of transients by prosecution instead of by giving relief so that the unemployed can stay home.

Transient relief, such as it is, allows a 24 to 48-hour stop-over in the larger cities. Many of the smaller communities allow their temporary guests the privilege of sleeping in the basements of court houses and in jails. Newspapers spread on the concrete floors serve as beds, and the lodger furnishes his own papers. Religious organizations usually provide this relief—or it is supplied through them. They sometimes give clothing also, but it is of little value for the best of that which is given these organizations for distribution among the needy, they sell in their stores.

For a short time the federal government provided transient relief, but since 1935 the federal setup has been done away with. The practical non-existence of relief forces the homeless to be beggers.

In the last two years the number of traveling indigents has diminished, due to business pick up and the refusal of the public in sparsely settled sections of the country to feed the hungry. The transients now exist by begging on the streets and private homes of the larger cities. Those that still travel extensively are subjected to greater hardship and hostility than ever before.

The transient is generally able to find work for short periods in the farming districts during the summer. Rarely does it happen that he is able to get one of the more steady jobs and to start life anew. For being fundless he is usually helpless and when he does get a chance at a steady job it is at the most unpleasant work and for the lowest wages. Employers invariably take advantage of the transient workers.

The transients fortunate enough to save a little money from seasonal or other casual jobs, congregate in large cities during the slack times; here they are able to find cheap lodging and food. Often the sleeping quarters he can afford are vermin-infested and filthy and the food is horrible.

In the western part of the United States the section of a city most frequented by transient workers is known as the "skid-road." The name is reminiscent of the by-gone days when the system of logging in the West required the building of trough-like, log-lined roads along which logs were pulled to the "landing" by donkey engines. Now days a "skid-road" is found in every large city of the nation; here the less fortunate of society can live at prices to suit their pocket-books. Employment agencies offer information about jobs at a fee of from ten to twenty-five per cent of the first month's earnings. If the job is out of town the applicant must pay transportation or "beat it." Railroad companies hireing men for track work furnish free transportation and a few other employers who hire men through "skid-road" employment offices advance the fare which is then taken out of the worker's wages.

LABOR POWER

The jobs thus obtained are not permanent; often the worker is discharged after a few days, or the job is so unbearable that he is forced to quit on his own account. This, of course, is good business for the employment agent, or "shark," as he is called by those who avail themselves of his services.

The road is hard traveling; most of the transients are striving at all times to quit it. To settle down at a steady job and to acquire a permanent address is the objective of nearly all migratory workers. Some succeed for a time, and some are able to find new homes, but many fail. Today we still find great numbers wandering through the country—youth and old men, the helpless outcasts of the machine-age tyrrany. There are the youngsters, inexperienced in industrial mass-production, and the old men who are unable to keep up the speed required.

The problem of economic security for the masses lies in the hands of society, it is not an individual problem. The plea of "Mister, can you spare a dime?" will continue to be heard on the streets until society does solve the problem. The homeless wayfarer has no other course left than that of begging for a living.

It is a social problem but society as a whole will do nothing for the "surplus population," except to supply it with a starvation existence in shelters, missions or jails. To one part of what is loosely called society, the migrant is economically necessary. He does a large part of the occasional and seasonal work. He filters into every crevice of the economic structure from whence comes a rumor of jobs to be had, and there swells the size of the reserve army of labor to such proportions that wages are not likely to be forced up through accidental scarcity of labor power. The dominant part of society, the employing class, will not consent to the elimination of the transient by supplying him with an adequate living in his home town.

On the other hand, when the migratory worker consciously takes a stand with that part of society to which he belongs, the productive and constructive working class, he will put himself in a position to raise his wages and improve his working conditions while he is on the job to such an extent that the days or months of enforced leisure are not made bitter by the necessity to beg his bread. When all the workers learn that shorter hours of labor are a crying need, when they demand and take the shorter work day, then there will be jobs for all.

So, though the transient presents a problem to society, its solution lies in working class organization.

If this be Un-American Make the most of it!

By ARTHUR HOPKINS

"Revolution?

"Why, that's un-American, unpatriotic, and is an importation from Russia," so exclaim the 150 per cent true Americans."

"We are a democratic nation and all our social change comes about through an evolutionary process and through legislative means."

But our "good" American forgets the history of his country except, perhaps for a little while on the Fourth of July—Independence Day—and then he fails to draw the right conclusions from what he knows.

He praises, he honors, he lauds and eulogises the heroes of 1776. But what is the Independence Day? Who were those heroes whom he exhalts so extravagantly? Was not this great day the beginning of a Revolution? And were not the men he reveres revolutionists

The Declaration of Independence decreed that it is the right of a people to "throw off such government when a long train of abuses . . . evinces a design to reduce them (the people) under absolute despotism." The independence of the American colonies from the mother country was accomplished through a revolution, not through peaceful, legislative or evolutionary methods.

Many of our patriotic citizens speak also of those "unwanted foreign elements," that, they profess to believe, threaten the very foundations of our great and beloved civilization.

When it is convenient for them to do so, they can forget a lot. They forget, for instance, that the one individual more responsible than any other for arousing the American colonists to resistance to the English oppressors was a foreigner—not even a naturalized American. An "unwanted seditious Englishman," that's what Thomas Paine was.

When he came to America he found the colonists clamoring for reconciliation; they did not dream of independence. They were perfectly willing to remain under the yoke of England provided only that it was made a bit lighter. But Paine gave them and the world his "Common Sense," a pamphlet which aroused the colonies to revolt. He convinced them of the need of breaking away from the mother country. He argued for revolution.

Yes, this "dirty little athiest," as Theodore Roosevelt mistakenly called him, was the man responsible more than any other for the freeing of the American colonies. It was this foreigner that instilled the spirit of solidarity and inflamed the courage in the hearts of those fighting in the American Revolution. When gloom settled upon all he wrote "The Crisis" and shouted, "this is the time that tries men's souls," and encouraged them to keep on fighting.

Preach what you will, you cannot change history. Your government, your country, was founded on revolution. Its spirit of political freedom was inspired by revolution. And the spirit and the reality of economic freedom and security will be inspired and founded on revolution..

If non-revolutionary methods are to accomplish social change, why was the Civil war necessary in America? Why was not "freedom" for the Negro legislated into the United States? The answer is: Because no individuals who benefit by a social system will give up their power, comfort, and spoils without a struggle.

The economy under which we are now living is based on profits for a few through the exploitation (robbery) of the many. The prime motive of the few who make up the ruling class is profits. Human values, cooperation, mutual aid, economic security count for nothing under the present setup. The system is based on the philosophy of rugged individualism which has been turned into a "rugged individualism." Dog eat dog, is the way of life under capitalism.

In this order of things a certain class enjoys the good things of life. It is a class that does no productive labor; it is the class that commands, that rules, and invests finances. It has no other function of life other than living on the labor of the great majority—the meek and humble workers.

Now when the working class decides to refuse to run the industries for the benefit of the employing class, and starts to expropriate the factories, mills and mines, will that class that benefits by their present ownership give up without a struggle? Even if the improbable could happen—that laws are passed to socialize the wealth of the nation—the Morgans, DuPonts and their like would not give up without a struggle.

This is proven by the fact that they resist to the utmost of their strength when their workers demand even such comparatively small concessions as the abolition of child labor, the raising of wages, and reduction of the hours of labor. If they will slaughter their hundreds to break a strike for higher wages, what will they not do in an attempt to save their system?

There is no sense in saying, "there will be a struggle," for it is already going on with the most brutal viciousness on the part of the employing class. The war is already on, and it is a revolutionary war; the working class against the employing class. That it will develop even greater violence in the future than it has in the past is not impossible.

But as this gigantic struggle between classes reaches a climax, the violence to which the masters are ever so ready resort may be actually reduced instead of increased. Bankers, stockholders, and so on don't do their own fighting. They have to draw their gun toters from the ranks of the working class and as the organized power of that class grows, as the workers become more class conscious, the physical power the rulers can muster must ever become smaller in proportion.

Those who do the bidding of the present economic masters will shoot into crowds of unarmed thousands but when they are confronted with millions, when they know that back of every picket line, large or small, is the organized might of the nation's workers they won't shoot—not often, anyway.

The Industrial Workers of the World is building an organization of wage workers which, to the extent it is successful, will reduce the danger of violence in future struggles. But it is a revolution that is needed, the greatest of all the world's revolutions—the end of class slavery, the establishment of industrial democracy.

week, the average was only $22 for a week of 55 hours or longer.

No wonder the business flourishes. That it does flourish is shown by the report of the Consolidated Laundry Corporation (New York). In 1936 this corporation showed a net profit increase of $246,000 over the previous year. But wages went down, not up, during this period of business improvement.

While there was an average increase of 6.2 percent in women's wages over 1935, the wages of the laundry workers dropped about 2 percent and at the same time there was an average addition of 18 minutes a day to their working time.

It is interesting to note that three directors of this corporation, who were also officers, received salaries amounting to $71,000 in 1935. Eight other directors, who were officers, received a total of $125,000.

Here as in other industries the lowest wages are paid in the smaller plants, those owned by that much lauded American who is bent on giving a practical demonstration that there is room on top for the ambitious go-getter.

New York had a minimum wage law which set the minimum wages for laundry workers at $12.40 for a 40-hour week, or 31 cents an hour. The old law has been repealed and a new one passed under which a board is to determin minimum wages on the basis of what a worker needs to exist on. Naturally the worker in the industry who does not use unfounded hope to excuse his own inaction in the fight for improvement, will not expect any more from the new law than he got from the old.

In the period in which the laundry slaves' wages were falling, the cost of living was going up. Retail food prices rose 2 percent from December to January, rent rose 11 percent, and clothing rose even more than these. It is no wonder that the laundry worker often has to apply for charity even while he or she has a full-time job.

Wages vary widely in this industry. A man who worked 10 years in one laundry received $10 a week while another doing the same kind of work in another laundry received $17 after only three years experience.

The hours are invariably much too long, but for some they are positively inhuman. The men get the worst of it in this respect; 60 to 70 hours a week are not unusual. But the more humane hours for women are nothing to brag about, they often are as high as 50 and the average is 43.

It is not necessary to state here what the living conditions of these workers are like. Every worker knows how hard it is to get along on what is called a good wage and can figure out for himself what a strain it must be to try to exist on what the laundry slave gets.

As to working conditions, the surroundings the slave has to put up with during the long hours he is on the job, these must be experienced to be fully appreciated. In this respect all laundries are bad, but some are worse and beyond description. The fetid odor that comes from laundry windows and doors and momentarily strikes the passerby like exhalations from some mysterious inferno doesn't even suggest the conditions that exist inside.

Here is what some of these workers have to say about their work:

"The ventilation is awful. There's not even a fan in the room. The walls and ceilings sweat terribly. It actually rains down on us. I really was healthy when I started but the damp and heat break you down. In two years you're in pretty bad shape. I get colds all the time."

And another:

"Nobody's health is good in a laundry. I had a breakdown from the work. Inhaling the steam keeps your throat dry and standing all day keeps your feet swollen. Some women get so weak they lose their grip in the hands and their arms."

And another adds:

"What hope have the young, if this is their future? I have worked here for 15 years. I was making more six years ago than now. Gradually we were cut to $11 a week. I got laid off Saturday. They gave me my pay and said, 'We don't want you anymore. We have to have younger help!'"

The laundry bosses know and practice all the tricks common to employers who have their workers down where they want them. Many of them practice the 'docking' system just as old John Farmer does on his threshing crew (when he can get away wit it). If there happens to be no work for ten or fifteen minutes, that time is deducted. If there is extra work, requiring overtime, it is often not paid for at all.

When there is re-washing to be done, it is usually not paid for, and the girls are expected to do the bosses' laundry after quitting time without pay. In some places the boss forces the girls to bring in their own wash and charges them the regular rate. A girl reports on one place where "they rung the bell for lunch at 5 minutes after 12 and then rung it again at 5 minutes to 1, chiselling us out of 10 minutes. And if I come in a minute late, I am docked a while hour, but if they make me work an hour overtime, I don't get paid for it. We work so fast that we haven't got time to count the pieces, so sometimes the boss slips things in on us."

These stunts will sound familiar to the workers in many other industries.

The only way in which the laundry workers can establish better conditions for themselves is to organize. Legislation is absolutely no good. It is a sign of the most slavish weakness for these workers to look for improvement from laws that the well-fed legislators see fit to pass and which the inspectors disregard if they provide for anything more than the bosses are willing to give. What the workers must do is to take the laundry bosses to a thorough cleaning with the help of a good union.

There are plenty of things that help make organization difficult in this industry. In many places the bosses play one race against another and in this way keep down any tendency on the part of the workers to get together. Foreigners and natives, Negroes and whites, old hands and new ones are skillfully pitted against each other by bosses who know that bigger profits depend on their keeping the workers suspicious of one another and disorganized.

Besides this and other considerations, it is always most difficult to organize workers in an industry where the wages are extremely low and the hours long. Low paid workers always are more in fear of losing a job than those that are better paid; and the long hours of hard work lessens the tendency toward and the desire for social contact with fellow workers after working hours. When their day's slavery is done, they want to rest.

Nevertheless it is possible to organize laundry workers. Recent months have witnessed many strikes in the industry, most of them spontaneous and unorganized. There is a splendid field here for the I. W. W. member to do something for his cause if he is familiar with the industry and has contacts with workers in it.

"THE AGE OF INNOCENCE"

A SHORT STORY

By

WALTER PFEFFER

The consequences of industrial espionage are the same among boys in a berry field as among men and women in a factory.

Old John Farmer looked over the youngsters who had come out to pick his strawberries and gave them his usual sermon about picking them clean, and filling the boxes up so they would be full after they settled a bit, and admonished them not to tramp on the plants.

He was glad to see so many boys there to convert his strawberry field into hard cash for him—little fellows who wouldn't want to stand up every few minutes to get the kink out of their backs, fingers nimble, and all of them poverty stricken enough to be spurred to the limit by the offer of two cents a quart. He had just one worry, that some of them might be up to such old tricks as pushing up the bottoms on their boxes, or putting leaves and what-not in the bottom before they covered them with berries. It meant that he had to look over every box to make sure that they weren't playing such tricks. He recalled one young scamp who had got hold of extra basket bottoms and stuck them in so that even he was fooled when he inspected the berries. This time he decided that he was going to fix things so that he wouldn't have to worry about such matters. It was just a question of picking the right boy.

Over there in the third row was a likely enough looking lad. He was just about as big as any of them, was further along than any of the rest, and was busy putting the berries into his baskets instead of into his mouth. Besides that he wasn't chattering away with the rest like a magpie. . . John called to him:

"Hey, you there, come here and give me a hand with these crates!" The boy was so busy that he had to add "and I'll pay you for your time."

They set to work getting the crates ready for the berries.

"These young scamps are mostly a shiftless, ornery lot" opined John Farmer, "but you strike me as a bright sort of lad. What's your name?"

"Matt Waters", said the boy.

"I think I ought to make a sort of foreman out of you. I can't be around watching these boys all the time. How would that strike you?"

"That sure would be fine," gushed Matt as he stuck his chest out.

"Well then I'll tell you what you have to watch out for." And John Farmer went on to recount his many troubles—dirty berries, and dirty little crooks trying to cheat him, and him paying two cents a quart just for picking, when picking berries was really fun and not work at all. He grew so indignant that he explained about the trash that some scamps had put in the bottoms of their baskets, and how he had to be everlastingly on the lookout, and about that trick of the phoney extra bottom in the boxes.

Even Matt was moved to indignation by the thought of such outrages, and in his new role of foreman assured John that he would chase any kid clean out of the field that played such a trick.

"Oh, no, don't do that," cautioned John. "I don't want you to chase any of them away. I want them to stay and pick berries."

"Well what are you going to do about it?"

"We'll fine them. Yes, any boy that's caught trying any trick like that ought to be fined five cents, for first offense, and a dime for the second one, and not paid for the berries he brings in when he's caught. Now I don't want to look over all those berries. It takes too much time. Besides that it messes them up. I want to know where to look to catch the crooks. So don't you tell anybody about you being a foreman, but you find out who's doing tricks like that, and when they bring their berries in, you, well, just stand up and lift your hat off, and I'll know to look the berries over."

It did'nt sound so dignified as being foreman, and Matt was a bit reluctant about it, but when John Farmer added "and I'll give you half of what I fine them," Matt agreed.

John gave him a dime with the remark: "You couldn't pick five quarts of berries that quick."

Matt was a fast picker, and with the prospects of earning something extra it wasn't so long before he had his row caught up with the others.

"What did Old Sourpuss give you for helping him?" they wanted to know. "Gosh, you're lucky. I'll bet I won't earn fifty cents all day."

"You will if you stick down to business" ad-

FRANK LITTLE
Lynched at Butte, Montana,
August 1, 1917

TWENTY YEARS AGO

We'll remember you, Frank Little!
The papers said: "So far as known,
He made no outcry."
No, not you! Half Indian, half whiteman,
All I. W. W.
You'd have died a thousand deaths
Before you'd have cried aloud
Or whimpered once to let them
Enjoy your pain.

Shortly after the disastrous fire of June 8, 1917, in the Speculator mine at Butte in which two hundred miners were burned to death, a bitter strike for higher safety standards spontaneously broke out.

The strike lasted five months and ended when the miners were forced through starvation to return to work.

Frank Little, I.W.W. organizer and ever ready to go where his great ability was most needed, arrived in Butte in the latter part of July. He was so successful in his work of organizing the strike that he was soon marked by the vigilante thugs as a man to be eliminated.

On the night of July 31 he hobbled with the aid of his crutch (he was a cripple) to his room in the cheap lodging house where he was staying and retired. "Some time during the night a gang of six men came and took him out, trussed his hands behind his back, tied him to the rear of their car and drove off into the night dragging him, clad only in his underwear.

"What happened after that is not very well known, except that he was horribly beaten. Next morning he was found hanging from a bridge; pinned to his underclothing was a note bearing the inscription, 'Others take notice! First and last warning! 3-7-77,' and underneath the figures were the initials, L-D-C-S-S-W. Other organizers in Butte later received copies of this cabalistic warning with orders to leave the city, which they did not do.

"For days after Little's murder, Butte was in a high state of tension. A move on the part of either the militia men, who were swarming the streets with the company gunmen, or on the part of the strikers, and a massacre might have taken place that would have had no equal in any part of history."*

The murderers of Frank Little were never brought to justice, and the Copper Kings still rule in Butte.

But surely there will be a day of reckoning; the I.W.W. never forgets.

The Wandering Wob

We're swingin' our shanks out of a side-door pullman on the old M. C., watchin' Michigan roll by, when the rattler begins jerkin' like it was takin' down sudden with a healthy case of the D. T.'s an' the next thing we know a sign is informin' us that we're viewin' the thrivin' backwoods metropolis of Wasepi. The shacks on this branch haven't been botherin' us, so we keep on sittin', swingin' our legs leisurely an' watchin' our makin's go up in smoke, when the original, one-an'-only John Farmer comes stalkin' around the corner of the depot an' ankles up to our car.

"Lookin' fer work, boys?" he asks, with a coax in his voice.

"Depends on the work, boss," Whitey answers. "What you got to offer?"

"Farm work!" John beams. His whole face looks like he's just inherited a million bucks, an' he's goin' to split it with us out of the kindness of his heart. We can see that he just can't conceive of anyone turnin' down a nice job of farm work.

"What's the truck?" I want to know. I can't see farmers in these parts takin' on four general hands.

"Huh?"

I'm patient. "What kind of farm work, I mean?"

"Oh," says John. "Some celery, some beets, mostly onions. Two dollars for a ten-hour day. No chores, either." Such generosity makes us stare at each other.

"Found go with it?" Clyde wants to know.

"Nope," Mister Whiskers confesses, "you board an' room yourselves. The Farmers Association hires you an' sends you around to whoever needs you. Truck takes you out from town at 6:30, brings you back at noon, takes you out at 1:00, an' brings you back at 6:00 p. m."

"That's ten hours thirty minutes," Walt comments.

"Well," says our pal, "you can't expect pay for the time you're travelin'." The rattler whistles an' begins to snort an' we see that it's either take it or leave it, so we look at each other an' then all hop off together.

"O. K., John," says Clyde, "you win. Lead the way."

By next morning we know a good deal more about the set-up. The local hicks have decided to settle the labor question in a thorough an' efficient manner indeed. They've formed a Farmers' Association which sees to gettin' 'em a good an' sufficient number of slaves. The Association sets a standard wage of two smackers a day for the whole district an' then sends the stiffs out to work wherever they're needed. They figure steady work givin' a wage of twelve a week will keep the workin' mules happy an' contented, cut labor turnover, an', above all, discourage any of them horrible labor troubles which they've heard of in other districts. Just as an extra incentive to stay on the job they sign you up with a contract which holds out a quarter a day of your wages, to be paid in a lump at the end of the season. An' if you don't stay the season, why, then, you just forfeit the quarter a day. This isn't much of a bother to the local boys who haven't ever been farther away from home than Kalamazoo, but for the 'bos they pick off the freights like they did us, the guys with the itchin' feet, the arrangement is downright irksome. All of this we learn from the boys from outside, who've fixed up a nice little jungle down by the tracks in order to slice that famous high cost of livin'.

A truck takes us out early in the mornin', just like John Farmer, whose name is Cal Krummery, said it would. We're workin' in onions today, we find. Now the workin' part of this job had been the least of my worries. Ever since I dug spuds all one fall up in the Red River Valley I've figured that there wasn't a job on God's good green earth tough enough to feaze me.

So now I'm surprised to find I've been wrong all this while. There is a job tough enough, an' that job is onions. By the time I've waddled the length of one of them mile-long rows with the sun beatin' down on the back of my neck until I felt like one big blister, an' the wet muck, also hot from the sun, steamin' me from the under side, an' my legs wet from the knees down from crawlin' through the muck, I know that I've met my match, especially when the skin comes off my hands from tearin' out the weeds.

The outfit doin' the work is one of the screwiest bunches I've ever run across. Age ranges all the way from eight to eighty, an' both male and female slaves are represented. Most of the stiffs are locals, but about an eighth or tenth are 'bos like us. The homeguards are all happy, many of 'em singin' as they work, even though plenty of notes go sour as the afternoon wears on. An' over the whole gang is a particularly nasty mugg whose handle is Mister Simpson. Br'er Simpson's job is to go around an' see that none of us waste any of the Association's valuable time, an' his favorite sport seems to be threatenin' to dock the pay of the kids of twelve an' under because he don't think they're workin' hard enough. He starts to say somethin' about my speed to me once, but I just look at him an' he shuts up, so I know that I've got his number for when the time comes.

Not everyone, I find, gets two a day. That's only for "adult males." Everyone else's pay is graduated, down to four bits a day for the youngest kids. An' yet, when I mention how lousy things are to the guy next to me, the scissorbill opens his face in a bucktooth grin an' says yes, but ain't we lucky to have jobs?

When Whitey an' Walt an' Clyde an' I compare notes that night, we're all agreed that it's time somethin' was done to wake up this rural open-shop paradise, an' that we're the boys to do it. We especially agree when we find sores are startin' on our knees from the friction an' heat an' wet muck. Our arms are a mass of ugly red welts an' blotches, as our faces are fast gettin' to be. One of the boys explains that this is nothin' unusual.

"It's the poison sumach," he tells us. "This was all swamp a couple of years back, an' even now lots of poison sumach sprouts come up. You pull 'em along with the rest of the weeds. That infects your hands. Then you rub your face, an' there you are. Not really very much you can do about it."

Anyhow, we drift from fire to fire around the jungle, puttin' a bug in the fellows' ears that maybe a little dose of the gospel as laid down by the Preamble would give us a stake for the winter. They eat it up, an' before we turn in we've peddled everything we've got, down to the last copy of the Industrial Worker, an' we've written out cards for practically everybody. Tomorrow, we decide, we'll start an organization drive among the homeguards that will put the One Big Union on the map in Wasepi.

Everything goes fine 'til noon, at which time, while we're waitin' for the trucks after lunch, Whitey is goin' at it hot an' heavy when a sanctimonious-lookin' sour-puss hops up an' allows that he's heard about enough of these un-American doctrines of high wages, an eight-hour day, an' no more child labor, an' that everyone knows that the I. W. W. is an out-an-out enemy of God, the family, Henry Ford, an' the gold standard. Furthermore, we're "com-MUN-ists", an' are these honest, law-abidin' citizens of the State of Michigan an' the town of Wasepi goin' to listen to our subversive what-you-may-call-it any longer?

The way he puts it is so out-and-out silly that we can't help laughing, an' we can see that the scissorbills are downright impressed by Whitey's answer to him, so we figure everything is still fine until we learn that sour-puss is the Fair-haired son of the local banker, an' the nephew of the leadin' sky-pilot of the community. Pa an' Uncle make him work summers for the good of his soul, but ordinarily he's a college man. Workin' in the marshes is only a neat exhibition of the innate depravity of the lower classes for his benefit. Everyone, it seems, is scared stiff of him because, not only is he a college man in the winter, but he is also able, by good or bad reports to papa or uncle, to stop credit or condemn to hell anyone foolish enough to cross him.

Well, the college part was all right, because Walt has served time there too, an' he told the fellow off in his own language, but we didn't know what to do about his influence. The way things were, it looked like he was goin' to kill our drive in short order, because he swore he'd tell the boss on us, an' with the agitators out of the way, we knew that the homeguards would sit back again.

There bein' nothin' else to do, we shut sour-puss up for the time bein' by informin' him that we'd break his lily-white neck if he so much as looked at the boss, but we knew that wouldn't hold him any longer than we could keep an eye on him. We had to think, an' think fast, if we were gonna make Wasepi safe for industrial democracy.

It hit me just as the trucks came in, an' it was a beaut. I ducked back an' high-tailed it straight for dear old Joe Krummery. His feet were holdin' down a desk in the warehouse office in his official capacity of director of the Farmers Association. I crossed my fingers an' trotted across the threshold with my hat in my hand, the very picture of what the obedient and loyal slave should look like.

"What'll it be for you, Sherman?" Krummery wants to know, wavin' his corncob pipe at me in what's probably meant to be an airy gesture of greetin'.

"Well, Mister Krummery," I gurgle, lookin' embarassed as I can, "I didn't want to miss an afternoon's work, an' I sort of hate to do a thing like this, but . . . well, I found somethin' out this morning I thought you should know." Old Whiskers brings his feet down off the desk with a clump.

"What is it, Sherman?" I can see that he already suspects what it is.

"I hate to bear tales, Mister Krummery . . . "

"Of course you do, Sherman, but it's your duty to tell me anything of importance to the Farmers' Association. You must be loyal . . . and if the information is valuable, it might even be possible to arrange for some slight monetary remuneration for you." The flow of it was too smooth an' I knew he'd been memorizin' Chamber of Commerce pamphlets, but that didn't bother me.

"Well, Mister Krummery, it's about Art Havens," I finally break down, givin' sour-puss's name. "He's an awful nice fellow, an' all, but bein' away to college, I guess he's picked up some . . . ideas." The way John Farmer jumped when I said "ideas," you'd have thought I'd run a needle in half an inch where it'd do the most good.

"Ideas?" he gulped. I burst out with a sudden rush of confidences.

"Yes. He's turned . . . com-MUNist. He's tellin' the men they ought to form a union an' strike, an' do all kinds of things. I thought you ought to know." John Farmer an' the Executive in Krummery were havin' a fight, an' finally the Executive won, so, instead of cussin', he got real calm an' said to me:

"How terrible! Sherman, I shall see that you're well rewarded for this. Have any of the other workers been—er—contaminated with the vidus of revolution?"

"'Fraid so, Mister Krummery. Jack Oakley, Harvey Boyer, Al Randall . . ." I reeled off the names of about a dozen of the homeguards who were hardest to bring to our way of thinkin'.

"I'll see that they're fired immediately, Sherman. Immediately!"

"If you'll excuse me, Mister Krummery, I wouldn't do that." 'What do you mean, Sherman?

"Well, Mister Krummery," I explain, getting very oily, "I've seen that done on lots of jobs, but it never did any good. It just made the men angry. Even brought on strikes because the men thought it proved all the mean things the agitators said about the companies."

"Yes, I see your point. But what can I do? I can't leave those men working with our loyal workers."

"Just let them work, Mister Krummery, only tell Mister Simpson, the gang boss, to bear down on them. If you make them work hard enough, they'll quit in a day or so an' you won't have to worry about their bein' able to make trouble." The sun was risin' all over Krummery's face.

"You're right, Sherman," he cooed. "That'll do it! Yes, indeed. Thank you, Sherman." My work was done, so I trotted out of the office.

Walt took my tip an' went to work to persuade Art Havens to stay with us. "Just a couple of days," Walt explained to Art. "After all, life is a great school. You'll never get another opportunity like this to study the psychology of the migratory worker. A social misfit, ture; but very worthwhile to understand. Many of our most eminent scholars have done it—Flint, Parker, London, Minnehan, and Williams, to mention only a few." And, as young Havens hesitated,—"Anyhow, you owe it to them to give them the benefit of your superior training, to show them the errors in their reasoning, and, in turn, to hear their arguments before your report them."

That settled it for our budding plutocrat. He trotted home with Walt in tow as our private precaution to see that he didn't change his mind—an' told his folks he was goin' in for the big sociological experiment.

I did have to hand it to Simpson. He sure knew how to ride a person. I'd have busted him one in the nose within an hour if he'd picked on me the way he did on Havens an' the dozen others I'd told Krummery about. Bein' well-trained slaves, though, they took it an' kept their traps shut. But by nightfall they were sure a lot friendlier to the One Big Union idea.

By the evenin' of the second day after that we were worried, though. We knew that we couldn't keep Havens much longer; our arguments just didn't seem to be dentin' his surface. We saw that he still had enough influence over the homeguards to make things fall pretty flat. Then, about 9 p. m., while Whitey an' I were sittin' guard by him to make sure he didn't wander off, he looks up at me all of a sudden an' says:

"Sherm, write me out a card." I nearly fell off the log I was sittin' on. "Write me out a card!" Why, it was just like a stroke of lightnin' out of a clear sky. An' you can bet I didn't waste any time gettin' out the riggin'.

"What's the idea, Art?" I asked him, friendly-like, after I'd handed over the book.

"Idea?" he grits, "idea? What'd'you think? You 've just rammed some sense into this thick head of mine. While I've been sitting in classes listening to pot-bellied professors who never did a day's work tell about the innate depravity of the working class, you fellows have been out on the job, listening to real, live bosses tell you to get the hell going, and to pull the rag out, and to get off the job if you couldn't earn your pay. You've been getting two dollars or less a day for working till you couldn't see straight. Well, I see straight now, and I'm with you. Let's tie this place up so tight that they can't weed an onion or pull a stalk of celery."

"'Sfunny," Walt says, "I got the same idea you just got a few years back."

It was clear sailin' after that. With Art on our side, aided unconscious-like by Simpson an' his nasty tongue, we lined up the whole section of the Wasepi Farmers Association. It took just two days of strike to make those whiskered sons-of-guns come across. You should've seen their eyes bulge when they saw Art Havens on the committee. His dad nearly had kittens right on the spot. An' you could've hung your hat on those farmers' eyes.

We gave 'em nice easy terms. Eight hours a day from town to town. Fifty cents an hour. All your pay whenever you wanted it. Equal pay for everybody. No kid labor under sixteen. An' all labor carryin' red cards. A ninety per cent vote to remove any gang boss. Oh, it was somethin' to make your open-shop boys turn green with envy.

Now that things were goin', though, Clyde an' Whitey an' Walt an' I couldn't see ourselves stuck in Wasepi. You know, itchin' feet. So, havin' nothin' better to do, we decided to head north for the Upper Peninsula an' the lumber country. We caught an M. C. rattler out of Wasepi, the only town I know of where a good Wobbly played scissorbill an' stool-pigeon for the good of the I. W. W.

A Letter from Apeland

By Card No. X141738

This work is affectionately dedicated to those untiring rebels in the American labor movement whose sense of humor has made it possible for them to endure the evil scissorbilism of our present scissorbilistic age.

I have had the strangest experience of any contributor to the One Big Union Monthly. I have recently returned from an extensive journey across the sea of imagination.

On this voyage I chanced upon the land of Apata and there encountered the Apevillians whose conduct and behavoir I wish to describe for the benefit of students of sociology and economics.

The city of Apeville is located by the river Mawillit in the northwestern part of the land. This river flows some hundred miles below Apeville into the Pigsific Ocean. At the mouth of the river is another city, a little smaller than Apeville but populated by the same kind of curious creatures. However, it is mainly the Apevillians that I shall deal with here although Apeville is only one of many cities in a vast country the exact size of which I did not learn.

The Apevillians resemble our own race in a great many respects. But they also have much in common with apes as the name of this city may already have suggested to the reader. The average height of an Apevillian male is six feet; weight 176 pounds; span of life 52 years.

During my short stay in Apeville I learned from Apevillians versed in the history of their race that at one time all their progenitors had tails varying in length from almost nothing to as much as six feet but that now only a few possessed tails and that these few remaining ones concealed them under clothing of about the same design and manufacture as our own. It was explained to me by an Apevillian scientist in terms indicating profound scientific learning that some five or ten thousand years ago their forebears had quit wagging their tails as a sign of joy and had instead started the habit of putting the tails between the legs as a sign of humility and resignation and that in this manner the tail had gradually come into disuse and by evolutionary process had been eliminated.

I did notice, however, that on occasions of great merriment, and at public entertainments, the main performance of the females especially, was that of wagging the buttocks to which their ancestors at one time had had tails attached.

The province in which Apeville is situated is governed by a huge man-ape by the name of Tiwtin Nirtam. At the time of my visit this man-ape was already way past the average age limit of his race and was suffering from an ingrown tail, that is, his short tail had curved upward and grown into his body causing him great pain at times. Whenever this man-ape had a spell of pain in the lower regions he would give way to the most primitive and base emotions. He would rattle sabers and swords and would threaten his subjects in manners most disconcerting.

He would accuse some of his subjects of being "reds," which in the language of Nirtam meant that they were bad indeed. He would forbid his fellow Apemen the right to organize except in slugging committees commanded by himself. He would order such slugging committees to swoop down on Apevillians, who in defiance of his orders had organized into unions. He was a dangerous man whenever his ingrown tail caused him pain or worry.

Now most Apevillians are a law-abiding people —in fact too much so for their own good as we shall soon learn. The baisc principles of their laws were formulated by one of their forebears by the name of Moses Mosesson a few thousand years ago. No one seemed to know for certain how long ago it was; but most Apevillians were satisfied that it was far enough back in time to make the laws sacred, which was considered the important thing. It was said of Moses Mosesson that he conceived his laws at a time when he was old and senile and when his whiskers reached the ground. This last fact made his laws binding on all forthcoming generations, said the Apevillians, on the ground that at this time the oldest lawyer was always considered the best and that an Ape's age, as well as his wisdom, was determined by the length of his whiskers. A smooth shaven Apevillian youth assured me that no one in the history of his race had ever been able to equal the illustrious wihskers of Moses Mosesson.

The Apevillians have a law forbidding certain kinds of co-oporation. For example: It was considered a criminal offense to cooperate to the end of raising the living standards of the working Apevillians. This law was called the "criminal sense law." Thousands had been executed, so I was told, because unknowingly they had violated this statute.

The first day of my visit to Apeville, I saw an Apevillian hung by his toes for having offered his aid to a kinsman in dire need. I was naturally shocked by this event, and I insisted that his sentence be at least reduced to something less severe. But a law enforcement officer explained to me very solemnly that this was really the only way to maintain continued harmony among their race.

He explained further that punishment was meted out very democratically to all offenders. The victim over whose fate I had been so "unduly arounsed," said he was offered the choice of hanging by his thumbs or his toes until dead, but had declined to vote for either method, wherefore a high tribunal of Apemen judges had decided on the latter. "The fact that the victim failed to choose neither thumb nor toe hanging," argued my informant, "proves conclusively that he is opposed to our democratic institution, does not believe in political action, in short, is a red. For this reason," he continued, "a special court is now in session deliberating on what method to employ in the destruction of all the victim's relatives and friends."

The reader can readily imagine the agony of my heart when I learned of these horrible acts of the Apemen which they evidently planned and executed with perfect calm and placidness. I feared that I might unknowingly commit some untoward act for which cause I would be dispatched to a world of eternal silence before having had time to communicate my observations to the readers of this journal.

On the night of my first day in Apeville while my heart was still heavy from the horrors I had witnessed, I wandered aimlessly about the streets, looking into Apemen faces in hopes of finding some sympathetic soul to whom I could confide my grief. My steps led me to the river's bank where I saw a dog of considerable size being played with by a half a dozen Apemen children.

I could see from the outset that the youngsters belonged to the working class for they were poorly clad and showed definite signs of undernourishment. The dog was heavily furred, moved about with great caution, and showed intense interest in the poor children, who romped about him.

Seeing me advance toward him, he fixed his philosophical eyes on me questions-like, yet with invitation. I could not resist stroking his heavy fur; while doing so I exclaimed half aloud, "I sometimes wish I were a dog." "You are not the only one," replied the dog. I was startled beyond description to learn that this dog spoke very good English.

When I had sufficiently recovered from my surprise I directed a few questions to the dog, whose name I learned was Mush.

"Where did you learn English?" I inquired. "An American sailor," said the dog, "taught me English, and many other subjects, in return for which I gave him information about this country and the people living here. The sailor got so disgusted with the odious apes who run this town that he committed suicide five years ago," continued the dog. And he added, "You are the only man I've seen here since he returned to the elements of his origin."

"I have," said I, "suspected these people of being man-apes, or in other words something in between apes and men. I thought at first that I had found the "missing link" in the evolution of the species, of which a noted scientist of my race once spoke. But I hear you refer to them as Apes?"

"Yes," said Mush, "and Apes they are, and of a most stupid and obdurate kind, if I may say. Look," he said, pointing with his right front paw to the group of Apeville youngsters who were now preparing to depart, "these young lives would not be here today had I not brought them food and drink. Their progenitors were killed because they failed to pray for rain when ordered by our mayor."

"Ye gods!" said I, "who is this monster ape who thus misuses the pwer f his station?" At these words the dog showed signs of great discomfort.

It was palpably obvious that it pained him to reply to my question. After a short pause, during which time he evidently labored to calm his emotions, he cleared his throat with a doggish bark, then with his former equanimity regained, spoke to me as follows:

"Alas my friend, the monster's name is Rasnac Phejos; he is my master and my benefactor. It is from him I steal food to feed the starving youngsters. Today I left him with the explanation that I was to visit the banker's bitch who is giving a party for wealthy canines. Accordingly, he ordered his servants to provide me with a basket filled with relishes with which to seek her favors. I brought the basket here instead so that the little Apesters would not want. My master, Phejos, was elected to his office through the financial support of the banker. He now repays him by passing ordinances in his favor and bestowing gifts upon his silly female. Phejos gained the admiration of the rich when, as a member of the Hysterical Legion, he led many violent attacks on the toilers of this burg. He also has accumulated quite a fortune as a cheat poker player for which reason the rich Apevillians regard him as a business genius well trained for the task of his present office. He has, in conjunction with the governor of this province, framed a law which provides that all female workers in the land of Apata are required under penalty of death to marry and give birth to at least three sets of twins. The object of this law is to raise living material for a large army, which is billed to be destroyed in a war already agreed upon. The rulers of this nation fear that they may not have soldiers enough to kill, hence the law providing for larger families. While arguments on this bill were heard in our senate, one of the senators of a liberal tendency dared suggest that the law could not be enforced for biologic reasons because the ape females were by nature uniparous. The senator in question was booed down by the whole nation and his argument dismissed as being "visionary and impractical." I started to write a poem once about my master when I was in company with the sailor who I told you committed suicide some years ago. It went like this:

Oh, Rasnac Phejos, what a fool thou art!
What manner of clay does keep thine ears apart?
How could you live so long,
    yet know so little?
Your mental vacuum is indeed a riddle.

"My friend, you may secretly think me a little short of principle for accepting the hospitality of this MONSTER as you call him; but I ask you, what is a poor dog going to do in this land of Apes?" Without waiting for my reply, he said, "If I don't take it, somebody else surely will; so it may as well be my meal ticket."

I awoke early the morning of my second day in Apeville having slept but little during the night. No need here to explain the reason for my insomnia as it must be obvious to the reader. I returned to the city and found it rustling with the most useless of activities. Useless is hardly the word—the Apevillians were destructuve. I saw several crews engaged in constructing boats of various sizes and dimensions. It was all contract work, and the Apes would work as though possessed by evil spirits. The boats had to be finished at a certain date, the contractor explained; or he would lose money on the deal. I learned that a number of completed boats had been taken down the river early in the morning to be sunk in the Pigsific ocean.

I dared suggest that this was certainly a stupid thing to do after Apes had worked so hard to make them seaworthy. One of the idle Apes, standing by and watching the work like myself, introduced himself as an expert economist and proceeded to show me by various arguments and figures that it was not stupid at all to build boats and sink them afterwards. "Continued employment," he argued, "is the very basis of real prosperity. And what better plan could be found to provide work than building boats and sinking them?"

The contractor favored it because the more boats he built, the more money he made. The Apeville ship Sinking Company favored it because it had a contract on sinking the boats for the City of Apeville. The City Administration favored it because every boat was properly insured, and they collected so much money on every boat sunk. The insurance companies favored it because it gave them a chance to sell more policies to the City of Apeville. Insurance on boats was paid by the City from funds collected through a sales tax on all food products. Even most of the Ape toilers favored this "continuous work progress plan" because as they put it, "without work we would be left to starve to death?"

The Apevillian professor in economics told me, with pride, that it had taken a brain trust five years of scientific study to formulate this plan of continuous work and profit and to frame it in such a way that no one would lose on the industry. This project was initiated by the City of Apeville for the purpose of showing private industry how things could be run for the benefit and in the interest of all Apevillians."

A few blocks from Apeville's northern waterfront was a huge factory manufacturing wooden legs. This was a private enterprise owned and managed by one Ape who had gained monopoly of the business some years ago. It was considered one of Apeville's most respectable businesses, and the owner was highly honored by both church and state. The market for wooden legs was maintained artificially through contracts with logging companies who for certain sums would have the legs of their loggers smashed so as to keep the wooden leg factory running. The logging companies also furnished the wood for the wooden leg manufacturer; so that both had mutual interest in each other's business.

There were some working Apes in the logging camps, who questioned the logic of the wooden leg industry. These were called foreigners because to question anything in Apeville and in the whole country of Apata for that matter was considered a foreign thing to do. Professors in the high institutions of learning in Apeville praised the wooden leg manufacturer and the logging contractors, who furnished him wood material and smashed legs, for the great service they were giving society in providing employment for so many people. Were it not for smashed legs, they argued, all those engaged in wooden leg manufacture would be thrown out of employment. Wooden leg workers agreed that this was certainly a truth that no one could deny.

Cutting off legs was a regular industry in Apeville and there was a leg-cutters union of those who worked at the trade. There was an agreement between this union and the wooden leg manufacturer. This agreement featured a clause providing for leg amputations of all union members who violated any of the rules governing the industry.

This clause pleased the wooden leg manufacturer because he could sell a wooden leg to every offender who survived the operation. It also pleased the union leg cutters because they could have work making the extra wooden legs. The civil courts respected the agreement because of its "common sense" qualities.

The leg cutters union was one of the very few favored by the employers and the local authorities. Even the ferocious Nirtam, governor of the province, was very much pleased with this union and styled it an "association of the Apes that would go far in helping to civilize the world and to bring about a close and more sympathetic relationship between employer and employe."

It may interest the reader to know that in matters of advertisement the Apevillians were every bit as progressive and peptimistic as our western business men. Another most striking similarity between the Apevillians and the westerner is the ready response of the Apevillians to the seductive power of billboard and repeated sales signs. The city was literally plastered with advertising of every conceivable kind and size. Huge billboards showed comely females wearing wooden legs. Huge signs would extol their virtues .

Signs such as these were to be seen everywhere: "For digestion's sake wear a wooden leg." "When weary and despondent, put on your wooden leg." "For that youthful figure, buy a wooden leg." "Remember your dad on Father's Day—buy him a wooden leg." There were other commodities advertised, of course, but the wooden leg industry seemed to have the most imposing signs. Signs such as these did also abound. "Comfortable graves at cut-rate prices—buy your hole in the ground now!" "Let us lose your money—save time. Apeville Losing Insecurity Company." "Drink our poison—Union made—Best in town. Apeville Suicide Supply Company." "Lots in Hell or Heaven cheap—selling out. Buy now on installment plan." "Bombs, Electric Chairs, Machine Guns, Poison Gas, Ropes for Lynching Parties, etc. See Apeville Sunday School Association."

It was a tragic sight, to say the least, to see poor ignorant Apes of both sexes and of all ages hurrying from store to store to buy as though the advertisement they had read were commands of the most high—things which in the end would only serve to injure if not destroy. And it was pathetic, to use a mild term, to see little Apesters playing with electric chairs and poison gas and older Apes giving instructions in the use of them. Youthful and well shaped Apes wearing wooden legs "to boost prosperity;" elderly and sickly ones paying out their hard earned money for lots in heaven sold htem by unscrupulous sharks.

But one thing which moved me more than all else I had seen in Apeville was a parade of young Apevillian males who, bubbling over with a sense of patriotic duty to the lumber industry, were parading up and down the streets wearing wooden heads and carrying banners which urged the populace to increase the use of wooden products.

The reader may want to know who it is possible for any living creature to wear a wooden head and still live? I can only assure you that I am as puzzled as yourself on this question. True, I posed this very question to one of Apeville's most prominent citizens; but he only shrugged his shoulders in a most dismissing manner as much as to say that such a question was too foolish to merit a reply from such a great Ape as he. I shall therefore have to leave the solution of this biologic question to some daring scientific genius, who perhaps inspired by the observations I am now relating will venture a visit to the land of Apata in the interest of scientific research. But whatever may be discovered and explained about the habits and social behavior of Apata's Ape-people in the future, I shall feel completely content with having been the first to report their case in part to the world at large.

monished Matt in his new responsiblities, and started to set example to match his advice. No sooner had he got ahead of the others than it struck him he couldn't be watching them and listening to them if he didn't stay back with the bunch. So every now and then he stopped and sat down to eat berries. But the morning dragged slowly by and not one did he catch doing worse than picking berries a bit dirty. He warned these that the farmer would raise particular Cain if he found them picking them with leaves and little green ones. He felt he had to do this as foreman even if it didn't mean any fine for him to share with the farmer. And their conversation gave him no profitable clues to follow up. The hotter it grew, the less they talked, and when they did talk it was about the heat, and how they would like ice cream sodas, and what they were going to do with their money. Perhaps he would make more money if he went ahead as fast as he could—but then he couldn't find any of them cheating the farmer. He felt as uncomfortable as the unbiased mule that stood midway between the two haystacks.

Down at the crossing the sawmill whistle blew. It was noon, and all took themselves over to some trees by the well to eat their lunch.

With half the day gone, it was time to check what they had earned against what they had hoped to earn. All were disappointed; but their disappointment was not pent up and stopped up as was Matt's. He wouldn't tell the bunch how much better he had expected to make out than he had. He munched his lunch glumly and resolved that if he didn't catch someone inside of an hour, he was going to step on it and pick berries even if he was a foreman incognito, and get at least the dollar that his mind had been set on before the day began.

The hour was up—and still no victim—and it was getting so hot that he didn't feel like putting on more speed. He was a bit ahead of the rest, and stood up to rest his cramped muscles. Bill Riley in the next row looked up to say: "You are always up with the rest and yet you're resting half of the time. How do you do it?"

Matt had a bright idea. He went over to Bill and talked very low: "I don't want all the kids to know it, but there's ways to fool Old Sourpuss. He can't look at every basket we pick. He don't seem to be looking them over at all. And once he takes your basket in, and gives you a slip for them, he can't tell who picked them can he?"

"No," said Bill.

"Well get wise to yourself. Fill some of the bottoms up with leaves and stuff—not too much, but every little bit helps—and then fill it up good on top with berries."

"Is that what you're doing?"

"Sure, but don't tell anybody. See," he added as he got the additional bright idea that the farmer wouldn't find out if he did pull such a trick, "I'm starting off a new box this way."

He went on with his work, and a bit later decided to tip off Walt Gallagher in the other row next him. Walt decided the idea was a mighty fine one. When Bill had got his tray of 12 pint boxes filled and headed up to turn them in, Matt stood up, lifted his hat and scratched his head a bit. John Farmer nodded, and looked Bill's berries over. By the time he had got back, Walt was on his way up, and Matt gave the signal again.

Bill told him what had happened. "Here I picked twelve cents worth, and don't get a penny and get fined a nickle besides." Matt agreed that they'd have to be careful and not get caught. Bill was sore, so Matt decided to comfort him a bit. "I'll tell you how we can get even with Old Sourpuss," he said. There's one trick even better. Get a few extra baskets, knock out the bottoms, and put them in this way so that if he does turn the basket up he'll see a good bottom, and not know but what it's the right one. That'll fool him for sure."

"Boy, that is good," agreed Bill and set to work to vent his indignation in a better trick than ever.

Matt went on with his work and Walt came back to tell him his hard luck story. It was a temptation to spring the double bottom stunt on Walt, but that might look too suspicious to John Farmer. Besides these were the two boys working alongside of him, and there were fourteen boys in the field beside himself. They were at the end of the field now, ready to start back soon, so Matt took advantage of the handy situation to get a couple more here and there started on putting leaves in the bottoms. Of course second offenses paid better—a dime fine and a nickle out of it for himself. He'd have to get them all started at it before they started talking to each other, but they were pretty well spread out by now, so there was still some chance to catch victims.

When Bill went up with his double bottom baskets, Matt gave the signal again, and tapped on the bottom of a basket. A whole nickle earned, he figured to himself right there, and when Bert O'Leary and Bob Cramer, the other two lads that he had got to put leaves in the bottom went up, he signalled once more. Bill figured nothing more sinister out of it all than that there was a Jonah on him, and Matt convinced him not to go talking about it to anyone, or Old Sourpuss might catch on that he was doing it too. Bert and Bob had evidently passed the leaves notion along to some of the other fellows, for John Farmer was catching a couple more that Matt didn't know about, and they were all talking about their offense and the fine and the fact that they didn't get paid for their berries either. Too bad, thought

Matt that it was too late in the afternoon to catch them a second time and get a nickle out of each victim. In fact he figured he had better lay low except for giving a couple more the idea about the phoney bottoms, or else they might supect him.

When he took his own tray of berries up next time he asked the farmer too look some of them over so that the rest of the boys wouldn't wonder why his baskets weren't searched too. He came back to report gleefully to Walt that Old Sourpuss "missed the baskets I phonied up on."

The mill whistle blew one more, and the youngsters figured that since they had started two hours ahead of the mill in the morning they could only work one hour after the men got through. Matt figured he'd have to content himself with eight first offences and three second ones. That made forty cents and thirty cents, seventy cents in fines all told, thirty-five of it for himself, almost as much as he would have earned if he had picked three more trays full. If he filled his tray before quitting time, that would make 72 cents for the berries, and $1.07 for the day. Pretty good he thought to himself—but then again if he'd stepped on it all day he might have made as much and not been worried about the boys finding out about his foreman job. They wouldn't like that a bit.

He finished his tray while most of the boys were still trying to get their last tray for the day filled. He went in with it, and Old Sourpuss wanted to know if he hadn't maybe put some bad ideas in their heads. Matt assured him he hadn't. "It's funny," went on Sourpuss, "they didn't do nothing wrong in the morning—just in the afternoon." But Matt's honest face was most disarming, and the farmer wanted to know what he figured he had coming. "Seventy-two cents for berries, and then I caught eight of them, and three of them the second time." While the farmer was figuring out that the meant thirty-five cents for Matt, Matt was figuring it meant thirty-five cents for Sourpuss, and 12 trays of practically good berries for nothing that he should have paid $1.44 for getting picked.

He doubted if he was getting the best of the bargain at that, and wished the farmer would get through figuring it out before anybody else got around.

The last of the boys got their pay, while all hung around because the farmer promised them a lift to town when he hauled the berries in. On the way they recounted the misfortunes of the day. Matt felt sort of bad about it all, and crossed his fingers in the hopes that they wouldn't figure he had anything to do with their tough luck. But there was Billy Scott talking about how the farmer had looked when he found him cheating the second time, and Matt hadn't known about that at all.

"Say," he asked, "how many of you fellows got fined?" They started checking up—there was Bill Scott, he been caught twice, and so had Bill Riley and so had Walt Gallagher even though he had used leaves both times, and Spud just once, and Ben twice, and . . . well it all added up twelve caught and six of them caught twice. Matt got so indignant that he forgot himself. He was up front in the back of the truck where they rode on top of the crates, and there was an opening up to where Old Sourpuss sat driving. "You old cheat", shrieked Matt," you promised me half of the fines and you know damned well you owe me twenty five cents more. You . . ." and then as he felt himself getting pulled back by the shirt collar he realized what a dead give-away it was. One boy sat on his face while another punched him in the ribs, and a third took his money out of his pocket. When they let him up he managed to turn their wrath against Old Sourpuss himself. "He's the fellow you ought to be sore at. He's got eighty-five cents that he fined you besides the thirty-five cents he gave me, and besides that means 18 trays he didn't pay for picking that's—12 eights are 96—yeh, that's $2.16."

It worked. They were hollering to Old Sourpuss that if he didn't give them back their fines, and pay them for the trays he hadn't paid for, off his damned berries would go in the ditch. They raised so much humpus that Old Sourpuss promised to pay. It gave Matt his chance to slip off —he had to explain at home that he lost all his money out of a hole in his pocket. But that alibi didn't last long. The fact is Matt's "foreman job" made matters so mighty disagreeable for the whole Walters family, that old man Walters decided to pack up and go to Oregon.

United States is at hand: it shows that even after the march of the NRA the disproportion between the purchasing power of the masses and the actual production became greater. And it was precisely in this way that a rise occured in capitalist purchasing power and production advanced temporarily. But to denote as planned economy the further impoverishment of the population is after all a bit strong.

VII.

The various exponents of planned economy are well known. Whatever may be the nature of their particular proposals, they all share with John Dewey the habit of viewing the problem from the side of distribution, even when they speak of production. Various proposals with reference to money, credit, banking, tariff, cartellization, and control of profit are designed to govern the market and, with it, the whole economy according to predetermined plans. The legitimacy of the market, though first rejected, is now to be controlled and again made into the regulator of the social life. However, the market and competition have a meaning only in so long as they work their pernicious effects; if their operations are controlled, they are deprived of their regulating functions and we arrive at the opposite of what we set out to attain. Any market control becomes the privilege of the groups already favored by that market. The individual interests are not governed according to the planning, but this planning can only adapt itself to the existing interests already established as a result of the previous development.

Competition is made responsible for the overdevelopment of the productive apparatus, though it is only this continuing over-development which is the secret of prosperity and its limitation is nothing but the philosophy of crisis. Competition is to be reduced through the further cartellization of enterprises, in spite of the fact that this trustification is a result of competition. It may be true that within the cartels the overproduction of commodities may be hindered (a matter which plays no decisive part). Still the cartellization does not hinder competition between the cartels. Nor does it hinder the overexpansion of the productive apparatus; such overexpansion is facilitated by way of monopoly profits, since each of the cartellized enterprises improves and expands its plants in order to make differential gains and raise its production quota. Capital-formation and control can never be attained from a planning station so long as production remains in private hands. The enterprises as well as the individual monopolies can cross the plans of the central bureau in hundreds of ways and, as a matter of fact, it has been shown in practice that ways have been found for getting around the plans as fast as they were made.

And so, in the face of these numerous contradictions, the planners take refuge in the illusion of a stationary capitalism. However senseless such a demand may be, it is nevertheless the logical consequence of all capitalist planning, which thereby, though of course ruefully, establishes its impossibility. A stationary capitalism is only another name for the permanent crisis: and even here the term fails to hold water, since any permanent crisis can only lead to collapse and is accordingly not stationary. But it is only with a stationary, i. e. illusionary, capitalism that planning is possible, since any revival promptly throws all planning overboard. And if the planners endeavor, nevertheless, to make the impossible possible and, for example, believe that in spite of technical advance it will be possible to hold on to an accepted price level—that is, if they fancy that prices can be juggled with like balls—there is concealed behind these dreams nothing but a total ignorance of the real nature of prices. Technical progress, which changes all values, obviously changes also the prices to be deduced from values; a matter which, in view of the decline of prices which has accompanied the whole of capitalist development, is hardly worth mentioning.

As a proof of the possibility of capitalist planning, we are often referred to the control of economy in countries at war. However, the monopolist economy of war time was only a means to capitalist accumulation, to perpetuating planlessness. A man takes castor oil in order to get well. But it will not occur to him, merely because he can, to live on caster oil exclusively. And yet such mental derangement is actually attributed to capitalism. During the war, the national economy was not subjected to the military necessities, but the military necessities, i. e. the necessities of the strongest capitalist groups interested in the war, subjected all other groups to themselves and forced their will upon them. Here also the technical possibility of planning was not proved, since this economic distatorship remained tied up with the market mechanism.

VIII.

Even though individual theoreticians of planning go so far as to raise the demand for a "World Economic Council," most of their theories stop short with autarchy. The national economy is to be made independent of the movements of the world market. Capitalist society is, however, bound up with international trade, as of course the whole capitalist development is identical with the creation of the world market. From division of labor within the separate nations arose international division of labor, and the latter can no more be got away from than the first. It may be objected here that individual countries, such as the United States, are capable of a self-sufficing economy by reason of their manifold natural wealth and are to be distinguished from countries less blessed. Nevertheless the very possibility of autarchy at the same time precludes it as an actuality. The very diversity of the geographic, climatic and cultural conditions of the United States are an obstacle to their unified coordination, for this diversity, under capitalism, is nothing other than a multiplicity of mutually hostile interests which are not very distinguishable from those of the continent of Europe, even though their forms are different. However small may be the part of foreign trade in statistics, it is nevertheless a question of life and death to whole social groups. However decisive may be the domestic market, when over-accumulation sets in the imperialistic compulsion becomes the dominant factor, for the insufficient profit at home compels to the conquest of additional sources of profit. While as regards industry, autarchy is impossible even in "war manufacture," so as regards agriculture, as the best experts bear witness, it is quite out of the question. Planned economy and capitalism are irreconcilable contradictions; the one excludes the other. If an economy is planned, then it has also ceased to be a capitalist economy.

I. W. W. PREAMBLE

The working class and the employing class have nothing in common. There can be no peace so long as hunger and want are found among millions of working people and the few, who make up the employing class, have all the good things of life.

Between these two classes a struggle must go on until the workers of the world organize as a class, take possession of the earth and the machinery of production, and abolish the wage system.

We find that the centering of the management of industries into fewer and fewer hands makes the trade unions unable to cope with the ever-growing power of the employing class. The trade unions foster a state of affairs which allows one set of workers to be pitted against another set of workers in the same industry, thereby helping defeat one another in wage wars. Moreover, the trade unions aid the employing class to mislead the workers into the belief that the working class have interests in common with their employers.

These conditions can be changed and the interest of the working class upheld only by an organization formed in such a way that all its members in any one industry, or in all industries, if necessary, cease work whenever a strike or lockout is on in any department thereof, thus making an injury to one an injury to all.

Instead of the conservative motto, "A fair day's wage for a fair day's work", we must inscribe on our banner the revolutionary watchword, "Abolition of the wage system."

It is the historic mission of the working class to do away with capitalism. The army of production must be organized, not only for the everyday struggle with capitalists, but also to carry on production when capitalism shall have been overthrown. By organizing industrially we are forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old.

Solidarity in the I. W. W. means unity with industrial freedom, not industrial slavery; it means a fellowship of all the workers organized in a One Big Union to direct their own activities. It does not mean a great aggregation of workers herded together in a "labor front" under the direction of a dictator.

The C. I. O. is not like the I. W. W., it is not a One Big Union, it does not practice class solidarity; it permits one section of a union to scab on another even to a greater extent than does the A. F. of L. It is not "a step in the right direction," it is, rather, an aid to fascism.

Take the I. W. W. road for your own betterment and the emancipation of your class.

THE RIGHT TO WORK

It may be true, as many employers under pressure of union demands for higher wages are preaching, that the "right to work is sacred." We are not trying to pass judgement on what is and what is not sacred. But it does seem certain that no one's right to work extends so far that it becomes just and proper for him to do so much work that there is not enough left for the other fellow.

Neither does the right to work, if it exists at all, carry with it the privilege of cheapening work so that it becomes impossible for anyone to live on the wages paid for it.

Nor does the right of the individual to work together with other people go so far that he is immune from interference by his fellow workers as to the conditions under which he exercises his right.

Granting the right to work, we maintain that what is needed is a strong I. W. W. union on every job through which the workers can regulate the conditions under which the work is done; and we believe that this regulation of work through the union should be extensive and effective enough to govern the working habits of the individual worker. In other words that a man's right to work should be subject to the control of his own union so that the work-hog and the simple minded person who is willing to leave everything to the boss will not hold back progress toward the workers' commonwealth.

We might ask—though it has been asked before: What becomes of the right to work when the employer closes down his plant? You know the answer. The right to work is changed into the right to look for a job.

Let's get the four-hour day and make 'em like it.

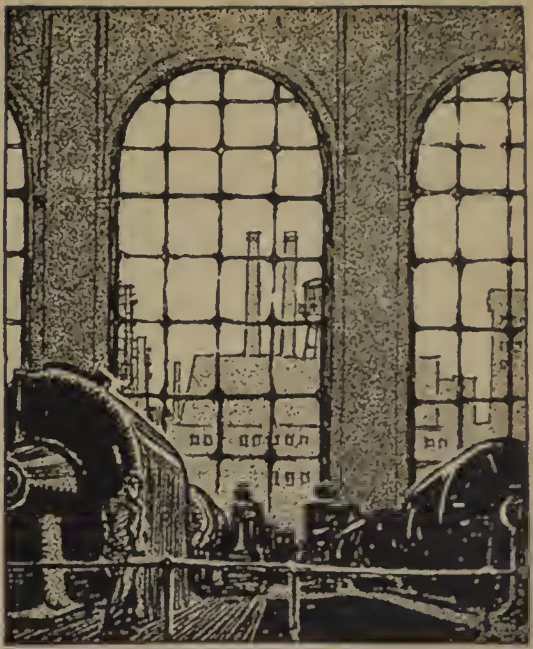
Noise-- An Intolerable Working Condition



By JOHN SERSHON

. . . . "might gague a man's intellectual capacity by the degree of his intolerance of unnecessary noise."—Herbert Spencer.
. . . . "a torture to intellectual people, and the true murderer of thought."
—Schoppenhauer.

Civilization, if it is at all worthy of the term, needs as a first requisite, healthful and happy living conditions. Culture, refinement, and the removal from savagery that the word "Civilization" denotes are abstractions if those conditions are not generally possible.

Health and happiness are dependent upon many things for their realization; the houses we live in, the bodies we are born with, the clothes we wear, the food we eat, the kind of work we do, and everything in our environment which is conducive to an agreeable or a disagreeable personal response.

Some things in our environment, such as climate and heredity it is not possible, at present, to predetermine, but most of the socio-economic conditions can be readily changed. That beneficial change is such a laggard when the knowledge for change has long been at hand is an outstanding characteristic of capitalism.

How capitalistic poverty, disease, crime, ignorance and war trample rough-shod over intelligence to the detriment of civilization, are subjects which have been treated with some adequacy (though insufficient) by generations of writers. Other subjects which are subordinate phases of these are either badly neglected or forgotten entirely. The condition of "noise" is such a subject.

A Machine Product

The Industrial Revolution with its increasing use of machinery brought many disagreeable things in its wake including noise. It is gradually becoming recognized as a public health problem, which as Engineer Stephen E. Slocum says, "will, within a generation, vie with disease unless the same mechanical ingenuity that has called the mechanical robot into existence shall be able to endow it with a soul of quiet."

Medical authorities have long realized the deleterious effects of noise and in some cases have made strong protestations against it, but though noise already vies with disease, little has been done in the way of its effective control. Hodge-podge individualism, as usual, finds only superficial ways to prevent the nuisance of "unwanted auditory stimulation." Nevertheless great credit must be given to those individuals who in the face of our unsocial "system," have tried to make life under capitalism more tolerable.

The first serious attempt (of any noteworthy extent) for the reduction of noise was begun in October 1929 by Commissioner of Health, Shirley W. Wynne of New York City with the appointment of the "Noise Abatement Commission." The commission comprised a large group of technicians engineers, and medical men from different branches of that profession. A survey of New York City was made to obtain all the possible facts about noise—its source, its intensity, its effect and its abatement. Some of the results and findings of the commission are included in this article.

Psychologist Donald A. Laird, conducting independent tests at Colgate university found that "four expert typists typing a standard letter over and over increased their speed under quieted conditions to 7.4 percent for the fastest typist, 3.6 percent for the second fastest, .08 percent for the next to the slowest, with no increase for the slowest. The energy expended under noisy conditions showed an average increase for all subjects of 71 percent during typing as compared with resting period, while under quieted conditions the average increase was only 51 percent. The fatigue effect was shown by the fact that under quieted conditions the average time for the last five letters at the close of the two-hour period required seven seconds less than for the first five letters, while in the noisy phase the average time for the last five letters was five seconds more."

The difference of 20 percent increase of energy output shown in this test is a demonstration of the increased fatigue that millions of factory workers undergo because of noise. Noise of between 80 and 90 decibels (deafening or close to deafening) is common in many factories, many others having 100 decibels or more.

Normal Man Dreads Noise

E. L. Smith and Laird found that noise of 80 to 90 decibels decreased normal stomach contractions by 37 percent, which accounts for the hostility with which workers regard running machinery during the lunch period.

Watson (Behaviorist) is authority for the statement that noise and falling are the only two things feared by a new-born infant.

Smith and Laird considered the physical reaction of noise as a "fear response," since the muscular tension and attendant effects were so similar. This fear-response inherited from our ancestors who were conditioned to fear noise as the approach of danger, surely must super-impose a most terrific strain upon the worker striving with might and main under a scientific speedup and the glowering eye of the bosses. That is indeed the case as is amply proved by R. Nyssen and J. Helmsmoort, Jr., whose report shows that "intense auditory excitation directly increases arterial pressure." Or by Dr. Morgan whose experiment at Northwestern University showed that fifty subjects at work reading a paragraph, to keep minds at work (with noise) caused an increase in breathing while speed decreased.

Professor A. T. Poffenberger's metabolic studies show that "the extra effort caused by noise creates an extra strain on the nervous system, a final reduction of capacity for sustained work, clear-thinking, and energetic action."

More spectacular, in a sense, were the revelations of Dr. Foster Kennedy of the New York commission. Several patients, otherwise in perfect health, whom past operations had left with part of the skull-bone removed and the scalp replaced, were used in the tests. "An accurate written record of the pressure of the brain was made by placing a small drum containing a partial vacuum over the soft spot area of the head. This was painless to the subject. One of the experiments, in which paper bags were burst, raised the brain pressure to four times the normal for several seconds. Thereafter this pressure, though not remaining as high, did not come back to normal until thirty seconds had passed." Sudden noise, it was found, raised the brain pressure more than morphine and nitroglycerine, the most powerful drug shocking agents.

A Menace to Health

In factories where workers were subjected to loud noises both the temporary effects of fatigue and the permanent impairment of health and hearing ware produced by the exposure.

From the imperative emissions of the factory whistle (the constant reminder of working-class servitude), to the turning of wheels, the grinding, drilling, scrapping, and pounding of a hundred different kinds of lathes and dropforge hammers; the factory is producing, along with its products, "neurasthenic and psychoasthenic" human wreckage of great loss to a possible civilization.

N. Losanoff, who used rabbits and dogs in his nail factory experiments, found inner-car lesions resulted from the intense noise. The experiments of Wittmaack and Yoshii with guinea pigs under boiler-making conditions caused inflammation of the inner-ear. Similar effects are produced in human beings in thousands of factories, close to thirty different trades at the present time causing deafness.

"Impairment of hearing caused by continuous moderate occupational noise develops gradually and it at first heardly noticed. In the beginning, many workers do not feel the influence of noise in the workroom. Examination by an ear specialist often reveals the impairment of hearing in such persons not aware of their injury." (Ger. Soc. of Indus. Hygiene, 1929.)

The noise of industry can be alleviated or arrested in several different ways. Buildings can be sound-proofed greatly by the use of any soft material used as wall and ceiling covers, or by painted or decorated sheets of steel backed by felt, and perforated to break up sound waves. Sheets of fibre-board (also perforated) can be made of the refuse of sugar cane stalks (bagasse) or cornstalks, etc. Everything within the building from the windows to the ventilation ducts must be insulated, while the machinery itself must be treated to prevent vibration. The distribution of machines and the machine foundation are equally important (formula by Walter Ritter, German technician). Silent chains, noiseless gears, etc., can easily replace noisy parts. Sound-proofing can reduce noise by as much as fifty percent, but where it is not in use, insurance indemnity should be paid, either by the state or by the employer to the workers deafened or otherwise incapacitated by the neglect.

The Remedy

In addition to the above, there are several different "ear-defenders" which can be used to directly protect the ear, the "Tommy" (English artillery), Mallock-Armstrong instrument, and the wax cones used both by swimmers and Italian gunners. The simplest protection is to use cotton, wool or rolled gauze saturated in glycerin with the air bubbles squeezed out (air carries sound) or vaseline worked in.

Incessant noise in the laboring class neighborhoods, with the resultant fear-response muscular tension, has been advanced seriously by medical men as an important cause for crime and accidents. Jazz music and the lack of appreciation of true beauty is also attributed to noise. "In thirty percent of the schools in New York City some classrooms were found to have been made useless by noise; in this city alone noise was interfering with the education of 477,400 children." Hospitals also are notoriously noisy and a long article could be written on the harm to the sleeper, the growth of children, and the invalids.

Streetcars, elevated and subway trains, and automobile traffic are the main cause for outside noise. Methods have been found which will eliminate most of them, but since profits are involved little is done.

Protection from noise, increasing the efficiency of the worker and the profits of the employer, may stimulate the employer to make use of it, but for his own health and happiness the worker should insist upon it. He should organize his insistence in One Big Union of the working class so that he will be sure of his results; One Big Union that will rebuild the homes and workplaces and cities of the nation so that, among other things, there will be reasonable quiet.

I Decide to Become a Wobbly

By A SEAMAN

For eighteen years I have joined, worked on, and sailed ships. Through the course of my wanderings I had circled the globe a number of times. As a result I learned the location of many bar-rooms, shelters, hide-outs, and places of ill repute. Places where one can get into trouble and out of trouble, as well; places where one can drink, curse, fight; where one can do as others do, or set the pace for others to follow; places where everything goes and nothing is barred.

I have been on the beach in some of the major ports and on the beach in some that are seldom used for a port of call. These experiences taught me much,—a hard school but a practical one.

While I was never keen on observation, many events did impress themselves indelibly on my mind. Nothing possessed great enough importance to cause me undue worry or thought. I have witnessed and taken part in brawls that resulted in serious injury to some and death to others, the weapons used by the combatants depending upon the geographical location—knives, guns, clubs, feet, etc.

It seems that when ashore the foremost thoughts in mind are of ships, and when at sea the topic of discussion was usually something that happened while ashore. Ashore or at sea I always added my bit by narrating certain episodes to the delight and interest of some, and to the evident disgust of others, which did not mean a thing to me, for my memories were precious.

In my travels I have met men of all discriptions, from all parts of the world and from all walks of life. I have been shipmates with college graduates and illiterates, with men who spent the major portion of their working lives in offices, and with others from factories, mines, and fields; some were sons of the rich but most of them were sons of the poor, and there were some who were labeled as sons of— well, taking them all in all, they were a representative section of homo sapiens. Some of those men were rational and spoke with conviction while others spoke merely to make a noise.

As for the ships, wages went up and down; on some the hours were long and the work was hard; the food, living conditions and quarters were lousy. There were others that, in comparison, were fair. On most ships there would be at least one man who would insist on discussing the difference between ships. And the question was often enough raised as to why all ships should not be good ships, with high wages, shorter hours, the best of food, easier work, larger crews, large confortable quarters and good living conditions generally.

We Talk Strike

I placed little stock in those arguments; others did. I favored no union. I preferred to stand alone but with my mind made up that I'd be ready to help anyone of them when occasion demanded.

My last ship was outbound for Philadelphia. On it there were a few wobblies. They brought up the subject of the impending strike along the West Coast. They spoke also, and at great length, of how the East and Gulf Coasts would benefit by striking at the same time. These Wobblies warned the rest of the crew to be ready to leave the ship when it docked, should word be received that a strike was under way.

I told them that I could be counted on at a moment's notice.

Sparks told the gang that the West Coast had some out on October 29. The watch below were all mustered in the sailors' foc'sle and a meeting was held on the proposition that the entire crew take a definite stand on piling off the tub. The matter was threshed out under the guidance of the Wobs who were the only union men aboard.

The tub docked November 2. Immediately a Wob dashed ashore for information. When he returned all members of the crew who were not work bound mustered in the foc'sle to listen to his report. He reported that a sympathy strike was called in all ports of the East and Gulf Coasts. From the strike headquarters the orders are to see whether the majority of the men are willing to come off. If so, then to declare the ship as struck; if not then wait for more news. From the Marine Transport Workers hall (IWW) the word was to strike the ship immediately. "You all know what we agreed upon at sea," said the Wobblies, "pack up and hit the docks."

The Wobs were all set. I helped convince a few doubters that it would be best for them to get off. All the unlicenced men did get off. The licenced men promised to do the same—three of them did.

Down at strike headquarters all was confusion and hub-bub. Too many men trying to do each other's work. The headquarters was located at the MFOW hall at the start. The strike was called by no one union. Men from all the unions, and men who belonged to no unions responded. For that reason a lot of the strikers thought it best to have the headquarters removed to some hall that did not carry the banner of any particular union. That was done as soon as funds on hand permitted.

On The Picket Line

I was dispatched with four others to picket a dock with orders to stay until relieved. Upon arrival at the dock we saw men coming out of and going into the piers. Thinking that all men were to be stopped from returning to the ships I started to accost them. My mates told me to leave all men come and go, to say nothing to them. If I did then no backing would be offered. That was hard to understand. For the remainder of the watch my mates were studied. The conclusions were not pleasant. Two had not been to sea at all. The other two questioned the reasons for striking.

The relief watch had orders to sand like wooden Indians and await their relief from duty. At strike headquarters an explanation was demanded. Seven hastened to advise. Each one contradicted the other. I did not know what in hell to do. So I searched further for advice. Then I had someone explain the meaning of "direct action."

The next watch was quiet; except for the appearance of the prowl car and the voice of the law who told the watch to "Beat it, your strike is not legal." After searching me he said, "What the hell are you on strike for?" You are not a union man. If I see you again I'll run you in." He was informed that he would see me again.

Headquarters had the news on hand before we came back from the waterfront. They told all men to "Stay there regardless of what the cops say. If they run you in we will jerk you out in an hour." The first lock-ups netted ten men. Four Wobs, four West Coast men and two ISU men. One Wob got 30 days. The other three Wobs and the four West Coast men got ten days each. The two ISU men shook hands with the magistrate and promised to be good. They went free. Many more were to be arrested. A large majority served their sentences . . . all of them arrested for the heinous crime of striking and picketing. When they came out it was right back to the picket lines.

From that day on things got lively. Scabs who were brave or careless at the beginning were rather hard to find after a few finks slipped on bannana, peelings and had to be taken to hospitals for treatment of bruises. In the days to follow so many finks hurt themselves that it became impossible for finks to be recruited to replace them on board ships. Efforts were made to man the ships, of course. What few finks boarded a ship had to be escorted by members of the police force on foot or in cars.

I saw two finks delivered to the docks in prowl cars. Two other scabs in a large packing case, on a truck with a cop as guard, and in other ways. I'll never forget the faces of the cops who stood watch for the Merchants and Miners Line. If a scab wanted a drink or smokes—a cop would escort him to a dump close by, and wait until the louse was ready to return to the ship. The good cops were always on hand. The same escorts were used by the United Fruit Co. for its faithful employees.

Some outfits would not trust to the watchfulness of the coppers. Beer, whiskey, supplies and women were brought on board ships for the scabs. Cops were beneath the level of the women, whom they protected. The limbs of the law, in all their majesty, accepted cigars, whiskey and cash from the company agent; and from the finks too.

The Wobblies For Me

I was close by when Haiman was shot in the leg by a Burns cur. I rushed over to aid others in blocking the escape of the louse who used the gun. I with five Wobs tried to get at the fink herder. We did not succeed or now he would still be recuperating. I heard Haiman address the rat and say, "If you'll lay down your gun, you son of a bitch, I'll punch your ears down."

And I knew Johhy Kane who was shot and died from it in Houston. And Haley who was knifed in Galveston. And the many Wobs who took their bits during the strike and grinned.

I knew Kane, Haiman and Haley for years. Was shipmates with them and other Wobs. This strike has borne out all that they told me. This strike has proven to me that the organization to which they belong is right in its teachings; that its members possess plenty of savvy and the guts to tell others about it. And so I have joined them to carry on in the struggle.

I want to mention one more man and pay tribute to him for his strike activity though he belonged to no union. His name is Mike Pashak. He was arrested, promised defense, at the last minute his counsel (ILD shysters) disappeared. He was given five to ten years . . . handed a stretch because he defended himself against the attack of a hoosier who was prompted to start it. Mike Pashak worked in the interest of the strikers—which is more than can be said for the LEADERS who forsook him in his hour of need.

AINT IT SO!

Cent by cent and dime by dime,
Swift away the dollars flow;
Count 'em fast or count 'em slow,
That is how the dollars go.

From our pockets, how they hie,
How the dollars slip and fly!
How we hustle, how we slave,
From the cradle to the grave;
How for them, until we die,
All God's children scheme and lie!
Dime by dime and cent by cent,

That is how my dollars went:
'Fore I got 'em they were spent!
Count 'em fast or count 'em slow
Lordy, how the dollars go!

PRODUCTION FOR USE

By COVINGTON HALL

(Being an open letter to the editor of the Jamestown (N. D.) Sun.)

In a recent editorial titled "Production for Use—its real meaning," the edtitor of the SUN has this to say:

"The next time you hear some one talking about "production for use," stop and think it over. A moment's reflection will show you "that all production is for use, and that the phrase, unless further explained, simply doesn't mean anything."

Evidently the editor has not paused to take the "moment's reflection" he advises others to, else he certainly would not assert so confidently that "all production is for use"; for, under the present economic system, generally known as Capitalism, nothing is produced for use.

True, all commodities produced must have a use value if they are to find a market; but, under Capitalism, goods are not produced for use but to be sold at a profit. No profit in producing, no goods produced, as the present "depression" and all past panics prove beyond controversy. In other words, the driving force behind production under Capitalism is the profit hoped to be made by private individuals and corporations and not the use values of the commodities, either to society or to individuals. Necessarily, by the very laws of its being, Capitalism takes count only of the market. If it considers use at all, it considers it only from the standpoint of what can be sold, of how much the market can absorb at a profit to the capitalist.

If that profit is not there, then no matter how direly consumers may need commodities, no goods will be produced. Worse, usuable goods will be wantonly destroyed, as they have been in this country and all over the socalled civilized world during the past two decades. Capitalism will produce only such goods as can be sold at a profit and, as all recent evidence proves, will bring about an artificial scarcity to maintain profit, even though by so doing millions are faced with homelesseness and hunger. No, under the present insane economic "system" nothing is produced for use. All our magnificent natural resources and all our splendid machinery of production, distribution and exchange will lie idle unless the private owners of the people's capital can make a profit off the people's needs and toil. From first to last the history of the monstrous system styled Capitalism bears witness to the fact that profit and not use is the motive behind all production under it.

The "Real Meaning"

In dealing with "production for use," the editor assumes to state "its real meaning." No where does he do so. Referring to the proposals of "Socialists, Communists, and various shades of radicals, he asserts: "But the object is precisely the same in both cases, to produce as many goods as possible and distribute them as widely as possible." That is not so.Capitalism never has and never will "produce as many goods as possible," for, to do so, would bankrupt the system. Its beneficiaries, I repeat, produce only as "many goods" as "can be sold at a profit. No profit, no goods; and, if this is not an assertion based on known facts, then why the closing down of fields, factories, mills, mines, banks, etc., etc., with the resultant DISemployment of millions of willing workers and the resultant bankrupting of millions of farmers and merchants during the "depression" that began in the Autumn of 1929 and is still with us, despite the strenous efforts of the "New Deal" administration to make "an evil tree bring forth good fruit"? The truth is there for all to see who use their brains for the purpose Father God or Mother Nature, as you choose, gave it to men and women for—to think with.

Profit is the sole motivating power behind Capitalist production and distribution of goods. The Capitalists themselves freely admit it, nay, they falsely assert that our Constitution "guarantees" it to them. It does nothing of the sort, the Supreme Court to the contrary notwithstanding. The Constitution merely guarantees the socalled "right of private property," not that it shall be profitable. Our forefathers were not that insane. Further, the gigantic corporations that today dominate the entire life of the American people are not private but public institutions; and when we allow them to be used as instruments for producing private profit for schemers and gamblers, it speaks ill for our intelligence.

"Who Has Done Better?"

But "who has done better" than the Capitalists? querys the editor, citing the wide distribution of mortgaged autos, radios, telephones, refrigerators and other gadgets. Granted that Capitalism has done all he claims, what of it? Are not the masses of men entitled to share in all the accomplishments of modern science, especially when it was the labor of these masses that alone made possible the wide distribution of these good things? And speaking of "much cheaper electric light bulbs," why didn't the editor or his "big electric company" in their advertisements tell the home folks that a bulb has been invented that will not burn out and, further, that the power trust has bought up the invention and "frozen" it, lest profit disappear from the bulb industry?

If anything should make the "common people" discontented with their lot, with their everlasting insecurity in a land of potential plenty, it is this everlasting carping on how many more gadgets and robots we can use as compared to our forefathers and mothes. What if the King of France in the year 900 did squat on a wooden stool throne while in 1937 John Farmer, Bill Miner and Jim Fastoryhand can luxirate in an imitation mahogany chair? Does that in any way justify Capitalism for all the insecurity, misery, war, famine and homelessness it has inflicted on society? I leave that for those who think for themselves to answer.

For USE, Not Profit

"All very well," you say. "Denunciation is easy. But, just what do you mean by 'Production for Use'?" Your question is justified.

By Production for Use we mean an economic system the direct reverse of Capitalism. First, we mean leaving in the hands of those who render useful service to society the purchasing power they alone create. This we aim to accomplish by paying to each individual worker, whether of "hand or brain," the full social value of his or her labor or service. We are certain this can be achieved if the American people declare their natural resources and socialized industries common property and, thereby, abolishing rent, interest and profit, the three great use-ries that are the prime cause of panics, disemployment, bankruptcy and war.

Receiving the full social value of their toil, the producers of goods and services will be enabled to buy back from each other value for value, thus ridding themselves forever from the fear of "overproduction," the alleged cause of all Capitalist panics, wars and revolutions. Under such a system, there will be no need for "public functionaries hired by the State to make decisions" for any of us. Holding in our own hands the purchasing power we alone created, we, the People, will automatically and individually make our own decisions as to what we shall spend our incomes for.

Second, there is a vast gulf between the Co-operative Commonwealth and the Capitalist State. The first is a Social Organization, the second is a Class Institution. Neither can be operated by the administrative machinery of the other, as witness the failure of the attempts of the "New Dealers" to gain co-operative good by means of capitalistic methods. It has not worked, and will not, as witness the fear openly expressed by Secretary Wallace and others high in the "New Deal" lest the bumper crops of cotton, wheat, corn, etc., now coming on the market plunge the country into another and far worse "depression." No. Capitalism cannot be mended; it must be ended if the human Race is not to starve, physically and spiritually, in the midst of boundless abundance.

Third and last, if this be Socialism, then I answer that the only question before the American people today is, not "whether we shall have Socialism or not," but whether the Socialism that is ALREADY here shall be an Industrial Democracy or an Industrial Autocracy—whether we shall preserve the principles of democracy by carrying them into the gigantic trust corporations that today dominate the lives of all of us and, by so doing, democratize the corporation and, thus, overthrow Kingship in its last stronghold—in industry and banking.

To accomplish this—the overthrow of Kingship in industry—is the purpose of production for use. The piddling Politician as well as the plundering Plutocrat must go if the People are to do what President Roosevelt and many of the ablest enginers now say we can do—conquer poverty.

That, to end poverty in the United States, to abolish insecurity and hunger of soul and body in a land of plenty is the aim of all—and there are now millions of us—who are organizing to bring about production for use by declaring the United States an Industrial Democracy.

We who have to depend on incomes derived from wages and salaries and who, according to President Roosevelt, now number "Ninety per cent of the American people"—we no longer have any interest in maintaining the "right of private property" in the common means of life. All our welfare and, therefore, all our interests call for its abolishment in order that our JOBS and the incomes derived therefrom be made secure. To secure this, it is our intention to bring about an economic system whereby goods will be produced for consumer use and not for the private profit of Uncrowned Kings.

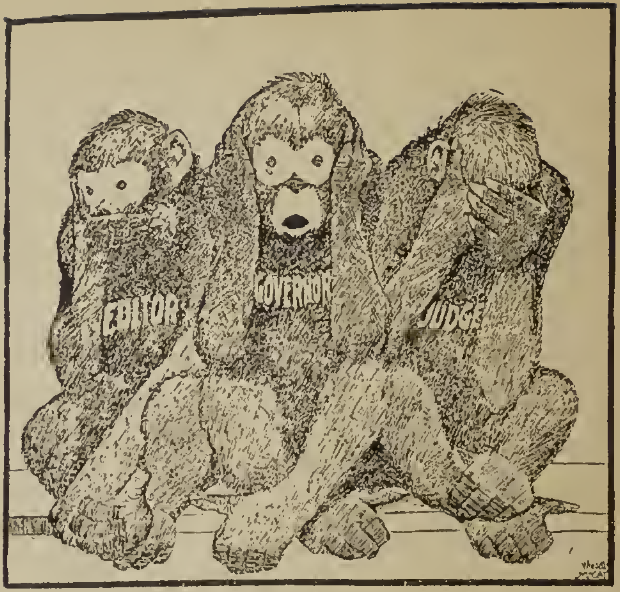
Finally, we have no intention in "escaping the tender mercies of the Plutocrats to fall under the loving kindness of the Politicians." That is why we stress forever the idea of Industrial Democracy, economic freedom, without which all other freedoms are vanities of vanities.

Let's end poverty before it ends us. We CAN DO IT.

Another Letter From Apeland

By

CARD NO. x-141738



It is Sunday morning in the city of Apeville., All is quiet save an occasional groan from devout worshippers. It is not just an ordinary Sunday. On the contrary, it is my good fortune to be in Apeville to observe the annual crowning of the most successful priest of the year. This is the greatest religious celebration ever in Apeville. Apes come from near and far to view the magnificent splendor of the church; to partake of the wisdom that flows from the lips of eloquent priests; to have a multitude of sins forgiven them (for a fair price) and to receive the blessings of the saintly, if the payment be large enough.

I now wish to conduct the reader to the Temple of the Holy Apes. It is a large prison-like structure (viewed from the outside) occupying a whole city block. Its seating capacity is 10,000. The altar is of solid gold. The walls are covered here and there by costly drapery. Between these are paintings, by Apata's masters, representing imps chased by vertuous angels, martyrs getting their heads chopped off, saints with long whiskers etc.

At exactly 10 A. M. the sounding of a gong announces the begining of the ceremony. The congregation rises and chants a moanful melody, led by an ape wearing a single black robe reaching to his feet. Next they get down on the floor, put their feet back of their necks while an automatic praying machine (resembling our phonograph) prays for them at the rate of 250 words per minute. After twenty minutes of mechanical praying they occupy the pews again but only for a minute; the church organ thunders forth music of some sort at which time they rise singing in a monotone a melody without words. The services are gradually working up to a climax. Now the music stops. Ten priests, wearing two black robes one on top of the other, come down the isles sprinkling something on the crowd. But it is not water—believe it or not, it is fleas, holy fleas.

In the land of Apata fleas are holy and woe to the Ape who is caught killing one.

While the priests are thus engaged, worshippers open their garments to better allow the holy fleas to enter; they sway their bodies from side to side, all the while singing in a low voice:

"Praised be the flea from whom sweet blessing flow.
Praised be the flea in voices soft and low."

After half an hour the fleas are properly received and their praises roundly sung. A gong is now sounded three times. Eight priests dressed in three black robes one on top of the other, enter the stage and take their places four on each side on the first elevation next to the altar.

I must tell you before I forget that the stage consist of three elevations. On the uppermost elevation is a throne. In front of the lowest is the altar.

Now the gong is sounded four times and six priests, wearing four black robes one on top of the other, take their station on the second elevation of the stage. They turn their backs to the audience, bow deeply and line up three on each side. The gong is sounded again, five times, but much louder than before. Four priests wearing five black robes enter the stage and take their places next to the throne after having bowed as the previous ones. We are approaching the climax of the ceremony. Apevilles greatest is about to enter.

The audience await him in eager suspense. He has promised to speak words of wisdom relative to the times, depressions, strikes, wars and so on. All eyes are fixed on the door on the left side of the stage from which he is expected to emerge. There is not a whisper in the crowd; not a sound except that of fleas changing locations. (Apeville fleas are a lot noisies than ours). At last the sounding of the gong. The audience rise. The door on the left side opens and in steps an old ape dressed in so many robes that he resembles a huge cabbage head. He walks majestically to the throne. The two priests nearest assist him to the throne. After he is seated the other two proceed to remove his shoes then kiss his feet with a smacking of the lips. This done the great priest raises his hands heavenwards, blinks his eyes, then speaks with long drawn out syllables singing-like; "Ee-ni-e mee-nie mi-nie mo." The six priests on the second elevation of the stage sing out in a chorus; "Aint it the truth" whereupon the eight next to the altar reply with one stentorian "AMEN."

This ends the great priest's contribution of wisdom. A crown of gold is placed upon his head after which he retires from the stage. The audience now arise upon signal from the dignitaries on the stage; the organ pours out thunderous music, and for one full hour they sing praises and hallelujas to the learned priest who has, by the words "eenie meenie minie mo," contributed so much wisdom to apekind."

The following day the Apeville News comes out with a special issue filled with more praises and hallelujas to the "learned one, who by the magic words has made of Apeville a beaconlight casting its rays of learning to the four corners of the globe. (In Apeville, by order of its mayor all globes have four corners). Never has Apeville ever heard such a profound lecture delivered with such eloquence" etc.

From my good friend Mush I learned the secret of the great priest's success. He held a monopoly of the soulsaving business in Apeville. Had already made a fortune on it. Had started branching out his monopoly to other cities. Was now on his way to become Jehovasson's (Jehovasson is the undisputed god of all Apatans) personal advisor for the whole country. Small wonder that he was crowned as the most successful priest in Apeville.

Anyone with the writer's point of view would naturally experience a feeling of indscribable disgust after having witnessed such folly as I did that day in the Temple of the Holy Apes. To see a priest of such obviously limited intellectual qualifications held up as a paragon, and still nourish hope for a better Apekind, would have required a stronger belief in the apes' ability to progress than I at that moment could claim. I felt an urge to solitude. I wanted to get away from it all. Thus, on the afternoon following my day in the temple, I started hiking away from Apeville toward a timberlined horizon.

Scarce had night checked my retreating strides before I was overtaken by Mush, who, I learned, was on his way to the "outlaws' convention" which was being held at that time some 30 miles from where we met, down deep in the forest. He proposed that I go with him there the following day. To this I readily agreed. "Anywhere to get away from Apeville." We arrived there 7:30 p. m. the next day. My heart was all aflutter with expectations of new but more pleasant excitements.

It was here at the "outlaws' convention" that my hope in Apekind's changeability to the better was reborn. The convention was attended by some fifty serious looking apes. They had met to consider ways and means of ushering in a better society for apes to enjoy. They were for this very reason called "outlaws," "reds," "foreigners," "bandits," "freethinkers," "blasphemers," "radicles," "nuts," "rebels," "god-killers," and so on. Constituted authority would destroy them at once could they only find them.

Some of the delegates spoke a refined and cultivated language. Some were very emotional and oratorical in their addresses. Others employed the simple parlance of the lowly. But all of them impressed me as being honest about their tasks and also highly intelligent. My attention has been called to the need for brevity but I do wish to report one speech which stirred me more then the others. The speaker was introduced as a delegate for the agricultural workers. Here it is:

"Listen to me you gloomy looking, long and short-tailed apes. Some of you mugs are getting impatient because we aint making enough progress with the muttonheads. But I am a telling you that Apeville wasn't built in a day and you aint a going to get socialism in a day neither.

"The monkeys in the Valley aint ready for no revolution yet. We can't have a revolution and stop all this monkey business until the apes are ripe for it. And the apes won't get ripe until we make 'em that way.

"Some of you grey-whiskered stiffs aren't going to live long enough to see it; but I am a telling you that one of these days there is going to be hell-a-popping in this country. And look out! When these guys finally wake up and shake the holy fleas out of their tails we are going to go places—and how!

"Where is it we are going? We are going as far toward an ideal system as we got strength enough to go. That calls for a lot of educational work on our part. Because our strength will depend, not only on numbers, but also on how much knowledge there is in the bunch. These monkeys has got to be told where to go and how to get there. Otherwise they will be like two blind monkeys leading each other by the tail and both pulling in the opposite direction. Can't get nowhere that way.

"Now I proposes that we take a day off tomorrow to boil up (wash clothes). Then the next day we should each return to his field and carry on from where we left off before we came here.

"I propose a strike be called against all ship sinking companies to determine how many apes are opposed to solving the unemployment problem that way. For it stands to reason that as long as they are in favor of sinking ships just to have something to do that they are not quite ready for a revolutionary change.

"I propose that we make a determined effort to prove to all and sundry that fleas aint holy at all. Of course, for myself, I would be in favor of killing them as I come to 'em, but you know, and I know, that such a radical policy would not go over with the masses at this time.

"I finally propose that Mush here and this stranger—pointing at me— be made honorary members of our Order."

There was storming applause at the termination of this speech and rightly so for he had spoken wisely, this all agreed to.

In the beginning of this copy I said that the Apevillians resembled us in a great many respects. From the above related case it may be seen that there are tendencies at work in Apeville and in Apata which resemble certain tendencies in our own society generally, though it is apparent that there is great difference in the details.

I have much hope for Apeville and for Apata for within their borders struggle noble souls. It may take a long time but with the untiring efforts of the outlaws they shall have a better civilization. I hope to return to Apeville some day to find happier apes at work and play. Who knows but what they will be able to get along without fleas and monkey business some of these days.

MIGRATING WORKERS

By B. R.

Though they are now without organization their clannishness will some day be directed into channels that will make them a potent force in the abolition of the evil conditions they have helped bring about.

MARYSVILLE, Calif.—"Go west, young man," advised a New York journalist sometime in the last century. No one heeded him and just kept on coming as they intended to anyhow. They came on foot, on horseback and covered waggons. They are still coming much to the despair of those who are there before them.

The Exodus: But No Moses

But there is a great difference in the spirit of the westward surge now than that of even a few years ago. Then it was the expression of the spirit of adventure, of the creative pioneer spirit seeking an outlet, an effort to live a fuller life than that of the stifled eastern states. Now it is with a feeling of despair and hopelessness they drift west, less a seeking for something new than it is a flight from what they have known. Behind them is drought, hunger and murky dust storms. Ahead, is the unknown but less feared than the known.

They pour over the mountains on the highways; vehicles piled on back, top, sides and front with all the possessions they could dig out of the dust of the old homestead. Men, women, kids, dogs, cats bedsteads, kitchen tables and old fashioned bureaus, all spew onto the side of the road when the day's travel is done or the car breaks down. At daylight the stir begins and with great creaking and groaning the old bus is coaxed onward. The "gum bums" move on. The ferment continues until the fruit valleys of California are reached and over night new settlements spring up along the highways. The stir subsides temporarily.

The papers talk of the good wages picking hops, peaches, pears and grapes. They are not ripe yet but the promises are necessary to hold the labor supply still. John Farmer is delighted with the vast army of labor to harvest his crops at the going wages. In the meantime it is a source of speculation of but a few what will be the outcome of this immense immigration which circumstances destines to be nomadic.

For several miles outside of any fruit center, on either side of the highways are parked the makeshift trailers and their occupants. It looks like an open air auction sale. Grown boys and girls in impromptu getups for clothing, barefoot and none too healthy looking, children, torn-trousered men and women: eating, sleeping and vegetating along the crowded roadsides. Any bit of brush over six inches in height affords the only possible place of sanitation. It hides from sight but not from smell. The hot cakes and grits are pretty thin and the green fruit doesn't stay with one.

Nor will these conditions be bettered when the fruit is ripe. No better places will be afforded by the farmers. By that time the camping places will take on what is called "atmosphere" when applied to slum quarters of old cities. Happily the children will not have to stay in them all day. They will help pappy make up a tolerable day's pay and the going wages, when there is such a plentiful supply of unorganized labor, will require plenty of pooling to make a half decent day's pay for one man. Age is no object here. Anything with two hands, or even one hand, that can glom hops or fruit will find work aplenty. The childrens' education will be that kind that is advertised by correspondence schools, "Earn while you learn."

When the crops and the going wages are gone the migration will start again for another industry, that of lumbering. Work is what they want. Wages are not a consideration. Conditions do not matter. They are like a blight. No matter where they light it is the same story. Conditions and wages go down and hours go up and the workers formerly engaged in these lines cannot compete and are forced out. Their traditional clannish prejudices prove an obstacle to any idea of organization growing. It is a setback to those who have labored for years to build better conditions and wages but it must be but a temporary one to the march onward of organized labor.

Plenty of Labor Prophets Necessary

There has been a good deal of hard feeling aroused towards the newcomers and unless a different and more tolerant attitude is adopted the time will be interminably slow in coming when they will come to the realization that the things the workers have here that they have not in the dust bowl and "down yonder" states are the results of labor organization. The workers who have been here longer should take into consideration that they did not take kindly themselves to organization so very long ago and the newcomers have had a far different environment and past to overcome before they will begin to see the wisdom and benefits of unionization. And in this we have one thing to be thankful for and that is the very clannishness that is proving such and obstacle at present. This spirit of clannishness, when union conscious and directed along this channel, will be a tremendous power in building the solidarity needed to overcome the ill effects of the present conditions they have brought about. The organization that taps this force first will gain the unflinching loyalty of first class fighting men and women as the battles in which their kin have participated in the past has shown. To the labor movement and its propagandititsts they are but another group of workers to be educated. So have at it.

The Odyssey of a Farm Hand

I started out in the world when I was fifteen years old, and went to work swamping in Mitchell & McClure's lumber camp at Baker, Minnesota, in 1889.

I was raised mostly on farms, so in the summer I would go to North Dakota to work on the farms, and put in the winters in the lumber camps, and what grief I did have!

I went to work for a farmer by the name of Abner Abbey at Tilby, North Dakota, my first bad job. I got $15 a month for eight hours work—that is eight hours in the morning and eight in the afternoon.

The old lady says to me one day at the table: "My goodness! but you do use a lot of sugar!" I had put two spoonsful in my coffee, so the next day she put the sugar bowl alongside of her plate. There were ten of us at the table including two school teachers. She says to the whole crew: "Do you use sugar in your coffee?" When they said yes, she put the sugar in herself—half a spoonful. When she came to me she said: "I know you do," and put in the same amount.

I tasted the coffee, and said: "Pass the sugar please." Then she jumped up and had a fit. She says: "I put sugar in that coffee." I said "not enough." She grabbed the sugar bowl, but the old man grabbed it away and passed it to me. Then I did use sugar. I put six spoonsful in my coffee.

That was at dinner, so when I sat down to supper, I noticed two bowls of sugar on the table, one in front of my plate. Some one said: "Pass the sugar please." When I started to pass them the bowl by my plate the old lady speaks up and says: "Don't pass that sugar. That bowl is all for you." So I says: "Thank you."

We had lettuce for supper, so I put eight spoons of sugar in my coffeer, filled my plate with lettuce, and turned the sugar bowl upside down over it.

When supper was over, the old gal sneaks up on that empty bowl, and talk about a fit! She called one of the teachers: "Miss Roberts, come here quick! Look at that! My God! that man has gone and ate a whole bowl of sugar for supper!"

They had two sections of land worth $150,000. They had a boy 15 years old. He drove a team in harvest. He and I and the old man ran the three binders. I got up at 3:30, went out to the barn, fed all the stock, cleaned the barn, and curried and harnessed twelve horses. That was quite a chore. After breakfast I went out and turned out the horses to the water trough. Then they hitched them up. At noon they turned their horses to the trough and went in to dinner, while I, poor sap, put away the horses and fed them. Then at night they did the same thing. I had twelve horses to unharness and take care of while they ate supper and went to bed.

This lasted three days, then in the morning I told the farmer I was leaving. He would not let me take my clothes. So I went to the granary and got two of the shockers. They went to the house and made the old guy give me my clothes.

The farmer wouldn't pay me so I went to the Justice of the Peace. Some justice! He said I had nothing coming because I quit before the eight months for which I had hired out was up.

Some time later I landed a haying job in Caryville, N. Dak. The hardware man roped in me and my partner, Bill, and told us Mr. Bloodgood would be in at 7 p. m. to take two men out to his farm. "They are fine people and it's a fine place to work," says the hardware man. So we says, "All right, we'll go out with him."

Bloodgood turned out to be a chin whiskered old farmer with a high-pitched voice and a daughter about 20 years old. He sized us up and remarked that "if you two men don't stick any longer than the last two I had you won't pay for the gas I burn up hauling you out."

This didn't sound so good but we went out with him anyway in his model T Ford. The daughter, who rode in the front seat, let us know that she was just back college and did her best to impress us with her superiority.

Well, next morning we were called at four o'clock and the farmer says, "Boys you can clean out the barn, curry and harness those eight horses while I milk the cow." After doing that we went in to breakfast.

There was a big silver napkin ring with a white napkin at each of the plates except Bill's and mine. When the hired girl brought in the bacon and eggs I noticed that there was one egg and one slice of bacon for each of us. But before we had a chance at it the old lady bowed her head and thanked the good lord for the bountiful repast.

When we had all been served there was one egg left. The old lady passed it around saying, "Would you care for another egg?" Bill and I refused it, though we wanted about six more, so the old men swished it onto his own plate.

Right after breakfast we hitched up four teams to hayracks and wondered where the other two men were. Finally, when we were already to go, out bounced a big fat kid about 16 years old saying, "Am I late, papa?"

When we got to the hay field about five miles from the house kid takes two teams and puts them on a buckrake, the old man gets on the stack and leaves me and Bill to pitch the hay up to him from the ground. The fat kid trots the teams back for each load and gives Bill and me hell until noon. Then we got two bacon sandwiches and a thirty minute rest.

That night at 7:30 I looked at my watch—we were still pitching hay—and I says to the old man, "What time do we quit?"

"Oh," says he, "have you got a watch?"

"Yes," I answered, "to keep you darn farmers from working me all night."

"Well," he says, "we better go home."

So he and Fatty hooks a team on two hayracks and Bill and I pitched on two loads of hay. Then he and Fatty gets on the other two racks and Bill and me loads them up too. Then we drove home.

As soon as we got in the yard Fatty says, "I'm awful tired, papa."

"All right son, you get your supper and go right to bed." Then turning to us the old man says, "You boys take these four loads of hay back of the barn and unload them with the hay fork." This was at 9 p. m.

Bill handled the fork and I drove the team. Well, with the first forkfull I got the team on the run and never stopped until I had shoved that fork full of hay through the other end of the barn. The old man raised hell so Bill and I decided we would leave him in the morning.

So the next morning when we sat down to the one-egg breakfast, Bill reaches in his pocket and takes out two red harness rings and puts a big red bandana handkerchief in each of them and lays one in front of my plate and one in front of his own for napkins so we would be in style. You ought to have seen the old dame's eyes pop out!

When Bill asks for the eggs I hand him the plate and he takes the whole six of them and starts eating. Then I asks for the eggs and Bill says at the top of his voice, "There aint no more."

The old lady comes in from the kitchen, took a look and says, "Mary, fry this man another egg and let the hog kill himself."

After breakfast we told the old man that we were leaving. And he says, "I didn't think you would stay very long."

Fine people.

Well, I got another job haying at Highmore for $20 a month. "I have a big treat for you folks tonight," said the farmer's wife at the supper table, and she brought out a piece of cheese. Nobody wanted any. "Isn't that too bad," said she, "I bought a whole pound." There were 12 at the table.

My next job was at Chinook, Mont. Here another man and I were haying and milking 17 cows. One morning I woke up and I caught the boss setting the clock ahead an hour. We had been getting up at four and that wasn't early enough for him. The other hired man told me he did that regular: he would set the clock ahead an hour in the morning and then set it back again after dinner.

Well, I bawled him out about it and he quit monkeying with the clock but every morning he would get up at three and bang the screen door. Then he would stand on the porch and call his ducks. He would stand there next to our room and call, "ducky, ducky, ducky"; and the damn ducks would gather around and say, "quack,

Schools Peddle Dope

By
A. B. COBBS

For many centuries thinkers called attnetion to the paralyzing effect of formal religions. Since the age of the cheap newspapers they too have carried a share of the blame for the blind, chaotic condition of the world. But "strange as it seems" our educational system has grown into something more demoralizing than church and press combined, without receiving proper attention from the critics.

We are all more or less aware that the balanced, double entry editorials of Arthur Brisbane were well rewarded because of their befuddling effect on the readers. Few, however, realize that a deadly dualism permeates our schools from the bottom to top. A recent news item illustrates the degradation of our educators and the bewilderment and confusion in the world.

At Beach Grove, a suburb of Indianapolis, a quotation from Van Loon's "Story of Mankind written on the blackboard, brought a preacher and a part of his congregation to the school. The principal of the school is reported as answering the complaint they made by saying that none of the teachers believed the theory of evolution and, further, that they were not competent to teach it. The state superintendent of instruction is quoted as saying: "The theory of evolution is not, and should not be advocated in any school in the State of Indiana."

The inevitable effect of such hypocracy will be to make hypocrits or fools of the children. On the first corner from the school they are likely to see the picture, life size, of a dinosaur with the words, "MELLOWED A THOUSAND MILLION YEARS," under it. They will know that someone is lying. They will go to the library (Indianapolis has a good one) and in the end will distrust both preacher and pedagog.

This hypocracy and dualism follow the student through the grammar school, high school, and into the university. Teachers are promoted and rewarded in proportion to their ability to submerge science to the fantastic dogmas and fables of antiquity. Then these same educators have the crust to blame the younger generation for the demoralization which they as leaders have created. In China they shoot dope peddlers; here they are considered pillars of society.

We of the herd look up to the institutions of higher learnings as places where dualism is left behind and science reigns supreme. The victory of science over nonsense is in sight but not yet won. That the march of progress is hurting the reactionaries may be seen from the antics of the hoosier preacher, or better still, from the loud laments of Dr. Huchins of Chicago University.

He regrets the idea of democracy in education, the idea of evolution, the idea of progress, the idea of character building, and the idea of adjustment of the student to the world he is to live in; and, above all, he seems to bemoan the advance of science. "The sciences one by one broke off from philosophy and then from one another, and that process is still going on. At last the whole structure of the university collapsed and the final victory of empiricism was won when the social sciences, law, and even philosophy and theology themselves became empirical and experimental and progressive." What most people call the advance of science he calls the collapse of the university!

To rebuild the universities that have "collapsed" he suggested a return to the metaphysics of the Greeks and the theology of the Middle Ages! "For the intellectual love of God"; as he says. His idea of a scientist is this: "It is not necessary for the physicists to know the nature of science, because the technique of experimental and theoretical work in physics are so well established that they cannot escape them."

And how will this university or this educational system that he longs for, treat the student? In this three-ring circus where the metaphysics of the Greeks, the theology of the Dark Ages, and scientists who do not need to know the nature of science, entertain if they do not enligten, what about the students? "They will have learned," he says, "to think for themselves."

There is a common saying that only one in a thousand can think. Anyone wanting to know why should make a careful study of Huchins' Higher Learning in America. Those who are able to think are probably the ones who never went to school at all. For an educational system that glorifies the superstitions of the past and belittles the advance of science, cannot help being just another and more powerful opiate for the people.

As an antidote for such poison, educators, parents, and all who are interested in human welfare would do well to make a careful study Dietzgen's Positive Outcome of Philosophy, where it is definitely proven that "metaphysics is possible only as fantastic speculation."

WHAT IS A SCAB?

By ELI HILL

Scabbery is the worst enemy of solidarity. The two most important words for the workers are: DON'T SCAB. It is time that someone explained in the simplest words just what a scab is. The matter is important to the leisure class as well as to the workers.

The leisure class dreads scabbery too, but they have been a bit more successful in keeping scabs out of their ranks than the workers have, and this accounts for the fact that the workers are still being kept under the iron heel of the leisure class.

When workers learn just what scabbery is and what it means to them they will know also what is meant by solidarity for one is the opposite of the other. Where there is solidarity there can be no scabbery and where there is scabbery there ends solidarity.

Workers some times scab without being conscious of what they are doing and there is a lot of scabbing going on that is not recognized as such. In fact, most of the scabbery going on is unrecognized but its effect, killing solidarity, is just as bad as where it is openly recognized and acknowledged.

The Unrecgonized Scab

An unrecognized scab is one who goes to work for a smaller wage than his fellow workers are getting on the same or similar work. He scabs when there is no strike on. This is forced on him or her by suppression and the results of suppression.

Workers are thrown out of employment continuously and continuously they are on the go looking for new jobs. The bosses, taking advantage of their need, offer them wages lower than those paid to other workers; some of the workers sooner or later, driven by hunger, accept the offer and they become scabs unconsciously and often against their inclinations.

This unconsicous scabbing, of course, tends to cut the wages of other workers, and workers who wont' stand to have their wages cut are forced to quit or they are fired. So the unconscious scab has done the employing class a favor and injured his own class no less than the worker who takes a job in shop where there is a strike going on.

There is another type of unrecognized scab. It is the worker who works longer than the scheduled hours on a job. He may be a timid soul who starts to work before the regular time and stays a little past the regular quitting time because he is afraid to say "no" to the boss. When he does this he is most certainly scabbing for his actions hurt his fellow workers. Every minute of work counts. In the first place the worker isn't getting enough for his labor within the scheduled time of work. He is being robbed even then, because every employer makes a surplus on what is produced. Out of the surplus he derives his profit. Profit is stolen labor. When a workers puts in a few minutes overtime without getting paid for it he is just helping the boss steal a little more from the working class. That's scabbing.

Some of these scabs are work-hogs because they are anxious to please the boss. They think that they will be the last to be laid off when slack time comes or that the boss will reward them with a better job. There is no worse scab in the world than the one that tries to climb to a higher position with better pay by tramping on the necks of his fellow workers.

If all the workers got easier jobs, then who would do the hard jobs? The question answers itself. The way things are run now there are not enough easy jobs to go around and the scab who does his best to please his boss by working harder or longer than the rest of the workers, more often than not, finds himself out of a job so much the sooner because he worked too much. Or, in the end, he finds that a younger, stronger worker who can out-scab him takes his place.

If scabbing means to do something that hurts your class, than the scab on the job who tries always to out-do his fellow workers is one of the worst of all scabs. Since there never are enough jobs to go around, he scabs on the unemployed by making it possible for the employer to get along with fewer workers. Also, since there is an end to almost every job, the speed-crazy, work-hungry scab hastens the time when he and his fellow workers will be idle, waiting for another job to show up. As the old Wobbly song had it:

> Do it all today and you'll soon find out
> That tomorrow you're nothing but a go-about.

The piece-worker

Now, the piece-worker is often to be classified among the unconscious or unrecognized scabs. Why do so many employers prefer the piece-work system? They save money by it, that's why. In many lines where piece-work is established the worker furnishes his own tools; that saves the boss bother and extra investment. If a piece-worker's saw is broken or stolen it's no loss to the boss and, anyway, it's a few more dollars he doesn't have to tie up in equipment.

School Days at Work Peoples College

BY FRED THOMPSON

Economics for boys and girls from 12 to 17? Sure.

An instructor has recalled to their attention that with modern spinning machinery and looms, combines and flour mills, we can clothe and feed ourselves with much less labor than in the days of the spinning wheel, the hand-loom, the scythe and flail and old mill stones. They have even worked out some of this increase in productivity as arithmetic problems. In general discussion they have reached the inevitable conclusion that if we can produce so much more than we used to, and do not live more than a couple of times as well, it must be that the working class is gypped of a good part of what it is now able to produce. Then comes the question when and where is the working class gypped? Is it because they are paid too little, or is it perhaps because they are charged too much when they go to buy? It is apparent that it must be one case or the other. It is up to the instructor to provide them with a way to think the problem out.

He asks: Suppose some of you have no money to buy candy and ice cream, and others have. Suppose that there is a general complaint that where you buy your confections they charge such high prices that you are robbed. Will those who have no money to spend there be robbed? All agree the answer is "No." Will those of you who have fifty cents to spend be robbed more or less than those who spend only a dime? It is agreed that those who spend the most would be robbed the most. Is it possible to explain that one class with plenty of money, and spending plenty of it, lives without working, by assuming that when people go to buy, they are robbed by high prices? And so these 12-year-old economists conclude that the gypping of the working class must be perpetrated by the time the worker gets his pay check, that "exploitation occurs predominantly at the point of production."

These 12-year-old economists seem even brighter than our worthy Congress when it comes to coping with such practical problems as unemployment.

Here's a question they were given. If 40 million people in this country try to make a living by working for wages, and 12 million of them can find no job, and those that do, work average nine hours a day, what must be done to have them all work? It was just a question in arithmetic for them. They took out their pencils, subtracted 12 from 40, got 28 for an answer, multiplied that by 9 and then dividing the consequent 252 by 40, uniformly decided that if such were the facts, everybody would be at work if only they averaged 6 hours and 18 minutes a day. (And these as yet unspoiled boys and girls figured that out without any theory about solving unemployment by dividing the available work among the available workers.)

Of course, they didn't spend all their time on such questions. They learned somewhat of the great struggles in which workers have battled for more of the good things of life. They made short speeches on all manner of things from these strikes to how we could cope with mosquitos and heat under a social order run by workers for workers. They learned how to conduct their own meetings. And in their meetings they arranged their own social life for the four weeks that they were at the I. W. W. summer school.

It has been a valuable experience for these boys and girls; and they like it so well that they always come back year after year. How about sending your boy or girl to the Work Peoples College next summer?

Of more immediate concern: How about you yourself, or your grown up boy or girl, coming here for the four months adult courses that start December 1? The work in the classes is so arranged that workers can carry on whether they quit school years ago and forgot a good part of what they learned, or have just recently left high school or college. The subject of these winter courses is to make the students more useful to the labor movement. To that end economics, history of the labor movement, industrial unionism, organization methods, public speaking, labor journalism, and such other subjects as the students require to become all-around useful members of their industrial union, are taught. The greater ease with which these subjects can be mastered under the conditions of continuous residential study is self-evident. And the total cost for room, board and schooling is only $30 per month.

Incidentally, the social life at this school in the suburbs of Duluth, with ample facilities for recreation indoors and outdoors, means that going to school is no longer a punishment. "Knowledge is power." let's get it and spread it. For information about the school write Box 39, Morgan Park Sta., Duluth, Minn.

Piece-work is about the best known way of cutting down wages, for it gives the worker the idea that he can make more than the average worker by speeding up. When the boss finds out that his workers really can make more, he cuts the piece rate on them. Then if they speed up still more, he cuts it again until they are working with all the strength and speed in them and getting no more in wages than they were at the day-rate. They are turning out more production and getting less for it; they are helping the employer swell his profits at the expense of their own class. That is scabbing.

Where the piece-work system is established the workers "are their own bosses." This means that they drive themselves and the employer is saved the expense of hiring foremen to see that workers keep at their tasks. Under this system when the worker accidentally spoils a piece of work it is the worker's loss. Another saving for the boss. The piece worker does more work than the men who work by the hour. Moreover, they make a greater profit for the employer and freeze other workers out of their jobs.

The employer wants greater production with fewer workers for two reasons: 1) greater production has greater value, greater value means greater profit for himself; 2) he wants to have all the workers' time possible occupied in his work so they cannot have time to think of their troubles and to discuss ways and means to get more pay and less work. That is the thing the employer fears most of all.

Competition develops scabbing among employers as among workers. When one capitalist undersells another he is scabbing. There is a lot of this going on but the capitalists, being better organized than the workers, keep scabbing in their ranks under better control than the workers do. Aside from this the pressure on the worker-scab is greater than on the employer-scab.

When the worker allows himself to get into a cut-throat game of compention for a job he is very often, goaded on by the threat of actual starvation. On the other hand, what the employer stands to gain or lose is usually an additional profit which is not a matter of life and death to him. When the worker takes a loss (loses his job) he goes hungry; when the capitalist takes a loss it's only a cut in his stolen surplus.

The Recognized Scab

We will take the workers who belong to this class into consideration. The worst and the most disgusting one is the man who does not belong to a labor organization. If he doesn't know why he should belong to a union, if he doesn't know why he should be organized against the capitalist class who are robbing him and his class, and if he doesn't know that the capitalists are organized against us in trusts, corporations, associations and alliances, then he doesn't know anything. Every worker knows, even if he won't admit that he does, that we've got to be organized to fight organized power. What could one do to a whole army? It takes an army to lick an army. Therefore if a worker isn't organized, he is playing right into the hands of our common enemy, the capitalist, and he betrays his own army. It follows that he is a scab. A traitor.

The next worst recognized scab is the one who goes to work during a strike when his fellow workers are battling the capitalist, our common enemy, on the point of production the only right way to fight them. The capitalist teaches us this himself, if we are only wise enough to pay attention in this school of life we can see that. The capitalist's rule rests on the industries from which they derive their riches and economic power. They must have economic power just as well as the workers should have it, to rule. Economics pertains to production, distribution and consumption. Here is what economic power means; "The class that controls industry, rules." Capitalists control it now!

Conclusion

As we go through this hard grind of life, we investigate all the ways and means by which the capitalists keep us under control. By fighting them in the same manner we can reach our goal. There is an old saying about beating one at his own game. Economic power has already been mentioned as their most important means. The next is the keeping out of scabs from their ranks. When a capitalist scabs, he is quickly put out of business by the power of the trusts. He is nicely told that "if you like the working class so much, you may go and join their ranks," which he is forced to do if he can stand the thought of doing honest work.

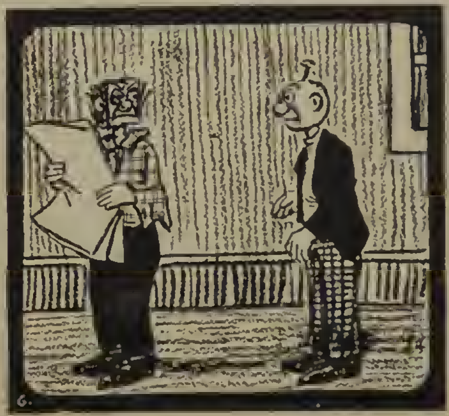
That is just what the workers should do to a scab in their ranks. Make him a marked man by advertising the fact to his fellow workers. They must see to it that this scab's life is made as miserable as possible. Every worker should boycott him. They must see to it that he doesn't get work any place without being sneered and jeered at by those that he has betrayed. Steps should be taken to keep him out of a job as much as possible. Since he has been favoring the leisure class, let him live in leisure then.

There is one specimen that could be called the two-faced scab. That is the middle class. First they betray the capitalists by underselling them. They also try to dethrone them so they can take the seat of honor with a state dictatorship. They promise the workers a paradise if the battle is won. When it is won, the workers have to suffer greater exploitation than ever.

They scab on the workers during a strike, by organizing vigilante mobs to club and lynch the workers. They are scabbing when they do this because their existence depends on the workers. If industrial freedom was to come today, the middle class would surely have to stick with the industries and those who run them, the laboring class.

The petty bourgeois' head is so full of capitalistic ideas that he does not realize that the big capitalists use them as mere tools to keep the workers in submission. The middle class is made up of professional men such as: doctors, lawyers, judges, detectives, stool-pigeons, etc. When a union leader is arrested he is thrown in jail by a policeman; prosecuted by a prosecutor; found guilty generally by a petty bourgeois jury; sentenced by the judge, another capitalist tool; and held in prison by a petty bourgeois warden. The union leader, in the first place might have been framed by the planting of false evidence by detectives, who are also capitalist tools.

If all the pety bourgeois took time off to read something else besides capitalist literature, they would be doing themselves a favor. They should read what an industrial democracy would be like; of all the health and happiness and absence of greed and exploitation. They themselves would be better off then than they are today. After reading about industrial democracy they would open their eyes and quit being tools of the capitalist class. When the capitalist has lost his tools, then he is lost himself and industrial democracy will come automatically.



If he doesn't know enough to organize he doesn't know anything.

A SOLDIER RETURNS

The One Big Union Monthly and the Industrial Workers of the World are heart and soul for the success of the anti-fascist fight going on in Spain but we see no reason why we should stick our heads in the sand and pretend not to be aware of the capitalist class element within the Spanish United Front government that is trying to rob the Spanish revolutionary unionists of the fruits of victory.

No matter what our opinion may be as to the wisdom of the syndicalists' policy of cooperation with political government, the information and arguments contained in this letter from a rank and file fighter in the cause of working class freedom, and in other articles appearing in this magazine, cannot but be valuable reminders that there are still working class enemies among those who favor "democracy" as opposed to fascism.—EDITOR.

Marseilles, France

Fellow Worker:—

Received your letter the other day in Barcelona. I typed three pages in reply but could not smuggle it out of the country, so I tore it up.

I am out of Spain. The reasons are numerous. I was not wanted by the government as I was in the Durrutti International Shock Battalion. The government sabotaged us since we were formed in May and made it impossible for us to stay at the front. No tobacco unless you had money. All of the time I was in the militia I received no money. I had to beg money for postage tamps, etc. I was sent back from the front slightly shell-shocked and put in a hospital in Barcelona. When we registered at the hospital I told them I was from the Durrutti International Battalion and they wouldn't register me. In fact they told me to go and ask my friends for money for a place to sleep. I explained to them that I was from Canada and had no friends in Barcelona, then they tried to make me a prisoner in the hospital. I called them all the lousy—I could think of. Anyway, I ran away from the hospital one day to the English section of the CNT-FAI, and the people there insisted that I see the British consul for a permit to leave Spain, which I did, though I hated to leave.

Spain is wonderful country. At present it reminds me of the stories I have read of the O. G. P. U. in Russia. The jails of loyalist Spain are full of volunteers who have more than a single-track mind. I know one of them from Toronto, a member of the L. R. W. P. I wonder if they will bump him off. The Stalinists do not hesitate to kill any of those who do not blindly accept Stalin as a second Christ. One of the refugees who came over with me from Spain was a member of the O. G. P. U. in Spain, which, by the way, is controlled by Russia. Every volunteer in the Communist International Brigade is considered a potential enemy of Stalin. He is checked and double checked, every damn one. If he utters a word other than commy phrases he is taken "for a ride." This chap (ex-O.G.P.U.) is like all the other commies coming out of Spain, absolutely anti-Stalin and anti-communist. He skipped the country by flashing his O.G.P.U. badge on the trains etc.

I believe the I. W. W. has lost some members here, as I doubt if they would keep quiet at the front in view of what is taking place.

It was only through sabotage that the government succeeded in disbanding the International Battalion of Anarchists. Four of our bunch died of starvation in one day. Our arms were rotten, even though the Valencia government has plenty of arms and planes. They know enough not to give arms to the thousands of anarchists on the Aragon front. We could have driven the fascists out of Huesca and Saragossa had we had the aid of the aviation. But the Anarchists form collectives where ever they advance, and the comrades would rather let Franco have those cities than the CNT-FAI.

Fenner Brockway, prominent labor leader in England, exposed the way the communists were treating those boys (volunteers) in the International Brigade. They will not let any of them come back unless they are racketeers of the Sam Scarlett type who will say anything they are told as long as the pork chops are coming in.

The CNT-FAI seems to have lost all the power they had in the army. There is a good fort on top of a hill overlooking Barcelona which the Anarchists captured from the fascists. When I left for the front it was still in the hands of the FAI but when I came back the communists had it. The workers of Spain are against the communists, but the latter don't care. They are making a play for the support of the bourgeoisie and other racketeers. As far as the industries are concerned the CNT has a lot of power, far more than any other organization.

Well, Fellow Worker, one day has elapsed since I wrote the above. Last night I had a head ache and had to postpone finishing the letter. I am eating good since coming to France.

I believe the British consul is going to send me to England or to Canada. If I wasn't such a wreck I would ship on a British ship for Spain. Wages are double on the Spanish run, and ships are tied up because of a shortage of men. I have been on English ships and none of the crew would speak English.

I met two more men from the International Brigade this morning. They say many Canadians are in prison in Spain.

With best wishes for the I. W. W., I remain

(Signed)

Bill Wood.

The Spanish Civil War

By JOSEPH WAGNER

Much has already been written on the subject of the Spanish Civil War, and a lot more will be writen about it in the years to come. This is natural, for the subject is of tremendous importance, by far transcending the boundaries of Spain, and it is far from being as simple, as imagined by the bulk of writers, critics and historians of this epic battle.

To some of these, the struggle in Spain is a clear cut fight between bolshevism and fascism. to others it is a life and death struggle between democracy and dictatorship, to others again, it is the final struggle for the final liquidation of all systems of exploitation of one man by another man, or of one class by another class, and the inauguration of a classless society of free producers.

The Spanish fight is, on the contrary, a very complicated one and far from being so simple. To be sure, here and there, are taking place clear cut fights but in the generality of cases, people of different ideas and with fundamentally antagonistic objectives are compelled to contain temporarily their differences and fight loyally side by side against some immediate common danger, such as a renewed major assault by the international fascist hordes.

The immediate danger over, the elements composing the anti-fascist blocs are reverting their attention to the realization of their own objectives. Bitter antagonisms exist among the elements on both sides of the barricades, which complicates matters even more.

But, just because of the complex nature of the Spanish struggles, it is important for us to follow carefully developments taking place behind the general news of battle, such as of lost or gained trenches, villages or towns. We may, and should learn from the painful experiences of our Spanish fellow workers, of the C. N. T., as this knowledge may be helpful to us if, and when, we should be confronted by like, or similar circumstances.

For, it is certain that capitalism will not last forever; it is certain that since everything that has a beginning will also have an end, capitalism cannot be an exception to this rule. But, how, when and under what circumstances will capitalism pass out? And what will follow in its place?

We are all acquainted with the revolutionary events in Russia during the World War. Under a prolonged strain of war, all the old moral and coercive institutions of Russia collapsed. All political and social organisms had been ground to pieces. About the only organized body left at the time in Russia was relatively insignificant fraction of the Socialist Party—the Bolsheviks. Due to the concurrence of unusual circumstances, the Bolsheviks were enabled to make themselves masters of that vast country and establish their form of government.

That Russian event had a tremenduous effect on the labor and socialist movement of the whole world. A large enough quantity of material was printed since on that subject to fill many large sized libraries, and the end is not in sight yet. Innumerable conclusions—most of them of necessity faulty—have been deducted not only from the faulty—have been deducted not only from the "Russian experiment" (proletarian distatorship), and from their revolutionary act of "expropriating the expropriators" and realizing socialism, but also from their method of "taking over the power."

History seems to be continually repeating itself, but of course, not in its details but only in rough outlines as it is now the case with Spain in respect to the Russian revolution. In the chaos created by the military fascist rebellion in Spain, practically the only consciously organized, compact revolutionary body was the National Confederation of Labor (the syndicalist CNT) and its spiritual reflex, the Iberian Anarchist Federation (FAI). The socialist and republican-bourgeois parties, panic stricken and demoralized, were almost out of the picture; there was no Bolshevik party to speak of at the time.

It fell, as a matter of course, to the lot of the anarchist and syndicalist movement of Spain to cope with the internationally supported, military fascist rebellion. They proved equal to the task: the fascists were disarmed in the principal cities, part of the navy came over to the workers after drowning or chaining their officers; the workers' armed forces took up energetically and successfully the offensive on all fronts.

Behind the lines, socialization of the economic life had started: factories and shops were placed in the control of the labor unions, the rural landed estates were put in charge of the agricultural workers union collectives. Revolutionists and progressives all over the world were watching with great interest to see how these libertarians, (who do not belive in force and compulsion) would carry out the difficult task of social and economic transformation, with libertarian, non-dictatorial methods.

Unfortunately, our libertarian fellow workers failed in the fulfillment of the expectations. Disagreements arose among the militants, as well as in the ranks, as to the best tactics to be used. Large and small capitalists were reluctant to be expropriated of "their" shops or factories, and they resisted as much as they dared; land owners would not volunteer to part with their land in favor of the workers' collectives.

What was to be done to carry out the program? Use force against the recalcitrants? But that would be using bolshevik dictatorial methods and our libertarians are opposed, in principle, to dictatorship. Some of the CNT-FAI were in favor of force while others were in favor of liberty. This disagreement in the libertarian camp on this important question slowed down considerably the work of socialization started so auspiciously at the beginning of the Civil War. And this slackening increased the dissatisfaction of the more extremist CNT members. The tactics of the CNT-FAI became more equivocal, hesitant and vaccilating. One fraction was in favor of uniting at all costs with all the anti-fascist elements in order to be able to stem the tide of the fascist armies, which with the direct aid of Portugal, Italy and Germany, and the camouflaged aid of England, were becoming a serious menace not only to socialization but to democracy as well. The other, uncompromising faction opposed such tactics.

In the meantime, on account of the CNT-FAI reluctance to rule with a strong hand while they had a chance, the socialist and bourgeois-republican parties somewhat revived; the bolsheviks, through their well known tactics of intrigue, grew in numbers and prestige. The responsible element of the CNT-FAI were then compelled to adopt a policy of compromise with the other anti-fascist elements even to the extent of being represented in the National and the Catalonian governments.

The argument between the two wings of our libertarian organizations is going on in a more or less bitter spirit. I am submitting here two articles that appeared in the French organ of the IWMA in Paris, Le Combat Syndicaliste. The defender of the compromise policy is Brandt, editor of the Spanish paper published in New York, Cultura Proletaria. He has been in Spain for quite a while. The article representing the uncompromising policy, in answer to Brandt is by the Secretary of the International Workingman's Association (IWMA), Pierre Besnard. Both of the fellow workers are outstanding figures in the labor movement.

The reader will perhaps be surprised by the way both of them use the term "counter-revolutionary," applying the term not only to moderate republicans, but also to the Spanish socialists and communists. However, as a matter of fact, the term is correctly applied. The real objective of the CNT-FAI in this Civil War is the socialization of industry and the rearing of a socialist commonwealth. They have realized this objective in a number of districts.

On the other hand, the objective of all the other elements in this war is the establishment of a democratic republic in Spain. This includes the socialist parties as well as the communist party. As a matter of fact the Stalinist communists seem to be the extreme right of the Popular Front. The realization of their program implies necessarily, the unscrambling of the CNT omelette, that is, the turning back of the already socialized land and factories to their former owners. In that sense they are called, rightly, counter-revolutionists.

CATASTROPHIC REVOLUTION

By BRANDT, Editor Cultura Proletaria.

Translated by JOSEPH WAGNER

Bilbao has fallen. The heroism of a people has been defeated by the superiority in armament of the fascist hordes. That indicates that the international fascist bloc is still stronger than the anti-fascist block. Bilbao in our hands signified a fair chance of victory for us, because that industrial center enabled us to manufacture the war material necessary for the maintaining of the Northern Front.

Bilbao in the hands of the fascists signifies that victory is inclining toward the enemy's side. If the entire northern front falls into the fascist hands, they will be able to withdraw a large part of their men power and war material and concentrate them on the other fronts.

Let us have no illusions. The Spanish Revolution is in its most critical hour. In spite of all the enthusiasm and all the faith of our fighters, the brutal force of arms is about to conquer us. Even with our forces united, we were too weak to stop the fascist beast; what will happen then if our fighting forces break up the anti-fascist block?

It is in the light of the Bilbao tragedy that the catastrophic events of the revolution should be judged. I want to refresh the memory of those who are preaching 100% revolution regardless of any consideration, by pointing out to them the Bilbao, catastrophe, which opens the way to a complete fascist conquest of Spain. To be sure, comrade Besnard, very nice to place the revolution above the war; but it is the war that is imposing itself upon us taking precedence over the revolution. The war got hold of us and we have to fight it out whether we like it or not. We can temporarily suspend the struggle against our Spanish capitalism, but we cannot, for a single instant, stop the fight against fascism. The revolution depends on our volition, but the war is imposed upon us. We cannot devote ourselves to the revolution if we have not first liquidated the war.

To believe that the anarchists by themselves could defeat the fascism of four nations—of Spain, Italy, Germany and Portugal—and at the same time fight against the counter-revolution represented by the anti-anarchist coalition of all parties—from the communist to the bourgeois parties—is to greatly over estimate our forces. We are strong, to be sure, but not strong enough to defeat all the fascist enemies and all our anti-fascist "friends" at the same time. Whether we like it or not, we are forced to remain tied to this coalition of anti-anarchist "friends" in the common struggle against fascism, even at the risk of being stabbed in the very heart of the revolution. It is a danger one always is exposed to when in order to fight a common enemy, it is necessary to associate with other parties. In order to save yourself from death at the front, you risk being knifed in the rear.

This is the situation in which anarchism finds itself in Spain. We are traveling between two precipices. Seeking to save ourselves from the fascist catastrophe, we are risking to perish at the hand of the counter-revolution. A tragic situation indeed! Anarchism compelled to go hand in hand with the counter-revolution, in order to fight fascism, which is too powerful for us, while within this same counter-revolutionthat calls itself anti-fascist—there are many elements that would feel more at home on the other side of the barricades. It is a situation that entirely paralizes our forces. The comrades outside Spain cannot understand the terrible dilemma confronting us in Spain if they will not understand first that, with the repressive forces of the government against us we are not strong enough to defeat the bourgeois counter-revolution while the communists—these traitors to all revolutionary aspirations of the Spanish working class—are associated to this counter-revolution.

It is an idle dream to believe that, by ourselves, we could not only block the counter-revolution, but also destroy fascism. Voline, in Tierra Libre, says that since there are elements in the C. N. T.-F. A. I. who are opposed to the tactics of compromise followed by these two organizations, it follows that these tactics are equivocal. But, then, by the logic, the opposition's tactics are also equivocal. Isn't that so Voline?

The fact is that this line of compromise made possible the maintenance of a semblance of an anti-fascist unity, and made possible the creation, out of nothing, of a military force that was capable of holding up the fascist armies, while a fight carried on in the rear would have paralized this effort.

If the CNT-FAI followed the line of compromise, it did not do so by choice but because it was compelled. They would have much preferred to carry on the straight fight for the social revolution. Like the opposition, the majority of the comrades who accepted the policy of compromise, knew that the revolution is imperiled by the counter-revolution, and they all would have desired to crush it. But, the crushing of the counter-revolution would have weakened the anti-fascist front. These comrades considered fascism as the greatest immediate danger, because, without defeating fascism there could not be a 100 per cent revolution, nor for that matter, a one per cent revolution. With the triumph of fascism, anarchism will be exterminated entirely and the working class masses reduced to 100 per cent slavery.

Could they, the CNT and the FAI, take at such times the extremist risks of a fight against the counter-revolution, when faced by such an overwhelming danger for the future of the Spanish proletariat?

"If the counter-revolution succeeded in so greatly strengthening itself, it is because the anarchists made too many concessions," say the opponents of all compromise. The opposition in other countries, as well as the opposition in Spain, is overlooking the reality of the anti-fascist struggle. The CNT and the FAI have been compelled to swallow the bitter pill, of giving to the counter-revolution the possibility of strengthening itself because the revolution was in need of arms, rifles, machine guns, canons, tanks and airplanes in order to triumph over fascism. The revolution had raised much enthusiasm, much faith and courage, but it lacked the offensive weapons necessary to arm this courage, this faith, this enthusiasm.

Even though the psychological and idealistic factors were powerful weapons in the fight, they were not all-sufficient in themselves. For, when facing death, even a coward—even an enemy in the fascist camp—will defend himself and even attack with the same energy as an anarchist fighting for his cause. The revolution possessed the psychological elements in abundance, but lacked absolutely the physical factors necessary for the defeat of the fascist armies.

In the month of May, Franco's army numbered probably 400,000 soldiers formidably equipped with the most perfect armament possessed by modern armies: thousands of machine guns, artillery of all calibers in abundance, numerous tanks, hundreds of bombing planes brought over by the fascists of foreign countries, in addition to Franco's 150,000 soldiers of the regular army.

To those, who are ceaselessly demanding that the anarchists fight in the rear as well as on the front, we now are posing, somewhat bluntly, the following question:

What are you revolutionists of foreign countries doing towards stopping this fascist invasion that is strangling the revolution? You make collections, you are loudly protesting, you are writing fiery articles. Excuse us for our impertinence when we say that fascism will not be destroyed by collections and fiery articles. Moral decency and human sensibility demand that you do more than that.

Your duty, the duty of the world revolutionary proletariat, is that this fascist invasion be prevented.

Your duty, the duty of the world revolutionary proletariat, is to prevent your democratic governments from blockading our sea coasts, our frontiers, while allowing the fascist invasion. And your duty, at this moment, is to prevent your governments from maintaining that control that is strangling us.

But to do that it requires revolutionary action on your part, and fighting on the streets; but you also, find yourselves unable to do that because, like us, you are surrounded by fascists and counter-revolution-aries.

To the 400,000 armed soldiers of fascism an equal number of anti-fascist fighters should be opposed. How is such a formidable army to be armed and equipped? Our factories can produce but a limited number of arms, of tanks and of planes, that formerly could not be manufactured here.

That cannot be done offhand. The machines and the raw material for their manufacture are lacking. We are entirely destitute. The only solution would be to obtain them outside of Spain, in sufficient quantities, on a scale possessed by modern armies. They are being secured from many countries, but neither in sufficient quantities nor of the best of quality. I have been in all the trenches of all the fronts. I have seen rifles of all calibers, of all models, of all ages. I have seen in the same company rifles of a dozen different models, among them the oldest kind that require an extravagant rifle practicing. To find munitions for all of these models of rifles, is a Herculean task. The confusion that is created among the fighters, during a fight, is enormous.

What efficacy could an army so equipped have, confronted by the formidable armaments of the fascists? Our fighters have to sacrifice their lives as a substitute for good weapons. Better arms, in abundance should be secured.

Russia—in accord probably with France and England—offered some.

But his offer was not desinterested. To abandon for the time being our revolutionary advances, was the price that had to be paid. The bolshevist-democratic clan would not have it otherwise. Another condition imposed on us was the toleration of bolshevization in Spain.

It was necessary to either accept these terms or perish at the hands of fascism. The anarchists of the CNT-FAI preferred to run the risk of bolshevism, rather than the certainty of extermanation by fascism. Revolution had to choose between a probable death and a certain death.

Today, we are still finding ourselves in the same tragic dilemma, fascism is about to defeat us. Who can even consider starting a conflict in the rear, now? Counter-revolution may fear a triumph of an anarchist revolution more, than a triumph of fascism; while we, we are determined to entirely destroy fascism so that we may have the possibility of carrying on the social revolution.

With tears in their eyes—like many of those who are compelled on May 7, to give up their arms—with rage in their hearts, the anarchists found it necessary to be tolerant, to show a measure of tolerance to counter-revolution, until the day, when perhaps, not being able to longer bear up with the continual provocation, they will react, and that may bring about the catastrophe at the hands of the fascists. And who knows? perhaps that is exactly what the counter-revolution desires.

The two jaws of the pincers are holding anarchism in Spain by the throat: fascism on one side, imperialist, democratic, bolshevik-bourgeois counter-revolution on the other side. What will the revolutioninsts of the world do to save Spanish anarchism, and with it the Revolution?

ANSWER TO "CATASTROPHIC REVOLUTION"

(By Pierre Besnard, General Secretary of the I. W. M. A.)

Ttranslated by JOSEPH WAGNER

We have never been unaware of the difficult tasks that confronted our CNT comrades. But we do not agree with Comrade Brandt concerning the character of the armed force, charged with the defense of the revolution. Basing ourselves on the lessons offered by history, we stated long before the outbreak of the Spanish revolution that, a government army is essentially a counter-revolutionary force, which will strangle the revolution, the instant the masters of the State deem it favorable, even if the revolution is on its descending phase. We never ceased telling our Spanish comrades that a confederal militia, on the contrary, constitutes the essential instrument of defense of this revolution.

Brandt claims, that in order to win it was necessary to accept the militarization of the popular militia columns. We do not agree with him.

In spite of the precisions he gives—and which we have known before—we continue to believe that it would have been possible:

a) to organize the united command;

b) to realize the unity of armaments;

c) to obtain the unity of provisionment, by the establishment of technical organism, to function in accordance with syndicalist (labor union) principles and under the permanent control of the labor unions (syndicates).

Like all the others, this problem was essentially a problem of organization, and the CNT—or the CNT and the UGT—were perfectly qualified to resolve it.

As for discipline, "the principal force of the army" as they say in the French barracks, it was just as easy to obtain it from the fighters of the front and of the rear. And we add that, having the consent of the men who would have to apply it, the discipline would have been infinitely superior to that imposed on the men by the constraining order of the State.

BRING DISCUSSION BACK TO ITS ORIGINAL FRAMEWORK

Meanwhile, we are aware that Brandt, who was not there at the initial phase of the revolution (the ascending phase), could not be convinced by our arguments unless we bring this discussion back to its original framework; therefore, let us try to do this so that the debate develops in all its clarity.

At the outbreak of the fascist counter-revolution, on July 19, 20 and 21, the working class forces led by the CNT and the FAI, crushed this counter-revolution and immediately took the offensive against the fascists on all the fronts.

They were absolute masters of the situation on the front as well as in the rear. The followers of the CNT-FAI represented 85% of the effectives in Catalonia; they were in the majority in the other regions of free Spain, with the exception of Madrid.

Was it not possible then, for the CNT-FAI, the inspirators and initiators of the movement against the fascist forces and, enjoying, in this two fold capacity, the full confidence of the masses, to definitely and for all times rid themselves of the politicians and of the governments, to decree—at least in Catalonia—the mobilization of all the wealth, as was demanded even by Duruty himself?

And was it not possible, with the product of this mobilization, to acquire the necessary arms with which to take Huesca and Saragossa—these two keys of the war—from the fascists and to open up the road to Madrid where the frozen and immobilized gold was awaiting to be put to use?

And further, was it not possible, to cut off supplying Madrid with foodstuff from Catalonia and the Levant if Caballero would have persisted in not understanding that his duty was to give aid to the rest of Spain in arming and reconstructing?

And was it not possible to have tried a Moroccan capital diversion, that would have chased Franco out of there, with no hope of ever returning?

Was it, finally, not possible to combine this action in Morocco with the starting of a revolution in Portugal, where the C.G.T. (General Confederation of Labor) was only awaiting the word to begin this revolution, being assured in advance of 80 percent support from the army and the navy, and of 100 percent support from the population?

Who would dare assert that all of these were not proposed by the I.W.M.A., at the very beginning with practical support for their realization?

These are, it seems to us, something totally different from mere collections and fiery speeches. The National Committee of the C.N.T., possessing, as it does, all this data in its files, knows the truth of them better than any one else.

It is not the fault of the revolutionists outside of Spain that they were not listened to, that their advice was continually ignored. Wasn't it from outside, my dear comrade Brandt, that came the plans for the economic and social reorganization as well as the plan for the proclamation of the revolution?

Inform Yourself

Ask of the outstanding militants of the CNT and of the FAI for information on this subject, they will answer you. Also ask the comrades of Catalonia, Aragon, Levant and of the Center whether the authors of the plans had not come there themselves, in person, to aid and supervise the application in detail of these planse?

There is no doubt about your unawareness of all the above—and of many other more important facts besides—made you speak so lightly of the comrades outside of Spain. However, perhaps this is not an excuse and you could have informed yourself on the subject before putting your thoughts down black on white, no matter how valuable your thoughts may be.

Let us now come to the question of fascism itself. Do you believe that the problem is as simple as you present it? No, it is altogether different. You will allow us to state that if there are anti-fascist counter-revolutionary forces today, it is because they were allowed to come to life, to organize themselves and to conquer for themselves a position not at all justified by conditions on July 19, 1936.

Had the C.N.T. and the F.A.I. been aware of their strength, and had they acted in such a manner as to attract into their orbits all the elements that today are composing the counter-revolutionary anti-fascism, this thing would have been reduced to its simplest expression.

Having failed to act in the right manner, the CNT-FAI allowed these forces to develop by their side in their own protecting shadow. At the beginning, these politicianist forces—who were working entirely under orders from Moscow—"represented nothing," as the saying was then. In a word they did not exist.

Today, and for some time back, they are the absolute masters of the situation: masters of the governmental apparatus, of the army, of the general administration of the country. Why? After the foregoing, asking the question, is answering it.

Why Was the Communist Peril Denied?

That is where the under-estimation of the peril, that the foreign comrades have ceaselessly been pointing out, led to. These forces should have not only not been allowed to grow, but they should have been wiped out and the fight in accordance with our principles in all its strictness should have been carried on.

That they should have been able to impose their law, it was necessary for them to encounter none of that active resistance which such an attitude on their part should have provoked at the beginning of the events of Barcelona.

It is natural that there should now be difficulty in fighting against them and that, on account of that difficulty, the revolutionary efforts should be diminished by that much; it is also natural that the situation should now be deemed insurmountable, because of the way the fight against the counter-revolutionary anti-fascist elements have been conducted at the time when the C.N.T. was the only force.

But it is an enormity that you should believe, comrade Brandt, that a revolutionary objective to the war be abandoned; that you should think that we would accept the law of least resistance, without any attempt to react; that you should subordinate everything to the winning of the war—the objective of which is the restoration of the Democratic Republic.

Enthusiasm Should Be Re-created

Our opinion is that efforts should be made to re-create, by actions conformable to our strength, the conditions that evoked the enthusiasm of the beginning, which brought about the veritable revolutionary realizations on the morrow of July 19, 1936, of the July 19 that reappeared again on May 6, 1937, and was passed up . . . in order to avoid responding to the provocations.

For, today it is from the interior of Spain that the revolution is receiving its greatest support. This support is not forthcoming from the outside except when there are successes in the interior which permits the broadening of the revolution. Never has a revolution followed a different course from 1789 to our own day. It is often only after a long lapse of time that a victorious revolution finds an echo in other countries.

Our international movement, numerically feeble, has done everything it was possible for it to do; there is no sense to say and write that it has not done its duty. Its weakness does not prevent it at all from having a clear vision and we are convinced that after all is said and done, the revolutionary masses will act in the sense they always indicated: against fascists and against the counter-revolutionary anti-fascists; that is, against all the combined forces of capitalism, among which the workers, with good reason, will not differentiate . . .

And in conclusion, allow us to state that we are just as much realists, and less "catastrophical" than you.

THE C. N. T. AND REFORMISM

By ONOFRE DALLAS

A reply to "Class Collaboration—Old and New" which appeared in the August Number of the One Big Union Monthly.

In the August issue of ONE BIG UNION MONTHLY, fellow worker Jos. Wagner writes an article pointing out the fact that socialist governments have been in the past the last resort of capitalism, and suggests that the C. N. T. in Spain is now following the same path. In an attempt to prove his assertion he cites and reprints an open letter written by A. Shappiro, former Secretary of the IWMA and well known anarchist.

I believe that, since a big issue is involved, as the actions and tactics of the CNT, whether right or wrong, will undoubtedly have considerable bearing on the future tactics and methods of revolutionary workers, a thorough discussion of the matter should be carried out to decide whether, under the circumstances the C. N. T. was justified in changing its tactics, whether any other way was open to them, except self-effacing, sterile 100% straight revolutionary action. We shall also see whether the CNT has duplicated the actions of the Millerands, Eberts, McDonalds, etc. When you know all the facts, I hope that you'll agree that, under the circumstances, the C. N. T. has acted in the only possible manner to save the Spanish working class from utter destruction, and that the assertions and conclusions of fellow worker Wagner are wrong and most unfair.

Now, let us see how the situation stands. Has the CNT joined the government to save it from the social revolution? This charge could easily be dismissed by pointing out the accomplishments in the line of collectivisation, and socialization of industry and agriculture in the face of the opposition of the petit bourgeois (republicans) a large part of the socialists and the whole communist parties. The bloody events of Barcelona should be a most flat denial of that unfounded charge. How many factories, farms, industries, or capitals have the Millerands, the Eberts and Scheidemanns and the McDonalds expropriated from the capitalists of their respective countries? Now, compare the record of expropriations by the CNT in this field and you'll have a further denial to the charge of their being saviors of capitalism.

It is true that the CNT deviated from the old revolutionary tradition as outlined by Bakunin and other teachers, but then Bakunin was never faced with a fascist insurrection that required the unification of all the antifascist elements including the petit bourgeoisie in order to withstand the attack of the stronger enemy and eventually defeat it. Again, the CNT is anarchist-inspired and anarchists are not followers of any particular man, for all men are fallible, and if Bakunin or Kropotkin were right in some things, they were wrong in other things. Anarchists are somewhat eclectic.

Let us examine the actual facts and view them in a realistic manner. Let me put it in the form of a few questions, and in the answer you'll have the key to the whole matter.

Can the CNT, alone that is, without the cooperation of the socialists and communists, make a successful revolution in Spain? Can the C. N. T., alone, make a successful revolution against the bourgeoisie, the socialists and the communists? Can the C. N. T. make a successful revolution against the bourgeoisie, the socialists and the communists plus the well equipped, well organized fascists having the full backing of Hitler and Mussolini? And a final question: Can the C. N. T. wage a war for any length of time against either the fascist front or the petit-bourgeoisie-socialist-communist front, the former fully supported by Hitler and Mussolini and the latter with the full support of Russia, France and England instead of the lukewarm, conditional support of today on the part of Russia, the platonic sympathy of France and the doubtful neutrality of England? The answer to all these questions is an emphatic NO.

Since the C. N. T. cannot go any farther than it did in its revolutionary path for the reasons I have enumerated, and since circumstances make it imperative that all the antifascist elements unite in order to stop the onslaught of the fascist hordes, to follow the old tradition which would involve warring and sabotaging on the government, etc., would have been suicidal. Inasmuch as cooperation is the watchword (it is not the fault of the anarcho-syndicalists if other anti-fascist sections are not sincere) the CNT, by reasons of its numbers and militancy, should have something to say in the conduct of the war, and although despite the efforts, of the CNT and the anarchists, most of the conducting of the war had been done from the offices of the government rather than from the labor unions, the CNT decided to have some of their men in those govenment offices to take a hand in the direction of the war, without however neglecting the bigger and more important tasks of the C. N. T. unions in their work of reconstruction, collectivisation and socialization. The aim of the C. N. T. leaders and the rank and file, both in and out of the government has been to make the labor unions the real "government" in Spain, and since every worker is organized, that would mean that the affairs of the nation would be managed by the workers, without however eliminating the petit bourgeoisie altogether for the time being, for even the most extremist anarchists realize that it is essential to keep the goodwill of Russia and France and a more or less neutral attitude on the part of England. It is admitted by both friend and foe that a "soviet" or "anarchist" Spain would mean open intervention on the part of Hitler and Mussolini as well as England and possibly France, which would put a quick and bloody end to the totalitarian experiment.

I cannot understand why men of intelligence like Shappiro and other European anarchists who have attacked the path followed by the Spanish anarchists and syndicalists in this war, should fail to realize the abnormal situation in which the Spanish anarchists and syndicalists find themselves. Do they want the Spanish anarchists to play the heroic role and waste their energies and their blood fighting the other antifascist sections and allow Franco to break through in the meantime to finish them up, thus opening the way for the ultimate triumph of the rebel cause in Spain and worldwide fascism?

It is rather interesting to note that in this matter as in many others, extremes meet. Thus we have the elements most opposed to the anarchists participating in the government (there must be a reason for it) in Spain are the communists, whereas the same attitude is taken by the extreme anarchists in Europe, particularly in France, and now (apparently) Joseph Wagner, of the I. W. W., in the United States.

It goes without saying that the C. N. T. has replied to the attacks and the critics of both friends and enemies. Therefore, in closing I will quote from the manifesto just issued by the CNT and signed by Mariano R. Vazquez, Secretary of the National Committee. It reads:

"Allow us to go ahead. We accept all suggestions; all the initiatives, all cooperations. We accept them and we need them. But, with what material do you criticize and reprehend us? What do you know of our tragedy? What do you know of the difficulties of the struggle in Spain?"

The sacred principles would have been saved. Of course. No doubt. But the fascist beast would have plunged the Spanish people into the darkest of tyrannies, into cruelest of despotism, into the most appalling misery. The story of the German and Italian tragedies would have been repeated. And we, with or without your approval, with or without principles, with or without compromises —we shall discuss that some day—are determined that the tragic history of fascist victories shall not be enriched with one page more. We want before everything else to crush fascism and, side by side with the pennants of victory, raise the banner of freedom that will guide the world proletariat through the path of its emancipation."

All About The Sodbusto-Simian War

Once upon a time the papers told about a strange war that had broken out in Southwest Africa. It seems that after the Germans had taken the country from the Hereros and the British had taken it from the Ueber Alles, the Sodbusters invaded the land and proceeded to take it away from the Monkeys and Baboons. This unwarranted and lawless act of Homo Sap-iens, the Simians bitterly resented; and no wonder, seeing that the Sodbusters, as usual ruthlessly and senselessly proceeded to destroy all the fruit, root and berry patches of the Simians, leaving them nothing for it but to die or go on the Dole.

But, strange to tell, unlike Homo Sap-iens in the same fix, the Simians chose to do neither without a scrap. Neither did they scrap with each other over who and which was to get the biggest hunk of the Garbage the Sod-busters charitably handed them out of their unsaleable Surpluses. On the contrary, they seem to have noted the ways and manners of the Sap-iens and to have profited by their observations and experiences, a thing the Sap-iens seldom seem able to do save after centuries of travail. But, as usual, I digress.

Noting the way in which the Anglo-Teutons had gone about taking the country from the Hereros and the manner in which the Sod-busters had expropriated it from them, the Simians seem to have concluded that what was sauce for the Goose was catsup for the Gander. Having, in their simplicity, arrived at this conclusion, it did not take any extraordinary stretch of imagination for them to note and act on the ancient Sap-ien principle that "they Take who have the Power and they Keep who Can."

Therefore, no Missionaries having ever bothered to convert them, they proceeded to act, not as "Reasonable Beings", but as their Evil Natural Instincts urged them on to do, which was, first, to Eat when Hungry, second, not to Starve in sight of Plenty.

Acting on this Evil Urge, the Simians raided the fruit orchards, berry, potato and vegetable gardens of the Sod-busters and feasted themselves and their kids on the best grub in sight, and all regardless of the Holy Institution of Private Property, of which they knew nothing, they being subject only to the laws of Nature. So blame them not if, unlike the Civilized, they in their ignorance and innocence thought the Fruits of Earth were there for all creatures and not merely to sell at a profit.

Undoubtedly it was due to their ignorance of Civilizer Procedure when the Simians titfortated on the Sod-busters; but, as "Ignorance of the law Excuses no one," and as "All are Equal before the law Expropriated and Expropriators alike, the Sod-busters naturally, and again as usual, flew into a rage and proceeded to set snares, trapguns and poisoned bait for the Simians. "And did the Simians take it laying down?" They did Not, that is if all latest reports coming from the Front were correct they didn't. Instead the Monks and Babs, again unlike Homo Sap-iens in a like hole, declared War, not on Each Other, but on the Sod-busters. Gathered on the hillsides and cliffs, armies of Simians would hurl rocks, sticks and anything else that came handy down on the Sod-busters passing, whether on foot, horseback, in wagons or in autos. At last accounts, it was Simply Fierce. The poor Sod-busters could hardly stray out of their Mortgaged Shacks without running danger of getting their coconuts cracked by a rock thrown by some Savage Simian who had no respect whatever for "The laws of Civilized and Christian warfare."

"How did it all end?" Well, son, I don't know. The papers seldom carry news after its first Sensational Value has worn off, for, you must know, the Sensational is to the Kept Press what Sin is to the Church—the Raw Material out of which is manufactured Prestige, Profits and Power. Hence the said Raw Material must never be allowed to become Stale or it will not be effective in Keeping the Pot Boiling. Darn it all, here I go digressing again! But when Silly Simians act in certain ways so much like Super-Sap-iens, only with more hossense, how can a feller help making obsevations he ort not to? Anyhow, the Simians didn't take it laying down or thanking Eff Dee Arr or any other Magician or Magicians for handling them Scraps in lieu of their "Unalienable Right to Life, Liberty and the Pursuit of Happiness." On the contrary, the Simians seemed, if all reports are true, to have acted on the principle of "Give us Liberty or give us Death!" And, not being themselves Civilized or armed with Civilized Weapons, I guess the Simians finally got what the Unregenerated get when they go up against the Elect. If you don't know what that is, read the horrible history of Africa since the "Civilizing" of the Dark Continent began and, when you have finished, if you don't agree that the Negroes of Africa have a better right to a White Devil than the Supremewhites ever had to a Black or Red one, then I give up.

Moral

Quit libeling the Monkeys. Men are not descended from them. No Simian of any tribe ever starved in sight of plenty or allowed his kids to grow up anemic and rickerty because the coconut groves had "Produced Too Much Milk." No Monkey ever was guilty of that cruel imbecility. Only Homo Sap-iens produces for Profit and not for USE.

MIDDLE CLASS REVOLUTION

BONAPARTE BY EUGENE TARLE. Translated from the Russian by John Cournos. Knight Publications, Inc. New York. $4.50.

Today's school of biography is either debunking or laudatory. Seldom do the authors search for material reasons to account for actions. If you like either of the first two types, then Tarle will be to your liking.

To really understand Bonaparte, we must first understand his historical epoch. We may appreciate his capacity for planning, his ability for organization or his military strategy, yet we will be unable to comprehend his favorable milieu, unless we are aware of the fundamental social changes then taking place.

France was breaking the chains of feudalism, being transformed from a social order dominated by landlords and the church, to one controlled by the rising middle class. This latter class had obtained the assistance of the peasants and the artisans in fostering and promoting the revolution of 1789 in France. These moving masses of aroused peoples would have gone farther and done irreparable damage to the new French acquisitive society, had they had a sincere and capable leader.

Bonaparte fresh from military exploits in Egypt was not that leader. He hated and feared the lower orders. His dreams of imperialistic conquest of Continental Europe dovetailed into the expansionist ideas of the now unfettered bourgeoisie.

This imperialistic conquest served two purposes. It diverted the aroused revolutionary energy of the French masses into acts of aggression against still feudal states, and it brought trading profits to the middle-class supporters of Bonaparte.

These same bourgeoisie were content to allow Bonaparte to root out all semblance of free election, of the beginning of democratic methods in France. Why? Because it stemmed the tide of revolutionary but unguided mass fervor. After 1789 the church had been deposed from its position of arrogance and its estates had been confiscated. In 1812 Bonaparte made a Concordat with the new Pope Pius and restored the church to a state of eminence in France. Bonaparte had expressed disbelief since his cadet days, but he well knew the advantage of controlled mass opinion.

Such appetites as those of the middle classes were whetted by Napoleonic victories, such as that at Austerlitz. As long as glorious military conquests brought in new revenues and opened new trading markets, the bourgeoisie stood by Bonaparte. When it became necessary to use the best French soldiery as garrisons of occupation, when unseasoned youths met defeat against the combined continental armies, when the Napoleonic Wars became a drain rather than an addition to the French Treasury, the bourgeoisie lost all desire for further imperialistic conquest and made peace at any price over the protest of Bonaparte.

Returning defeated to a disgruntled and war impoverished France, Bonaparte was still enough of the popular leader to have led the people to overthrow the bourgeoisie regime. He spurned this opportunity to go down in history as an emancipator and accepted exile. His temporary return was but a middle-class plot.

Bonaparte was the Middle-Class Dictator. Twenty-five years of research by Tarle compacted into this volume of 450 pages with an excellent bibliography, brings forth a new school of life stories of great men and what made them great.

MINNEAPOLIS STRIKE

AMERICAN CITY by CAHRLES RUMFORD WALKER. Farrar & Rinehart, $2.50.

To constant readers of the labor press the memories of the bloody truck drivers' strikes of 1934 in Minneapolis can be refreshed by this book. To those of recent union acquaintance, this story of the actual strike warfare and its antecedents will prove to be a behind the scenes glimpse.

It is hard to understand why the Citizens Alliance and the vigilante augmented police of Minneapolis were so vicious, unless we know the open shop, frontier exploited history of the prairie capital. Here was the stamping ground of the Jim Hills and the Villards, the early robber barons (actually called captains of industry). The followers of the early tradition of the "public be damned" are today's Pillsburys, Washburns, DeLaittres and the whole coterie of Minneapolis' Lowry Hill aristocrats.

It took men of calibre to fight against this lineup. To build a union in the face of violence and apathy, and make that union the most powerful transportation union in the middle west prairie states. The leaders of this union of hard fisted family men of determination were a small group of expelled communist party members, the Dunne brothers and Carl Skoglund. Of course there were others, but these members of the radical splinter group had much to do with the policy and strategy of the strike.

In this volume is traced the growth of the Farmer-Labor party in Minnesota and its climb to power with Olson. According to this book, Olson first sent the militia to the Flour City with the intention of suppressing violence on both sides in the strike even though it meant the breaking of the strike itself. He was dissuaded by the union and thereafter the militia became an aid rather than a hindrance. Walker has his sympathies but they do not prevent the book from becoming readable.—James Dewitt.

THEY ARE FINE PEOPLE

quack, quack," until it was impossible to get another minute's sleep.

Some fine man.

The next was a ranch at Drummond, Mont. The first time I sat down to the table the old man says, "I had an awful good man last summer."

"Yes," says the old lady, "and he was such a small eater."

This guy was always saying, "We will leave that for Sunday."

Every damn Sunday he had enough work left, branding calves, shoeing horses, or cutting pigs to last us all day.

Two days after I declared myself against any more Sunday work I was laid off.

The next place was another one-egg-for-breakfast layout. Once, when the lady was in town, the other hired man and I fried six eggs apiece for ourselves. When she came back and saw the signs on our plates she gave us hell, telling us "those eggs are to sell and not for you to eat."

But here comes the worst of all. I hired out to a man at Cherry, Wash. He did feed good but he worked 16 hours a day.

One day we were two and one-half miles out in the field at 11:45 and I asked him if it wasn't time to quit for dinner. He says, "Boy, I came out here to work and not to watch the time. I don't think much of a man who carries a watch on a farm."

"Well," I answers, "what do you call quitting time?"

"You can't have any quitting time on a farm," says he.

By this time I knew a little more than when I first started working for farmers and so I said, "I'll make a quitting time for you." And after that I quit every day at 11:30 and 5:30 and he never said any more about it. But he used to send me up the road a couple of miles or so when he could think of something to do there just before quitting time so I would be out late any way. He didn't gain anything on me though because I would just half do the job when he did that.

This farmer talked a lot more about work than he did. He would sleep after dinner until three or four o'clock and then go out until nine in the evening. He expected the hired man to do the same—but without the afternoon nap.

In the end he couldn't stand my methods for he blew up one day after dinner because I stopped a few minutes after eating to read the paper in the dining room.

Yes, friends, I love the poor farmers, the worst exploiters of labor in the world.

THE GOOF SAYS:

That a substitute for the I. W. W. is better than the real article;

That Hitler is sent by God to free the German workers from exploitation;

That it is the Spanish people that are helping Franco and that Hitler and Mussolini are only looking on and not helping him;

That without the capitalist there would be no capital;

That the way to freedom is to give up all freedom to a dictator;

That it is better to vote than to organize;

That you must have leaders to lead you and that he, the goof, is the one to lead the workers, "so elect me dictator and all will be well."

Preamble of the Industrial Workers of the World

The working class and the employing class have nothing in common. There can be no peace so long as hunger and want are found among millions of working people and the few, who make up the employing class, have all the good things of life.

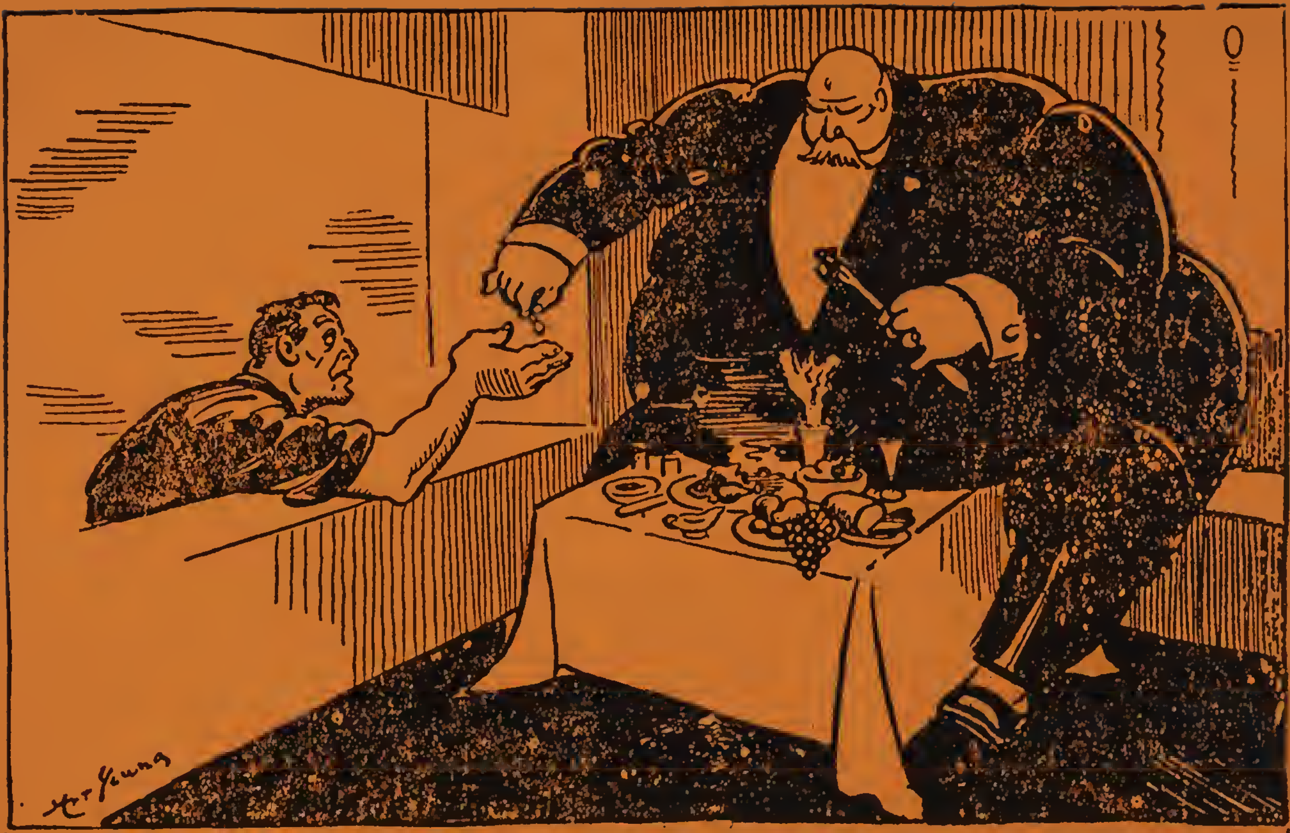
Between these two classes a struggle must go on until the workers of the world organize as a class, take possession of the earth and the machinery of production, and abolish the wage system.

We find that the centering of the management of industries into fewer and fewer hands makes the trade unions unable to cope with the ever growing power of the employing class. The trade unions foster a state of affairs which allows one set of workers to be pitted against another set of workers in the same industry, thereby helping defeat one another in wage wars. Moreover, the trade unions aid the employing class to mislead the workers into the belief that the working class have interests in common with their employers.

These conditions can be changed and the interest of the working class upheld only by an organization formed in such a way that all its members in any one industry, or in all industries if necessary, cease work whenever a strike or lockout is on in any department thereof, thus making an injury to one an injury to all.

Instead of the conservative motto, "A fair day's wage for a fair day's work," we must inscribe on our banner the revolutionary watchword, "Abolition of the wage system."

It is the historic mission of the working class to do away with capitalism. The army of production must be organized, not only for the every-day struggle with capitalists, but also to carry on production when capitalism shall have been overthrown. By organizing industrially we are forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old.



THE MINIMUM WAGE

When the workers of the world organize industrially for economic action on the job they will no longer be compelled to go begging for permission to work, or for a hand-out.

When they build the One Big Union of wage workers they will be able to enjoy the full truits of their labor, asking no man's leave to live and enjoy life in a world that their labor has created.

The Source of Strength

When black reastion settles on a nation's workers, when democracy is dead, and the ballot box thrown into the discard; when free labor unionism is outlawed and the heavy hand of a dictator seeks to crush out every vestage of working class freedom—where will resistance to tyrrany be born again? Where will aspirations for a new freedom find expression in fruitful action?

Fellow Workers, it will be on the job; in the industries. For workers to whom the command is given to produce, always and ever have the power to stop production or to slow it down. As long as production is in charge of workers (and how can it be otherwise) they have a power of which they cannot be robbed. Tools in the hands of workers are more than implements, they are, in a sense, weapons also, which can be used with effect in the class struggle.

Once there was a time when there was no ballot box for workers to use, and when unions were illegal. But workers were not stopped from taking economic action, or from eventually organizing unions in spite of all prohibition. In the depth of their slavery they still had their one indispensable source of strength—that power to act on the job that is the workers' even in wage slavery.

The power to act on the job, now and always, is the only one that cannot be taken away from workers by the employing class, and so the I. W. W. is right when it says it is the only power they actually have under any circumstances.

Let opportunissts say what they will, organization of economic power is the function of a workers' labor movement.

POWER OF FOLDED ARMS

All the wheels be standing still
If thy folded arms might will!

By

W. E. TRAUTMANN

The protest of the workers is seldom directed by the inflexible laws of the class conflict consciously applied in defense or attack. Were it not so energies, once spent in such demonstrations, never could be diverted into the quagmire of capitalist-dominated organizations.

When accumulated discontent manifests itself it may be directed into one of two channels which flow in opposite directions. One leads to beneficiary achievement for the whole class of wage workers; the other feeds the wheels of detriment to the interests of working class solidarity.

From the outset of manifested protest the course taken depends upon what group, as exponents of clearly defined objectives, assumes responsibility of intellectual leadership and is accepted in that capacity. Let us review some of the periodically appearing events in the "Social Protest" within the United States of America.

As everybody seems to think that SITDOWN STRIKES have blazed a new short-cut to the millenium, the purpose of the present analysis must be weighed by the Power wielded by Folded Arms, and the Facts of bayonets in the hands of soldiers animated by the commandment: Thou shalt not kill!

That law should take precedence over other laws, although it may be declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Courts of Germany, Italy, Hungary, and the United States.

The native American wage worker on the railroads had made a courageous stand against the abominably merciless power of the first combination of employers in the transportation industry, headed by Jay Gould. Martin Irons, that irrepressible rebel, clean and incorruptible in his concept of social responsibility, had been forced into an outcast's life. It had availed little that the aroused people of Pittsburgh, Pa., had scattered the ranks of the state troops on their march to the roundhouses where they were to be quartered.

Little did the world know that school children had captured cannons from retreating militamen and were parading them through the districts where miners and mill workers lived. When locomotive tenders filled with oil were dispatched from hillsides, ablaze with infernal heat, along the switch-locked tracks into the roundhouses and the central railroad station, starting a conflagration that threatened to engulf the business district in a pandemonium of destruction, it only served Jay Gould as a welcome pretext to start in Wall street the "Black Friday" with all the nauseating orgies of self-destruction by speculators and brokers.

Reward of violence

A servile court later assessed all the damage done against every property owner in Iron City, which they finished paying—principal and interest—only a few years ago.

A new precedent was established as a warning. Henceforth the petit bourgeosie in other places would know the penalty for sympathizing with workers in protest, although such outbursts might in the future repeatedly be directed against other industrial despots of the type of Jay Gould.

While Martin Irons and a few of his associates were driven across the continent as exiles from further opportunities in their own native land other exiles crossed the Atlantic in flight from political tyranny in lands across the sea. Martin Irons fell by the wayside from hunger and exhaustion; his body was dumped into a pauper's grave, a victim of the power of predatory interests that could not corrupt that great American but killed him by slow starvation.

Another outstanding leader of America's railroad men, Eugene V. Debs, writing his memorial tribute to the dead pioneers on new fronteers, learned the lessons of the defeat that followed heroic resistance—where, as stated by one of the participants who later became an outstanding editorial writer for William Randolph Hearst, "dynamite mixed with coal went into fireboxes of the engines and hell popped high in the roundhouses of the Erie line."

Rebel Emigrants

The exiled rebels from European lands, finding asylum in the United States, for want of other opportunities filled the rapidly growing manufacturing plants in the middle-west.

The branches of the International Workingmen's Association gathered the rebels in their folds. The Amerikanischer Turnerbund and the Bohemian Sokols (gymnastic unions) directed the agitation for a "Sound Mind in a Sound Body." In their cooperatively controlled halls—12 in Pittsburgh, 8 in Cincinnati, 12 in St. Louis, etc.,—the cultural needs of a new pioneering class were stimulated and led into agencies for constructive action.

Insisting on the constitutional right that American freemen must not be restrained from carrying arms for purposes of defending the right to a free press, free speech, and free assemblage, there were organized the Lehr- und Wehr-Vereine (To teach and to defend societies). They flourished in every large city in the Middle-West and exercises were held in training camps established in suburbs of these towns.

In the central councils of Chicago, Cincinnati, St. Louis, and other places all societies of liberal thought and for constructive endeavors gathered for consultation on matters of policy and for the advancement of a United Cultural Front.

However, in the East, particularly in New York City, things had come to pass which threatened to encompass the "socialists and anarchists" in a civil war with workers not conversant with the radical way of waging the class struggle againt the exploiters of labor.

Organized Scabbery Appears

Samuel Gompertz, emerging from the slum districts of London, came to the United States, not as an exile but rather as an ordinary emigrant. After being engaged for a few months by a relative to roll a few packs of stinkadores every day, he was engaged by a daily German socialist publication, the New Yorker Volkszeitung as reporter and editorial writer. In this position Gompertz,—then terming himself at the "Round Table" at Schwab's place on East Second street, New York, a philosophical anarchist—had gained support for a scheme to defeat the conservative policies of the Knights of Labor cigar makers assembly which had adopted a "White Label" as a trade mark in shops where Knights of Labor were employed.

The blue label of the International Cigar Makers union was placed in competition, and members of the International filled the places of Knights of Labor members in this "first jurisdictional fight" under the direction of said Samuel Gompertz. Mark that down in your mind!

Quite a different course was pursued in the territory west of Pittsburgh. Among the exiles from European countries were many students from leading universities.

It happened that the breweries, packing plants and restaurants absorbed many of the exiled rebels. They kept close company in the meetings of the International Workingmen's societies, in the Turnvereinen, and Bohemian Sokols. They planned and schemed—how to establish rights in the workshops, curtail and abolish abuses under which they suffered more intensely than those who never had the courage to rebel against the kind of despotism they had tried to escape by seeking refuge in the United States. Theirs was this keynote: The power to produce, as a social function, conferred power also to stop producing if anti-social tendencies were to be combatted.

The slogan of Folded Arms to make the wheels stand still led to the first test of power in the Jackson Brewery company in Cincinnati.

The Power of Folded Arms

In those days the workers in breweries were quartered and boarded in a special confinement called the Schalander... The working hours were unlimited. Every man had to be obedient to beck and call any time during the day or in the night. So the Schalander, by habit, and by strict construction of law, was a collective home.

One day in mid-summer 1884, the resolution to stay at home and let the bosses take care of the work themselves found its concrete expression in a Folded Arms demonstration. The bosses and the underlings of the Jackson Brewery company protested. They were told politely to leave the premises. As they went out—down 120 steps of stairway hewn into the rocks—they swore that everyone of the employes would hang by the neck for the outrage of locking out the employers.

State troops were called out; cannon rattled over the cobble stone paved streets of the Cincinnati hill district.

The Jackson Brewery was a solid structure, huge vaults having been hewn into solid rock. But as the troops were marching to take possession, the men in the brewery built barricades of barrels filled with beer and water, on the terraced hillsides.

The Lehr- und Wehr-Verein patriots were also on the march; intent on defending with arms, the constitutional rights of men to protect their homesteads, even if it were the Schalander in a brewery in which they lived subject to the master's absolute power to summon them to the tasks of brewery peons. "Brewery peons" is the correct translation of Brauerei-Knechte, as the men in the breweries were then called.

The siege lasted a few days. There were enough provisions in the Schalander storage vault for several weeks. The bosses hoisted a flag of truce first, to allow a committee to proceed unmolested to parley with the embattled workers. Peace terms, revolutionary in character for those days, were agreed upon—without one solitary socialist lawyer being permitted to wisecrack on the constitutionality of the procedure.

There wasn't any violence. There wasn't a drop of blood spilled, but barrels of amber fluid flowed down the throats of state troopers before their departure.

Industrial Unionism

The triumphant brewery workers summoned by wire representatives from the food producing industries to meet in convention for the formation of the first real industrial union of wage earners in the United States. The United Brewery Workers organization was formed with the objective of embracing every man and woman, regardless of whether skilled or unskilled, in one solid rank and file alliance for the purpose, plainly expressed in the declaration of principles, to educate the workers for the task of operating the industries when they shall become socialized institutions in character and functions.

The bakery workers organized on the same lines. There were no high-paid officials then to bargain with the bosses how to fill the places left vacant by protest-demonstrations.

The meat packing employes everywhere rushed into Knights of Labor assemblies. In the packinghouse plants of Chicago the eight-hour work day was established after a 24-hour Folded Arms Demonstration. Terrance Powderly, then Grand Master Workman of the Knights of Labor, claimed that to his credit, as was to be expected; while Samuel Gompertz was just finishing the filthy job of displacing, in New York City, Knights of Labor cigarmakers by organized strikebreakers of his own union.

This all happened two years before the call, emanating from the Association of Iron, Steel and Tin Mill Workers and financed from funds furnished by an agent of Andrew Carnegie, the Iron Master, was sent out summoning delegates to Pittsburgh to launch the craft union movement under the auspices of the American Federation of Labor. All rival organizations were to be scabbed or slugged out of existence, in due course of time, Mark that down in your mind.

The urge to solidify their position, to consolidate interests, to close their ranks, is ever present among the wage earners no matter how backward otherwise the masses appear to be in the understanding of their social status.

In the field of railway service the employers, through their agents, had followed up advantages gained in crushing every semblance of rebellion. They gained a "Peace at Warsaw" by fostering a state of understanding with the high officials of a few separate brotherhoods. Chief Arthur of the Locomotive Engineers and Chief Garrison of the Railway Conductors under that alliance were fortunate enough to accumulate immense fortunes in their own names.

In vain did the men in the service try to break the unholy alliance. Sporadic rebellions were subdued by filling the places of recalcitrants with recruits from obedient groups. Smarting under the ignominies of this policy Eugene V. Debs, high ranking official in the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and editor of the Locomotive Firemen's Journal, had challenged the right of these alliance chiefs to barter away collectively the rights of the railway workers as a class.

A Challenge to Fakerism

Despite appeals by some of his friends, who held that he could successfully bore from within by playing the game, Debs had given up all official positions in the brotherhood and had started out to form One Big Union of railway service men.

Just one flying trip in the engine cab, brought almost every employee on the lines of the James Hill interests into the folds of the American Railway union. To forestall discrimination a silent, passive resistance was inaugurated. The Northwestern system became completely demoralized; yet there was no suspicion of a regular strike or walkout.

Before Debs had reached Chicago from the flying trip, James Hill himself was frantically calling for a settlement. But only two men, Debs and Kelliher, could speak for all the employes. The whirlwind trip on a special engine, which was furnished Debs and his committee, for a conference with James Hill to settle the "folded arms" protest, is one of the record events of those days.

There was not one engine demolished, not an act of violence recorded; nor were there any lawyers permitted to prevent a direct agreement with the industrial ruler of the Northwest.

That victory spelled the doom of craft union bargaining, the tragic play of pitting worker against worker in the war for spoils to be garnered by the head masters of the bargaining counter. Indeed the country was astir. But organized scabbery was the stock in trade of the head masters of the craft union movement.

Gompertz Shows His Hand

Ten years had passed since the days when Gompertz had scabbed the Knights of Labor cigar makers out of their jobs and their security. Why not get recognition of organized strikebreakers as the sole bargaining agency?

The workers in the Pullman shops near Chicago had at last revolted against the outrageous peonage established in the company-owned dwellings of the employes. Their appeal to the American Raliway union resulted in all the lines controlled by the James Hill interests declaring that none would pull out a train to which a Pullman car was attached.

Instantly the Railway Managers Association took up the cudgles for the corporation. Pullman cars were ordered attached even to freight trains, so as to provoke resistance by the railroad workers. Subsequently work on all lines centering around Chicago came to a complete standstill. Yet there was no disorder, no violence.

But provocation was furnished by thugs of the Thiel and Pinkerton Detective agencies, under the command of one George Wahl. They set fire to thousands of cars lying idle in the freight yards. This and alleged interference with U. S. mail gave the pretext for ordering federal troops to Chicago, by executive mandate of President Grover Cleveland over the vehement protests of John Altgeld, then governor of Illinois.

To offset this, Soverign, Grand Master Workman of the Noble Order of the Knights of Labor, appealed to all labor and progressive organizations throughout the country to send representatives to meet in conference in Chicago so as to form a united front of labor and farmers. From headquarters of the American Federation of Labor came orders to ignore the summons; while Samuel Gompertz—now Gompers—in derision and contempt openly announced that he was going to drive the last nails into the coffin of the American Railway union. (For reference see reproduction of A. F. of L. exhibit at the St. Louis World's Fair as incorporated in published records of the first I. W. W. convention.)

In that conference appeals were made in vain to Samuel Gompers to consider the noble purpose of America's railroad workers in going to the aid of the "foreigners" employed by the Pullman company. Gompers held out for strict obedience to the law as laid down by Federal District Judge William H. Taft in an injunction—the first of its kind ever issued to prohibit workers from suspending services for the adjustment of wrongs—an injunction seemingly issued in connivance with the craft union leadership. Gompers demanded his pound of flesh, and took it. Tens of thousands of wage earners in railroad shops were forced back into the craft unions before they were re-engaged for service. Mark that down in your mind!

Debs, Kelliher, Hogan, and others were held on charges of contempt of court. They refused to accept the service of lawyers, and thousands of dollars contributed by the United Brewery Workers for a defense fund were returned by Debs with thanks. He and his associates went to jail for one year. The folded arms methods were condemned as Un-American in courts of law and from the pulpits; and Gompers and associates were once more placed on a pedestal of fame as the greatest patriots of the age. The organization of gang leaders was in the saddle to stay put!

The job of scabbing the Knights of Labor cigar makers out of existence being completed, the United Brewery Workers were given the ultimatum, in 1895, to sever their connection with the Knights with which they had been affiliated as Industrial and Trade District No. 37. They had voted in Chicago to support the plea of the American Railway union. That was a crime in the eyes of the capitalists and their labor lieutenants. Fearing that Gompers would make good his threat to fill their places by unionized scabs, as he had done in the New York cigar manufacturing trade, the United Brewery Workers at a convention held in Cincinnati in 1896 were compelled to repudiate bonds of solidarity with all these other industrial workers and cultural progressive organizations.

The Slave

They set the slave free, striking off his chains . . .
Then he was as much of a slave as ever.
He was still chained to servility,
He was still manacled to indolence and
sloth;
He was still bound by fear and superstition,
By ignorance, suspicion, and savagery . . .
His slavery was not in the chains,
But in himself.
They can only set the free man free . . .
And there is no need of that;
Free men set themselves free.

An Alabama Idyl

The Adventures of a Boy Hero in search of the Eats and Overalls

By Covington Hall

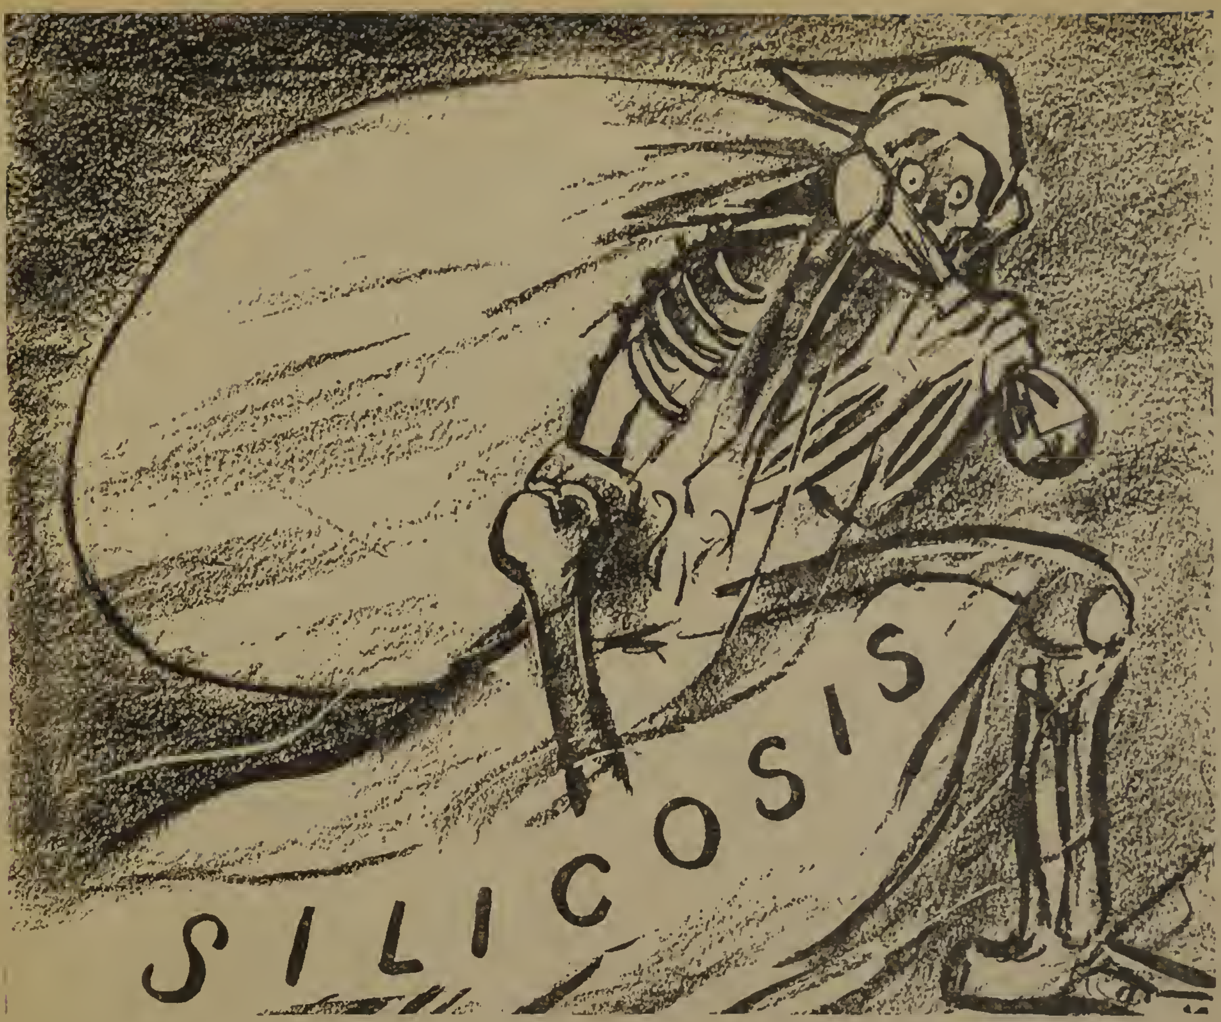
The shades of night were falling fast
When thru a Dixie village passed
A youth (he didn't have the price)
Whose banner bore the strange device:
"I want a job!"

He plodded on with weary feet
Down country road, up city street,
And all the bosses passed him by,
Tho far and wide they heard his cry:
"I want a job!"

The sheriff didn't like his ways;
The judge he gave him "ninety days";
And now he's working like a hoss,
Employed by the chaingang boss.
He's got a job!

The boy at last came home to maw,
The saddest sight you ever saw;
And when she kissed him on the head,
He cried aloud and, sobbing, said:
"I want a job!"

And then he left us all once more,
The Texan jungles to explore;
And mother asks, with eyes afright:
"Where is my wand'ring boy tonight?"
(I don't know, but I hope)
(he's organizing.)



A Challenge to Organized Labor

By JOHN SERSHON

As challenging as the "Cry of the Children from the Brickyards of Eangland," are some of the accounts describing the ravages of silicosis. Unfortunately few of these accounts ever reach the attention of those who might profit by them.

The Gauley Bridge tragedy of last year momentarily focussed the eyes of the industrial world upon this finally recognized scourge. But the accounts in the capitalist press, which the working class is suckled on, were incomplete and uninstructive, therefore, most workers are still in the dark as to what silicosis is, how and where it is contracted, and how to protect themselves when endangered by it. For these the story of Gauley Bridge bears repeating.

In 1930 the New Kanawha Power Co., a subsidiary of Union Carbon and Carbide Co., contracted (Rhinehart and Dennis, contractors) to drill a three mile tunnel for water power at Gauley Bridge, West Virginia. Gauley Bridge, at that time, was an all but deserted industrial village, which a half dozen years before had been engaged in the mining of coal. Now the mines were exhausted of their wealth—hence the desertion.

Profits Before Life

The few remaining natives passed their empty days with much talk of the Hawks Nest Tunnel,

---

Note: The Cry of the children from the Brickyards of England—a social book written by George Smith, an English man in 1885.

speculating upon the jobs that would be open to them, and of the progress and prosperity that the tunnel meant. Many of the natives did get jobs as well as hundreds of outsiders, in the days that followed.

The engineers found that the hard rock through which the tunnel was to be driven, was a mountain of almost pure silica (99 per cent in some parts). Any rock containing more than 25 per cent of silica is dangerous, and is known to be dangerous by all civil engineers. Nevertheless the West Virginia Department of Mines forewarned the company of the danger of silicosis, but because they had no authority over tunnels they could act no farther.

The warning was completely ignored by the company, but incidentally, an agreement was made with a factory in the state to sell them the silica removed from the tunnel for use in a commercial product.

Every state mining law was summarily broken by the exploiters who provided no ventilation at first, and used dry drills and no respirators. Dust was so thick in some sections of the tunnel that men could see no farther than five feet, while collisions of locomotives and other accidents occurred because of it. Workers who breathed the dust during the ten-hour day, complained of irritation of the throat and lungs and of a cough. "That," the company informed them, "is only tunnelitis." Many quit work and went away, but their places were quickly filled by others. The labor turnover was very high.

By the fall of 1930 hundreds had already died, allegedly of pneumonia, and when the tunnel was at last completed in September 1932 at least 2,000 men had lost their health and from 200 to 500 workers had died.

So rapidly did the workers succumb that the company was obliged to take charge of those who died. This it did with the greatest expedition possible. The men, their clothes still white with silica dust, were buried without benefit of clergy enmasse. One hundred sixty-nine of them were buried in a corn field.

Village of Dying Men

These and other ghastly facts were revealed before a Special House Labor Committee which investigated the case. Officials of the company, did not appear during the investigation, but in private conversations called the report of the deaths "gross exaggeration" and claimed that "the company used every modern device."

Vanetta village, which is near Gauley Bridge, was the subject of a Federal Emergency Relief administration report last year. It was this report which acted as a percussion cap to the government's investigation. Fifteen wage-earners, fourteen of them suffering from silicosis were shown to be providing for ninety-one people in the village. Almost every home had a victim or two dying of the disease. Added to this was starvation. There was no longer work and none fit to work. The government gave two or three dollars relief a week per family, for which those able were obliged to walk fourteen miles.

Shyster Lawyers brought suit against the company on behalf of the Gauley Bridge victims, but if any compensation was ever paid the lawyers were the chief gainers.

Senator Rush Holt of West Virginia called this working-class epic, "the most horrible industrial disaster in the history of the world and a permanent black mark on the record of American industry." Labor has often been enjoined to remember such things as the Alamo and the Maine, but it would be more in keeping with common sense if they would keep in mind—Gauley Bridge. However, Gauley Bridge is only one instance of silicotic deaths. The great mass of them are unknown and unheard of.

Worthless Legislation

The caterpillar Tractor Company in Peoria, Illinois gave its 1,400 workers in the foundry department a physical examination including an X-ray of the chest, in September of last year. On November 13th the company shut the foundry down until new machinery could be installed to comply with the new Illinois Occupational Diseases Act. One hundred seventy-nine of the men found a note in their pay envelopes advising them to appear at the company's personnel office on November 20th. Twenty at a time the men were admitted into the sanctum of the personnel manager. Here they learned for the first time that they were silicotics. From 80 to 100 were first class silicotics, which means that they had it bad, and the rest were second and third class. So with the deep regret of the company's spokesman 179 first, second and third class silicotics were given the air.

The new Occupational Act went into effect on December 1, 1936. It is similar to legislation passed in other states and as utterly worthless. It pretends to compensate silicotics and holds the last employer of a silicotic liable for damages. Our last advices have a few of the survivors still awaiting the decision of a federal court.

We can perceive from these cases that silicosis is just as bad as it is cracked up to be, but what are the causes and symptoms of the disease?

Causes and Prevalence

"Silicosis is a disease due to breathing air containing silica." It is but one of many similar diseases caused by breathing foreign material into the lungs. The result of breathing hematite (common iron ore) dust into the lungs is called "siderosis"; of chrysotile dust from which asbestos is made, "asbestosis." Anthrocosis is produced by breathing coal dust. All of these diseases are classfied under the term "pneumonconiosis" (dusted lung), but silicosis which is much more dangerous than any of these is only caused by inhaling silica dust, though different terms as, grinders rot, miners consumption or phtisis, stone masons' phtisis, potter' asthma, etc., are used by workers in different trades to identify it.

Silica is one of the most common minerals of the earth's crust and is found in most rocks. Free silica is found in quartz, quartzite, flint, sandstone, chert and chalcedony. Silica in combination (silicate) is found in feldspar, mica, talc, soapstone, various clays, chrysotile (asbestos) garnet and sericite. These minerals are widely used in industry.

The Second National Silicosis Conference of February 3, 1937 called by Secretary of Labor Perkins showed that of 49,000,000 workers, 1,000,000 or two per cent were exposed to silicosis, one per cent or 500,000 to a serious hazard. 110,000 have silicosis and 4,000 to 5,000 are affected seriously, being too disabled to work.

The working hazard for silicosis is acute in metal mining, anthracite mining, quarrying, drilling, tunneling in granite, gannister and sandstone; in smelting and refining; in foundries, potteries, glass works; in stone product industries, grinding, buffing, and sandblasting. Note: Booklet, "Silicosis" of Met. Life Ins. has a complete list.

Factors causing silicosis are:

(1) Amount of silica dust in air breathed by worker, (2) the rhythm of work on which depends depth of breathing, (3) length of exposure, (4) individual's own power of resistence.

Dust particles must be very small, below 10 microns in diameter (1 micron equals 1/125,000 of an inch), before they can be floated in the air and gain access to the air cells in the lungs. Silica dust in the lungs produces fibrous tissue similar to scar tissue. What produces the fibrosis is a moot question, the mechanical theory was first advanced followed by the chemical theory in which the silica was thought to act as a poison to the tissues, later physico-chemical. The Canadian Medical association Journal in its July 1937 edition tells of how physicians and investigators at the University of Toronto are working upon a different theory (Sir Fred Banting discoverer of insulin is one of them). Some of their experiments with animals seem to show that aluminum dust taken in the lungs reduces the effects of silica. Nothing, however, has been proved, and silicosis is still an incurable disease.

Symptoms

The principal symptoms of silicosis are shortness of breath, the spitting of blood and a reduction of breathing capacity due to the air sacs being scarified and filled up with silica. The chest wall is inelastic during respiration and there is a cough with recurrent pains. During early silicosis the patient may even gain weight. The disease is so insidious in its nature that as a rule the victim is unaware of having it until it is too late. Silicosis usually takes several years to develop—seven being the given average, but there have been many cases where less than one year was enough to bring death. Death from silicosis, though, is seldom unaccompanied by some acute respiratory infection, usually tuberculosis.

In a survey by the Sepcial Industrial Disease Commission in Massachusetts (report Feb. 1934) "7.6 per cent of the granite workers examined were found to have silicosis and tuberculosis, while it was noted that foundry workers were particularly susceptible to pneumonia 'about one fourth of all foundry men being found to succumb to this disease'." (Clark and Drinker, Indus. Med.)

In a study of anthraco-silicosis in Pennsylvania conducted by the U. S. Public Health Service in 1935, 616, or 22.7 per cent out of 2,711 examined had the disease. 106 of them being in advanced stages. These affected suffered from pleurisy, pneumonia and severe colds. One hundred twenty-four or 4.6 per cent of those examined had tuberculosis. The mine dust in this case contained 35 per cent pure silica.

The following typical cases of silicosis is taken from the Lancet of October 1930. The two young women spoken of were engaged in packing, cleaning powder in a London factory. Death followed in both cases shortly after symptoms appeared.

Quote: "The two girls, one of whom was 17 years of age and the other 19, had been employed for 2¾ and 4¼ years, respectively, in packing a cleaning powder containing ground silica. The first girl reported at a T. B. dispensary on April 27, 1928, complaining of a slight cough and pain in the chest. She was admitted to a hospital on April 30 and rapidly became worse, dying on June 4. The second girl was admitted to a hospital May 3, 1928, and died June 16, 1928. In the first case no tubercle bacilli were found in the sputum nor at autopsy, but in the second case the post mortem examination showed tubercle bacilli to be present. In both cases the lungs did not collapse upon opening the thorax (chest) for the post mortem examination but when removed from the body were bulky and very heavy and preserved their correct anatomical shape. On section they were extremely tough, grating as the knife went through the tissue. They were of a greenish-gray color resembling in a general way something of marble, and in the first case the lower lobes were almost entirely solid while the upper lobes still contained air but were tougher than normal. In both cases there were fine gray nodules throughout the lungs, and in the first case there was extreme fibrosis and in the interstices of this fibrosis there was a finely granular black or brown deposit." The soap manufactured was found to be 75 per cent pure silica with 25 per cent soap powder containing sodium.

Preventatives

We have seen something of the nature of silicosis —how can we prevent the disease?

The means of prevention are not always easy but among them are these:

1. "To suppress dust at the point of origin in such operations as rock-drilling, handling, pulverizing, and milling rock and ore; grinding metal on grindstones, abrasive wheel cutting of granite and sandstone.

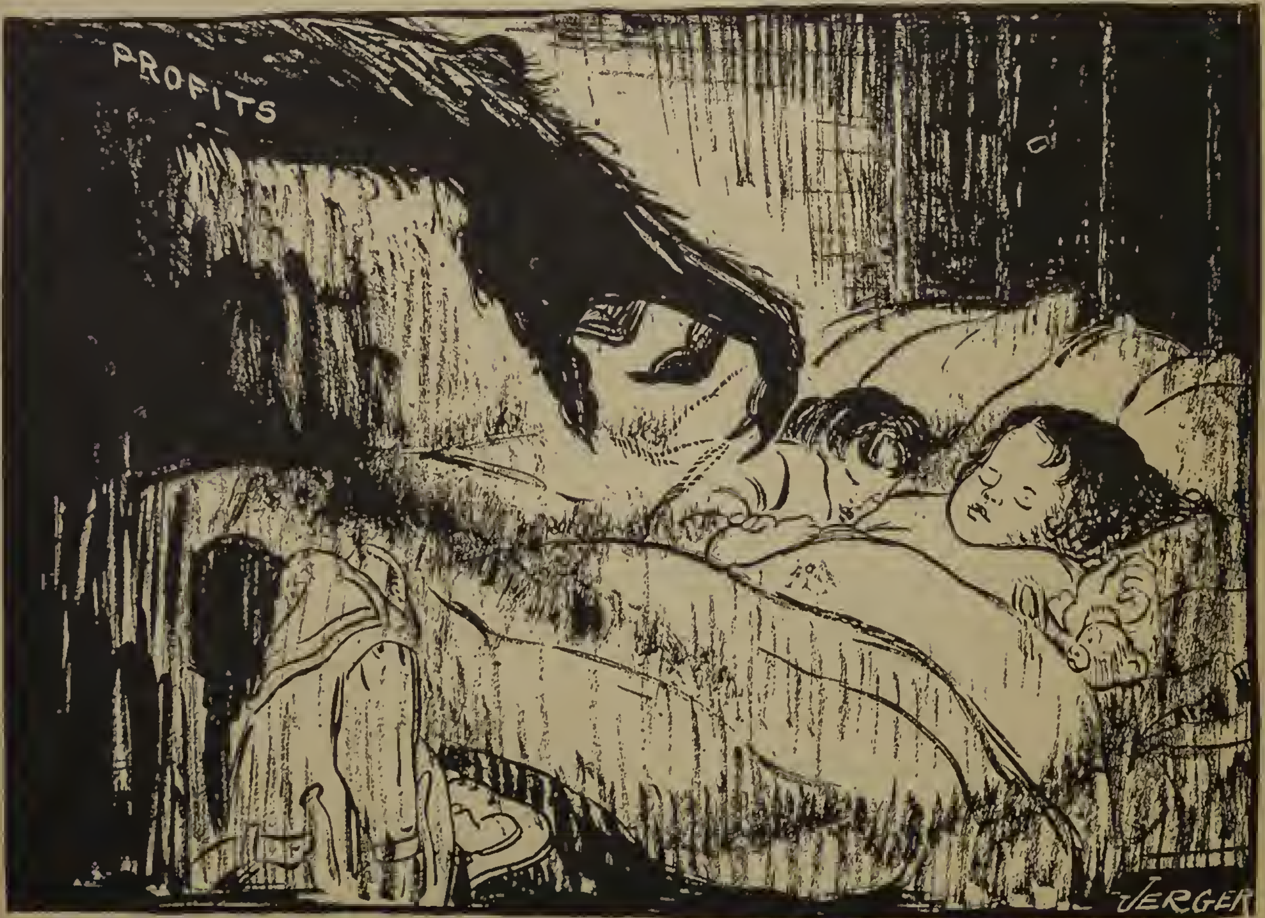
2. "To prevent the redispersion of dust that has settled on the floors, walls and other surfaces, such as in the granite industry and in foundries.

For the suppression of dust at the point of origin, the Kelley Dust Trap, is about the best arrangement. It is used in all forms of drilling (including jack-hammer), grinding, buffing etc. Other forms of suction exhaust hoods are also effective. The use of water and oil to lay dust has proved of great value. Good ventilation and the use of respirators with filters and supplied air if necessary (list from U. S. Bureau of Mines) are indispensable, while accumulated dust can be picked up with special vacuum cleaners, etc. Substitutes for materials containing silica.

Silicosis which is industrial disease number one, can be eliminated if we the workers by economic action, force those in power to comply to the health standards that the working class needs. With our economic power we can also force our parasitic masters to compensate those already stricken, so that their families if not they themselves can breathe fresh, clean air.

There are no state or federal statutes to protect the workers at their work and only eleven states give compensation to silicotics. (For an example of this see Monthly Labor Review May '37 —Wisconsin Workmen's Compensation.) Clearly, it is with the industrial worker himself that protection lies.

The Ptolomies knew about silicosis, Aristotle and Pliny wrote about it, a mining engineer's book warned of it in medieval times. Now the workmen of today should hear of it—and act!



Other valuable scientific accounts of industrial dangers to which the workers of today are exposed, and that will remain a threat to future generations of workers as long as the greedy and profit-hungry capitalist class remains in power, will be given by the same author in future issues of the One Big Union Monthly.

A STORY

By GEFION

Karl Meisner, Chef de Cuisine, Hotel d'Allemande, Copenhagen, was a punctilious man. Promptly each morning at 4:13, he threw his well-muscled legs from under the feather quilt and hit the floor wide awake. He could as well have pounded his ears to five, but the extra forty-seven minutes were exactly what was needed in order that Chef Meisner's 190 lbs of flesh and bone might be kept in trim. No big gut for him—donner und blitzen, nein!

At five o'clock he would step forth from his spick and span rooms to finish his morning's constitutional with a brisk walk along the wooded and venerable promenades of the ancient city. Five-thirty would find him at the famed and spacious kitchen of d'Allemande. A cup of Mocha, a Bogdanoff cigarette, and Chef Meisner swung into action.

Karl Meisner had come out of the gutters of Berlin. The sole reason he had become a chef was due to the idea of old Mutter Meisner, who one cold and snowy night had lain tossing on her straw tick, trying her damnedest to figure out how to provide wurst and kraut enough for her multitudinous brood. She had slowly come to the decision that Karl at least should not go through this vale of tears with an empty belly. She was going to see to it that he learned to be a cook—Ja, that was it! The other kinder? Well, she would have to scheme for them later—one at the time.

And by much wheedling and conniving, she had at last succeeded in getting the youngster placed as chef's pupil in the Berghof. And from the start, Karl proved to be a natural. He took to the concocting of piquant sauces, flaky butter dough pastries and epicurian courses as a duck takes to water. But the Berghof chef had a colossal paunch and was a no good schweinehund, and to his dying day, Karl Meisner hated blubbery guts.

To the Berghof there came one day another pupil. But this embroyonic Savarin was not a guttersnipe. Nor was he a Deutscher. He stepped from the Copenhagen-Berlin Express, shiney satchel in hand, well brushed, well washed behind the ears and superbly well recommended by Hr. Schoolmaster Barfod of the Copenhagen Latin School. Yes, the recommendation set forth that Viktor Remmel, aged 14, had been an exemplary pupil, high in languages and exceptionally well grounded in history and geography. But the kids with whom Viktor had smoked cigarettes and with whom he had learned that the tale about the stork was more or less unreliable, had surmised on the q. t. that this gushy document might have been prompted by the little fact that Papa Remmel, Collector of Royal Revenues, 3rd Class, now and then played a game of l'Hombre with Schoolmaster Barfod. But mebbe that was neither here nor there.

Anyway, the Berghof chef puffed out his hanging jowls like an adder and read with care the German translation of Viktor's virtues and after due formalities accepted his application. And thus it came to pass that another apprentice was added to the Berghof staff.

Karl Meisner looked upon the new arrival with disgust. Viktor spoke a precise and academic German that jarred upon Karl's ears as so much highbrow blah. He didn't mind the kid's being an outlander—a guy couldn't help where he was born—but, Godawmighty, that cream-puff palaver! So one fine day in the cobbled courtyard of the Berghof, Karl Meisner, chef's pupil, took a healthy Berlin guttersnipe swing at Viktor Remmel's chin and found to his dismay and surprise that the cream-puff knew how to duck. And before Karl had time to recover from his painful discovery, Viktor had him flat in one of the ivy covered corners of the ancient hostelry.

But Karl was no heel. He took his tamping-up philosophically. Old Mutter Meisner and the slums of Berlin had taught him not to be a louse. As Viktor backed off, he got to his feet, wiped the gore from his swollen beezer, stuck out a paw to Viktor and let him know that for an outlander and a rosebud, he hadn't done so damn bad at that. And from that day on, they were kameraden. Viktor showed Karl a trick or two about straight punching, upper cuts and sundry other items needed in a man's repertoire if he didn't want to get his can knocked off. In fact, he proved himself so effective an instructor that one day Karl sneaked over a smack to Viktor's whiskers that made him discover stars others than those listed in the astronomical text books.

Karl paid his debts to Viktor by declaring that if he didn't intend to be taken for a pansy the rest of his days, he'd better lay off that kursaal lingo he was using. Viktor protested that it was perfectly good and correct Deutsch—hadn't he received an udmaerket godt for it at the Copenhagen institution of learning, and Hr. Barfod certainly was an excellent teacher. Karl said nuts on Barfod and insisted that Viktor's German was as stiff as a Prussian lieutenant on parade. Well, if it would make Karl sleep any better, then, of course, Viktor would be glad and willing to throw grammar and perfection to the wind and take up the Hottentot argot Karl was jabbering. And so Karl set to work unraveling the mysteries of the Berlin slang and slum vernacular for Viktor. And on their days off, they toured the beer kneipes together and found out a secret or two about the Berlin janes that they thought it best not to mention to the Berghof meister koch—ha, ha, it might make the fat slob lose a kilo or two.

Five years at the Berghof and Karl and Viktor were told that they had absorbed all the culinary wisdom possible to impart by that kitchen. So they were presented with diplomas, duly signed and with red wax seals attached, and informed solemnly that they were not finished products yet—not by a long shot. Nein, they now would have to go out into the world and gain the experiences of other lands and foreign kitchens. And always—always—hold in high honor their art and profession.

And so they clicked their heels and made the proper salaams before His Nibs, the big pot-gut, shook hands with the staff all around, pinched the cheeks of a few of the chamber mädchens, were wished Glückliche Reise a thousand times over, went to the Rathaus and obtained permission from the military and municipal big shots to depart in peace and with legal sanction, made the last round of the beer kneipes, danced for the last time at their regular dive, went to Munsterstrasse and dried Mutter Meisner's maternal tears, and set out for Hamburg on foot and from there across Germany for the borders of Switzerland. But first Viktor dispatched a weighly epistle to Papa Remmel, Copenhagen, B, Denmark, telling him that he was on his way out into the wide world, and for Mama not to worry, he would take plenty of clean socks along, and send her an Edelweiss from the Alps.

Ah, days of freiheit! Oh, wunderschoene nights of adventures and bliss! Hamburg—Sankt Pauli! The Elbe River. Magdeburg. Halle. Nürnberg, Stuttgart. München—Switzerland. Mighty mountains and blue lakes. Months of work and added knowledge. Paris—three years of extensive studies, French and English for Karl—new delicacies, new tricks.

And then a letter with the Imperial Eagle sprawling all over it, telling Herr Karl Meisner to return forthwith to Deutschland and military duties.

They left together. Once more they walked the streets of Berlin and felt the greetings of the old scenes. But Mutter Meisner had returned to her ancestors and the Berghof chef had departed this terra firma one morning in a fit of apoplexy.

Viktor remained in Berlin long enough to take a snapshot of Karl in his infantry regalia—and to let him know that he looked verdammt funny. They went out and got gloriously drunk together—told each other that they would be friends till hell froze over, barged through their old haunts the night through and parted next day with swollen heads, never to see each other again.

Viktor landed in Copenhagen on a morning when the old town lay bathed in warm sunshine. It was good to be here again. The cobbled streets and squares, the golden and verdigris towers said, "Hello—so you're back!" Lovely girls and women looked at the foreign cut of his clothes and smiled into his face. He took the stairs to the parental flat in a few jumps. Papa Remmel said, "Welcome home, my son." And Mama through her tears and kisses confided that the lingeri Viktor had sent her from Paris was ever so charmant and chic, but, oh, a little too risque for a matron of her years.

And next morning, Viktor arose quietly and served for his loved ones a breakfast of Petites Croustades a la Genoise.

On the Langelinie promenade, Viktor met a jaunty golden haired nymph. She came down the graveled path with an easy and free swing to her walk. Viktor pushed his hat back on his head and said, "Hello, little one." She smiled faintly and kept on down the path. Viktor turned to watch her and she blew him a kiss as she disappeared among the trees.

He met her again the next evening. He tipped his hat and let her know that he thought it a nice evening. She laughed deep from her chest. Yes, the light nights were lovely, weren't they? And wasn't that moon out over the Sound just beautiful?

They stood together by the boulders where the Little Mermaid lies gazing sorrowfully in her bronze beauty out over the surf. Viktor said, "You're as lovely and beautiful as the mermaid—and what is your name?" She said, "You are a flatterer, and my name is Bertha—Bertha Helm—And yours, fresh one?" "Viktor Remmel, chef par excellence, the Berghof, Berlin—Switzerland, Paris—several recommendations as to morals and splendid character—a medal or two for haute cuisine—at the present unemployed."

They lay together in the anemones under the trees. Viktor told her of his life—of the Berghof, of the fat meister koch, of Berlin, of Karl Meisner and the glorious days and nights when they had tramped together across Germany into Switzerland, of Paris and its loveliness.

It was the light nights. In the trees and bushes the birds were twittering sleepily. The waves murmured across the rocks on the shore and sprayed the kneeling mermaid so that she became burnished gold in the moonlight. And it was as if they had known each other forever.

And one day Viktor Remmel sat down and wrote a letter to Karl Meisner, Private 57, 159 Infantry, Potsdam, Germany, and told him that he had married the loveliest mädchen in all the world, and that next month they would leave for America. He would write more from there—Auf Wiedersehen, old friend.

II.

In the famed and spacious kitchen of d'Allemande, the staff was whispering, "What is up with the Chef? Is he going off his nut—or what? He is as excited as a kid taking his final examination. Mebbe he has decided to get spliced—hope we get a hint to attend the wedding."

Oh, yes, Karl Meisner was excited all right, and no mistake. But he wasn't figuring on sharing his bed and board with any of the jolly Copenhagen dames—no matter how much they fished, no such a thing. But in his pocket he had a letter from Viktor Remmel, New Orleans, U. S. A., stating that he is sending his one and only son, Hugo, aged 10, to Karl Meisner, in order that the kid may get his hand in early, and so that he may, so Viktor hoped, become a second edition of the one and only Karl Meisner. He knew of no one else in whose charge he would intrust the kid, and now that the old folk were gone, would Karl also please arrange for the boy's schooling in Copenhagen. And good luck, you old bum, and all good wishes from myself and Bertha—and P. S.—Could Karl remember their last night together in Berlin?

And Karl Meisner read the letter and re-read it. He phoned the steampship company so that he wouldn't miss the kid. And he thought of Viktor and their days in Berlin and Paris, and he would have given his right arm to have those days back—and fame and a fat salary could go to hell. And he wondered what the kid would be like, and he swore a donner und blitzen that he wasn't going to let his friend over there among the wild Indians ever get a chance to say that he had let him down.

Karl Meisner, chef de cuisine, stepped from a taxi in the front of d'Allemande. He turned and gave his hand to Hugo Remmel and ordered the driver to take the baggage to Karl's rooms. They entered the kitchen and the staff stood gaping as if they were seeing old Nick himself.

Karl Meisner said, "Colleagues, this is a new pupil—Hugo Remmel from America—the youngest ever to be accepted by d'Allemande and the first ever to come from America—and that all by himself."

The maitre d'hotel found his voice and said, "But Herr Chef, he is only a stripling—he should be home in the nursery." Karl Meisner merely repeated, "He is the new pupil."

Hugo had taken in the whole scene—a queer land this was, he thought. Everybody talks Danish. Oh, yea, he understood that all right—Papa and Mother Bertha always spoke it at home—but here everybody speaks it—Why don't they also talk English? He gazed wide-eyed at the vaulted kitchen with all its shining pots and pans and its ranges and utensils. He looked at the emaculately white dressed army before him and he was awed. He would have given four marbles to be back home in New Orleans and his dad's cafe.

Karl Meisner took him by the hand and lead him through the kitchen and down to the cavernous wine cellars. Hugo looked up at the walls and thought that a swarm of the goblins Mother Bertha had told him about might jump from behind the mysterious looking strawdressed bottles. He sniffed the wine fumes and must and thought that this was the most exciting and dangerous cave he had ever gotten into.

They walked to the further wall. Karl Meisner stopped before a small barrel. He took two small glasses, frail and delicate as Tonder lace, and drew them full of pale-golden liquid. He handed one of the glasses to Hugo. "Drink that, Viktor's son, that will chase your sea legs away."

Hugo drank his glass empty: "Gosh, that's good—What it is?" "That, Hugo, is forty-year old St. Croix rum—a drink fit for men only—Makes your belly tickle, eh?"

He bent over the boy and lifted him into his arms. He looked into his face and studied him in silence. Then he said, "Now we go home for the day and tomorrow we go to work."

It is morning. Through the open windows of Karl Meisner's rooms comes the rumble of the first milk wagon. Charwomen are clattering along the sidewalks to their jobs, and in the wild chestnut trees, the birds are greeting the new day with a rhapsody of glee.

Karl Meisner is on the floor with a bounce. It is 4:13. He turns to Hugo's bed and shakes him—time to get up, you lazy pup. Hugo sits up and thinks that this is one tough world. Karl Meisner throws the quilt aside and Hugo gets to the floor. Together, they do their exercises—one—two—three. One—two—three. And Hugo stands naked on a bath rug and Karl Meisner sponges him with icy water. And he tells him of the value of strong belly muscles—keeps a feller straight and makes him able to take a smack to the guts. No fat, see! Or I'll beat your ears off. And Hugo says okay and rubs himself until he tingles. And he thinks Karl Meisner a pretty swell guy, even if he does speak English like a fool highbrow.

And under the trees on the promenades, men and women scurrying to work look at the burly chef and the gangling kid—a queer pair. Wonder who the kid can be? Mebbe one of the Hr. Chef's wild oats—Ha, ha! And they say Good Morning, Hr. Chef,—swell morning, eh?

And in the famed and spacious kitchen of d'Allemande, Karl Meisner, chef de cuisine, sips his morning Mocha and enjoys his Bogdanoff while Hugo drinks his coffee and munches brioches, thinking meanwhile that the latter are just about tops when it comes to eats.

And so work begins. Hugo is again one of the pupils—no favors from the Hr. Chef, no pampering, no coddling. Karl Meisner stands over him—You loemmel, I tell you once, twice—the third time —look out! And Hugo learns that this Big Brute, whom he calls Onkel Karl when off shift, is a pretty exacting mug when in the kitchen.

Eight o'clock and Hugo is off for school. And he has as teacher no Hr. Latin Schoolmaster Barfod. No, over him hovers a giant with a beard that would have made the mug of Erik the Red look like the fanny of a new born babe. When he whispers, the City Hall tower shakes. And on one's birthday he hands you a ten ore piece and says, "congratulations, old scout, and many happy returns."

And next to Hugo sit no cream-puffs—nay, nay. Row upon row, they are all sprouts of the folk who do the dirty work. And Hugo acquires a lingo delightful to the ears of Karl Meisner—a lingo that would have made Mother Bertha swear that the brat was heading for the gallows. And now and again, Hugo Remmel, chef's pupil, shows up at the famed and spacious kitchen of d'Allemande with a facade battered and blotchy—and not a damn word of sympathy from the Hr. Chef—that big hunk of a so 'n so!

Three o'clock and Hugo is back to work. The weeks grow into months, the months become years. To Hr. and Frau Viktor Remmel, New Orleans, U. S. A., Karl Meisner submits reports punctiliously—The lad is doing well, a little headstrong and pretty tough at times, but nothing to worry over. Things are so and so over here—Hope you won't get scalped, and when do you figure on returning to civilization? Leb wohl, old man. Best to yourself and Frau Bertha—Verbindlichst, Your friend, Karl Meisner.

And Hugo Remmel is fifteen and out of school. And he learns a thing or two about the Copenhagen tarts that he thinks it best not to mention to d'Allemande master kok—The big stiff might get tough about it, ha, ha!

But of a night, Karl Meisner and Hugo Remmel walk the streets of the ancient city together. And under the trees of the Tivoli Gardens, they sit in the witchery of the light nights and drink their beer. Life flows by, and in Hugo Remmel, Karl Meisner sees again the friend of his youth. They talk together about Hugo's plans and his future. Soon it will be his turn to go out into the world with a red-sealed diploma in his pocket. And Karl Meisner feels lonely and lost. But life flows on. Laughing girls, men and women from all the world come to this old and lovely garden of joy and fun. And Karl Meisner sits thinking and planning for the son of his friend.

Then came 1914 and the world went verrückt. To Karl Meisner there came for the second time in his life a letter over which sprawled the Imperial Eagle—Reservist Karl Meisner was hereby commanded to report for mobilization duty forthwith.

They walked their last night together through the old streets. Now and again Karl Meisner stops and stares on the sidewalk as if he expected an answer to his perplexities written there—What was he to advise Hugo? Would the war last long? What was he to do about the whole crazy affair?

They went to the La Bodega. The place was crowded with excited men and women. The headwaiter came to their tabel and laid the wine card before them: Would the Hr. Chef have to return to Germany? Karl nodded and ordered Tokay. They drank their wine in silence and went to their rooms and packed Karl's trunks.

The kitchen of d'Allemande was a morgue. Reservist Karl Meisner, former chef de cuisine, famed for his art far and near, shook hands with the staff. Perhaps we shall meet again—Perhaps. They drove to the central station. Hugo took Karl Meisner's hands in his. They looked deep and long into each others faces—"Auf Wiedersehen, Onkel Karl"— "Auf Wiedersehen, Hugo." A shrill whistle, and the Copenhagen-Berlin Express began its journey once more across the Danish land, onto the Gedser-Warnemunde ferry, back into the Deutschland that Karl Meisner had not seen for ages.

The little barrel in the cavernous wine cellars of d'Allemande had become nearly empty since that day years ago when Hugo had first tasted its pale-golden liquid. During all these years, Karl Meisner and Hugo had visited it on festive occasions and whenever a letter came from Viktor Remmel and Mother Bertha.

Now Hugo stood before it for the last time. Today he was to leave d'Allemande. He took one of the small glasses, frail and delicate as Tonder lace, and drew himself a drink. He looked at it long and his thoughts wandered back over the years. It was now months since Karl Meisner had gone into Germany and the bloodbath. Hugo had heard little from him. Now and then a laconic letter—He was well—Had succeded in getting out of being a mess cook, couldn't have stood that—Was in the infantry at a sector near the Bethune road—Couldn't tell him a great deal about the war on account of the censor—give my best regards to your folks—take good care of yourself—you are in my thoughts always.

And Hugo shook himself out of his reveries and emptied his glass. He said farewall to his friends in the kitchen—No, he didn't know exactly what he was going to do. No use trying to travel—the damn war had closed everything in that line. Perhaps he would stay in Copenhagen and work until the insanity was over and Karl Meisner came back.

But he didn't go to work. He was a Karl Meisner pupil and offers for jobs came galore. He turned them all down. He roamed the streets of the old city and was lost and desolate. He cursed the war that had taken Karl Meisner out of his life and had blasted his plans and dreams. He drifted to the harbor with its traveling cranes, its bedlam of whistles and foghorns, its ships of all nations. He drank with Malayan deckhands and Copenhagen stevedores, and their talk drifted through his brain like water through a sieve. What in t' hell did it all mean to him.

He sat in the cafes and amusement places and heard the excited jabberings of cutthroats, speculators and whores. And down near the Bethune road, Karl Meisner was floundering in mud and putrification.

Then came a letter from the old folk, suggesting that he return to America until the war was over. He felt it would be deserting Karl Meisner and wound up by writing him a letter, telling him that he was going to America and in the future to address his letters to New Orleans.

III.

The new land—the land of Hugo's birth, the land he had not seen since he was a kid—it was booming. Yes, it was on the up and up. The sales and exports of such little playthings as cannon, rifles, TNT and ammunition for the game of strafing going on across the pond had caused golden rivulets of assorted shekels to empty themselves into the bank vaults of the land sentried by the uplifted torch of Liberty.

Hugo went to see the old folk. They sat together in the sticky heat of New Orleans and he told Viktor Remmel and Mother Bertha of Karl Meisner, of Copenhagen and the horde of vultures that the war had brought to its cafes and amusement places.

He went to New York and took a job in a swanky joint—one had to live. And he, a mere youngster, a pupil of Karl Meisner, knew more in his little finger than all the meatburners working with him. He found the land of his birth a queer lay-out—Rush, rush, rush! And what in t' hell was all the shooting about? When they had guzzled their so-called steaks and make-believe French fried, their dabs of this and that, they shoved off at sixty miles per for some more pushing and mauling hours, and only to repeat it all over the next day.

And disgusted and amazed to the core, Hugo began to drift. Without realizing it, he became a floater. He worked in hotels of the widest advertised virtues and high class plumbing. He cooked in dives where four bits were the top. And nowhere did he find the traditions, the respect for his profession and its men, that Karl Meisner and his dad had hammered into his skull as far back as he could remember.

And Hugo Remmel found out several additional items in his rambles. He discovered that there were men who journeyed by box cars, by blinds and rods. And he took up that mode of travel himself—nothing like learning. He found out that men ate and slept in places called jungles.

Now and again he dropped a few lines to the folk in New Orleans. He wrote long letters to Karl Meisner, telling him of his new experiences, hoping and hoping that the war would be over soon so that they could meet again and become human beings once more.

And then one day the bankers and the ammunition manufacturers made up their minds that America was going to take a hand in the job of saving the world for democracy, and Hugo's letters to the German, Karl Meisner, were returned by the postal authorities as nixies.

The jacks in the Silver Lake logging camp swore that Hugo Remmel was the best goddamned mulligan mixer that ever struck the cookshack—Christ, did that bird know his onions! He might be just a snot-nosed punk, but, did he know how to put the chuck on the plank!—and no damn kowtowing to the bull o' the woods, either. And the cookhouse and the flunkies—Why, the whole show was as clean as a whistle—no noise, no racket—everything like clock work. No mistake, the kid knew his grub. The rigging slinger went so far as to state that if Hugo had worn skirts, he would've proposed long ago.

Hugo laughed indulgently at their ravings. He saw before him the vaulted, the famed and spacious kitchen of d'Allemande. He saw again Karl Meisner's deft and masterful hands as he patiently explained this or that little touch in order that things might be perfect. Ah, Karl Meisner. No letters, not a word for months now. Damn the war. Goddamn all the bastards! If only a letter would come.

And at night after everything was spick and span in the cookshack and all in readiness for next morning's breakfast, Hugo would walk across to the bunkhouses and listen to the talk about the war, the draft, about strikes, about union men in prison. He would scan the newspapers for information on the war. Every word indicating that the end of the slaughter might be near set his heart beating—soon—soon. He denied himself all luxuries so that he would have money for his fare as soon as he received the first sign from Karl Meisner—and he must have money for him, too, so that he could get back to life.

And summer draws to close and the 11th of November is hurled across the world. Armistice! Revolution in Germany! And Hugo watches the timekeeper's office for mail—nothing comes. He writes to New Orleans—no, no word yet.

The bull o' the woods was reaching for his third wedge of pie. He was of the opinion, so he told the hooktender, that times might get kinda tough now the war was over—wouldn't be a bit s'prised. Furthermore, he was wondering why in t' hell the timekeeper was late for supper. Well, mebbe he had got delayed sorting the mail down at the mill.

But the timekeeper showed up before the meal was over. He laid a large envelope on the serving table for Hugo. Hugo glanced at it eagerly and recognized his old man's handwriting. He would see what was in it as soon as things were cleaned up—Maybe, maybe there might be news from Karl Meisner—three months now since the armistice.

The flunkies had gone. Everything was cleaned up for the night. A single light burned in the cookhouse. Hugo sits under it and with shaking hands he tears open the envelope from New Orleans. A letter from his father falls out and two letters neatly tied together. They bear the postage of Germany. Hugo rips the letter on top open. It states briefly that Karl Meisner, Private 57, 159 Infantry, fell in action before the Bethune road, November 4th, 1918. And according to a request found among his effects, a letter had been forwarded to Hugo Remmel under separate cover—Horting, Kommandant.

Hugo shrieked at the empty cookhouse, "It's a lie! It's a lie! He is not dead!" He tore open the letter addressed in Karl Meisner's handwriting. He read:

"Hugo:

"We have just come back from four days up at the front. Out of the company, there are four of us left. How long we will last, I don't know. In every human brain the thought beats that he will be the exception. That is nonsense. A bullet or a chunk of shrapnel cares no more for individuals than nature does for life. It is all a question of law and circumstances.

"Soon, we will have to go up again. We do not speak our thoughts—in fact, we do not think. We are past all of that. We snatch from the few days we may have left the joys we can find—a scrap of pork rind for our nettle soup—a night with a girl—then the mud and butchery once more.

"There are four of us left. Once I loved life. It has become filthy—I love it no more. Behind a mutilated wood here, there are rows of crosses. I often think, 'If only one lay there.' They have turned life into filth.

"Soon we shall go up again. We go like automatons. A bullet whines through the air. A human jumps as if electrified. He flails the air with his arms for a moment. He sinks into the mud with a shriek of agony, or he slumps silently as if he were a lump of putty. And in a short while, we who still breathe are enveloped in a sickening atmosphere.

"Words have come that we must go tomorrow. So if this letter comes into your hands, you will know that one didn't come back. But I cannot leave without telling you that once I loved life. I loved your father, my comrade of youth. When you came, you were he. Out of you, I was going to mould a master—one who would be Viktor Remmel and Karl Meisner in one. The scratch of a pen by someone in Berlin changed all of that.

"And so, Hugo, if this comes into your hands, you will know that it is Gute Nacht, Gute Nacht—Karl Meisner."

Across in the cook's bunkhouse, the flunkies were singing One-Ball Reiley. The chorus depicted vividly how Reiley's girl friend lost her virtue. From down in the valley came the long drawn whistle of a train. Then the night becomes silent. Only through the pines around the camp, the wind sings its song—a song of birth and death, of life, a melody as old as the morning of time.

And under the light in the cookhouse, a human sits thinking—thinking.

The End.

OUR EDUCATIONAL SYSTEM

BY

A. B. COBB

In some parts of the world the theory of organic development is taught in the primary schools, not only regarding man as a product of natural evolution but teaching also that his institutions have grown out of simple units into the present infinite complexity. These truths are as well established as that the earth is round and revolves about the sun; they are absolutely essential to the child if he is to understand himself and his place in civilization. Yet in most of these forty-eight states these important truths are suppressed in the schools with the intention of allowing children to grow up in ignorance of their own origin and fate.

But the normal child, alert to the contradictions between what he has been taught and the facts of nature, will learn from the billboards, the zoo, the magazines or the library. As Pegler said lately about the sex question, if the children are not properly instructed they will learn in the coal shed or the hog lot. From the newspapers and from observation they will learn that the institutions they have been taught to revere deserve anything but reverence; that there is always an alliance between politicians and criminals; that the constitution was not made to promote the general welfare but to protect property.

Says Prof. Hutchins, "We are a faithless generation and take no stock in revelation." Whose fault, brother, if not yours and your education?

Dr. Hutchins bemoans the chaos in the world. "The most characteristic feature of the modern world is bewilderment. We do not know where we are going, or why; and we have almost given up the attempt to find out. A strange circularity afflicts us. The state of the nation depends on the state of education; but the state of education depends on the state of the nation."

From the last statement one might think that he was willing that the educational system share the blame. But in an interview as reported in the press he was quoted as saying, "Society is to blame." Thus whitewashing himself and his fellow educators.

George Eliot must have had such people in mind when she said: "The ladies of St. Ogg's had their favorite abstraction, called society, which served to make their consciences perfectly easy in doing what satisfied their own egoism."

And how does the professor propose to break this strange "circularity"? How end the chaos and demoralization, to say nothing of wars, revolutions, the breakdown of a great civilization? His answer is simple—too simple:

"If we can revitalize metaphysics and restore it to its place in the higher learning, we may be able to establish rational order in the modern world as well as in the university. Not any specific theological or metaphysical system . . . I suggest that we shall get a better one if we recognize explicitly the need for one and try to get the most rational one we can." (He means plausible, not rational.)

In the above statement we find merely a ten-cent store imitation of the old reactionary motto, "Religion must be preserved—for the benefit of the people." All systems of theology and metaphysics have this one thing in common: they maintain that the things of this world are cheap, transient, and worthless. But beyond the reach of human vision, location unknown, there are real, stable, priceless, everlasting good things for those who are cheated in this world or who wisely choose "pie in the sky."

Under capitalism," says Marx, "every institution

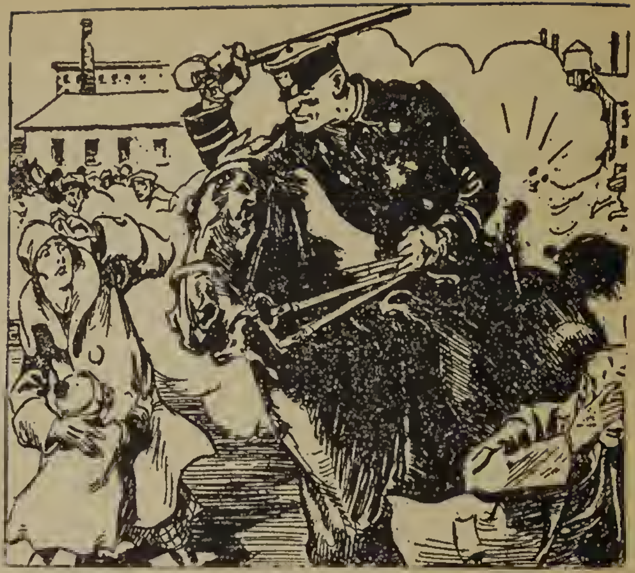
The General Defense Committee - -

20 YEARS OF ACTIVITY

October 1917 — October 1937



As long as this can happen the General Defense Committee will render valuable service to the working class.

Two score years of eventful labor history have passed since the General Defense Committee was organized and during that time it has supplied legal defense to more than 5,000 worker victims in the class war, and furnished relief for prisoners and their families.

It was back in 1917 when in Seattle, Washington 74 workers, mostly loggers, were held in the King county jail waiting trial on charges of murder that the need for a permanent defense organization was recognized by the members of the I. W. W., and it was on October 5 of that year that the General Defense Committee was born.

The 74 intended victims went free. A competent, well organized defense proved to the court, and to the world, that the Everett Massacre was the result of an almost unbelievably bloody and ruthless frame up on the part of lumber trust flunkeys to keep the I. W. W. out of Everett. The trial was a climax, and at the same time a beginning; persecution continued and grew even worse during the war years that followed, but organized strength of the workers grew too, and the General Defense Committee became firmly established as a part of the I. W. W. fighting machinery.

The next big job of the committee was the defense of the 101 I. W. W. members arrested under the espionage act—the trial of 101 in Chicago, of 33 in Wichita, and of 51 in Sacramento. These cases were "lost" in the sense that the prosecution obtained convictions, but they were won in another sense. The attempt of the prosecution to show that the industrial union movement of the I. W. W. was a plot hatched by the Kaiser failed and the popularity of the organization grew as workers joined by the thousands.

In 1919 the lumber barons of Washington engineered another major raid on the I. W. W. This time it was in Centralia. Workers defended themselves and their hall, raiders were shot, an I. W. W. was tortured and lynched, and once again the lumber trust called on its servants to frame union men. And once again the masters won. Eight lumberjacks went to prison. But had there been no adequate defense many important facts of the case would never have been brought to light and the villainous degradation of the capitalist court and press would not have been effectively exposed.

During the "Deportations Delirium" which employers nurtured, and fanatical 100 per centers promoted, the General Defense Committee handled hundreds of cases. In the course of this work it has been established that membership in the I. W. W. is not cause for deportation.

With the gradual decline of the war hysteria the masters found it necessary to use other means to oppose the vital and growing I. W. W. movement. Criminal syndicalism laws were passed in 36 states. The committee fought these cases—sometimes successfully, some times not,—in states from Maine to California. In California, where the fight was the severest, over a hundred members went to prison with sentences of from one to twenty-eight years. The General Defense Committee through persistent effort drew one tooth after another from this monstrous law until it has become relatively harmless.

In the great Colorado Coal strike of 1928-29 the committee did splendid service for the fighting I. W. W. workers who there won a memorable victory against the Rockefeller coal interests.

It was at this time that the committee was reorganized on a basis that allowed persons not members of the I. W. W. to become members of the General Defense Committee. Locals were set up and many people not eligible to membership in the I. W. W. have since then taken part directly in the committee's work.

Among the thousands of cases of persecution of working people by the employing class that make up the day to day work of the General Defense Committee are many that never attain wide publicity—people are not startled by revelation of the fact that a union worker can be sent to jail for from a few days to six months in many parts of this country merely because some local big shot employer wishes it. Yet such cases are of the greatest importance to the labor movement. Where petty persecution is allowed to continue unchallenged it is hard to build organization.

Though the Yakima case of 1933 is not exactly to be classed among the lesser cases, since it involved trumpted up charges of criminal assault against men who defended themselves on the picket line, it illustrates the importance of having a defense organization on hand ready to fight with legal aid and publicity machinery at a moments notice.

Among the more important fights the General Defense Committee is now carrying on is the defense of Mike Lindway. Lindway is in the Ohio State prison, having been convicted of illegal possession of dynamite in connection with a strike in Cleveland in 1935. The frame up, the illegal use of evidence, the prejudice involved in this case have repeatedly been brought to the attention of American workers by the committee. The case is still in the courts on appeal and it appears now that it may be taken to the U. S. Supreme court a second time.

Twenty years of useful activity has amply proven the value of the General Defense Committee. Not all of its work consists of fighting court battles. Soon it will remind the workers of America again of their fellow workers who are in prison for labor's cause, and start collecting for the annual Christmas Fund which the committee raises for and distributes among those who have fallen in the struggle.

wears a mask." We should be thankful to friend Hutchins for partially and, no doubt, unintentionally, tearing aside the disguise under which our educational system is working to demoralize the young by systematically withohlding the truths of modern science.

Thanks to scientific methods we can produce abundance for all and our youth will not be content with theological "pie in the sky," nor with metaphysical pork chops. One car in the garage looks better than ten of the supernatural kind. Science marches forward regardless of the efforts of stooges of "Big Business," the most vicious of whom are our "educators."

When Chief Justice Hughes stated that, "the arch enemies of society are those who know better, but by indirection, misstatement, understatement, and slander seek to accomplish their concealed purposes or to gain profit of some sort by misleading the public," it is doubtful if he had the teachers in mind. But the shoe is a perfect fit, and most educators are conscious of it and hate to have a man in the position of Dr. Hutchins blab the secret to the whole world and even try to make conditions worse.

Some time back there was an editorial in the "Social Frontier, a journal of educational criticism and reconstruction, regarding the qualifications of American teachers. It stated in part:

"It is admitted without argument that American teachers as a group are timid and docile. Their mental horizon does not reach significantly beyond the three "Rs." They are for the most part strangers to literature, to music, and the plastic arts. POLITICALLY AND SOCIALLY THEY ARE ILLITERATE. Seldom is the distance between what a profession thinks it is doing and what it is actually doing, so great as in the case of teachers."

We are witnessing today a world-wide reorganization socially and politically. It is vain to expect any guidance from educators that are too ignorant to understand what is taking place and are too cowardly to tell the truth if they know. Let the younger generation beware of the educators.

Counter-Revolution in Spain

Introduction and Translation
By JOSEPH WAGNER

By R. LOUZON, in the Paris "La Revolution Proletarienne," under the title "Notes on Spain."

INTRODUCTION

The articles on Spain, prepared by me, for the One Big Union Monthly, consisting largely of translations appearing in the current and two previous issues of this magazine, were not meant to serve as news articles of the Spanish War Front.

The news about the ups and downs, of victories and defeats, on the various fronts of fighting Spain are abundantly covered by the papers of all shades and creeds. Each of them colors the news according to the interests or the principles of the writer writing them up, or of the publication printing them. The lessons drawn from the developments of the events, differ from writer to writer and from publication to publication. That cannot be helped, and perhaps it should not. The questions involved in the Spanish struggles are much too complex to be lightly disposed of.

Neither was the intent of these articles to pass judgment over what is being done in Spain by the anti-fascists, and to take sides with one or another of the various contending parties and groups, that grim circumstances brought together in a common fight against the gory beast of fascism.

But even though we are not so situated as to take a direct hand in the great struggle on the Iberian Peninsula, we are greatly interested in it, because, as workers, and as revolutionists, we feel that the struggle going on in Spain is our struggle as well.

Different political parties, radical groups with varying philosophies are thrown together to form the anti-fascist front. And although they have one common aim, these component groups are separated by class interests and by philosophical and political views. In the course of the war in Spain the political supremacy of what is called loyalist Spain, has shifted more than once, and before the end comes there will be very likely more shifts taking place. With these shiftings, tactics of struggle also change. The ones at the helm at a given moment are prone to claim credit for every victory that takes place while they are holding the reigns of government, blaming the opposition for the reverses taking place. The opposition looks upon it in just the opposite way.

Because of the complexity of the question, I intended to place before the readers of the O. B. U. M. the views of serious working class observers, and who, moreover, had first hand knowledge of the situation, and speak not by hearsay, but from actual observation.

In this issue I present an article by R. Louzon, one of the founders and present editors of that admirable and well known semi-monthly, French syndicalist magazine, "La Revolution Proletaire." The article appeared in the second July issue of the magazine mentioned.

Fellow Worker Louzon is one of the old guard of the pre-war French General Confederation of Labor. He is still a French syndicalist with the old revolutionary, non-political meaning of the term. He was personally acquainted with Haywood; has closely followed the development of our own I.W.W. with great sympathy ever since the I.W.W. was founded. In spite of his multiple activity in the French labor movement, he has been closely watching our own General Defense Committee cases and at times has made financial contributions towards them. At the outbreak of the Civil War in Spain, where Louzon is well acquainted in the revolutionary world, he went over immediately to Catalonia, to secure first hand information and to be able to write understandingly in his magazine. He has visited Spain often in the last year, and made faithful and objective reports of his findings to his readers. The following article is one of his latest.

NOTES ON SPAIN

When I wrote in this magazine, nearly a year ago, my "Notes on Barcelona" they were notes on Revolutionary Spain, as the subhead indicated. My notes of today, however, are on the Counter-revolutionary Spain.

I left Spain by the end of May; I returned there at the beginning of July. One month is a tremendously long time in revolutionary . . . or counter-revolutionary times. During that month of June the events have succeeded themselves with great rapidity. Things, that could be dimly outlined as possible hypothesis in the May days, have since been realized in an accelerated rhythm.

The present situation in Spain can be summed up in two facts:

First: total loss of power by the working class;

Second: transfer of power into the hands of the Spanish fascists, by the intermediary of the communist party.

Working Class Loses Power

When I say that the working class lost the power, I am, naturally, not alluding to the fact that now the CNT has no longer representatives either in the Valencia or the Catalonian governments. Cabinet ministers are but cogs in the bourgeois-capitalist State machinery, therefore it is not by its participation in the machinery of the bourgeois State machinery, but by the creation of its own institutions, that the working class develops its own power.

If the working class of Spain was partially in power until recently, that was due to the fact that alongside of the bourgeois State power the working class was able to impose the power of its own organs: the labor unions, workers' committees, etc.

Today, this power of the working class is non-existent. It cannot be stated too often, that political power is essentially—one can almost say, exclusively—a power of repression; it is the police force and the armed force. Today the working class of Catalonia no longer has police or armed power.

The "Patrols of Control" of Barcelona and vicinity, of which I spoke in my former article in this magazine, have disappeared. This workers' police force, that was functioning since August 1936, alongside the police force of the State, was dissolved last month, and this time not only on paper, but in fact: all of its members have been disarmed, the most active of them were imprisoned, the leading militants have "disappeared," an euphemism signifying murdered.

The same holds true of the workers' militias. Wherever these militias existed, whose duty it was to enforce revolutionary order upon avowed or camouflaged fascists, especially along the extensive frontiers, they have been completely disarmed, their best elements were imprisoned, a certain number of them murdered.

In Barcelona and in the entire Catalonia, nothing was left in the way of organized armies except the mercenary corps of the State police: the assault guards, the civil guards, carabiniers.

The same has taken place with the army. Working under the Catalonian C.N.T. War Minister, the C.N.T. formerly had the control over the army of Aragon; after this Cabinet post was taken over by General Pozas, an appointee of the Valencia government, the commanding machinery was lost by the workers' organizations and it fell into the hands of the State.

The labor militants, the creators of the militia, who after the "militarization" were supposed to merely transfer their title, from "delegations" to army "ranks," are now obliged to ask the Minister of War for confirmation of such transfers and the Minister confirms those of whom he thinks he has nothing to fear, while postponing indefinitely the confirmation of those he doubts, thus eliminating the ones and placing the others in the position of being under obligation. By this twofold scheme the entire hierarchy of the army passes under the direct control of the State.

Thus, the workers' police and army has been done away with. To be sure, there are still men on the police force, especially among the assault guards who are at heart with the working class and with the C.N.T.; certainly the soldiers of the Aragon front and a good number of "confirmed" army officers have not forgotten their origin and when the day comes they will be on the side of the people and not with the State. And certain it is that besides the visible arms, there are plenty of hidden arms, for the Catalonian proletariat, it seems, has conserved its hidden arms. But, all that does not alter the fact that today there are no longer any regularly and publicly functioning workers armed institutions. The working class still has means of fighting the power, but it no longer possesses organs of power.

Removed from the police force and from the army, the working class is, just as naturally removed from all auxiliary institutions of power. The representatives of the F.A.I. (Iberian Anarchist Federation) have been excluded from the popular courts of law, where the representation of the workers have been reduced to a feeble minority. The C.N.T. representatives likewise have been excluded from a large number of municipal councils that have replaced the former municipal revolutionary committees (but which were nothing in reality but committees, since they had been composed of representatives of all the anti-fascist organizations, in a determined proportion) under the pretext that the C.N.T. has not repudiated their protest movement in the days of May. The district workers' committees can no longer function and there hardly passes a weak without some new decree being issued surpressing the representation of the C.N.T. as well as of the U.G.T. in this or that Council or administration.

Everywhere the State, the bourgeois State, constituted in its traditional forms, re-establishes its sole and entire power. In Catalonia as in Valencia, the working class is now completely excluded from power: It has lost the power. Such is the first truth that we have to establish, but there is a second.

What the Spanish Communist Party Is

The much lauded policy of the Spanish Communist Party, as dictated by Stalin, is well enough known by now: it is the defense of the bourgeoisie and of the private property; no more expropriation is to be countenanced; the landed proprietors to be re-established into their "rights"; the small and so small employers to be organized in "labor" unions. Such is the program. A program of hindrance and of destruction of the conquests of the revolution; a program of bourgeois defense.

Such a program of bourgois defense, naturally should have attracted the entire bourgeoisie, and it has not failed to do so. The bourgeoisie flocked in masses into the communist party and into its annex, the Unified Socialist Party of Catalonia, as well as into the Catalonian U.G.T. (General Workers Union), founded for their convenience. They joined partly because the communist party program was their program, their class program. But above all, they joined for reasons of personal security. To be suspected of fascism, was until recently, a very serious matter. But, by the very nature of things, the bourgeois is always in danger of being suspected of that very thing. What better way of avoiding suspicion than of having in his pocket a membership card in the communist party or in one of the locals of the U.G.T.?

The Spanish communist party and its annexes have, therefore, become bourgeois organizations not only in virtue of their program, but also by their social composition. But this first fact was bound to be soon followed by a second: Of all the bourgeois, the most interested in averting the suspicion of fascism were the very ones who were actually fascists. And that is how the communist party in its composition, soon became not only bourgeois, but above all, fascist bourgeois. Whether in Valencia, where the district secretary of the Gil Robles party, among others, is at present a member of the communist party, or in villages far removed from Catalonia, the most active members of the communist party are former members of the "Patriotic Union" of the CEDA, etc. etc.

Republican Spain Passes into the Hands of Fascism

It naturally follows that the Spanish communist policy is not only a bourgeois policy, but actually, a fascist policy. Through the racket in connection with the furnishing of arms to the Spanish government, the Russians having succeeded in giving the State powers to "their" party, the fascist followers of the communist party made the party follow a policy favoring Franco and the Russians were much to dense to notice it. The facts, however, are evident.

While hundreds of the militants of the anti-fascist organizations were murdered and thousands imprisoned, and while the help rendered to Spain by the foreign organizations were systematically sabotaged, the Falange, yes the Spanish Phalanx, the Phalanx of Franco, is making open propaganda and is recruiting almost openly in Catalonia. The Falangistas arrested by the workers' Control Patrols (before their dissolution), for attempts of sabotage, are now free. And while the anti-fascists arrested during the last two months, especially the foreigners, are lamentably treated, kept in airless cells from which they are not taken out for a moment, and are forced, like the prisoners in Calle Corcega in Barcelona, to go on hunger strike, the imprisoned fascists enjoy all manner of favors, so much so that the anti-fascist prisoners of Carcel Modelo of Barcelona demanded that they be granted the same rights as enjoyed by the fascist prisoners in the same prison! Finally, as they cannot absolve all the fascists without too much open scandal, the authorities decided to free them on bail of several thousand pesetas. The most notorious fascists, who are rich or who have rich friends, can thus leave the prison . . . for an indefinite time.

Government of Defeat

The facts related above are serious enough, but what follows is even more so. It is openly said that the fall of Bilbao was due to treason. The fall of Bilbao is the masterstroke realized by the fascists, through the medium of the communist party, by the overthrow of the Caballero government in May.

To relieve the pressure on the Biscayan front, the Caballero government had prepared a vast offensive to the south of Madrid, where the front is not far from the Portuguese frontier, with the intention of cutting the rebel armies in two. Everything was ready for the offensive that was to begin early in May: 75,000 men had been assembled with adequate war materials on hand.

But, a couple of days before the launching of the offensive, the communist party torpedoed the Caballero government, forcing his cabinet to resign and replacing him with the Negrin government, whose first task as government head was to countermand the prepared offensive; the assembled troops were scattered and during the entire month following nothing was done to relieve the hard pressed Biscayan front. The Basque minister's letter of resignation (because of lack of aid from the central government) was prevented publication by the censors, and the Madrid journal C.N.T. was ordered suspended because it had published it nevertheless. But nothing was done to save Bilbao; it was necessary for the city to fall, for so it was decided by the fascists in the Stalinist party.

Only after the fall of Bilbao—and the fall enabled Franco to withdraw, without danger, a part of his northern troops—that they started an offensive, for after all it was necessary for them to appear doing something . . . especially at the wrong time.

The sum total of all the above facts cannot leave room for doubt: The Negrin government is entirely dominated by treason. The cleverness of the fascists, acting under the cover of the Stalinist stupidity, makes the Negrin government, nilly-willy a government of defeat.

If the Negrin government holds out, if the evil forces that brought them to power are not destroyed, the defeats will succeed each other continually. That will be certain victory for Franco and the certain defeat not only of the revolution but of the republic itself. This is the second truth that needed telling.

Causes for the Defeats of Russian Imperialism

The defeat of the Spanish republic will also be a defeat of Stalin. And on this subject it is interesting to note that the serious defeats suffered in the last ten years, by Russian imperialism, are all due to the same cause.

The Stalinist imperialism had experienced two notable defeats: that of China with the boosting of Chian Kai Chek, and that of Germany, with the ascension of Hitler to power. Spain is reserving him a third defeat, for he will either be beaten inside of republican Spain by the other anti-fascist forces, or, if he maintains his hold over the Spanish republic, it will be beaten by Franco. But the cause of these three defeats are one and the same. Odd as it may appear, that cause is Stalin's absolute lack of understanding of the class struggle: in all three cases the policy that lead Stalin to defeat consisted in his disregarding of the class antagonism.

In China he imagined himself able to marry the fish to the hare: the bourgeois Kuomingtang to the revolutionary workers and peasants. To hinder such a marriage, the Kuomingtang massacred everything that was Russian. After having furnished Chiang Kai Chek the means with which to conquer all China from Canton to Peking, Stalinist imperialism found itself expelled, from one day to another, by this same Chiang Kai Chek.

In Germany, Stalin imagined that the revengeful Hitler will turn to be a better support for his struggle against Poland and the other neighbors on the western border of Russia than the timid social-democrats. The two dictators could divide the existing spoils if the States emerged from the Versailles treaties, just as their royal and imperial predecessors had, in the past divided up and annexed Poland. Therefore every time, before the advent of Hitler, the communists of Germany were ready for action, the Communist International sternly forbade them doing anything.

But, the attraction of the "corridor" did not cut much figure in the class interests of Hitler's backers. No matter how anti-socialist the Stalinist regime had become, the absence of private property in Russia was not agreeable to them; no matter how opposite to the October revolution Stalin's regime was, to the bulk of the world proletariat, and especially to the German working class, it appeared to be the continuator of that revolution and the symbol of their emancipation; hence the fight inside of Germany against communism and against the working class was not compatible with an alliance with Russia. That is the reason that Hitler, brought to power by the Ruhr magnates to extirpate communism and socialism in Germany, could not base his foreign policy on a Russian alliance, but on the contrary on a struggle against the U.S.S.R. From Hitler's coming to power Stalin expected a strengthening of the Rapallo treaty; the first act of Hitler was the destruction of Rapallo.

Under different forms, this same misunderstanding, of the fact that the class struggle dominates the foreign as well as the domestic policies of States, is the cause that leads Russian imperialism to its defeat in Spain.

It was Russia that saved Spain last November. The fact is incontestable: it is foolish to deny it or to belittle the fact. Without the Russian planes and without the International Brigade—which was a communist creation, it would have been all over for republican Spain. The blockade of Mr. Blum —the greatest treason ever committed by social-democracy in the entire course of its history—was accomplishing its work. Just as it was Russian help that enabled the Kuomingtang to conquer China, it was Russia that enabled the Spanish republic to save Madrid. . . and the rest.

But, again, the same as in China, where Stalin, believing thus to best serve his imperialistic interests, ordered the communist party of China to collaborate with the Kuomingtang, to uphold the interests of the Chinese buorgeoisie, just so in Spain, he forced his party to defend the Spanish bourgeoisie against the revolution.

The result will be the same: as in China where one nice day, Stalin saw his followers massacred at Nankin and at Hankow by the soldiers of Chiang Kai Shek, so in Spain, he will wake up one of these days to the fact that his party is but an annex of the Falange, which has secured victory for Franco.

The C. N. T. Continues to Live

In the presence of the situation as described above, what is the C. N. T. doing? How does it react to the loss of power by the proletariat and to the fascist control of the bourgeois power?

The C. N. T. is playing dead. It keeps itself carefully from reacting. The C. N. T. allowed without the least protestation the disarming of the Patrols of Control; it forbids any retaliation for the murdering of its militants (official figures: 60 C. N. T. members "disappeared"), and against the imprisonment of its members (official firgures: 800 C. N. T. members imprisoned) it is opposing only respectful interventions and legal defense.

In the meantime its forces—so it seems—are intact. In Valencia as in Barcelona, the C. N. T. press is the most widely read. One comrade even claimed—and his claim seems to be very nearly the general opinion—that the C. N. T. never was as strong as it is now, for the prestige it may have lost while participating in power, it now has regained, and the Stalinists's stupidity makes them grow stronger every day.

On the other hand, it is certain that it still retains its arms, keeping them in the most unexpected places.

Finally, the economic attainments of the revolution are being preserved almost entirely. As a general rule, the labor unions and collectives are functioning the same as before. Stripped of political power, the working class still retains economic control.

Thus in Puigcerda, of which I said last month that I don't know whether the work of collectivization, that I have seen in February, is still in existence, and which is one of the places where the exclusion of the workers from power was most complete and most brutal (seven murdered since the end of May, without counting former murders; 50 imprisoned. Continuous presence of 500 guards in a town of 4,000 inhabitants), the collectives are still in force almost entirely, according to what one of the local militants told me, whom I met in the middle of July: only the rayon cooperative was closed; a few tailors and certain other bourgeois elements belonging to the UGT have seceded from the cooperative, "but, added the comrade, this was fine, for on account of them we were obliged to admit representatives of the UGT in the administration of the cooperative; now that we are to ourselves, we can go ahead more openly than before."

The C. N. T. unions in Puigcerda have been dispossessed of their hall, but they have simply occupied another hall, a little less imposing than the old one. And, they are only waiting for the arrival of their paper supply, in order to resume publication of their local Libertarian Youth paper, SEMBRADOR (The Sower).

Thus, under the storm, the Puigcerda comrades have bent down, after the storm they are straightening out. And this is not a specialty of Puigcerda; it is, I believe, the traditional policy of the C. N. T.: "let the storm pass."

To let the storm pass and saving everything that can be saved. Advancing step by step, and maintaining its least attacked and most solid positions as intact as possible. These positions at present are the economic sectors. Not to engage its forces in order to save them for the favorable moment, when circumstances are favorable for a new offensive.

However, this is not a new tactic with the C. N. T. and the F. A. I.: it is their traditional, historical tactic. When the foreign comrades, alarmed by these repeated retreats, of these abandoning positions of primary importance without a struggle, communicate their fears to the Spanish fellow workers, they invariable receive the following answer: "This is not the first time that we are persecuted, we have known many others; after every persecution we came out stronger than before. It will be the same now as it happened in the past."

The optimism that results from the strength of the C. N. T., a strength that is not based on the mass of its members, nor on the wealth of its treasures, but, if I may say, on the morale.

Through their principles, through their manner of being and of acting, the C. N. T. and F. A. I. have deep and manyfold roots in the entire Spanish proletariat. Due to that, they dispose at any moment, an important number of active militants who can, at the first favorable opportunity raise the flag and take spontaneously the necessary action. The labor union action and the anarchist morale are at present so rooted into the body of the Spanish proletariat that they cannot be separated; that bond cannot be severed without destroying the proletariat itself.

It is that, no doubt, that explains the expectant tactics followed at present by the C. N. T. and which perhaps justifies it.

West Coast Chaos

By Card No. X13068

THE CIO-AFL INTER-UNION WAR

Labor history now being made on the Pacific Coast bids fair to be a chapter of which the working class can in no way be proud. Inter-union strife between officials and labor fakers of the A. F. of L. and C. I. O. using every method of attack on each other and promoting violent wranglings and even sluggings not soon to be forgotten among their rank and file members, who, in not a few cases, are only dues-paying pawns in the hands of unscrupulous union bosses with political or other anti-working class ambitions, is fast sapping the unity of Coast labor.

Added to the natural union jurisdictional fight are the everpresent so-called labor party promoters, those jackals who take every oportunity to feast on the vitals of labor.

The writer of these lines is a member of neither the C. I. O. nor the A. F. of L. and nothing here said is intended as a defense of either group. It is an attempt to portray briefliy what is now going on in these unions of the Pacific Coast.

Teamsters vs Longshoremen

The struggle is centered between the powerful A. F. of L. Teamsters union, and thte International Longshoremen's Association which recently left the A. F. of L. and joined the C. I. O. Disregarding the frantic supporters of both sides who do things through emotion without applying logic, it is necessary to point to some of the purported leaders.

For a long time prior to 1933 the I. L. A. and other maritime unions were of no consequence in the Coast labor set up. In that year a campaign was put on which succeeded in establishing the I. L. A. locals in all ports. The seamen's union also had a revival in their part of the maritime industry. By the early summer of 1934 these unions were going strong enough to challenge the shipping masters.

The 1934 maritime strike was a hard-fought and bloody battle. This memorable struggle ended in victory for the unions in all ports. One outcome of the 1934 strike was the formation of the Maritime Federation of the Pacific.

This organization, embracing all the maritime unions, was hailed as a progressive step in promoting solidarity and in giving the maritime workers a potent weapon for concerted action. The 1934 strike closed solidly all important ports except Los Angeles (San Pedro harbor). The chief supporter of the strike was the Teamsters union which had strong locals in all ports except Los Angeles.

Along with union action the teamsters poured thousands of dollars into the strike relief fund. The refusal of the other port unions to sign agreements unless all ports signed, forced the notorious Los Angeles harbor also to recognize the union.

This unity between the maritime workers and the Teamsters union proved an unbeatable combination, not only in 1934 but also in the strike which started in the autumn of 1936 and ended early in 1937.

Due to the refusal of the ship owners to try to recruit scabs the 1936-37 strike was a strange affair. Continuous negotiations were carried on with some near-clashes over perishables and medical supplies. Again the Teamsters union and other A. F. of L. unions poured money out for strike relief. The teamsters also strengthened their organization all along the line, getting a strong foothold, even in Los Angeles.

At this time under the direction of Harry Bridges the I. L. A. started organizing warehouse men, in some instances far removed from the water front. This was a move that would obviously cause a clash with the teamsters. It should be remembered that at this time the Pacific I. L. A. was still a part of the A. F. of L. The Maritime Federation of the Pacific never had an opportunity to test its mettle under fire and is now probably doomed to die, and with it the solidarity of the maritime workers for a long time.

Industrial Background

To get the proper perspective of labor on the Pacific Coast it is significant to point out that there are no great mass production industries such as are found in autos in Detroit, rubber in Akron, or steel in other eastern and mid-western cities. There are branches of the various eastern manufacturers but they are comparatively small and employ hundreds where in the East thousands work. Consequently the C. I. O. strength has been chiefly recruited in the West by raiding already organized A. F. of L. unions.

This raiding is, of course, vigorously fought by the AFL. In the view of the writer who believes that both the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. are conservative unions it puts the C. I. O. promoters in the position of being more or less union splitters. Further, the great horde of unorganized agricultural workers are as yet not an objective of the C. I. O. As with the A. F. of L., these most exploited workers are not considered important enough for the C. I. O. leaders.

The suspicion arises that, again like the A. F. of L., the C. I. O. knows that 20 to 30 cents an hour agricultural workers will be unable to pay the high dues and assessments charged by them. Certainly the C. I. O. slogan to "organize the unorganized" which was carried out in the automobile and steel industries is sufficient excuse for their existence. As much as one might wish to find that same excuse on the Pacific Coast it is not apparent, search as you may. The wrangle in the Northwest is over the withdrawal of already organized A. F. of L. unions in the sawmills.

No Clearcut Division

The outlook for the workers would be better and the position of the C. I. O. more secure if it were true that there is unanimity in the ranks of the recently withdrawn A. F. of L. unions which are now C. I. O. But the I. L. A. itself is split on the question, and even though the I. L. A. majority voted C. I. O. there is a grave danger of the formation of the not insignificant minority into new A. F. of L. locals which will create further havoc on the water front in case of a strike.

In every port these minority groups are active and are pointing out the obvious instances where appointed C. I. O. officials did not consult the rank and file of their unions on serious moves.

Then there are the other maritime unions besides the I. L. A. which are not affiliated with the C. I. O. Chief among these is the Sailors Union of the Pacific which is very much anti-C. I. O. Neither is it in good standing in the A. F. of L. due to the charter-revoking scandal of a year or so ago. The S. U. P., no doubt, is an outstanding exponent of rank und file unionism. This union's record since 1933 is the most clear cut of all the maritime unions. The S. U. P. in spite of threats from both bosses and other maritime unions went down the line in refusing to accept the Copeland fink book. While on the East Coast the only outstanding support they got was from the I. W. W. Marine Transport Workers Industrial Union No. 510.

The Sailors' Stand

Those who are now promoting the National Maritime Union (N. M. U.) branded themselves by advocating the acceptance of the fink book. There is now no compulsory continuous discharge book, The S. U. P. in other instances has taken an excellent stand, such as on the minimum wages and hours bill for seamen and on the present effort of another Copeland bill to abolish the hiring halls. At least one C. I. O.-N. M. U. representative favored this union-wrecking bill.

Harry Lundberg, secretary of the S. U. P., seems to be a different sort of official and consequently is not popular with Harry Bridges, Joseph Curran, or the communist Western Worker which is blatantly supporting the C. I. O. Some of the other maritime unions, such as the Marine Firemen, Oilers and Water Tenders, are taking the same stand as the S. U. P.

Beck and Bridges

The recognized boss of the Pacific Coast Teamsters union is Dave Beck of Seattle. There is nothing to be said in his favor. He is a typical A. F. of L. ruthless labor faker. But the Teamsters union has an estimated membership of over eighty thousand, and the teamsters are traditionally not kid glove performers in any kind of dispute.

In a recent case in Los Angeles the leaders of the C. I. O. wrote long letters to the chief of police demanding police aid in fighting the A. F. of L. teamsters. In at least one instance they had members of the Teamsters union arrested and taken to court for assault and battery.

The present director of the Pacific Coast C. I. O. is Harry Bridges who was appointed by John L. Lewis. Bridges rode to popularity and power from the I. L. A. strike of 1934. Although an unknown before that time he rose from the I. L. A. local in San Francisco on the cry for rank and file rule. Yet it is to be remembered that he sought and accepted an appointment from Lewis while an official of the Maritime Federation of the Pacific without bothering to ask the sanction of the Federation in advance.

No doubt Bridges is an able man and he has a large following who are his fanatic supporters. As to his course—it depends on whether one is anti- or pro-Bridges. He has been given undue publicity in his activities. During the 1936-1937 strike his name went on all advertising in box-car letters while the strike itself went in smaller type. Bridges is, to the outside observer, a cagy performer and certainly appears definitely committed to the formation of a Farmer-Labor party. Which is true also of the whole Pacific C. I. O. leadership. He is supported by the communist publication, the Western Worker, and this may well be one of his handicaps.

Harry Bridges is at a crisis in his career. Regardless of his sincerity he has yet to demonstrate the possession of unerring tactical knowledge necessary to take him to the hights of labor captaincy to which he so obviously aspires.

Further light on the Bridges' position may be obtained from the files of the Voice of the Federation. In the published charges against an editor by Bridges the careful reader may draw a clear conclusion of Bridges' idea of correct action.

A Little Economics for the Home

By WALTER PFEFFER

Warning!—This is not a play— it's just a conversation!

Workingman's front porch. "The Missus" is on a hammock.

I. W. W. Organizer: (walking up the steps) Is William Jones home?

The Missus: What do you want with him? I haven't seen you before.

I. W. W.: I wanted to see him about some plans that the men down at the shop are making for themselves.

The Missus: I'll bet their plans are for no good.

I. W. W.: The general idea is to get a raise for William.

The Missus: That's different. Oh Wil-yam! Come here!

William has been working long and real hard, and he should get a raise the way prices are going up.

William (coming outside): Er, ma, this is one of the organizers that have been trying to get all of us down at the shop into a union. I've been figuring on joining.

The Missus: Oh—he's one of these blamed trouble makers that I've been reading about in the paper—and here you come and tell me that you wanted to see Bill to get him a raise.

I. W. W.: That's why we want the union, and don't let the papers fool you, ma'am. You've been having lots of trouble trying to make ends meet long before I ever met your husband. Lot's more people have had plenty of trouble trying to get a job at all. We're not here to make trouble. We're here to fix things so that people have less trouble.

The Missus: And the first thing you want to do, I'll bet is to take some of Bill's hard-earned money to make him belong to the union.

I. W. W.: That's exactly what I called to do.

The Missus: I'll say that you're brazen enough about it anyway. Why don't you go to work and earn your living?

I. W. W.: Now that is an idea, ma'am. I can run a press just as well as William, and I suppose the boss down at the shop would be so glad to see me stop organizing the men that if I told him you wanted me to quit organizing and go to work, he would even give me Mr. Jones' job. Would that please you better?

The Missus: It wouldn't be fair at all.

I. W. W.: As long as they have no union down there, you can't make them fair. And even if I didn't take Mr. Jones' job, I'd be taking Mr. Somebody Else's job. . . and I suppose Mrs. Somebody Else would say that wasn't fair either. I really prefer this job of getting men to stick together and win higher wages for themselves. In fact I'm pretty good at it, and because of the work I've done at it, there are thousands of workers who have more money to spend; they have the power to insist that seniority rights are observed, and that things are run closer to their idea of fairness. They are more secure in their jobs. They are better off all the way round. So what good would it do you if we quit organizing? You'd just find it that much harder to make ends meet, and you'd be sitting around saying somebody ought to do something about it.

The Missus: That's just what I told Mrs. Logan down at the butcher shop. Porkchops are forty cents a pound. It's outrageous! But if Bill pays you to go into your union that won't help us buy any porkchops. We'll just be out so much good money. That's the trouble with Bill—he never did have any sense.

Bill: Oh yeah?

I. W. W.: Do you tell the butcher what you will pay for porkchops, or does he tell you what you will have to pay to get them?

The Missus: Ain't you got no sense a-tall? Certainly he puts the price on a card and sticks it right up on a little stick right over the porkchops.

I. W. W. If he let you set the price, would he be able to make ends meet, and keep in business?

The Missus: I don't suppose he would, for I can remember when porkchops were ten and eleven cents a pound.

I. W. W.: Now, Mr. Jones, do you tell the boss what he should pay you, or does he tell you what he's going to pay?

Bill: Fact is, we're never real sure what we're getting until pay-day. There's hourly rates, and piece-work, and bonus, and gang-piece-work-bonus.

I. W. W.: So you sell your life at so much per hour, and let the boss set his price on it—in fact you wait until what you sold of it has been used up before you find out the price—and Mrs. Jones wonders why she can't make ends meet when everyone who sells her anything does just the opposite of what you do.

The Missus: What do you want me to do, pin a price tag on William?

I. W. W.: In a way, yes. Mr. Jones can't set his price on his labor himself, but he and his fellow workers can, if they organize, and tell the company what their wage rates will be.

Bill: Yes, ma, all the men figure we ought to get together and tell the company a few things about wages, and hours, and time and a half, and a few other things.

The Missus: And then you'll get fired and have no job at all.

I. W. W.: There's millions of men in this country with no job. It isn't because they belonged to unions and asked for too much. It's because there wasn't enough unionism, and they didn't ask for enough.

Bill: And when we have a union, the men will stand back of each other, and we won't be afraid to speak up for our rights.

The Missus: So you have to go through all that to get a raise. Why don't you just speak up for yourself and tell them that you're worth more, and that I had to pay forty cents a pound for porkchops, and that rent is up. Believe me if I worked there, I could tell them plenty and not bother with any fancy union business about it either.

Bill: The foreman can't change rates for just one man. He has to change it for all the men on the same job.

The Missus: So if the rest of the men get a raise, you'll get one too.

Bill: Sure.

The Missus: Then why do you have to spend some of your perfectly good money on a union card?

Bill: I don't want to have the rest of the men get a raise for me by joining up, and me not going with them. That's too much like stealing pennies from a blind man's cup, or waiting at the post office for somebody else to push the revolving door around for me.

I. W. W.: Besides, if too many wait for the rest to get a raise for them, there won't be any raise.

The Missus: I don't see what good a raise will do you that everybody gets, for then prices will go up too. That's all been explained right in the morning paper, right in this cartoon on the front page.

I. W. W.: No, don't let the papers fool you ma'am. If the higher wages were added to the price, no company would put up such a fight to stop the men from going after more money.

The Missus: But that's just what they do. I remember during the war, how Bill kept getting more money but it didn't do us any good because the cost of living kept going up faster and faster. And it was all on account of these unions.

I. W. W.: Prices went up because so much was being used up and destroyed in the war. How well off would you have been if your husband's pay hadn't gone up too? The unions kept raising wages where they didn't have contracts to stop them, to keep somewhere near the rising cost of living. Prices are going up again, and if your husband doesn't organize and raise his wages, you'll be most decidedly up against it.

The Missus: What union is it you want him to join?

I. W. W.: The I. W. W.

The Missus: Oh them terrible I Won't Works.

I. W. W.: The papers go to a lot of trouble to give the wrong idea about our union, and it's just because it's such a good union for the workers, and the employers don't like to shell out with their profits.

Bill: Sure, if we let the boss pick our union it would be one of these inside company unions. That's why we figure on the I. W. W. It must be good to have such a reputation. See, my card costs $1.75.

I. W. W.: Yes.

Bill: Say, ma. I need another quarter, I've only got a dollar and a half here.

The Missus: It don't make much sense to me, but I'll give you the quarter. And you better be a good union man from now on so I can get my money back.

I. W. W.: O. K.—you'll get it back many times over in wage increases, or I miss my guess.

The I. W. W In Theory and Practice

A BOOK REVIEW

"Industrial Unionism the C.I.O. and the I.W.W. in Theory and Practice" by Justus Ebert. Published by the Industrial Workers of the World.

How the Industrial Workers of the World fits into the present day industrial scene and how it lays the ground work for the industrial commonwealth to come is plainly and interestingly set forth in the new I. W. W. booklet entitled, Industrial Unionism, The C. I. O. and the I. W. W. in Theory and Practice, written by Justus Ebert.

Though this timely work is based on and is to a considerable extent a revision of the earlier I. W. W. in Theory and Practice by the same author, the new data it contains makes it in a very real sense a new and striking contribution to the literature of working class revolt against the capitalist system.

In approximately 150 brief pages (at this writing the work is still in manuscript form) the author has succeded in depicting those conditions which in recent years have given so many knotty problems to the American worker for solution. The new deal, the new politics growing out of capitalist integration and technological development, and the pseudo-industrial unionism promoted by reactionary labor leaders are discussed fairly and thoroughly. Contrasting the I. W. W. with the C. I. O. the author says:

"The A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. are both essentially the same. . . They both believe that the capitalist system is a final one. They have no social outlook beyond capitalism. They are bulwarks against socialism, or any other upward workers‘ movement. Accordingly they resist the new society. They join the capitalist class in the persecution of those who advocate one; and expell them from their membership.

"The I. W. W., on the other hand, believes that capitalism is but a phase of social evolution that is breaking down. The I. W. W., accordingly, organizes industrially to prepare to carry on society when capitalism shall have collapsed as it gives every indication of doing. It welcomes all workers at work in industry; or unemployed because of industrial maladjustment."

In discussing the democratic structure and policy of the I. W. W. he contrasts these with the autocratic leadership system that obtains in other unions, pointing out especially the C. I. O., of which organization he says:

"The C. I. O. is even more highly centralized then the A. F. of L. in this respect (centralization of power). Where the A. F. of L. international union heads only dominate their own individual unions, the C. I. O. heads dominate all of the C. I. O. unions. They have the most highly centralized control in all American labor unionism."

The book also has more than a word to say about the "anti-working class socialist-communist politics" which "in the name of Joseph Stalin and Karl Marx supported Roosevelt to save the workers of the country from relief cuts and fascism."

With the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. in existence, is the I. W. W. needed as a labor organization? Ebert asks this question and answers it with a clear and unequivocal, yes. He succeeds in showing, in fact, that "the I. W. W. is the only labor organization in the country today."

The book gives a thorough and easily understood account of the I. W. W. as it functions, of its ideals, motives and objectives. With such complete coverage of theoretical and practical material there is, of course, not room left in the book for a detailed history of the I. W. W. but even so enough of this has been included to give the reader an excellent picture of the eventful past of this organization.

This new "Theory and Practice" is a book that will make a place for itself in every labor library but what is more important, it will prove to be an eye-opener to every worker who reads it. Its predecessor has for years been used as text book in labor unionism in half a dozen different languages. There is every reason to expect that the present work will do even better.—C. K.

THE MARCH OF PROGRESS

By A Tannery Worker

Way back in 1849 there were in the United States 6,686 establishments engaged in the production of leather and there were 25,595 workers employed in the industry.

Since then some noteworthy changes have taken place in this industry which is one of the few that has not been affected tremendously through introduction of new machinery, showing that the concentration of industry into fewer and fewer hands goes forward even without pressure of great technological change.

By 1919 the number of establishments had decreased to 680, only a little more than one-tenth of number operating 70 years before. Side by side with this rapid decrease in plants there was an increase in the number of workers employed up to 1919, when there were 72,476 workers who had jobs in the industry.

But after 1919, along with a continuing decline in the number of plants, there has been also a decrease in the number of workers employed. In 1935 there were only 384 establishments and 50,877 workers. The decline in both the number of plants and the number employed has been steady, year by year. Between 1923 and 1935, about 9,000 workers were dropped; this number would have been more than doubled had it not been for the shortening of the work hours from 48 to 40 a week in this period.

In spite of the rapid decline in the number of plants, the typical leather manufacturing establishments still remains small compared with the size of plants which prevail in many other important industries. Even relatively large leather plants employ fewer than 500 workers on the average.

A considerable amount of the work done in leather tanneries is performed by hand. Hardly any of the machines in use can be called automatic, and almost every process involves some manual skill. Hides are easily damaged by unskillful handling and at some stages they deteriorate rapidly if not put through with due promptness the routine of operations involved in the manufacturing process. Because of these factors a high premium is placed on skill and training.

What the workers get

Just the same the workers in this industry are not well paid—far from it. In a recent issue of the Industrial Worker there was an account of wages and conditions in Elkland, Pa. where the "biggest sole leather plant in the world" is located. Here, it appears, that these skilled workers with fairly steady employment live practically in a state of peonage in spite of their skill. However, the U. S. Department of Labor gives the average annual wage of leather manufacture workers for 1935 as $1,095. With this as the average it is certain that the majority receive much less; so it is a fair inference that even outside of Elkland the leather makers have a standard of living barely above the subsistence level.

Productivity

In 1935 a wage earner in the sole leather tanning industry produced an average of 20.70 pounds of leather an hour. This was an increase of about 18 per cent over the average of 17.51 pounds in 1929. Comparable data for the years further back are not obtainable but it is estimated that the increase in producivity between 1923 and 1935 was about 32 per cent.

These increases in productivity were not due in any substantial measure to the introduction of new machinery for few new machines have been introduced into this industry since 1923. The gains have practically all been achieved through "better management" which, to the workers, is merely another way of saying, "harder and faster labor."

It has come to be an old story. With an ever growing population there is a progressive shrinkage in the number of workers employed in useful production. Increasing numbers of workers are forced into unemployment or into socially useless or even harmful occupations. More labor is expended for munitions and battleships, more for the protection and pleasure of the rich; and less for the production of food, clothing, and shelter.

The progressive degradation of the common man is a theme that can be illustrated a thousand ways from the facts of modern industrial life. Humanity needs shoes, lots more than it is getting, so we are compelled to make guns, something humanity doesn't need, instead; or we walk the streets doing nothing.

It's high time that the people who have been running the world for us producers be given a permanent lay-off.

Animosity Grows

At this writing, mid September, the fight is on in earnest in San Francisco where the teamsters have practically stopped cargo movement to and from the docks. Only the state-owned Belt Line railway is reported as moving I. L. A. handled cargo. This dispute was precipitated by the I. L. A. warehouse argument. There are so many charges and counter charges from each set of leaders that it is hard to get straight story, but it is all a part of the same mess.

In the Northwest the A. F. of L. and Teamsters have succeded in closing a number of lumber mills because they are manned by one time A. F. of L. unionists now C. I. O. At Long Beach in Southern California, the California State Federation of Labor convention in session is busily purging itself of the C. I. O.

All this wrangling is likely to spread more, and to result in more open warfare. The capitalist press gleefully gives columns of space to this worker-against-worker strife.

C. I. O. Record

The C. I. O. unions have conducted few important strikes on the coast. In some instances they have shown amateur form in their tactics. The most notable fiasco was the Douglas Aircraft sit down strike of last February. Also the C. I. O.'s notorious Mine Mill and Smeltermen's union bungled a strike of construction workers on the Los Angeles Water and Power Project near Bishop, California; adding to the long, infamous record of this formerly A. F. of L. affiliate. This union also had some strength on the Colorado aqueduct. It is now conducting a strike at Banning, California on the unfinished Colorado aqueduct tunnels. Since their only demand is a signed agreement of union recognition and no demands for shorter hours or better conditions, it is not likely to succeed. The aqueduct is a 48-hour week job.

The outcome of all the confusion in Pacific Coast labor ranks remains to be seen. It is now apparent that neither the C. I. O. nor the A. F. of L. can win all. The A. F. of L. certainly has the strongest footing. The reader may favor either one or the other of these two official-ruled groups and expect unity eventually to be gained. The writer sees nothing to be gained for the working class except its disillusionment in movements that keep workers fighting workers and unions scabbing on unions.

The leaders on both sides will have their publicity and high pay. The communist Western Worker will become a daily paper. Those queer creatures the communists whose magic glasses make yesterday's misleading traitor appear as today's peerless leader and union man, will add another pock mark to the pages of labor history.

There is one solution. Let the workers say: "To hell with all you fakers" and organize industrially as a class as advocated so long by the Industrial Workers of the World. Until then—?

Preamble of the Industrial Workers of the World

The working class and the employing class have nothing in common. There can be no peace so long as hunger and want are found among millions of working people and the few, who make up the employing class, have all the good things of life.

Between these two classes a struggle must go on until the workers of the world organize as a class, take possession of the earth and the machinery of production, and abolish the wage system.

We find that the centering of the management of industries into fewer and fewer hands makes the trade unions unable to cope with the ever growing power of the employing class. The trade unions foster a state of affairs which allows one set of workers to be pitted against another set of workers in the same industry, thereby helping defeat one another in wage wars. Moreover, the trade unions aid the employing class to mislead the workers into the belief that the working class have interests in common with their employers.

These conditions can be changed and the interest of the working class upheld only by an organization formed in such a way that all its members in any one industry, or in all industries if necessary, cease work whenever a strike or lockout is on in any department thereof, thus making an injury to one an injury to all.

Instead of the conservative motto, "A fair day's wage for a fair day's work," we must inscribe on our banner the revolutionary watchword, "Abolition of the wage system."

It is the historic mission of the working class to do away with capitalism. The army of production must be organized, not only for the every-day struggle with capitalists, but also to carry on production when capitalism shall have been overthrown. By organizing industrially we are forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old.

You Can't Throw a Natural Unless the Right Spots Are On the Dice

Once there was a small boy who went fishing for salmon in a wash tub. He didn't catch anything but he was only a youngster and had a good time pretending.

This boy had a grown up neighbor who got the goofy notion that he could find apples growing on sage brush. Of course he didn't find any and, because he persisted in his foolishness, he was finally safely stored away in an asylum.

There are thousands of workers who think they can get industrial unionism through the C. I. O., and other thousands who hope the A. F. of L. will give them economic security; and, strange as it may seem, there are still others who believe that a labor party holds some promise for suffering humanity.

No, they are not out of their heads, but just over credulous and misinformed.

When the workers sit in the game of labor politics, or craft unionism (old or new style), or Lewisized "industrial" unionism, even the greatest of good luck can't make them win. The right spots are not on the dice. They never have been there. Those are games so fixed that the workers always lose when they play them.

In the I. W. W. the rank and file members make their own rules and set their own goal. They may not win every time but of this they may be sure, they are not played for suckers.

WORKING CLASS UNITY

The Industrial Workers of the World wants a unified labor movement; but it is an active unity that we want, not the passive kind that grows out of meek submission to employers, leaders, and dictators.

We want to see men and women of the working class voluntarily united by a common cause, a conscious urge for plenty in freedom, and fighting on the economic field against the common enemy. We want workers united by knowledge and understanding of their position in society and by the conviction that through industrial unionism alone can they reach their goal—freedom from wage slavery.

There is unity of a kind in a mob bent on distruction. There is unity in an army rushing to its death, and the death of others, at the command of a leader whose purpose and object the soldier cannot understand, nor is supposed to question.

We don't want unity of the millions for the glory and honor of political and industrial leaders, no matter if they do claim to speak in the name of labor.

The unity we want is established only in workshops and in union meetings where workers produce and where they make plans for the regulation of production.

Let working class harmony develop out of a common activity instead of from blind obedience to self-imposed leaders, and the troubles from which we suffer will soon be ended. The I. W. W. shows the way to freedom!

November 11 Fifty Years Ago

By

LUCY PARSONS

Once again on November 11 a memorial meeting will be held to commemorate the death of the Chicago Haymarket martyrs—1937 is the fiftieth anniversary and this meeting bids fair to be more widly observed than any of the forty-nine previous ones.

It has taken fifty years to dig the facts of this case out from under the mountains of lies that was heaped upon our martyrs by the exploiters in their attempt to cover up their crime of sending five labor leaders to the gallows. You will hear people say today, as one said to me recently, "What! Calling those Haymarket bomb-throwers martyrs? Do you think I believe that? You will have to show me."

Now I am writing this article to "show" all such doubting Thomases.

The Protest Meeting

The Haymarket meeting was held as a protest against the brutality of the police who, during the great strike for the eight-hour work day of 1886, tried with all the vicious power at their command to defeat the hopes of the workers.

At noon on May 3, 1886, the striking workers of the McCormick reaper works were discussing their problems in a mass meeting near the plant when two patrol wagons loaded with policemen appeared. With drawn clubs the police rushed down upon the workers, clubbing them. Two workers were shot.

The next evening the famous Haymarket meeting was held to protest against this and other outrages of the police. This meeting was attended by about 3,000 people, men and women. I myself was there with our two children.

The meeting was perfectly peaceful but when it was about to adjourn a company of police charged upon it and ordered the crowd to disperse. At the onrush of these police, violators of the law they were sworn to uphold, someone—to this day he is unknown—hurled a bomb into the ranks of the police. Then hell broke loose!

The "Anarchist" Craze

The papers came out next morning with great flare headlines, "The anarchist dynamiters, bomb-throwers had started a riot and had intended to blow up the city; and but for the courage of the police they would have thrown many more bombs," and so on. They demanded that the leaders be arrested and made examples of.

Six weeks later eight men (our Chicago martyrs) were arraigned in a prejudiced court before a prejudiced judge and a packed jury. They were charged with murder.

Mayor Harrison of Chicago testified for the defense. Here are a few lines from his testimony:

"I went to the meeting for the purpose of dispersing it should it require my attention, when the meeting was about to adjourn I went to the station (about half a block away) and told Captain Bonfield to send his reserves home, that the meeting was about to adjourn, that the speeches were tame."

But State's Attorney Grinell, pointing to the defendents, said:

"These defendents are not more guilty than the thousands who follow them; they were selected by the grand jury because they were leaders. Convict them and save our society."

Bailiff Rylance was heard to remark:

"I am managing this case. Those fellows will hang as sure as death. I am selecting men that will compel the defense to waste their challenges, then they will have to take such men as the prosecution wants."

Triumph of Reaction

The trial, so-called, lasted sixty-three days. The jury brought in a verdict of guilty in three hours.

The judge in dismissing the jury-men thanked them for the verdict and told them that carriages were outside to take them home. The capitalists were over-joyed. A sum of $100,000 was paid the jury. The Chicago Tribune on August 20 opened its columns thus:

"The twelve good men and true have rendered a just verdict, let them be generously remembered. Raise a sum of $100,000 to be paid with the thanks of a grateful public."

When the march to the gallows was begun all the men showed remarkable courage without the slightest tinge of bravado. Parsons was wonderfully composed. The moment his feet touched the gallows he seemed to lose his identity . . . "No tragedian ever made a more marvelous presentation of a self-chosen part," a capitalist paper reported.

On that gloomy morning of November 11, 1887, I took our two little children to the jail to bid my beloved husband farewell. I found the jail roped off with heavy cables. Policemen with pistols walked in the inclosure.

I asked them to allow us to go to our loved one before they murdered him. They said nothing.

Then I said, "Let these children bid their father goodby, let them receive his blessing. They can do no harm."

In a few minutes a patrol wagon drove up and we were locked up in a police station while the hellish deed was done.

Oh, Misery, I have drunk thy cup of sorrow to its dregs but I am still a rebel.

"The Life Abundant"

A SHORT STORY

By WALTER PFEFFER

Suzanne Gives Some Low-Down On The Crust of the "Upper Crust"

Slim shouldn't discuss economics after a big meal. It always makes him too optimistic. Last Thursday he happened to be full of spare-ribs and cabbage—it was just the day after he got his pay from the WPA—and was discussing about Intelligence. It wasn't just the spare-ribs and cabbage, it must have been something he had read about a speech by one of these big shots who do the window dressing for the corporations.

"The world is going ahead to a greater abundance even if the unions don't do much about it," he opined. "Improved machinery not only makes it possible; it makes it necessary. For years haven't we heard political leaders of every party, in and out of office, business leaders, lawyers, college professors, everybody in general say that the problem is one of bringing consumption of goods to a par with our productive capacity? Isn't it plain as day that the economic problem is making everybody think? Aren't the capitalists, the industrial leaders, the big bankers, all talking differently about the standard of living than they used to? Yes, sir, there's a growing Intelligence among all classes of people, and that is going to solve our problem. They know that they've got to raise the standard of living, or they can't keep their machines running."

Suzanne had dropped in—Thursday is her day off—in the midst of this optimistic opinionation, and was already busy on her knitting. (That's a sure sign that she was all set for a big argument.) She actually stopped knitting to ask: "So the leopard is changing his spots, is he?"

"Yes, sir, right in front of our eyes every day," says Slim, "you can see them coming to recognize the impact of technology on our socio-economic structure." (Every time Slim feels shaky about an argument, he hoists up all the six-bit jawbreakers he can find.)

"Well, the only ones of the tribe that I know much about are the Old Man, and His Nibbs (that's the Old Man's son-in-law), and the folks that come out to eat, drink and be merry with them," says Suzanne, "and their spots ain't changing. In fact you should have tin-eared on them last night," she says.

"I was out in the kitchen, dishes all washed and Algernon in bed, and the house that quiet that I was pretty sure the little spoiled brat would soon be asleep, when the Old Man let a holler out of him. 'They're eatin' too damned much,' he says. So I look into the library where they had a log fire on to make it look cheerful, and there he was looking at the Saturday Evening Post.

He'd said it so loud that His Nibbs, and Letitia, (that's the Old Man's daughter that His Nibbs married), and Cornelia, (that's the other daughter that's waiting for the Old Man to buy her a title), and Mr. and Mrs. Spifldink who were over playing bridge with His Nibbs and the Mrs., all looked up respectful like. Even Gerald, His Nibbs' kid brother who's going to college, took his nose out of his book long enough to see if the Old Man was goin' to throw a fit.

"I was wondering if he was hollering about the help, but I'll say that for the Old Man, he always leaves it to Letitia to begrudge us enough to eat—yeah, she buys chops for us, exactly one apiece, and the butcher's boy is that well trained that he has to slip us something extra, and once in a while we take up a collection for him. "Look at this ad,' he says, 'in a magazine that reaches millions of people. How to coax kids to eat a hot cereal for breakfast! When I was a kid we used to fight to clean out the pot!'

"Well, they all relaxed a bit to find it was nothing worse than that. But he wasn't goin' to let them have any peace. He lays down the magazine, and glowers around at everybody, and lets another whoop out of him: 'Yeah, they're eatin' too damned much!'

"It set Algernon to crying that he wanted an ice-cream cone, and Mrs. Letitia sent the chauffeur out to get him one, and that's one chore Dick always kicks about, for he usually gets gypped out of the nickle. His Nibbs doesn't figure Algernon should have ice-cream after bed time either, and that must have made him sore, for he came back at the Old Man with: 'Well, dad, that's just a line of advertising that's brought you in plenty—you have a ten per cent interest in that—and they just grind up some wheat, and parch a bit of it—and package it and sell it at a fancy price by that kind of advertising, so what are you squawking about?'

" 'I don't give a damn whether I made a million on it or not,' says the Old Man. 'That ad is a sign of the times. It's a sign that these damned people that are striking, and raising so much hell, are eating too damned much. If they didn't have too damned much to eat, there wouldn't be any sense to this sort of advertising—and it all goes to prove my point that you can't pacify the beasts by giving them more. We put the lazy bums on relief, and even then they eat too damned much and want us to pay their doctor bills for them too. We'd all be better off if the kids were still scrapping to clean out the pots.'

" 'Then how would you sell them this cereal?' asks Gerald.

" 'We wouldn't have to sell it to them,' says the Old Man.

" 'If you didn't sell it to them, what would you do with the mills that make it, how would you make money out of them if you closed them down?' he asks.

" 'I'd damned well fire a few people if they couldn't figure how else to make some money with those damned mills. I know well enough that if we paid people less money, and they got along by wasting less food, and not eating so damned much, I'd have more money. Oh yeah, I can tell by the look on your face what you're thinking. I know what sort of radicalism they're teaching in that college that I'm fool enough to pay for—I've heard some of those political orators call me a gilded Grease-Us and you think I begrudge the working class the very bread that's in their mouth. But I'm telling you this, young feller, that there never was a kinder hearted man than yours truly, or a man who had the interests of the working man closer to his heart. It's the principle of the thing that I'm fighting about. We give these men jobs, and they bite the hand that's feeding them. We have to give them bonuses to get any damned work out of them. We get a bunch of college bred boobs as personnel managers, and every time some outside agitator comes around, they get yellow around their gills and tell us we'll have to give the men an increase or they'll organize and go on strike—and all the time it's the same old story—the more they get, the more they want. The world's going to the dogs and it's all because they eat too damned much. We got to do something about it. We got to save this damned waste. We got to save this damned civilization. And we're going to cut these wages next week, and we're going to keep on cutting them until kids start fighting to clean out the pots."

"Hell," says Slim, "he's just one of the Old Guard. The new type of capitalist is college trained—he knows his economics—he knows you can't keep on running that way—increased productivity won't permit it."

"Well," says Suzanne, "he may be Old Guard, but he's the guy that tells these other fellows where to get off at. I'm just telling you that you won't be wrong if you start telling the boys that they have to organize and fight, or they'll be getting wage cuts."

Industrial Unionism - - It's Power And Promise

By

COVINGTON HALL

No subject is being more "cussed and discussed" today than the question of Industrial Unionism.

Therefore, what is industrial unionism? Out of what environment did the idea originate?

To me at least, Frank Walsh, the chairman of the Industrial Relations Commission of 1913, "hit the nail on the head" when he said: "The I.W.W. is the most American thing in America." By which he meant that the plans and principles laid down in the Preamble to the constitution of the I.W.W. could have originated only on this continent; for only here were the economic and other factors ready for the birth of the idea. Well, what is this idea?

For A Democratic Society

It is, first, that democracy as defined by Thomas Jefferson, "equal rights and opportunities to all and special privileges to none," is a good doctrine for the masses to cling to and strive to perfect. Under the influence of this idea, the American workers have sought to organize from the earliest times. All their great spontaneous attempts at organization were based on class and not on craft rights, as witness the Knights of Labor, the American Railway Union, the Brotherhood of Railway Employees, the Western Federation of Miners, the United Mine Workers, the American Labor Union, the Industrial Workers of the World, the Brewery Workers, the Bakery Workers, and others too numerous to mention here.

No one who reads the history of American labor movements can honestly believe that the idea is "a foreign one," for, if any idea was ever born on American soil, it is the idea of industrial unionism and its logical corollary, industrial democracy. Craft unionism, not industrial unionism, is "un-American."

This is not the only source of the origin of the great idea, of course. There is yet one other that makes it a race-idea. And that idea is that economic and social evolution is inevitably driving us on, whether we will or not, to one of two things—revolution, or a going onward and upward to a higher and nobler society; or devolution, or a sinking backward and downward to a lower standard of living.

With this idea ever in mind, the industrial unionist forever insists that the hope of a free and classless society depends first and last upon the ability of the working class to control the factor that finally determines the lives of men and nations—the economic factor.

Industrial Unionism the Only Way

Holding steadfast to this idea, we further hold that it is only by and through the industrial union that labor can plan and control the production and distribution of the means of life, food, clothing, shelter, education, power, etc. All of which, we hold, should be produced for consumers' USE and not for private profit, whether of individual or corporations.

Believing this, we demand the organization of the workers into, first, unions covering an entire industry; and, second, that these industry unions be bound together in ONE UNION of the working class, the working class being, as we define it, all those who must depend upon the sale of the labor-power of their hands and brains to acquire the means of life.

Only by and through such an organization can we conceive of society carrying on when "capitalism collapses," as we hold that it most surely will, at no distant date now in these United States.

In building the one big union it is not alone a question of forging a fighting weapon to use in the struggle for higher wages and better working conditions. When capitalism shall have disappeared through the operation of forces that are even now hastening it to its end, the organized working class will take control—through its industrial unions—of the means of production and distribution.

The diagram of an I. W. W. industrial union above need not be taken as representing exactly the manner in which the functions of the workers on a job are or will be carried out. For instance the functions of the "shop council" indicated are at present merged in the shop branch.

Other than the machinery of the industrial union, we can see no other way society can carry on if our democratic rights are to be preserved and broadened. We cannot conceive of the co-operative commonwealth functioning through the machinery of the capitalist or political state, nor through any other machinery of administration based on territorial units of organization and representation, any more than we can conceive of a capitalist system functioning through that of feudalism. With President Woodrow Wilson, we hold that "the corporation is a new form of social organization that has already risen superior to and above the state"; and that, this being so, we either democratize the Corporation or lose all we have gained through centuries of bitter struggle.

Of, By and For the Workers

Seeing this fact of the domination of human welfare by corporations and the kings who own and govern them, and seeking for a way to establish a truly democratic co-operative commonwealth, working class thinkers evolved the idea of industrial unionism as the only means to gain control and management of industry and agriculture—as the only means whereby could be established "a government of, by and for all the people": for if the people, who are the workers, cannot control that on which their jobs depend—industry—their control elsewhere is a delusion and a snare. So, our idea is that the union and its correlated organizations will supersede the State as the administrator of society, and that the workers and technicians alone are capable of creating the Industrial Republic. We look to no "withering away of the State" save as the power of the industrial republic grows and developes; and, despite the seeming evidence to the contrary, we hold that no power on earth can finally prevent the conquest of social power by the workers, not in this country, at least, for if President Roosevelt is correct, we, the working class, already constitute "ninety per cent of the American people."

The Conquest of Poverty

To organize that "90 per cent" and run this continent on the good old American principle of "the greatest good to the greatest number" is the aim and purpose of all true industrial unionists, whatever their affiliation may be. We hold that this can be done, that President Hoover for once stated truth when he said shortly before leaving the White House that "the American people today stand face to face with the conquest of poverty, the first time in history any people have ever so stood." There is no doubt about the truth of that assertion, for it has since been backed up by statement after statement by many able engineers to the effect that a minimum income of around $5,000 per year was now possible for every American family, some engineers putting the minimum still higher.

Not within the bounds of the present economic system, however, can this higher standard of living be achieved, but only in a system based uncompromizingly on production for use. It is either that—PRODUCTION FOR USE—or a steadily falling standard of living for the mass of the American people from now on, and no matter what their money wages may be.

It may be said that production for use means socialism. It does. But it is no longer a question of "whether we will have socialism or not." As regards that, the only question now before the American people to decide is this: "Shall the socialism that is ALREADY here be an industrial democracy or an industrial despotism?" That is the only choice we have, for all our great basic industries and natural resources are today operated, not by individualistic, but by collectivized labor. They have been trustified—socialized, but not for us who labor.

Therefore, seeing this, and while we battle ever for higher wages, shorter hours and better working and living conditions, industrial unionists never forget this: that the final purpose is INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY, the ending of kingship in industry, of dictatorship everywhere.

Power in the Union

There is no doubt that the One Big Union, once organized, will have the power to bring this about, for it will have the power of food, clothing and shelter, of transportation and communication, aye! and of rifles, cannon and machine-guns in its hand. It will control the mightiest might on earth—ECONOMIC POWER, the source of all other powers, and of all other freedoms, as well.

Finally, there is no other plan that offers so great a promise of individual and collective security and prosperity, so much of spiritual liberty to the race as that held out to mankind by the industrial unionists and syndicalists of the world. It is a promise of free men and women working in free workshops and on free soil and of free children in free schools and free playgrounds everywhere under the banners of the Democratic Industrial Republic.

Let us rise and march, my comrades, to the song that Freedom sings!
Let us hurl a Man's defiance in the ashen face of Kings!
Let us rise and organize for justice, freedom, homes and bread
Till the whole world shakes and trembles to the thunder of our tread,
To the thunder of our tread, to the thunder of our tread,
Till the whole world shakes and trembles to the
thunder of our tread!
Onward, onward, onward
Till the toilers all are free!
Forward, forward, forward
In a mighty jubilee!

"Fordism's" Sacrifices

By JOHAN KORPI

On Thursday evening the radio broadcast "March of Time" dramatizes the news over the ethereal waves. Regarding one particular news item from Paris, the dramatization was as follows:

Women, in an apparently paralyzed condition are brought to emergency receiving room of Hospital from a sugar refinery, their nerves irritated to the utmost, the slightest confusion could bring about an awful hysteria.

The physician arrives, examines the patients, makes notes of his findings, at last asks:

"Where were these patients brought from?"

"From the sugar refinery."

"What kind of work did they do?"

"They worked on some machinery."

"What happened to them in the refinery?"

The party who had brought the women related:

"They were working on machines, the speed of which is exceedingly fast and the speed of the attendant's hands must conform with that of the machines. Oftentimes a worker gets a fainting spell, but now it was a little more. In the place of just fainting—they just stood with a horrified stare in their eyes, when suddenly one screeched in a terrifying voice at the machinery, others joined her. Finally they fell in a faint."

The Doctor asked one of the patients—"Do you remember what happened to you?"

"—I remember. The high speed of the machine, from day to day, week to week, the terrifying noise of machinery in motion, it gets my fingers to shaking, my eyes see images, see a horrifying, shattering machine. Oh! It's there! In front of me! . . . I can't get my hands away from it. — Now my eyes!!! Oh! Oh! oh . . ."

The woman shrieks the last words in a voice filled with terror and suffering. The doctor follows every detail of the happenings with keen interest, until once again the patient has been revived to consciousness.

It was not the first occurence of this kind that the doctor had witnessed, therefore, he appears before the Health Commission and speaks as follows:

"Medical Science has come to the conclusion that the mass production era, its speed and excessive noise-producing machinery has created a heretofore unknown disease which is widely spread and of serious nature. It creates high blood pressure, nervous prostration, fainting and it may have as a climax total paralysis."

This, in brief, was the contents of the radio broadcast.

This news item deprived me of my sleep that night for I too have been at the mercy of similar machines. Only once in my lifetime, but, that one time was enough to create memories, harrowing mental images of a machine for the remainder of my life. Originally I was a cobbler by trade. In this trade, as in all handicraft, the worker handles his tools as well as the materials worked upon, being totally individually in control of the work and speed thereof. The worker can either speed up or slacken his pace at will.

We Used to Control the Machine

At the age of sixteen I started working in a fully machine-equipped shoe factory, now about thirty-five years ago. The machinery was primitive and the output, accordingly very small. Each machine was separate, operated individually, not depending upon the other for speed, hence, the worker was the master of his machine. He was able to either start or stop it whenever he wished so to do. He could control the speed of his machine according to the speed of his own ability.

Upon my arrival in the United States in the year 1905, I worked in a few shoe factories, but then machinery still was in its early stages.

The automobile industry probably is the first, in the so-called, mass production form, where the machine and article worked upon control the movements of the worker on the working premises. Its murdering effect upon the worker can hardly be fully realized by no one outside of the ones who become the sacrifices of this sort of industry.

The Ford output probably was the way-opener of the development of this creation.

Many corporations in the automobile industry have followed Ford's ways of development and some have possibly exceeded him in it.

In the year of 1923 I experienced the fate that befalls workers of mass production. At that time I secured work in Ford's River Rouge Plant, where, already then, 45,000 workers were doing three shifts. Seeking work, we stood close to a thousand in number, in line. This line lasted from 4 in the morning until 3 in the afternoon, for many were the seekers and many hundreds of workers were employed.

A Job at Ford's: Preparation

A stout man, equipped with eagle eyes, reminding one of a southern slave driver, walks alongside the slow moving line, cane in hand, with which he points at a worker, whom he has approved. He asks a few questions. If the answers are satisfying, he points with his cane to an office where this worker gets a stamped slip and then upstairs, where, first some routine questions are asked regarding his former places of employment. If the answers are satisfactory to the officials, then starts the physical examination by the doctors. The first doctor examines the eyes and tests them as to their sight. The next doctor examines chest, heart and lungs and the third examines the hands, feet and completes the examination. This occurs while the worker or applicant is stripped. If the outcome is satisfactory as was in my case, then he gets a slip which designates the department in which he is to work.

On stepping out, Ford transportation, which took about twenty of us straight to the factory, was waiting. We went not directly to our departments, but first into a theatre within the factory, where there were about a hundred men already waiting. Then the show started. On the white screen appeared a machine and beside the screen, with pointer in hand, stood the instructor who explained the moving parts of the machine as they appeared on the screen. He explained each movement in detail and how the worker is to conform his movements accordingly so as to keep the equipment and the material under control during his time at the machine.

First the moving parts and the functions of each, on the machine were explained thoroughly during the showing of the slow motion series of the picture, then it was speeded up faster, then still faster. The instructor brought out very carefully all of the dangerous movements, with which the workers could cause damage to the machinery, the material and also to themselves, but the greatest stress was laid upon how to use the equipment most efficiently so as to eliminate all pauses and gain more and more speed. So, on the screen there appeared one machine after another, with their respective movements and, before two hours had elapsed this audience knew just what department they, each one, would be referred to and how the speed of this work could attain its maximum.

The Job

After the show each was given a number with instructions which shift he was to work and in what department. I was assigned to the Open Body Department. My duties were to paint the space for the lock in the door frame which is about four inches wide and four inches long.

At that time the frame was of wood and the paint was to eliminate rot. It did not need much skill, three strokes with the brush and that was all, but, the speed, it necessitated was more than I was capable of or could withstand.

The boss who first showed me the work, just how it was to be done, pointed and made motions with his hands and movements with his lips, for his voice was not audible above the din and noise of the machinery, it was so great, unless he hollered in my ear.

The work was to be performed alongside a conveyor. From the department where the frames were manufactured, the conveyor brought a continuous line of frames. My duty was to take the frames from the conveyor, place them on the floor, then paint them, and pile them up for the next operation to be made upon them, the covering by sheet metal panels.

I felt a certain attachment to my duty, as insignificant as it seemed. In endeavored to keep up with the speed of the arrival of the frames, but that was impossible, I could not. The frames stacked up more and more which I had no time to paint. When I started to paint, the conveyor which kept moving constantly, took the frames past me when I could not snatch them off fast enough.

An Introduction to Speed

The boss came around and watched my panicky circumstances and smiled. It created in me a thought that he surely is thinking: "There is another ass without brains." And, perhaps, he would not have been very much in the wrong, for I was not there for pleasure but for the want of bread. Soon a young man came to assist me. He yelled in my ear: "Do not hurry! I shall assist you this shift and the shift following to get you accustomed to the speed. Take care, not even the best of men have been able to stand the gaff more than a couple of months."

The extreme noise and din of the machinery caused me to nod my head in assent. I endeavored to quieten from my first bewilderment, I tried to think that others before me have been unsuccessful here, but the work and its din drowned my thoughts.

During the eight-hour work day we had a fifteen minute rest period, during which we grabbed some sandwiches. The keen interest in the work during the first shift had caused forgetting to note anything else. Up to then I had not noticed the so-called mercury lights; it destroys color. Starting to eat my sandwich it appeared soiled green, then my working tools, my skin, the skin of others, all seemed a soiled green. Later I read of such a light completely destroying the optical nerves in a short period, so much so that over 50 per cent of the Ford employees have weak eyesight.

The Machine is Master

I resumed my work with the same vim and interest after lunch. Should it be necessary to leave even for a moment, another worker must take your place for that time, for the machine cannot be stopped. At the lavatory door is a guard with stick in hand, should anyone overstay, either falling into a stupor of relaxation or faint, for even such has occurred from overexhaustion, — then the guard steps in and does his duty.

So continued the first, second and even the third shift, and so on until I had attained the speed required to put out from six to eight thousand frames in an eight-hour period.

But the effect that this speed has on one, I have never experienced in any other work. This constantly moving conveyor, frames, painting, stacking up the frames, they control every iota of the human being, hands, eyes, body and mind, so that it is impossible to remove ones thoughts without impairing the speed.

When the eight-hour strain is ended, the workers of the next shift take the place at the machine without a stop, stepping out of the shop with the noise of the machine in ones ears.

When the outdoor clear and quiet air contacts the worn and strained body, it is as though paralysis had struck each nerve and muscle. Thus weary we get on the street car and hardly a block is passed when this paralyzed body and nervous system is in a drowsy sleep. It so happened to me and also to the other workers. This paralysis does not stop on the way; it also continues to the home. Still tired, weary, sleepy, no desire to go anywhere but sleep, to remain quiet and away frm noise and hurry. The saying throughout Detroit is "Nodding like a Ford employee."

Voiceless Mummies

Thus arriving for the next shift we are still weary, sleepy. Voiceless mummies we move inside of the entrance, but, what a miracle! When we step within the factory, where grease, gas fumes and the din of the machinery surround us, then the outward appearance seems to change. Every nerve and muscle becomes alert. The eye becomes sharp, the movements become quick. So living is the memory—as though this small individual human, stops being, thinking, and joins and becomes a part of, a moving part to this large, giant-like, noisy machinery. Without our own desire we feel ourselves becoming a part of this mass production. It pulls us along with itself.

Human Scrap: A Machine Product

Thus I felt, also saw my work companion feel. We hurried to our machinery, not hearing, not seeing, not thinking of anything but that we must do our part in this hellish conglomeration. At the end of the sixth week I was at the end of my wits. The constantly increasing speed was increased according to my ability and the constant bending over paralyzed my back. I could not bend it. The boss referred me to the first aid department. There I had to wait, for there were 28 ahead of me. It was not a pleasant sight. Many a worker had a mashed hand, some a foot, an eye, head, or some other portion of the body injured. I asked one comrade:

"Have all of these been injured in this department?"

"They have, and the day is just beginning, there will be many times this before the day is over.'

"Never have I read in the paper that workers are injured here."

"Oh, that is not necessary, why that would injure Ford's reputation and would probably hinder the sale of Ford automobiles."

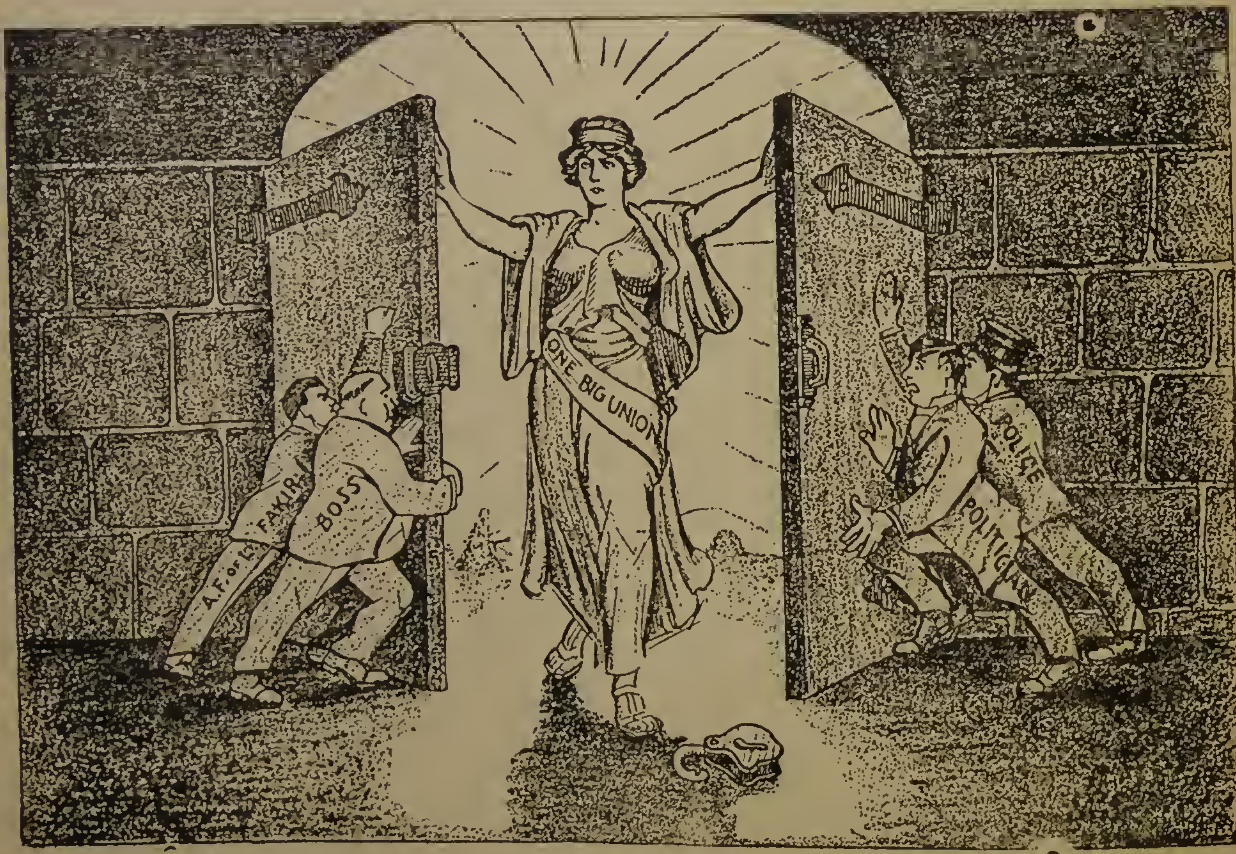
"So, now I understand why they hire so many workers each day."

I received a plaster on my back and was ordered to the factory hospital nearby for examination. There I was advised that I could come again for treatment, but should I not recover within 14 days, I would lose the hospital treatments as well as my job. I was in bed for close to two weeks.

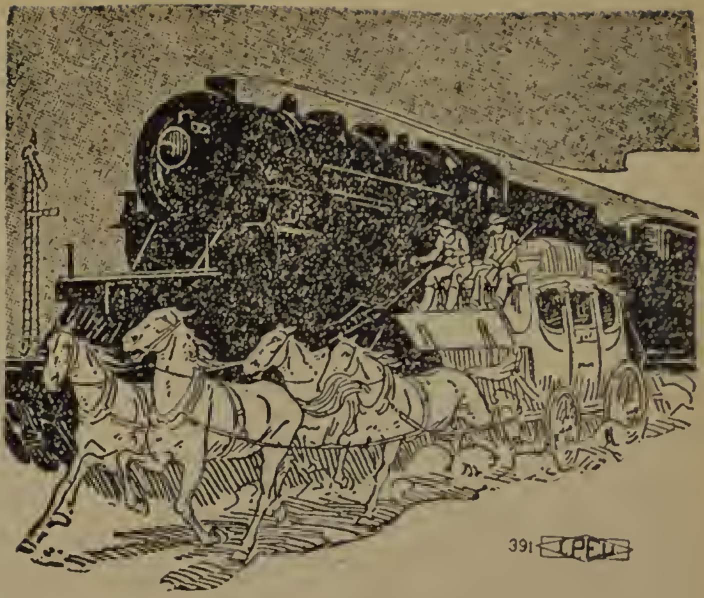
I received employment in other factories, where I thought myself more human, although yet a wage slave. But even then finally, I developed lead poisoning which is an occupational disease attributed to metal finishers, as in the development of machinery, even in that I became the sacrifice of "Fordism."

Workers Awaken!

Of the foregoing has been heard for over ten years. I know of many, many, working companions during this period who became paralyzed, sacrifices of "Fordism." How large is their number —and how many thousands suffer in hospitals . . . Could I but call so that I would be heard from one end of the earth to the other, in the factories, mines and mills to the slaves therein, brothers of mine—I would call in their ears over the din of the machinery with the last of the broken down strength of my lungs: "Stop! Look! That machine will crush your muscles, your nerves! It will maim you long before your time! It will dullen and paralyze your brain, making you dull, desireless, machine-governed robots . . . That machine will murder you unpityingly with its noise and speed . . . Think! You are human! You have a life and you have a right to the good in life! You have human responsibilities to your loved ones, to your working companions, to your own class! Organize in your class . . . Organize on your jobs, in your industries, over production! Organize and get possession of that machine, the machinery of all production, and make it the slave of the human workers! Clothe the machine in your garments, give it the speed you desire to protect the good of life. Use the production of the machinery you govern, use it for the good of your relatives, your beloved ones, and for the good of the class that has made this production possible . . . Then and only then is the machine the upbuilder of the human race.



The End of an Epoch



By A. B. C.

The period beginning with the discovery of America and just coming to a close has been, in many ways, the most remarkable in human history. The best traits and the worst, carried men into new wildernesses in search of souls to save and bodies to enchain. Intellectual heights were scaled by men of genius; new depravities were invented, more ruinous than those of Sodom and Gomorrah.

In the preceding centuries all forms of wealth had become private property in the hands of a few; even religion was a monopoly in most cases and was the ready tool of despotic governments, But the newly discovered lands promised wealth and liberty of conscience to all.

Under the banner of religious and political freedom the oppressed of Europe murdered natives of the new lands and took possession. They enslaved the red men or chased them into the desert; the blacks were chained and taken to far countries; white slavery soon flourished in every port of the world. The new freedom was the same as the old—freedom of the strong, the crafty, the unscrupulous. From the very start force and fraud ruled in the new colonies. Private property everywhere became the corner stone of the new governments. Now the wealth of four new continents is as thoroughly monopolized as it was before the sailing of Columbus.

The Triumph of Monopoly

Not only are all the available resources marked private property, every day new machines take the place of the men and women who labor. One man stays to tend the machine, others are turned into the street. The mechanical equipment that has brought us in sight of the promised land becomes a weapon in the hands of the oppressors. The accumulated wealth and knowledge of the ages are used, not for our welfare but for our destruction. Those who still have jobs or some petty property are clinging to a sinking ship. Foolish are their hopes, if they expect to ride safely through the coming storm. Private ownership of resources degrades those who own as well as those who work. The prosperity of manufacturing countries such as England, Germany, and the United States was cheap, one-sided, and transient. The poverty of the world at large was wide-spread, deep, and lasting. The day of reckoning is at hand. It is time to choose between industrial democracy and industrial slavery.

For whether the process be fast or slow, the inevitable end of private ownership of resources is monopoly. And never in all recorded time has the development of small properties into monopoly been so rapid. Four continents, each larger than Europe, have been surveyed, colonized, made private property and then gathered into the hands of a few. The scientific and mechanical advances of the race have been rapid, even startling; these also have been turned to the benefit of the money changers, so that all future progress is subject to the whims of the miser and the profiteer. Humanity stands face to face with world-wide monopoly and no new lands as a refuge.

Individualism is Doomed

Two roads are open before us, reorganization and chaos. Already we see in Europe a row of dictators with promises in one hand and force in the other.

Behind them stalk hunger, ignorance, and demoralization. The same causes will bring the same results here in America. Monopoly of resources means political centralization. The sooner we face the facts, the better for all concerned.

Even though the iron hand of monopoly were not at our throats, even if privately owned labor devices did not threaten our standing as wage workers, the totalitarian states would surely put an end to the fiction of individualism. When millions of people equipped with modern machines and scientific methods are armed with the avowed purpose of conquest and pillage of their neighbors, such action compels all other governments to arm likewise or face extinction.

The totaliarian state is another product of monopoly whose development is easy to trace. The main business of all political states is the protection of property. In the colonies, especially in the English colonies, a large proportion of the colonists obtained land or other wealth. Under such circumstances a democratic government is usually formed.

Government Through Force

While giving ample protection to property, such states seldom need to use much force as land may be had for the asking, jobs are plentiful, and the general standard of the people is one of comfort. But when the day comes, as come it must, when the great resources are monopolized by a few, the pressure from the landless and the unemployed calls for a stronger government and the use of more force to protect the monopoly.

The ruling gang in such a state, usually headed by some dictator, dominates all individuals, classes, minor groups, and even the property they are supposed to protect. Democratic forms and ideas are abolished; force is the only argument.

But the greater police power of the state requires greater revenue to keep it. Revenues must be increased. At first this is done by lowering the standard of living of the population at home and, when finally that fails, by conquest of weaker nations. The struggle for world domination is on and no matter which dictator wins, the human race will lose. The "Age of Individualism" is dead.

Truth vs Humbug

A Short Discussion About Education

"What a piece of work is man! How noble in reason! How infinite in faculty! In apprehension how like a god!"—Shakespeare.

"The properly trained intellect can understand, describe, the whole world in a simple, natural way."—Dietzgen.

"Nor are we possessed of any evidence which authorizes us to assign even an imaginary boundry at which human intellect will, of necessity, be brought to a stand."—Buckle.

But do not take the word of these men, though they are recognized as authorities. Go to the playground and see for yourself. Better still, try to answer the questions of some bright boy. It is nothing less than miraculous what they see, hear, and ask about.

Yet in a few years those brains will be dull and inattentive, and their later years will be spent in an atmosphere of confusion and frustration. Most of them will be like masterless dogs, ready to follow the first demagog or neurotic who promises a rescue from insecurity. Those intellects, the most complicated and delicate tools in the universe, have been crammed with facts, figures, rules, and tables—most of which are worthless and even meaningless. Those minds capable of analyzing and classifying everything in nature, resemble a storehouse for unclaimed freight; only a few items are labeled or classified and the rules for classification have not been learned.

Obscurity Reigns Supreme

In a time when the future of every nation, the fate of humanity, hangs in the balance, not one institution can be relied upon to tell the truth.

Radio, press, and church are no more respected. But, says H. V. O'Brien, columnist, "In my catalog of smitten shams, education must take a high place. What was long regarded as a miracle appears now as menace . . . It is the crowning irony of our faith in education that the educated man, in his attitude toward ideas, is emotional, childish, indistinguishable from the taboo-ridden savage of the jungle."

"But it is dangerous to tell children the truth," says someone. It can be dangerous only to those individuals and institutions that profit from fraud and deceit. Harm comes to the children by lying to them or by withholding from them the truths of nature and the civilization in which they live.

"Head Fixing"

"The children will learn to think for themselves," says another. The most important natural laws are concealed from them. How will they learn? As for social laws, the wiseacres themselves are ignorant of them; how can they teach others? Why not teach students the rules of sound thinking, the nature of the human brain processes?

We are told that scientific laws of thinking are too difficult for them. "Such is not the case," says John Dewey, who ought to know if any of them do: "The native and unspoiled attitude of childhood, marked by ardent curiosity, fertile imagination, and love of experimental inquiry, is near, very near, to the attitude of the scientific mind," he adds. But regardless of ability and capacity, which are infinite, they are compelled by law to go to school to instructors who are also compelled by law to withhold the most important truths and to palm off untruths, half truths, and plain humbug.

Then comes Chief Justice Hughes of the Supreme Court with another wise crack: "Then there will always be a multitude who are congenitally unable to think straight." In the face of the evidence, Your Honor, I think you are wrong. And when Pegler says we owe more respect to the Supreme Court than to nine old bums in the back room of a saloon, I fear he is getting effeminate. I vote for the nine old bums.

In view of these vicious circles that afflict the educational system and for which our wise men have only silly answers, what is to be done?

As a general proposition when any institution becomes useless or detrimental, that institution will be remodelled or abolished, or be permitted to die out. Since it is inconceivable that the school will be allowed to die or be destroyed, it remains to us to find means and methods to modify it to suit the present needs. It is proposed, therefore, to those, especially students, who have given serious thought to this subject, to write to the author in care of the One Big Union Monthly, giving their opinions as to causes and conditions of this disease, and suggestions for a cure. Write if you are interested, or give this magazine to a friend who is.

Fundamental Truths

"Profoundly pathetic is youths' hoping against hope that some older person can help untangle the riddles of existence." Let us hasten to add that it is absolutely damnable. For these great riddles are not natural but artificial creations, propagated by church, state, and school with the knowing and avowed intention of misleading the young regarding the most simple and important truths about themselves and the society in which they live. In the hands of well paid, highly trained specialists, the simple facts of individual, sexual, and social life are so mixed with the prejudices, traditions, and delusions of past ages that the young and innocent minds of children are wrapped up in a vicious maze from which they seldom escape. Let us examine a few of these truths and then see how they have been smothered with lies.

First: Man is an animal, nothing more. This very evident fact is so constantly with us throughout life that we cannot entirely escape it. But by starting on the child at its mother's breast, with lies about his divine nature, following this with solemn rites and music in the church; then the evasions and hypocrisy through school, even into the university, the facts are obscured and the lies are accepted.

Second: The sex life of mankind is wonderful but as simple as that of the domestic animals and less difficult to understand than that of the honey bee, the kangaroo, or the spider. Yet out of these simple, natural processes, prejudice, religion, and school have built taboos and ostricisms that wreck the lives of millions. Our savage ancestors venerated the sex organs and at times worshipped them. We in our superior wisdom must not so much as utter their names.

Third: Man is a thinking animal. Thinking is as natural as digesting food or the circulation of the blood and hardly more difficult to understand. The laws for sound thinking could be written on one sheet of paper. Says Dietzgen, "Thinking, understanding, explaining, realizing, are so many terms for a formal classification and description of the final test, anyone can verify whether he has been thinking truly, as soon as he compares his thought with the available material of the studied object." Our primitive ancestors allowed accidental and imaginary relationships to assume permanent forms; they peopled the world with mermaids, centaurs, unicorns, angels, gods, and ghosts. The medicine men took advantage of their ignorance, made these creatures of fancy into permanent tools to browbeat and blackmail their fellows. All modern religions can be traced back

All the wheels be standing still
If thy folded arms might will!

Another period of ten years passed on the annals of time. What is now recorded had direct bearing on what is transpiring at the present time in the field of conflict between capital and labor. Under date of May 17, 1937 there appeared the following news item in Washington D. C. newspapers:

> WASHINGTON, D. C.—The distinction of having been the scene of the first sitdown strike in the United States—and a successful one belongs to Schenectady, N. Y., it is claimed here.
> In 1906 the Industrial Workers of the World organized a sitdown strike in the General Electric plant to back up a demand for higher wages. At a given signal, picked groups of mechanics in key departments stopped work, folded their arms and sat quietly looking at their tools and work tables. Picket lines were thrown around the plant and most of the 5,000 employes joined in the strike.
> The sitdowners stayed in the plant 65 hours, receiving food and drink from outside friends. The demand for more pay was agreed to by the G. E. and sitdown tactics accomplished their first victory in this country.
> It was a demonstration of what Bill Haywood, famous I. W. W. leader, called "the power of folded arms."

We may discount the latter part, for at the time of that "Folded Arm Demonstration" Haywood was awaiting trial in Boise City, Idaho. After his acquittal Haywood did not come near the I. W. W., nor did he mention it until he paid to Joseph Ettor in Pittsburgh on May 1, 1910 his admission fee into the I. W. W. as a member at large. The "Folded Arm" method, however, had been explained to Haywood in Worta's Hall on January 5, 1905.

The Buzzards Come to the Rescue of Gould and Belmont

Again the background of events leading to the affair in Schenectady—and incidentally in Lynn and Pittsfield, Massachusetts; Fort Wayne, Indiana; and Erie, Pennsylvania—must be projected into closer view.

Once again railroad workers, of ninety percent native stock, were forced into rebellion. In May 1904 Jay Gould's heirs had challenged the right of labor to be treated as human beings and entitled to consideration for long years of service.

August Belmont, under Tammany Hall's political dictatorship, had assumed control of the subway system then completed. Engineers and conductors of the Second and Third Avenue elevateds, controlled by Jay Gould interests, were to be transferred to service on the subways, but only after each and everyone had passed a physical examination, without regard to the senority rights by which the retirement pension was regulated. It meant, in blunt language, that half of the superannuated were to be discarded. So the workers on the Jay Gould elevated and on the Belmont-Tammany Hall subway revolted.

As the American Federation of Labor buzzards had long since scabbed every Knights of Labor Assembly out of existence, the rebelling railroad workers turned to the Socialist Trades and Labor Alliance organizers and their publications for sympathetic support. Rozelle and Samuel French, both strikers themselves, took charge of the muddled up affairs, and directed the activities of the men.

Instantly the Belmont-Gould-Tammany Hall interests branded the rebellion as instigated by international revolutionists. Easley, Secretary of the National Civic Federation of which Samuel Gompers was vice-president, summoned all labor leaders to New York City for a conference in the Waldorf Astoria. Chief Stone represented the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, William Mahon the Amalgamated Association of Street Car Employes. All made common cause with James Farley, engaged by Belmont to regiment thousands of strikebreakers into service. The charters of the rebelling members of the different trade unions were revoked. New charters were issued to the professional scabs and a free range was given hired thugs to use the tactics of civil war against the strikers.

The orgies staged in the Waldorf Astoria, and the drunkards' brawls when the gangsters came to receive their orders constitute one of the blackest chapters in the history of proletarian uprisings in the United States—aye, in the whole world.

The Industrial Workers of the World is Launched

The resentment among Americans, I say this advisedly, was tainted with a bitterness beyond description. It was in this period that the Industrial Union Manifesto was issued—another Declaration of Independence—after a conference in January 1905 at Worta's Hall in Chicago. In another conference at the end of June, 1905, between Thomas Hagerty, Daniel DeLeon, and William T. Trautmann, a Preamble was drafted which in its original draft was adopted at the convention when the Industrial Workers of the World was launched on July 4, 1905 in the noon hour.

During the days of the convention a conference in the Ontario Hotel deliberated on the methods and tactics of an impending conflict with the employers combined with the hoodwinked masses of trade unionists sold over the counter of collective bargaining—so misnamed then—for a mess of pottage.

The idea of a general strike was discarded. The method of "passive resistance" offered a way of avoiding bloodshed and riotous encounters at the factory gates. It gave Daniel DeLeon the idea of advocating the lockout of the Employing Class" by immediate application of passive resistance methods. Bear in mind that nowhere in the literature of the I. W. W. of those days is there any mention of overthrowing the government by ballots or otherwise. The passive resistance methods could, therefore, be applied only to industry, and that alone, not to destroy but rather to safeguard the tools and instrumentts of production against vandalistic designs.

Charles Proteus Steinmetz, "electrical wizard," and "unreplaceable superman," he was called in the scientific world—was to the last days of his life a class conscious working man. From the time of the famous sit-down strike discussed in this article to his death in 1923 he remained a firm friend and generous supporter of the Industrial Workers of the World.

When the delegates from New York left the convention, they made Schenectady a point at which to deliver a message on the Preamble of the I. W. W. Daniel DeLeon's speech on that subject, a classic in itself, delivered in Minneapolis, was printed and distributed in thousands of copies in the plants of the General Electric company.

Eighteen craft unions of the American Federation of Labor, however, were determined to exercise control over the workers in the plants of the G. E. and, in case the employes would make demands, repeat what had been done to the workers on the elevated and subway of New York City.

G. E. Workers Sit Down

The eight-hour work-day with corresponding increase in wages for all employes regardless of station or craft, was the key issue. To have called a strike would have been disastrous to working class solidarity and conducive to the engineering of riots and bloodshed by the trade union leaders who would make contracts with the corporation to keep the workers in their places.

So, therefore, the workers decided to stay at their places and fold arms. It is needless to say that in this matter venerable old engineer Steinmetz who occupied a high position with the corporation, had secretly approved of that method. Passive resistance—and that alone—intelligently applied, brought the results anticipated.

Whenever the history of those great days is written the names of a few workers, will stand out as true industrial democracy; men whose names glorify the records again as the itellectual leaders of the "Folded Arms Protest" staged in the plants of General Motors in Detroit and Flint in the winter months of 1936-37.

In rapid succession the men and women in the industries of steel and iron applied methods that demonstrated the stupenduous power that can be wielded by the "Folded Arms."

At the third convention of the Industrial Workers of the World it had been recommended that international connections be established so that workers in European countries, when landing on the shores here, would not fail to make contact at the nearest places with the advocates of "One Big Union," a term used by me first to embrace the symbol of interests in common by all engaged in services of Field, Factory and Fireside. The three stars in the emplem of the I. W. W. were conceived in that meaning. That symbolic objective of the industrial union movement was portrayed in brilliant oratory by Thomas Hagerty on July 5th 1905 in the Bohemian Hall mass meeting in Milwaukee.

In the wake of the first Russian revolution of 1904 a wave of uprisings swept all over the Slavic countries of Central Europe, directed mostly against the absentee lords of manors in Slovakia, Hungary, Kroatia, Slovenia and extending into the Paduah, Italy's agricultural districts. The uprisings of the rent-peasants and agricultural workers assumed alarming aspects, for it was verily a "Passive Resistance Strike" of immense proportions. Harvests went to rot on the ground; and thugs of the landlords set fire to the drying grain so as to collect insurances and place the onus on the leaders of the uprising. Thousands of them fled across the borders, and, indeed, landed in the United States together with thousands of others who were gladly received as willing workers in the steel mills, particularly.

By the indoctrination method discontent ripened into the fruit of action. When, therefore, steel workers in McKees Rock, later in New Castle, Sharon, Monessen, Martins Ferry etc. suspended work they had the leadership of men seasoned in furious conflicts across the sea, and these leaders had made close contact with friends in the I. W. W.

McKees Rock Strike

When, therefore, trainmen on the Lake Erie Railroad refused to haul trains past the immense plants of the Pressed Steel Car and the Carnegie Steel Mill plants in McKees Port and Schoenville, — — the railroad corporation deemed it rather expedient to reroute the course, and not a wheel stirred either inside or outside.

Then it came to pass that in the political-economic contest for subterranean traffic control between the interests of August Belmont-Tammany Hall on one side and the Pennsylvania Railroad—Wm. Gibbs McAdoo on the other side it became a paramount issue that work be resumed in the plants of the Pressed Steel Car Company. August Belmont, boss of the New York Subway, did not want the Pennsylvania to fulfill the terms of a franchise whereby passenger cars were to run through the Hudson-River bore built by William Gibbs McAdoo. So therefore A. F. of L. union men of the bridge and structural iron workers, of which one J. McNamarra was Secretary-Treasurer, passed with passports signed by one Ernest Boehm, for the Central Federated Union of New York, through the picket lines into the plants of the Pressed Steel Car Company. With them went about 250 seasoned "Passive Resistance Militants" under disguise of strikebreakers. What happened then within the plant is well recorded in the "Pittsburgh Leader" of those days. That was a Sitdown Strike indeed, and the corporations paid for it at the rate of twenty thousand dollars a day.

Tired of having such a farce continued, the company paid off all the men quartered in the plants over two weeks and all were told to leave the plant in the evening. However, the company officials had failed to inform the State Constabulary (Cossacks) also quartered within the mills, that there was to be a general exodus of over a thousand men from the plant after the payoff.

It was then at the bridgehead of the viaduct spanning the freight yard of the Lake Erie R. R. that the Cossacks opened a fusillade only to find themselves encircled by thousands who had gathered to give a welcome and cheers to the hired men from New York who had sat down on the job of strikebreaking." After seven cossaks fell dead under a counterfusillade by trained men, the rest were disarmed and released on their word of honor.

Another, a more important episode, came as an aftermath of a vote taken by ballot in the town hall, and the return of the day shift to work under accepted terms of settlement.

In the spacious hall established by the I. W. W., steel workers' locals of Pittsburgh,—at that time 22 industrial unions were in the process of formation—about 50 volunteers from Pittsburgh militants were busy posting membership books and collecting dues that came in that day by the thousands of dollars, when, headed by one W. Novak, as official of the Iron City Trades and Labor Council, an A. F. of L. affiliate, who displayed a letter from Charles H. Moyer, President of the Western Federation of Miners addressed to J. McArdle of the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel and Tin Workers, deputies came to put the I. W. W. out of business. Tables were overturned, the cash drawers confiscated, and I was placed under arrest and taken to the lockup, manacled.

Instantly a word was passed around by Joseph Schmidt, the greatest of loyalists who ever crossed my path of life. Alarm spread. Max Forker, speaker for the Pittsburgh Turnbezirk (Gymnastic Unions) with a committee came to consult about posting bond. Twenty thousand dollars were required,—in cash. They went to get it.

Solidarity

Soon word came through the Servian, Kroatian and Dalmation Committees that the workers in the Aliquippa plants of the Jones-Laughlin Steel Corporation, only a few miles off down the Ohio River, were ready to sit down on the job. U. S. President William H. Taft who had married into the Jones family, had heavy interests in the corporation. Alarm spread all over the valley. The night shift had gathered at the gates of the Pressed Steel Car Company and when the day shift came out, both shifts formed lines of march, and the heavy tramp of 8,000 men augmented by twelve thousand more of closeby mills, echoed from the hills around the Indian Mount.

Close to midnight the McKees Rock business district and the fire house where I was locked up, was occupied by a throng of not less than thirty thousand people. The detachment of 50 cossacks, all mounted, yet trembling, surrounded the lockup. In vain did Max Forker try to break through with the news that he had the cash for the bonds.

"No bonds," roared like a thunder of warning the voice of Joseph Schmidt, supported by the giant Katuskas, a Lithuanian. "Stoicie razem, obivateli towarzicie" came the response from a hundred steel-strong chested men.

The burgess, for a preliminary hearing to be forced, came trembling, under the escort of a dozen heavy set steel workers. As he was pushed into the firehouse, more than fifty of the known leaders of the McKees Rock rebellion rushed to the front. With a smashing blow G. Heney, a Magyar, splintered the rolltop of the judge's desk.

There were charges. Nineteen counts. The "Bloody Purge" affair was charged in the indictment. Most convincing to the burgess-judge was the letter from Charles H. Moyer. There was no doubt in the mind of thousands that the Western Federation of Miners was now an ally of the interests who wanted someone as a scapegoat to go to the gallows. Charles H. Moyer was merely the deliverer of the rope. Further comment at this time is superfluous.

In 1906 three hundred thousand men and women had marched through the streets of Pittsburgh and Allegheny to the airs of the slogan "If Haywood, Moyer, Petibone die, fifty million workers must know the reason why." I headed that monster demonstration, walking afoot. Surging neck to neck on the streets of McKees Rock was part of that crowd of 1906. By the morrow they would be half a million,—folding arms. Wires ran hot from Washington not to permit the Jones-Laughlin mills to be affected; anything to be done to avoid implicating a firm in which the President of the United States was a heavy stockholder. Sheridan was on the ground to witness that the President's silent wishes be fulfilled "Not guilty!" was the plea by the prisoner before the bar, "Acquitted"—came the judgement, and a hundred thousand steel-muscled workers marched that night, carrying me on their shoulders. Will there be another day when the Power of Folded Arms will thwart the policy of craft union leaders in their resort to violence and bloodshed as the result of pitting one group of workers against other groups and fomenting hatred so horrible in its disastrous consequences?

Victory

Let it here be said to the credit of the stalwarts of the Socialist Labor Party in the Pittsburgh district that in the crucial hours when my own life was in jeopardy, they did forget all differences that had arisen over tactics, methods and objectives of the industrial union movement. Nor should we forget that in the supreme test for intellectual fortitude, as an aftermath of this industrial revolt of steelworkers, involving all around 150,000 men, two men blazed a new trail in the defense of rights guaranteed in the constitution of the U. S., J. McCarthy who was present at the scene of my acquittal in McKees Rock, and Ben Williams, on the grave charges of being involved in a conspiracy of subversive sedition, stood their ground against a galaxy of highly eminent jurists in the court of New Castle, and they proved to the consternation of a stern judge and jury that the movement to dislodge capitalist-profit control of industry does not necessarily suggest the overthrow of government by insurrection. As both were acquitted, the principles of the I. W. W., their methods and tactics, the objectives of building within the shell of the old the structure of a new social system as so originally incorporated in the Industrial Union Manifesto, were vindicated before the law of the land.

Too little attention has been given to this epoch-making decision! much irreparable injury to others might had been prevented in later controversies and judicial anathema, if more information had been disseminated among workers in other parts of the country.

Fifteen years before this steelworkers uprising in Pennsylvania, West Virginia and Ohio, Samuel Gompers and the leaders of the craft union movement in 1894, had helped to break the solidarity of labor, assisted in destroying the American Railway Union; gave moral and factual support to the court to hamstring the workers by injunction and send leaders of the industrial movement to jail.

In vain did these same leaders, of whom quite a few are at present "headmasters" in the Commitee for Industrial Organization, try to strangle the I. W. W. in the crucial test of strength of ideals; and they failed, though enlisting the aid of the leaders of the Western Federation of Miners in this nefarious scheme, to place the stigma of murder on us so as to have us hang by the neck by verdict of a court of law. The Power of Folded Arms was justified in the claim to be the best safeguard against the methods of violent destructive force.

However, with all this illuminating display of the power of organization and power of intelligence in the past, how is it that now, quarter of a century after the passing of foregoing events, workers in the steel mills, in the same districts where they won their skirmishes, are being pitted against each other? Why should it be that violence unexcelled in fury, and killing in bloody ancounters is displaying a tragedy of errors that, in comparison on a smaller scale, but in consequences leading to the same disaster, is on the same pattern of events as the Civil War episodes in Spain?

Syndicalist League

Let us retrace occurances to get a clearer picture. In 1919 William Zack Foster, appointed general organizer by Samuel Gompers, although known by the latter as president of the Syndicalist League, summons the highest officials of eighteen national unions of the A. F. of L. to Youngstown, Ohio, to prepare for a general strike of all steel, iron and tin mill workers.

At that time the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel and Tin Workers is recorded as having a total membership of 5,200, the other national unions had no members whatever in any of the mills and possessions of the United States Steel Corporation, the Jones and Laughlins, the Republican Steel, the Inland Steel, and two other independent corporations represented in the Iron and Steel Institute under a "Gentlemen's Agreement," and the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company, a Rockefeller controlled corporation. Of the total of 456,000 employees in all these possessions about twenty-eight thousand workers had retained their industrial workshop councils although then divorced from the I. W. W.

In the Youngstown conference one main demand is formulated as basis for commanding a "general strike." "The check-off system, the power to be delegated to the employers to deduct an approximate total of five million dollars in initiation fees and eight million dollars annually in dues, and turn it over to designated financial agents of the eighteen national unions.

Approximately two hundred thousand workers follow the strike call. Instantly an approximate sum of $850,000.00 is collected from the strikers to be used as an "organizer's fund."

The corporations make it known what the check-off system means, the Workers Industrial Councils also issue a warning. Thereupon two-thirds of the strikers break their neck in trying to get back to their vacated positions. Bloodshed and riots follow; at the mill gates. A fake issue demands a toll in life that runs up to over one hundred all around.

Further back! In 1911 William Zack Foster declares in the Chicago Federation of Labor in presence of Samuel Gompers that the Syndicalist League was operating for the purpose of eliminating the Industrial Workers of the World. Gompers nods his assent.

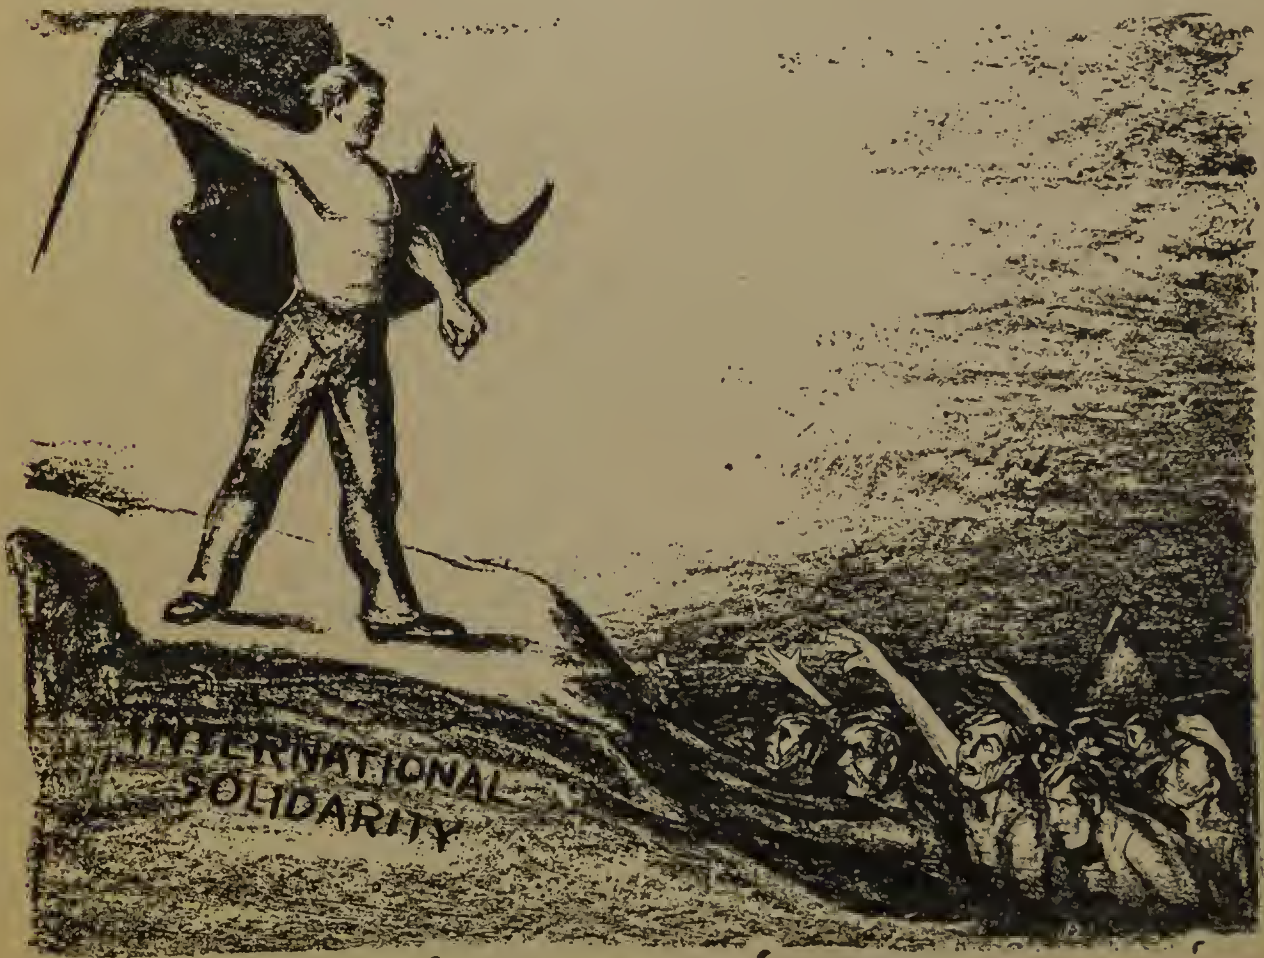
In 1910, a day after the blowing up of the Los Angeles Time building by dynamite Andrew Gallagher, pal of Anton Johanson, bursts out the inuendo: "This is another of the dastardly acts of the I. W. W." And Samuel Gompers, knowing better, nods assent.

In 1909 at the International Trades Union congress in Budapest, James Duncan, Vice President of the American Federation of Labor, and admitted by the congress as delegate, offers bond for the release of William Zack Foster, picked up by the police as "vagabond" in Harlots Alley. Foster is released, and then travels extensively in European countries, returns to the United States, organizes the Syndicalist League, enlists an army of traveling agents preaching the gospel of destructive sabotage, all received with open arms in the meetings of the craft unions, particularly in cities along the Pacific Coast. Acts of violence and sinister destructions are recorded, quite a number of wobblies too mouthloose for their own good, are picked up and dumped into dungeons for things they talked too much about although the deeds were done by agents provocateur organized in the Syndicalist League. We have the word of William Hynes, captain of the "Red Squad" police in Los Angeles that he got into the I. W. W. through the Syndicalist League of which he was a member to get the goods on the I, double you, double you so as to help in their elimination.

At this time, 1937 the issue of the check off system,—nothing else, once more is pitting workers against workers in the mills of five steel and iron corporations, in East Chicago, Indiana Harbar, in Cleveland, Youngstown, Warren, Niles, and in the plants of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation where, forsooth, the workers had to go on a strike in 1910 conducted by Joseph J. Ettor to obtain, along with better wages and shorter hours the "abolition of the abominable check-off system."

No one must expect the CIO to be in reality an industrial organization not more than getting good wine by pouring it for aging in old vessels where the liquid had turned into vinegar.

THE END.



The Right Kind of Education

By "A PAL"

In order to perform any job in our line of duty. we must have the necessary tools to do it thoroughly. When you start to write an article for publication as I'm doing, you must dig up a typewriter or some other instrument to perform your writing. The same think holds true in our every day struggle for more of the good things of life. We must be prepared with the right kind of tools to get them. One important tool to get more of the good things of life is the right kind of education.

The men who put the three stars in the I. W. W. emblem knew what they were doing. The first star stands for education; the second star means organization; and the third star is the best of all—emancipation. The first star is the beginning of it all—it will lead to organization and emancipation. The second star has been shining off and on ever since the I. W. W. was born. The first star has been shining from Work Peoples College for some twenty odd years showing the way to real revolutionary workers education. Workers have struggled for real working class knowledge for many decades, but without much success. The public school system was given to the workers when the employing class saw that it needed better educated and trained slaves. Naturally it made the school system into the biggest bulwark of capitalism that we have today. To counteract the poison fed us in the public schools, the I. W. W. has its own workers residential labor college at Duluth, Minn.

Work Peoples College

The school itself is located on the shores of Spirit Lake, eight miles from the business district of the city of Duluth proper. Stitll the street car line goes by two block from the college giving it a very suitable location. Being a residential labor college, the only one of its kind in the country, it can take care for food, shelter, and instruction to the satisfaction of the students who are inclined to take advantage of the real bona-fide workers' education that is taught there. All is not work at the college. The college has a very good gymnasium and skating can be very readily indulged in on the clear mirror like surface of Spirit Lake. Duluth is located in the nothern part of Minnesota, so heavy clothing is in order. Still while in school, the students are in complete comfort, because the college has its own steam heating plant.

For Industrial Unionism

The school and instructors are required to stand for and teach the industrial unionism of the I. W. W. Subjects taught are Marxian economics, labor history, Industrial Unoinism, sociology, organization methods, public speaking, journalism, english grammer, etc. This year for the first time, three subjects are going to be required, namely Marxian economics (a thorough explanation of the capitalist system), history of the labor movement (an examination of the past struggles of labor) and Industrial Unionis (the ultimate road to workers emancipation.). The rest of the subjects are elective. Work Peoples College is the one place wher the brutal functions of capitalism are analyzed and the way for its removal shown. The purpose of the college is to get trained speakers and organizers for the I. W. W. along with writers, and other functionaries of a labor organization. Te dough that goes to make the products of the school. If the raw material is good, the products will be good.

Any body, regardless of sex, color, or previous schooling can enroll providing they have attained the age of eighteen. Room, board and tuition is reasonably low being only $30.00 per month. The coming winter courses will beginn on December 1st and continue for four months. Do not fail to investigate the possibilities offered by this school and if possible attend the courses. Let's put our shoulders to the wheel—support the college, use the college, and boost the college. Let's actually go out on the limb and find out how many students we can get to go to the Work Peoples College for the "right kind of education."

If anybody is interested in further information about the college, I'm sure the business manager at the school will provide it for you. Just address your inquiry to:

HI-JACKING THE REVOLUTION

Translation and Introduction by
JOSEPH WAGNER

L. Nicholas reveals some interesting facts about the betrayal of Spanish Workers by the "friends" from Moscow.

INTRODUCTION

I am presenting the readers of the One Big Union Monthly another translation on the Spanish situation, written by another old-time revolutionary syndicalist, for the "Revolution Proletarienne" of Paris. The writer is entirely at home in Spain, and is intimately acquainted not only with the political situation, but with the personnel of the various workers' political and economic organizations of that country. He has written in the past many valuable and informative articles on Spain or the French revolutionary press, and continues to do so. Many months before the outbreak of the Franco rebellion, and even before the historic convention of the C. N. T. in May 1936, he predicted pretty accurately what would take place in Spain in the near future, including the present long drawn out civil war.

Perhaps, a large portion of the article will seem superfluous to the readers of this magazine, as they are already acquainted with the facts; other parts will appear to be obscure. The reason for these shortcomings is that the artitcle was written for the French reading public and I, as translator, could and would not take too many liberties with the writing of others. But, I am sure that the article contains also some very valuable information for the majority of our readers. It throws additional light on the mission of the Stalinists in Spain and on the role they are playing.

The arrest and kidnapping of "Marc Rein" is not exceptional, but rather a typical case of the work of the bolshevik "comrades." Whatever the outcome of the present phase of the class struggle in Spain, when the history of it will be written, among the black pages that that history will necessarily contain, I am not sure that the blackest of these will be those furnished by Franco and his outspokenly fascists, gory beasts, I am not sure but that the first prize will be awarded to the Stalinist gangsterdom. For while the fascists are openly declared enemies of the working class, the Stalinists, as the champions of proletarian revolution, profiting by the crying need of the Spanish working class for weapons, sold them some, but at what price! They not only had to pay in gold for the arms and services received, but in addition they had to turn over the country, their army, their government, and their freedom to the Stalinist gang and allow them to set up their own private police and jails and death chambers, and to offer their best and sincerest friends and warriors as sacrifices to the hatred of the new masters in exchange for Russian arms and ammunitions.

And perhaps the greatest tragedy of all is that a portion of the leading element of that excellent proletarian militant organization, the C. N. T., are accepting the situation, are willingly accepting the Stalinist tutelage, and are proud of what they are doing.

In the light of the above, the vacillating policy of England and even of France, toward the Spanish situation will seem a little less puzzling.

In the meanwhile history is marching on, the class struggle will continue until the working class achieves complete victory, in spite of all the stumbling blocks and betrayals and desertions.

IN THE SPANISH MIX-UP

The Difficulties of the "Whites"

Public opinion in loyalist Spain is mainly preoccupied with the situations that are being created at the war fronts, on the one hand by the fascist advances, which, after having taken Bilbao and Santander, are now seriously menacing Asturia, on the other hand by the governmental offensive in Aragon, where for the first time since July 1937, the government forces succeded in capturing a very important position, namely Belchite.

Unfortunatly, it must be conceded that the successes of the governmentals are far from equaling in extent and importance the successes of the fascists. Inevitably, therefore, the question arises: If tomorrow the Asturias are taken by the fascists, will all revolutionary resistance in the North be crushed? Will this fascist triumph be as lasting as that of Hitler in Germany and as that of Mussolini in Italy? Or will the Russian phenomenon of the Civil War, where the occupation of Siberia by Kolchak and of Ukraine by Denikin brought about the disintegration of the whites, be repeated in Spain?

There is no doubt but that one has to take with the greatest of reserve the news dished out constantly by the government dispatches, announcing riotings in all parts of the zones ruled over by Franco. And yet, on this subject there is much information coming from fascist sources, evidencing that as a matter of fact, the situation in fascist-ruled Spain remains unstable and the revolutionists are continually harassing the Francoist power. One instance is the ban of Guiepo de Llano, published in the "ABC" of Seville and reproduced in the Solidaridad Obrera of August 28, which plainly reveals how extensive is the menaced zone in the fascist rear and the extent of the support of the civilian population given to the revolutionists; moreover these things are taking place in regions occupied by the whites almost since the beginning of the civil war. Part of this ban reads as follows:

> Article 1. The region composed of the Province of Huelva and by the corresponding parts of the Provinces of Seville and Badajoz, up to the Seville-Badajoz road will be delimited and considered war zone in which all servise demanded by the authorities will have to be performed in the same manner as on the battlefield, when facing the enemy; these limits may be extended and they will be so as to include all the zones necessary in order to fight and to defeat the unsubmissive Marxist elements.
> Article 3. (This article designates the additional offenses, revealing the existence of extremely summary Martial Courts).
> The following shall be considered as acts of rebellion:
> a) acts tending to furnish alimentation or any other aid to fugitive persons within the prescribed zone;
> b) furnishing information on the situation of the forces, or of their movements to fugitives in the villages;
> c) leaving the proscribed villages in the mountains without the possession of documents, issued for the purpose by the military chief of the zone;
> d) disobedience of any orders given by the military as well as civil heads of the zone;
> e) neglect or lukewarmness in the execution of orders and of military services demanded by the chief of the zone;
> f) giving shelter in urban or rural properties to fugitives considered rebels;
> g) failing to inform the regular authorities of the existence of rebels, by possessing such information will be considered as rebellion;
> h) traveling in the mountains or to stay there without a clear justification of the reason and the object of the travel.

Another proof of the efficiency of thte action of the civil population in the rear of the white front, is the account of the Italian legionaire, Albert T. de Parme, fighting at Guadelajara, published in Libro e Moschetto, organ of the Italian Fascist Students and reproduced by the Nuovo Avanti of Sept. 18:

> In the occupied villages some of the best elements of the population whom we have respected, were hostile to us; they signaled to the reds, by radio, the positions of the nationalist forces, indicating the objectives to the aviators, directing the artillery of the reds. This was done by a few traitors whom we had spared because they were unarmed. In the meantime we were being methodically bombarded both from above and from the land and we found ourselves menaced by the insidious blackguards. In spite of that our moral and material strength was not lessening. . . . every evening we shouted with pride our "Saluto al Duce!" every night we sang with passion the songs of Italy, in answer to our enemy, who, by means of loud speakers, invited us to go over to him in order to attain finally liberty, well being, and other such foolishness. . .
> This activity of the reds that presupposed a perfect knowledge of our positions, filled us with stupor, but we were entirely amazed when that same plane, flying very low over us, scattered thousands of tracts, written in Italian, stating that we were being betrayed and inviting us to pass over to their side. What did that mean? What was going on behind our backs? Why did the division commandment's telephone no longer answer our appeals? Why was it that our artillery, usually so prompt and precise, did not at present heed our plea for fire and failed to counterstrike the rapid and correct firing of the enemy artillery? Only much later have we learned that our telephone line had been cut by the spies and that our artillery was being bombarded from the sky as well as from the earth. Everyone of us, without saying a word, was being tormented by the suspicion of having the enemy behind his back, while on the front an unusual movement could be discerned.

Difficulties of the "Governmentals"

But the rear of the "governmentals" is also extremely divided. The main internal fight is that led by the communist party against the FAI-CNT. The Stalinist leaders understood that they were not yet sufficiently strong to destroy the syndicalists on a frontal attack. So they consented to some concessions, preparing the spirits for the acceptance of the latest note of the Political Bureau of that party as told in L'Humanite (Paris) of September 16:

". . .The communist party is disposed to enter into friendly conversations with the CNT in order to definitely dissipate misunderstands and to arrive at a collaboration that will become more efficient from day to day."

It was necessary to throw out some ballast in order to keep the boat afloat. The French press announced the liberation of J. Acaso (CNT militant), ex-president of the dissolved Aragonian Council. Furthermore, the trial of Tortosa, which resulted in death sentences, will be revised. According to Solidaridad Obrera of September 9 all the defendants who were present at the trial were acquitted, only those of the accused who could not be arrested were sentenced to 15 years each.

It would be in order here to reproduce the answer of Vidella, Minister of Labor in Catalonia and member of the United Catalonian Socialist Party, to a delegation composed of the parents of the prisoners: Here are the essential passages quoted from Solidaridad Obrera of Sept. 9:

> . . .The judges could not admit the charges based on acts of revolutionary character that sprung out of the movement provoked by the rebellious generals, for that would be placing the revolution itself on trial.
> . . .For these reasons, the judges not only ought not to have accepted charges of this kind, but they ought not to have accepted them when these charges came from persons whose flats were requisitioned on the ground that they were considered fascists, or that they have abandoned them themselves. The judges ought to accept only concrete charges against such persons who, instead of having acted as revolutionaries, actuated by mercenary spirit, have availed themselves of the revolutionary situation in order to eliminate their personal enemies or were inspired by the base desire of stealth.

This thesis was accepted unanimously by the Generalidad, (the Catalonian government), and that means that the persons at present imprisoned for various causes arising out of the revolutionary facts, should immediately be given their freedom.

It would, however, be an error to believe that these concessions mean an intention to practice a policy of understanding between all the anti-fascist sectors. It is only maneuvering to cover up new measures of repression. Thus it is taken for granted that the members of the P. O. U. M. and the syndicalists arrested for the May events, will continue remaining in prison. In the place of Acaso, who has been set at liberty, we have now in the Carcel Modelo, Aurelio Fernandez, well known CNT militant, ex-Minister of Hygiene, ex-director of Police, charged with participation in the attempt against Andreu, presiding judge of one of the important Courts of Barcelona. It is to be noted here, that the FAI and the CNT have repudiated immediately any solidarity with the attempt, and that there is not the least presumption that Fernandez had any share of guilt. Tens of political refugees, Germans and Italians, tried and true syndicalists, are being conducted under escort to the border as rewards for the months they put in on the war front. The CNT limits itself to sending messages to the CGTSR (Revolutionary Syndicalist General Confederation of Labor) of France, asking that body to come to the aid of these twice outlawed revolutionists.

And on the economic field, the counter-revolutionary attacks inspired by the Catalonian United Socialist Party, are developing also. A violent campaign is led by the communist press towards the militarization of the railroad employees; it is a question of taking away even the last vestiges of the workers' right to have a say so in the conduct of that industry, a right accorded to them by the nationalization of the railroads.

Solidaridad Obrera of Sept. 8 informs us that the dispositions of the new Administration forbids the Shop Committees from giving the workers any information which would enable them to judge as to the progress of the institution.

When it comes to the agrarian question, it is only now that it is fully understood how much the workers' collectives have been encroached upon. An underground paper, Liberdad, published by the POUM and by the minority anarchists of Barcelona, in its Aug. 1 issue describes, with much detail, a series of attacks, confiscations and arrests the collectives of Catalonia were subjected to. And, it is this paper that also gives for the first time a precise account of the kidnapping of the young Russian social-democrat, Marc Rein Abramovich, son of the militant social-democrat Abramovich, member of the Executive Committee of the Second International.

The Work of the Cheka in Barcelona

The night of April 9-10, the Cheka, of which we have previously spoken, cleverly seized the journalist Marc Rein. Rein had come to Barcelona at the end of February and was lodging at Hotel Continental, Rambla Canelatas.

But, who was this Marc Rein and what was he doing in Barcelona?

"Marc Rein" is an alias, which would betray North American nationality. In reality he was the editor of Social-Demokraten of Stockholm, a paper that published sensational but true information about political problems of the USSR. The great Soviet leaders were extremely embarassed by this paper, that often unmasked their most intimate secrets, and led them to suppose that it was an important communist party member who gave out the information, furnishing all the data, details and documents.

Marc Rein came to Catalonia to see the revolution at close range. On his arrival in Barcelona he gathered around him a small group of socialists—anti-fascists and anti-P. S. U. C., who considered themselves his collaborators. He published several articles on the Spanish situation, criticizing some aspects of the activities of the CNT anarcho-syndicalists; he explained that the reason he criticized exclusively the activities of the CNT was because the CNT is the only one that was creating something.

The GPU having learned of the presence of Marc Rein in Barcelona, conceived the plan of getting hold of him. For that purpose it brought over some of its best elements with the double mission of seizing the social-democrat journalist and of perfecting the Cheka in the service of the communist party.

The night of April 9-10, Marc Rein was writing one of his articles in the room he was occupying at the hotel. Soon the phone rang; an agreable feminine voice was heard through the receiver asking for an immediate interview on matters of great interest. Marc Fein interrupted his writing and left the hotel.

What happened?

Shipped to Russia by the G. P. U.

What became of Marc Rein? Some believe that he has been murdered by Herz's gang. (Herz is the chief of the Cheka in Barcelona according to Libertad (Autor's note). We, who are better informed, do not believe so. Well, in order to efface all trace of that "raid" that was clumsily enough performed, Marc Rein was constrained to write a letter by his own hand to one of his friends, Nicholas, whose wife is at present detained in prison, after having been horribly manhandled, and one to the owner of the hotel. In these letters the journalist is taking farewell from them, begging them to forgive him for his flight and for the expenses he has caused them. The letters seem to have been written in Madrid but it could be seen without much trouble that the date was written in by another person. This ruse does not betray much intelligence on the part of the elements working under the orders of Alfred Herz.

We said that Marc Rein was not assassinated in Barcelona. But one could be informed with more authority and knowledge by a certain Schaya Kinderman, a Polish Jew, a militant communist who lived in Barcelona for some time and who was the "chief of the foreign police of Valence"; this function enabled him to keep track of all the movements and plans of the other parties, especially when these parties wanted to get in contact with their respective Central Committees in Valencia or in Madrid, and creating difficulties in the contacting of all non-communist parties.

Marc Rein was not murdered; it can be affirmed with certainty that he is at present in Russia, in the hands of the G. P. U., having been transported there "as a package" on board of a ship, between the dates of the 11th, and 30th of April.

The Retort of the FAI-CNT

When the maneuvering tactics of the communist party are too raw, the FAI-CNT answers with written or verbal protests; but at the same time the anarcho-syndicalist leaders are not missing a single opportunity for hinting the idea of approachment with the communist party and its boss, the Russian government.

Thus, the infamous speech of Commorea, in which he referred to the first heroic confederal militias as "tribes," led the Regional Committee of the CNT in Barcelona to refuse the invitation of the communist party to celebrate September 11, the National Day of Catalonia, in common; yet, these same leaders, a few days later, accepted a similar invitation from the Catalanist Union, (which includes the communist party).

The campaign carried on in the communist press against the now dissolved Aragon Council provoked a break in the parleys between the CNT and the communist party; but later and without any retraction of the insults, the parleys were resumed.

The anarcho-syndicalist officials are attaching great importance to their re-entering in the Cabinet; they are carrying on an active campaign in that direction. They seek by all means to prove that the foreign bourgeois governments would not be displeased by the collaboration of the CNT in the government of Spain. They widely publicized the conclusions of their militant Augustin Souchy (ex-secretary of the IWMA) just returned from a tour in Europe. We reproduce them from Solidaridad Obrera of August 28:

> The liberal and democratic powers of Europe see in anarcho-syndicalism the most authentic expression of the character of the Spanish people.
> The participation of the CNT in the government is considered by them a strong guarantee of the independence of Spain.
> . . .A Federal Republic of a socialist character, created with the participation of the CNT would be acceptable to the foreign powers.

The same in regards Russia, the anarcho-syndicalist press is displaying, in big letters and boxed, hossanahs extolling the Stalinist foreign politics. Here are a few examples: Solidaridad Abrera, Aug. 9: "The Rock of the USSR in the Pool of European Diplomacy;" same paper, of Sept. 12: "The Voice of the Only One that Arose at Nyon;" same paper, on Sept. 9: "The World Proletariat Should Support the Position of the USSR in its Actitvity."

Their concessionist policy is growing in the interior also and the leaders of the Libertarian Youth are following the same road. Only a few months ago this organization had formally refused the invitation to join in a common front of Youth; the reason for the refusal was that the Stalinists within the United Socialist Youth, who were the inspirators of this front, as a preliminary condition, demanded the non-admission of the Youth movement of the P. O. U. M. qualifying them as fascists. At that time the Libertarian Youth indignantly and categorically protested against that conception of a Youth Alliance.

However, as early as September 2, Solidaridad Obrera reproduced from Ahora, a summary of an accord, grouping the Libertarian Youth, the United Socialist Youth, the Syndicalist Youth with the bourgeois organization such as the Youth of the Left Republicans and the Federal Union of Spanish Students. The summary follows:

> This accord establishes the collaboration for unity of all the political and syndical anti-fascist forces; it pledges action by the Youth in the popular army, in the field of production and in the other manifestations of life; it determines that the Youth will intensify its efforts towards better production in the fields and in the shops, and will increase its sacrifices by furnishing fresh thousands of soldiers to the people's cause.
> For moral principle, this Alliance of the Youth will combat the use of insulting terms, slanders and acts tending to produce discord on the front as well as in the rear; it will fight against anything that weakens the unity of the anti-fascist forces.

It is plain that there was no longer question of including the POUM Youth in this anti-fascist alliance. This changing in the attitude was decided by the Peninsular Committee of the Libertarian Youth, without a convention and without consulting the rank and file of the organization. As a result of this policy we now see Fidelio Miro, the young Libertarian, making speeches from the same platform with the worst of the Stalinist valet, Santiago Carillo, and this only a few weeks after the "extra-legal" murder by the Cheka of the eleven Libertarian Youths at Barcelona, after the May events; all these after the mysterious kidnapping and "disparition" of the Libertarian Youth leader, Martinez, at Barcelona.

The National Committee of the CNT is going in the same direction: it accepted the invitation of the "Friends of USSR," (an organization to serve the Spanish Stalinists) to celebrate in common the Russian national holiday, November 11, the committee appointed its militant Alfonso Miguel to arrange in common the details of the common parade where the Spanish syndicalist workers will march arm in arm with the assassins of Andres Nin and of Berneri, in honor of Saint Stalin!

At the same time the Madrid paper "C. N. T." reproduces from Solidaridad Obrera the answer to the underground tracts published by the POUM, appealing for a coalition of that body with the CNT, in order to create a revolutionary workers' front in opposition to the Negrin-Stalin government. The text follows:

> The comrades of the POUM should not let themselves be misled by the advise of those who are not living our revolution, nor by their state of spirit that was necessarily the result of the treatment they received. Demagogy leads nowhere. The anti-fascist front should be defended with the greatest determination by all those who really wish to win the war and assure in the rear the conditions that will open the road for the march towards social and political progress.

How odd! The press informs us that the journal "C. N. T." will be suspended for an indefinite period by the censure of the... government.

to the infancy of the race. Later, when science had undermined the old religions, metaphysics—fantastic speculations—, were invented to further beguile humanity. Metaphysics is a reversal, a contradiction of the inductive method of modern science, " an undigested relic of the theological period." Metaphysics must go.

Fourth: Man is a social animal. Yet in no part of the school courses do we find any emphasis upon this fact. Go from the first grade to the Ph. D. degree and you will not find one law of social development nor an acurate definition of a society. Most students will come out obsessed with individualistic ideas, not knowing that the age of individualism is dead and that at best it was but a short and an abnormal period.

If the millions of students now in school want to fit themselves for contact with the world or to remake the world so it will be a fit place to live in, they will have to do a lot of reading and thinking on the outside. If our educational system is to be improved it will have to be done by the present generation. Thousands of youngsters are now engaged in a crusade against syphilis. With the experience gained in this struggle they should be able to tackle our diseased educational set-up. But they will find it a much larger undertaking, and perhaps more nasty.

Fifty Years After Haymarket

"A day will come when our silence will be more powerful than the voices you are throttling today."

By ART HOPKINS

There are two monuments in the United States that on November 11 of each year are an inspiration to much oratory and an attraction to the gaze of crowds of people who pause to read their inscriptions and then pass on.

One of these monuments is in Arlington cemetery near Washington, the other in Waldheim cemetery near Chicago.

On one of these monuments are inscribed the word: HERE RESTS IN HONORED GLORY AN AMERICAN SOLDIER KNOWN BUT TO GOD.

The other bears the prophecy of one of Labor's martyrs: A DAY WILL COME WHEN OUR SILENCE WILL BE MORE POWERFUL THAN THE VOICES YOU ARE THROTTLING TODAY.

Arlington

One is erected in memory of those soldiers who fought and fell in the World War. The second is dedicated to working men who fought and fell in the class struggle. The former is a symbol of militarism; the latter symbolizes all those things that true rebels of the working class have fought and died for and the coming unity of the workers.

The tomb of the unknown soldier! Somehow, while standing near that sepulcher last summer, I was reminded of the words of Robert Ingersol at the tomb of Napoleon, when he said that he would rather have been a French peasant than that "imperial impersonation of force and murder known as Napoleon the Great."

I could not help reflecting while standing there watching the honory guard that paces back and forth before this largest piece of marble ever mined that it would be infinitely better to be an unknown fighter, fallen in the class war, than that symbol of capitalist war-making—the Unknown Soldier.

Monument in Waldheim cemetery in memory of the Chicago martyrs—Albert R. Parsons, August Spies, George Engel, Adolph Fischer, and Louis Lingg. Lucy Parsons, surviving widow of Albert R. Parsons, is standing in front.

What was the progress he had brought to this world? None whatsoever! His was a career of war—fighting his fellowmen—killing, plundering, murdering. He did not reason nor question. His duty was to obey!

He is one of many who went to France and returned a corpse.—

He is a hero of war, of patriotism, of nationalism, of plunder, of murder. He is a hero, honored not by his class brothers but by those who believe in social inequality, in class distinction, in wholesale murder—WAR.

Waldheim

Those eight men who lie buried under that monument in Waldheim are heroes of a grander, a more wholesome and a more humane cause; they are the heroes of the international working class. They are the heroes that are condemned by the powers-that-be; they are the martyrs who have fallen in the class struggle. They fought not for the supremacy of a particular nation or group of nations. They believed not in slaughtering their fellow men. Theirs was an ideal of uplift, of international solidarity.

There is no stately guard pacing before the Waldheim monument. No governmental body supports the upkeep of the monument over the graves of the Chicago Anarchists. Poor workingmen, humble workingmen—with their pennies and dimes and quarters support that monument.

Who Are the Heroes?

The story of the Haymarket is written large in working class history. It is a story that would make an effective plot for one of Dickens' novels, were it not for the horror of its actuality.

Webster's Dictionary defines a hero as "a man honored after death by public worship, for exceptional service to mankind. . . ."

When we hear the patriotic orators speak this November Eleventh on the Nineteenth Anniversary of the Armistice and they will issue a flow of oratory about the heroes of the World War and the Unknown soldier as the representative of those who died in an honored and glorified cause—let's stop and ask ourselves this question: "What exceptional service did these men,—did the unknown soldier render to mankind that they are to be called heroes?"

They may have decreased the population a few million—but that does not warrant their being called heroes? Birth control has found a more effective way of limiting the growth of population.

Did those heroes "save the world for democracy?" Have they made the world a better place to live in? Have they left an heritage that the next generation may be proud of? All these questions must be answered in the negative. The only thing that can be said of them is that they were dupes who were lead to believe that they would make this world a better place to live in. But their accomplishments were nil.

On the other hand, the Haymarket martyrs are heroes in the true sense of the word. They are "honored after death, for exceptional service to mankind."

What is this exceptional service?

It lies in the fact that they preached the unity of the labor movement. They preached the gospel of the organization for labor. They said: Labor must organize. We must have a shorter working day, a shorter working week. Labor must organize against its masters. It must throw off its chains.

They Saw Truth and Spoke It

These men taught, that men can live in a more beautiful way, that they can live in harmony and social co-operation. That well-being and joy can be the heritage of all. They believed in that old Greek maxim: "Man is the measurement of everything."

They despised government and the State for they saw it an evil—having no function of necessity. They believed that instead of government of men there should be an administration of industry.

They despised law because they saw it as rules of the master class, made for the benefit of that class.

It will be fifty years this November Eleventh, the very samè day that "patriots" will celebrate the Armistice, that these men walked to their gallows in the Cook county jail in Chicago.

Fifty years ago these men spoke for the eight-hour day. Today it is a reality.

Their Challenge

Fifty years ago these men issued a challenge to Labor to organize for freedom.

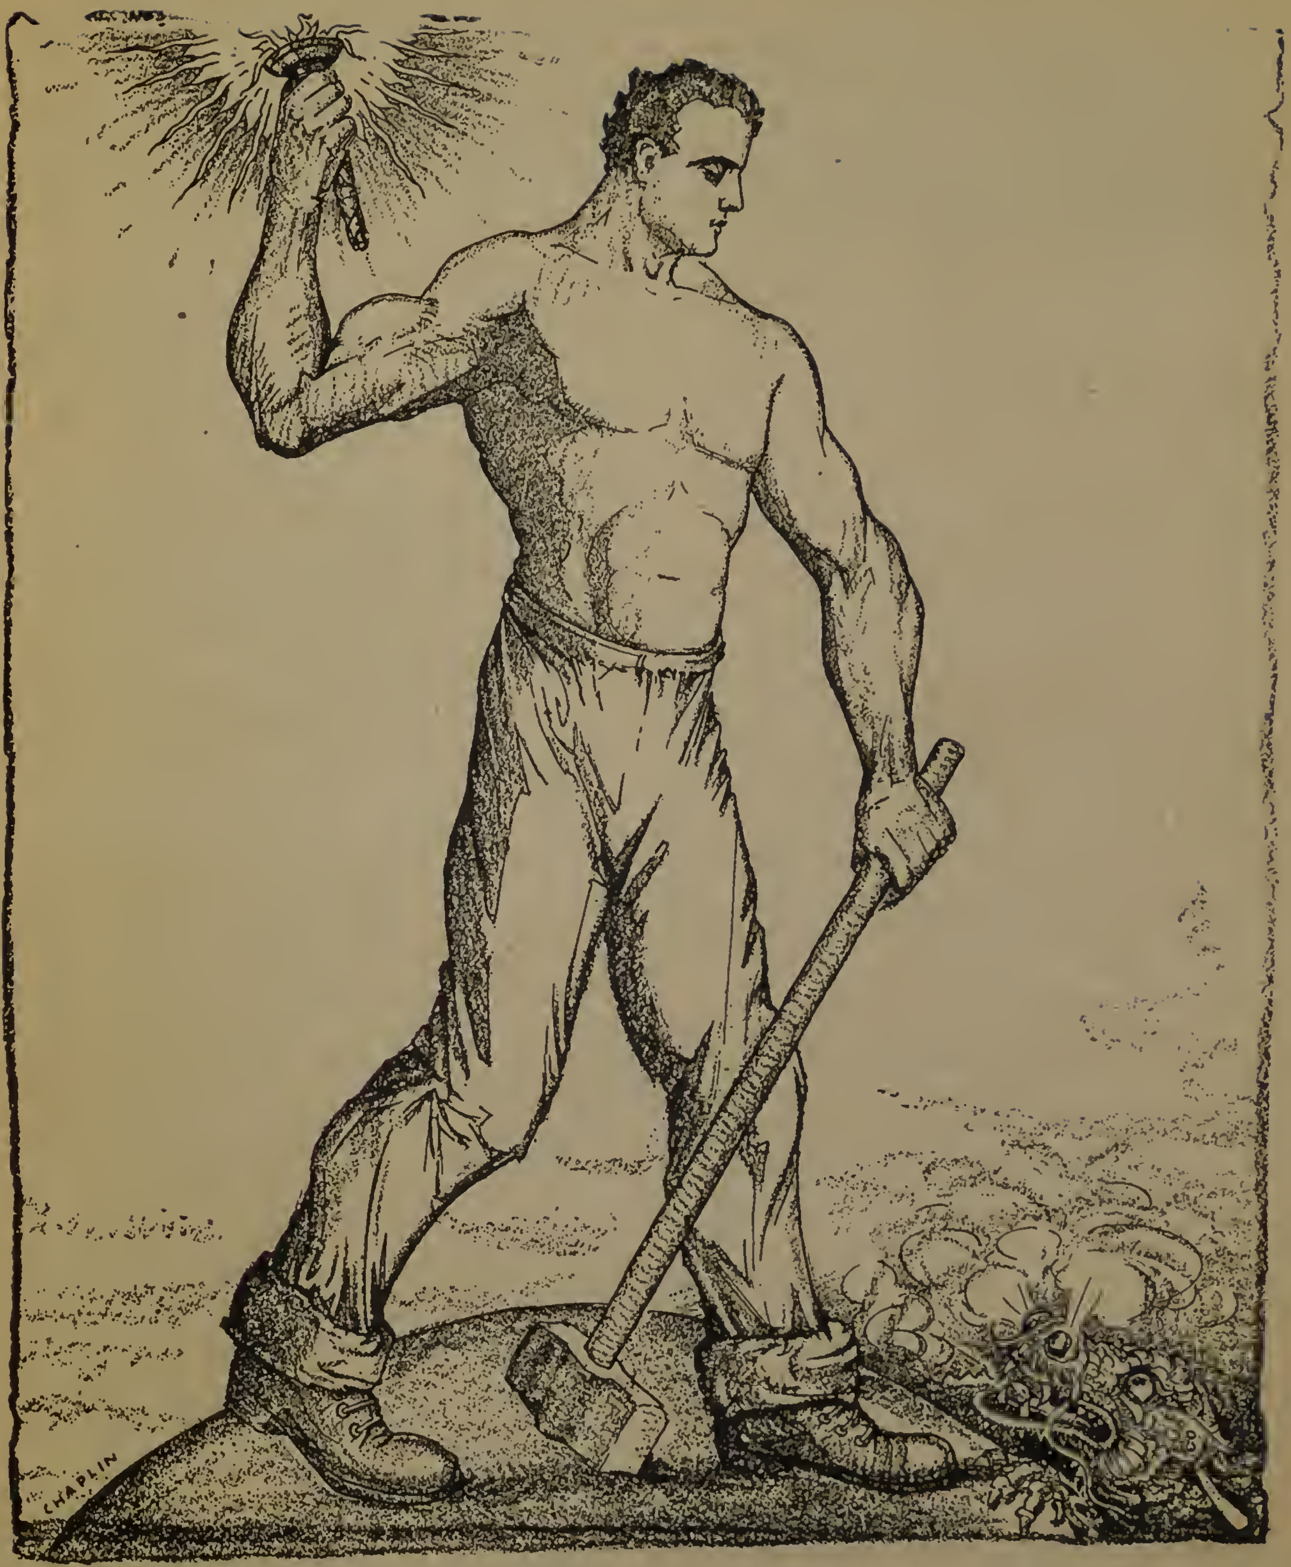
Fifty years ago it was a crime to tell Labor these things—and so they were judicially lynched.

These men are heroes! Their philosophy, their ideas have rendered exceptional service to mankind. They opposed slaughter of millions of men in war. They opposed the oppression of the working man. They revolted against the tyranny of the State. They spoke of organization. They were not interested in politics; they were interested in economics. They did not believe in political action, they believed in revolutionary industrial unionism.

Politically and economically they were anarchist believing in the destruction of the State and the establishment of a communistic form of society. In tactics they were Revolutionary Industrial unionists.

Long after the marble monument has crumbled to dust, the monument in Waldheim will stand as a symbol of victorious martyrdom.

Long after the Unknown Soldier will have been forgotten, the names of Spies, Parsons, Fischer, Engels, the four who were hanged November 11, 1887, and Lingg, who committed suicide in his cell, and Fielden and Schwab, who served prison sentences, will reverently be remembered.



There is promise of power only in a working class united on the Industrial field to control the wealth it produces.

Book Reviews

The 'Hero' of Kronstadt Writes History

By PAUL MATTICK

THE REVOLUTION BETRAYED

By Leon Trotsky.

Doubleday, Doran $2.50

To those readers who are already acquainted with Trotsky's ideas and the publications of his movement, his present book will be a disappointment as it contains little new material. In this review we shall therefore limit ourselves to those portions of the volume which indicate that even in the mind of the party-intellectual changes do take place. But, it must be said, even such changes as Trotsky sees are only matters of emphasis—an effort to adapt his "theoretical line" to the new situation which has obviously contradicted previous postulates of his theory.

Any serious student of Soviet Russia must admit that Trotsky's factual material gives an accurate picture of the real situation in Russia. It may also be said that, on the whole, he has paid due regard to the high-lights in the history and present policy of the Third International even though he still tends to account for the counter-revolutionary role of that institution and its sponsor, the Soviet state, by referring to the stupidity and viciousness of Stalin and his associates. The subjective "errors" and "crimes" of these leaders seem to play, according to Trotsky, a more significant part in the general development than the objective factor of economic-social necessity.

Hazy History

The farther Trotsky searches back into the past of Bolshevism and Russia, the more meagre are the fruits of his investigation. It is regrettable that the period during which Lenin and Trotsky held sway is dealt with in such a cursory manner as not to admit of a critical evaluation. It should be evident that to explain Stalin's triumph it is necessary to refer back to pre-Stalinist conditions in Russia and it is precisely these important years that preceded Stalin's rise which meet with no criticism at the pen of Trotsky. Stalinism can be explained only by way of Bolshevism. If Leninism was the revolutionary stage of Bolshevism, Stalinism is its phase of consolidation. The two are inseparable and a criticism of one is of small value without an analysis of the other.

Trotsky writes: "Socialism has demonstrated its right to victory, not on the pages of Das Kapital, but in an industrial arena comprising a sixth part of the earth's surface—not in the language of dialectics, but in the language of steel, cement and electricity." (p. 8. This sentence, accepted at its face value, vitiates all criticism of Stalinism for certainly, this "right" of "Socialism" has been better demonstrated in the period of Stalin than before. Only with Stalin has this "right" been demonstrated at all "in the industrial arena." Lenin himself did not think it possible to do more than vindicate the "right" of state capitalism after the Bolshevik seizure of power. Can it be that when Trotsky innocently states that the "term 'state capitalism' has the advantage that nobody knows exactly what it means," he is expressing a hope that his readers are unacquainted with Lenin's position on this question which dominated the ideas of the Bolsheviks prior to Stalin's ascendancy?

Lenin, at the eleventh party congress, stated clearly his line: "State capitalism is that form of capitalism which we shall be in a position to restrict to establish its limits; this capitalism is bound up with the state—that is, the workers, the most advanced part of the workers, the vanguard is ourselves. And it is we on whom the nature of this state capitalism will depend." But it was necessary to camouflage the state capitalist character of Russian economy before the Russian masses. As Bukharin expressed it at a government conference toward the end of 1925: "If we confess that the enterprises taken over by the State are state-capitalist enterprises, if we say this openly, how can we conduct a campaign for a greater output? In factories which are not purely socialistic, the workers will not increase the productivity of their labor." This plainly reveals that the Bolsheviks did not think it convenient to tell the workers that Russia is a state capitalist system. Of course the international bourgeoisie understood that they could deal quite as well—if not better—with the One Big Corporation which was Soviet capitalism as they had done formerly with the multitude of individual capitalists.

Frequently Lenin identified state capitalism and socialism... In Towards the Seizure of Power, he writes: "Socialism is nothing but state capitalist monopoly made to benefit the whole people; by this token it ceases to be capitalist monopoly." In spite of tthe unmistakable meaning of Lenin's words Trotsky nevertheless writes that his analysis of the concept of state capitalism "is sufficient to show how absurd the attempts are to identify capitalist state-ism with the soviet system." (p. 248)

Russian State Capitalism

Trotsky denies the state capitalist character of Russian economy by reducing the term state capitalism to a meaningless phrase. That is, he sees in the concept no more than was seen in it prior to the Russian revolution, or than is seen in it today with reference to the state capitalist tendencies of the fascist countries.

Since it is clear that Russia today is dominated by an economy different from what is implied by the term state capitalism in fascist or general bourgeois society, Trotsky is enabled to win his argument by posing the question to suit his convenience. But a full-fledged state capitalist system is surely something other than state capitalist tendencies, or state enterprises, or even state control in an otherwise bourgeois society. State capitalism as a social system presupposes the expropriation of the individual capitalists, that is, a revolution in property relations.

While the capitalist mode of production grew up historically on the basis of individual ownership of the means of production, the Russian revolution has shown that under certain conditions the capitalist mode of production can continue to exist even though the individual proprietors are eliminated and replaced by a collective exploiting apparatus where factories are not owned by capitalist "X" or "Y" but are "controlled" (i. e. owned) by the State (i. e. the controlling classes).

The Russian revolution changed property relations, replacing individual proprietors by the Bolsheviks and their allies, substituting new "revolutionary" phrases for the old pep slogans, erecting the hammer and sickle over the Kremlin where the Czarist Eagle once stood, but the Bolshevik seizure of power did not change the capitalist mode of production. That is to say, under the Bolsheviks, there remains, as formerly, the system of wage labor and the appropriation by the exploiting class of surplus value which is profit. And, what is done with such profit is exactly what was done with it under the system of individual capitalists, allowing, of course, for the special character of state capitalism.

Such surplus value is distributed according to the needs of the total capital in the interests of further capital accumulation and to safeguard the state capitalist apparatus by increasing its power and prestige.

Only a change in the mode of production can bring about socialism; otherwise, as far as the workers are concerned, they will have only exchanged one set of exploiters for another. Under the conditions of state capitalism the process of accumulation, the development of the productive forces by wage labor is bound up, as in the case of "regular" capitalism, with an increased appropriation of surplus value, with further exploitation, and hence with the development of new classes, of new vested interests in order to continue this process since the working class cannot exploit itself.

This capitalist necessity serves to explain Russian development; no other "line," no other "policy" could have essentially changed this development. By failing to recognize the state capitalist character of Russia, by regarding its present economy as a transitional step to socialism, Trotsky merely indicates his readiness to precipitate a new state capitalist revolution which must lead to a new Stalinism—another betrayal of the Revolution.

Advocates A New Machine

Trotsky describes the contradictions of the Russian economic situation as follows: "To the extent that, in contrast to a decaying capitalism, it develops the productive forces, it is preparing the economic basis of socialism. To the extent that, for the benefit of an upper stratum, it carries to more and more extreme expression bourgeois norms of distribution, it is preparing a capitalist restoration. This contrast between forms of property and norms of distribution cannot grow indefinitely. Either the bourgeois norms in one form or another spread to the means of production, or the norms of distribution must be brought into correspondence with the socialist property system." (p. 244)

The solution, according to Trotsky, lies in the replacement of the present parasitical bureaucracy by a non-parasitical apparatus. Nothing else in his opinion needs to be changed as the Soviet economic system is fully qualified to proceed toward socialism in combination with the world-revolutionary trend. This new bureaucracy, essential in Trotsky's transitional stage, will, according to Trotsky, introduce a greater equality of income. But Trotsky must remember that the present bureaucracy started out with the same idea, originally limiting salaries to Communists, etc. It was the circumstances enveloping the economy which not only enabled but obliged the present bureaucracy to adopt a program of ever increasing economic inequality in its favor. This was in harmony with the need of a faster accumulation to secure the system as a whole. There is no guarantee that a hypothetical Trotskyist bureaucracy would be any different in this respect from Stalin's machine.

Under the prevailing mode of production Russia cannot develop the productive forces higher than the old familiar brand of capitalism in the western world was able to do. Because it cannot do so its system of distribution can never exceed the norms of capitalist distribution. Such a contradiction between forms of property and norms of distribution as Trotsky envisions does not exist. The Russian method of distribution is in perfect harmony with its state capitalist method of production.

It is only necessary to reflect on the paramount role which Trotsky played in the first thundering years of Bolshevik Russia to understand why he cannot admit that the Bolshevik revolution was only able to change the form of capitalism but was not able to do away with the capitalist form of exploitation. It is the shadow of that period that lies in the way of his understanding.

Preamble of the Industrial Workers of the World

The working class and the employing class have nothing in common. There can be no peace so long as hunger and want are found among millions of working people and the few, who make up the employing class, have all the good things of life.

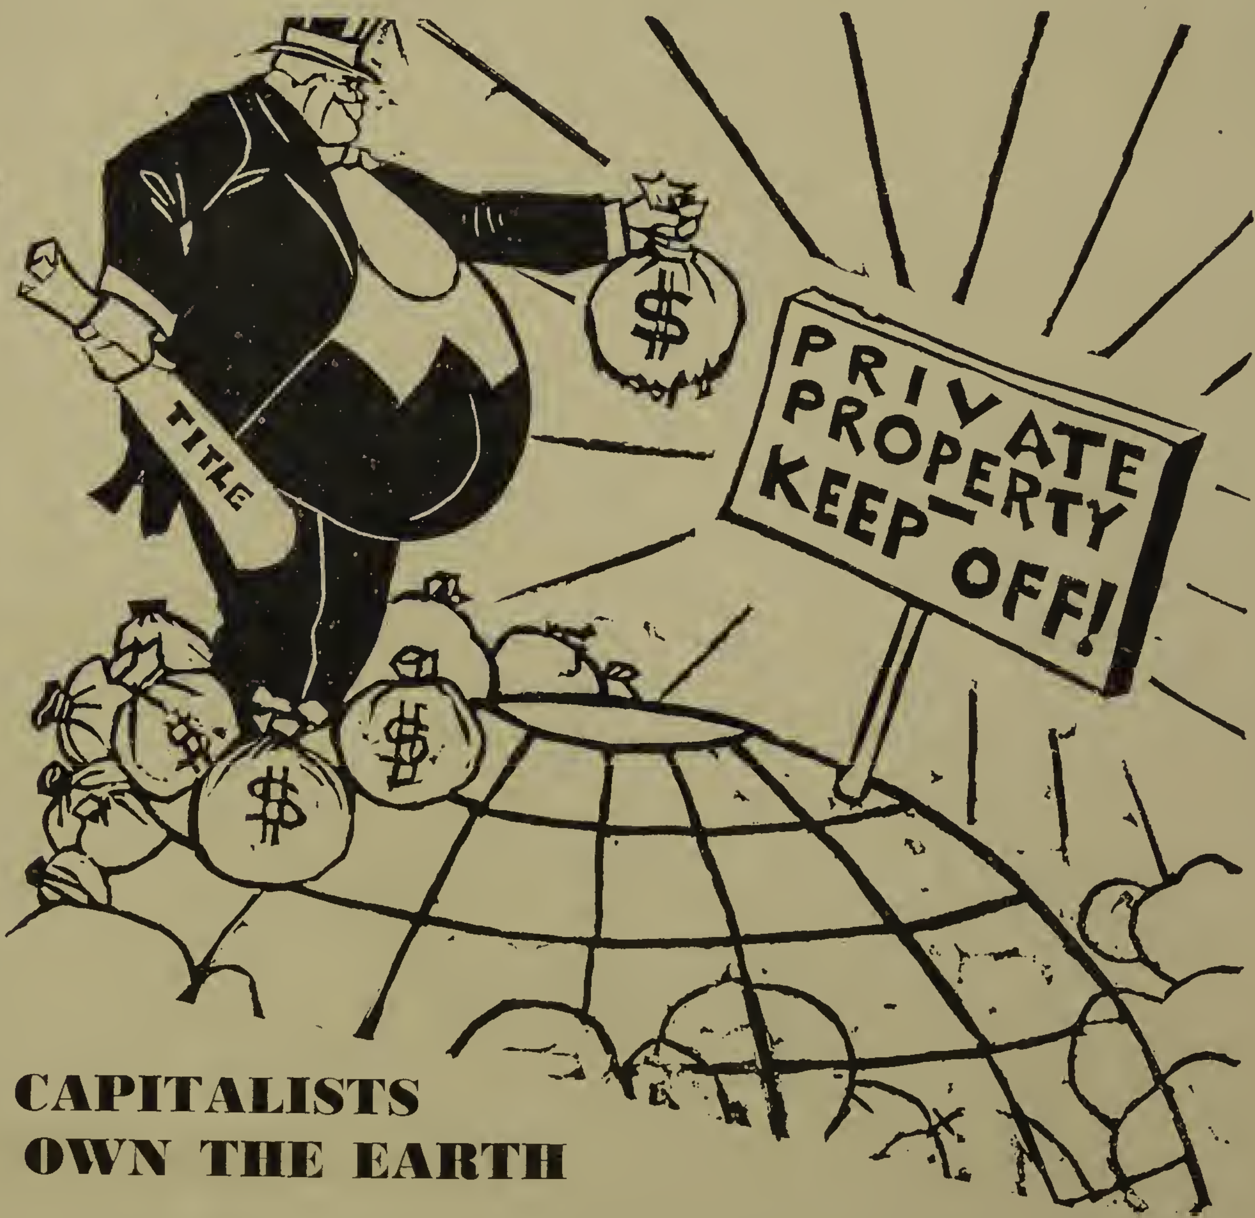
Between these two classes a struggle must go on until the workers of the world organize as a class, take possession of the earth and the machinery of production, and abolish the wage system.

We find that the centering of the management of industries into fewer and fewer hands makes the trade unions unable to cope with the ever growing power of the employing class. The trade unions foster a state of affairs which allows one set of workers to be pitted against another set of workers in the same industry, thereby helping defeat one another in wage wars. Moreover, the trade unions aid the employing class to mislead the workers into the belief that the working class have interests in common with their employers.

These conditions can be changed and the interest of the working class upheld only by an organization formed in such a way that all its members in any one industry, or in all industries if necessary, cease work whenever a strike or lockout is on in any department thereof, thus making an injury to one an injury to all.

Instead of the conservative motto, "A fair day's wage for a fair day's work," we must inscribe on our banner the revolutionary watchword, "Abolition of the wage system."

It is the historic mission of the working class to do away with capitalism. The army of production must be organized, not only for the every-day struggle with capitalists, but also to carry on production when capitalism shall have been overthrown. By organizing industrially we are forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old.



CAPITALISTS OWN THE EARTH

That the ownership and control of the whole world has passed into the hands of a few is the most astonishing fact of our civilization—it also is the most important. All economic problems are rooted in this circumstance, every movement for the improvement of the lot of the many must take it into consideration.

From this fact it follows that owners need not be producers and that those who live only by producing cannot be owners. It follows that the producers are slaves of the owners.

Private property in the means of production is the great, outstanding evil of our age. A working class movement worthy of the name, and entitled to the support of labor, must aim at establishing worker-control of the means by which the population lives. The Industrial Workers of the World is such a movement.

CHRISTMAS IN PRISON

When at the time of year we now call Christmas, our pagan ancestors decorated their homes with holly and green pine boughs in celebration of the return of the sun from the winter solstice there was often great scarcity in the land. People went hungry because there was not enough food to go around. Man was at the mercy of nature because he had not learned how to produce with the aid of machines.

When the sun rose higher above the horizon and the days started to lengthen, giving promise of another spring with warmth and a fresh growth of things for him to eat, he rejoiced in the prospect.

An age has passed since those days and there is now plenty in all the lands of the earth. There is equipment to produce still more, to produce in such abundance that there need never again be a man, woman, or child in want of anything needful to life and happiness. But that abundance is withheld by the owners of the world's wealth from the workers who produce it. Those who have more than they can possibly use allow the many who work only enough for a bare existence.

So the workers of the world still look forward to a new day, to a more cheerful world. There is an ever-growing number of these workers who are not content to wait for the better time to come. Knowing that there is power in organization they are building organization of the dispossessed to combat the criminal economic masters responsible for the darkness that now envelopes the world.

Some of these organizers of labor have been falsely accused of crime and sent to prison. The masters are afraid of them; they want them to suffer so that their plight may discourage others from organizing and demanding for all that which rightly belongs to all.

Labor must organize to free these champions of its class from the prison cells where they will spend this Christmas. Labor must organize to abolish a system where such injustice is possible.

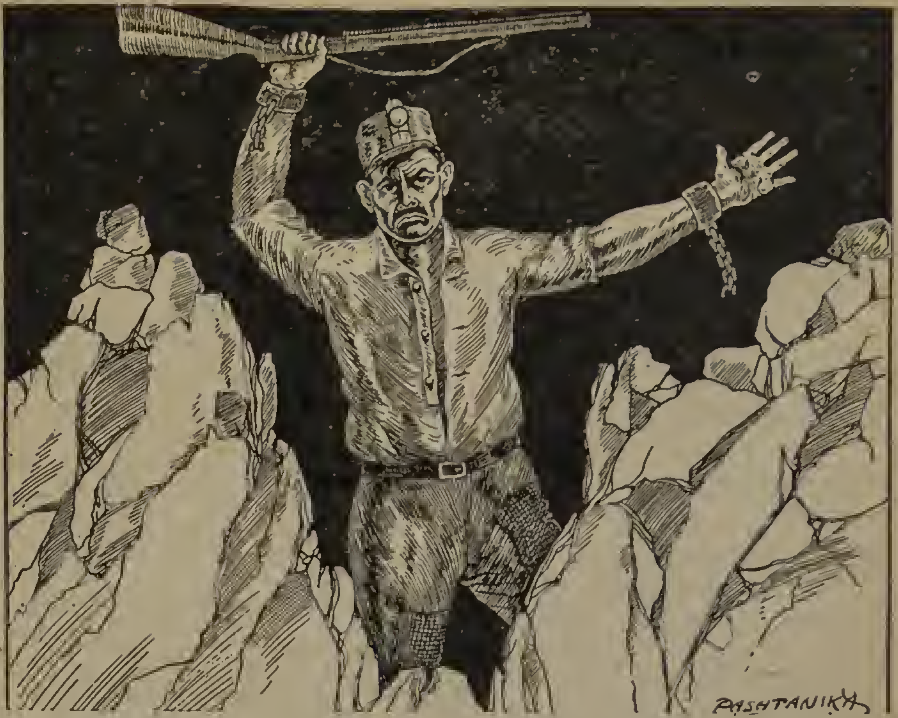
Sacrifice of the Asturian Miners



In 1934 the miners of Asturias (in northern Spain on the Bay of Biscay) rose in revolt against a government striving to set up a fascist government after the model of Italy and Germany.

That was the famous October revolt. It proved that Spanish fascists, then set on making of Spain another prison pen, would not succeed as Mussolini and Hitler had succeeded in crushing the labor movement without help from the outside. Though the heroic miners suffered defeat in that encounter, it was accomplished only through the use of savage Moorish professional soldiers brought into Spain for that purpose from Spanish Morocco.

Anti-Fascist Spain was saved from imminent danger of a fascist upheaval, was given time to prepare for the epic struggle that was to come so many months later—in July, 1936.

Now, after more than a year of incessant fighting against fascist forces armed by Germany and Italy, the Asturian miners have gone down to defeat. Cut off from the rest of Spain and poorly armed they succumbed to the superior forces of the fascist murderers.

The Asturians could have received help from other countries—from democratic France and England. But the "Popular Front" government of France was and is too capitalistic, and therefore fascistic, to help a people who were and are bent upon making freedom for workers a full and complete reality; and England, as always, was concerned only for her right to continue exploiting workers in the rich mines of northern Spain. And so, while Franco's forces were well supplied with Nazi arms, the fighting miners looked almost in vain for ships coming to their ports laden with the things they needed to repel the invader.

Though admission of the fact may dim a hope that the democracies will some day arise against the maurading fascists of the world, the world's workers had better face the reality now that no nation is against fascism in principle. Only class conscious workers are against it, and in a position to develop effective resistance against its expansion. There are many lessons to be learned from the conflict in Spain, but this one stands out so plain that no worker who reads and thinks need be deceived by the soft words of "democratic" politicians.

The workers of Spain, particularly those organized in the C.N.T. in Catalonia have shown us that labor intelligently organized to fit the conditions of economic development can take control and operate industries, can successfully protect their gains from their own master class, and that they can even carry on where international capital supports their enemies. But we have been shown also, as in the case of the Asturians, that national or local labor fighting alone against an organized international enemy cannot win.

Labor must take these lessons to heart. Labor must organize first of all to control production and distribution of goods to such an extent that it can refuse to make goods for or ship them to any fascist country engaged in a maurading expedition. This would be a real economic blockade, real "sanctions"; intelligent, just and effective. Let labor once undertake to shape world events through its own organizations and the nightmare of fascism and its parent, capitalism, will soon be wiped out.

"Resistance Against Fascism Depends on Us"

The Iberian Anarchist Federation Addresses the Libertarians of the World

From
BOLLETIN DE INFORMACION

The Spanish proletariat is maintaining a war against three nations who are invading Spain and supporting Franco's cause with arms and men.

The Holy War of the absolute monarchs against the French revolution, and the capitalist countries against the Russian Revolution (1918) is being repeated, improved and intensified against Spain and the Spanish proletariat.

In spite of the heroism of the people, in spite of the combatants, in spite of the superhuman efforts already made, the attack of the fascist countries against Spain, tolerated and even approved by the cowardice and the interests of the European democracies, seriously threaten our cause. Let us add to that the contemptible behavior of the socialists and communists, the silent torpedoing of the revolution by the bourgeois republicans in defense of their class interests, and we have an approximate idea of the gravity of the situation in which anti-fascist Spain finds itself at the present time.

The Workers Will Win

We do not say "desperate" because we know the inexhaustible energies of our people, the tenacious combative spirit of our men, which permits, even today, the Rio Tinto miners and the Gallician fishermen to carry on the armed struggle in the very heart of fascist Spain, risking their lives a thousand times a day.

We know, however, that if the world proletariat, including all the socialist tendencies, do not consider the cause of Spain as the crucial cause of liberty, of progress, of improvement of human conditions all over the world, we may be reduced. Once again, therefore, we address ourselves to our comrades of all nations, to all men of free conscience, asking them to do everything possible to rouse morale, to arouse the working masses in order to compel the so-called democratic countries to oppose Italian and German imperialism, barefaced invaders of our unfortunate land.

Position of the Libertarians

If we wanted to speak out we could say much . . . With a sense of responsibility that the other sectors do not have, we have kept silent in the face of the destruction of the work accomplished by the peasants in the agricultural collectives, and carried out under the inspiration of the communists frantic maneuvering for the annihiliation of our movement.

They stopped in time because they realized how suicidal was their policy, and because they learned soon enough that ours was not a force to be easily destroyed. We kept silent when we lost Bilbao, victim of the blackest betrayals. When Santander fell, only two CNT-FAI companies fought to the bitter end, while the others either fled or arranged for the surrender of the city.

We are still keeping silent when we reject all responsibility for those unfortunate events which were taking place at the same time as the absurd attacks against the revolutionary conquest of the people. And the latter, now more than ever, are turning to us and placing all their hopes in us.

We are where we have always been, richer, if possible in the tremendous lessons of an incomparable experience, and in the certainty that we shall follow our road with a firmer step than ever if the more immediate and more dangerous enemy, fascism, is crushed and the revolution is not throttled by the hordes of Hitler, Mussolini and Franco. More: we solemnly affirm that if Bakunin were living in Spain today and going through the revolution, he would be working in the same spirit as we are, under the pressure of a long and tragic struggle, cut off by a world that is sacrificing us, for an illusory peace to an egoism maddened by the bloodshed and the moral and material disaster of the World War. Malatesta, Kropotkin, Cafiero, all our theoreticians and fighters, would have been doing the same if they were facing our situation, forced to solve the problems with which we are beset.

It Must Not Happen in Spain

For us as well as for the libertarians of the entire world, the most important question is and should be that of the life or death of the cause of liberty throughout the world, that fascism does not triumph, that the only hope for liberty in Europe, SPAIN, be not suppressed, and thereby allow humanity to sink abruptly into the darkness of the Middle Ages. If that were to happen, would not our libertarian principles be relegated to the limbo, condemned to death and disappearance, brought to collapse by social democracy which, vacillating and cowardly, prepared and permitted the triumph of fascism in Italy and Germany, as well as by communism, which did not know how to organize the great masses of the world proletariat under the control of a revolutionary banner, sacrificing them to the necessities of their international policies in the face of the Russo-British alliance such as panslavism has always pursued from Peter the Great to Stalin?

For Spanish libertarians, for all libertarians with a realistic spirit and a general understanding of our problems, the fundamental task is to defeat fascism, to fight the totalitarian states, to arouse the revolutionary spirit of the wage-earning masses.

The future of our ideas depends on the latter, the ability of our movement to win the emancipation of the exploited; our influence in every realm of human activity, and the very basis of our ideas: the philosophy of progress, now interrupted, the theory of evolution, and our trust in humanity, ever seeking its well-being and liberty; all this must be opposed to fascism and must push on the slow development toward federalistic and libertarian socialism.

What We Ask

The entire resistance against fascism depends on us. Thanks to us, who have suffered so many injuries and so much injustice, including even illegal persecution on the part of our political opponents, the Cains who forget their origins and raise an armed fist against us, preferring to risk the loss of the war rather than permit libertarianism to strengthen its position and continue being the greatest force in Spain; thanks to us, we repeat, the anti-fascist block is being maintained. We are keeping it up, not for what it represents in our country, but for example it offers to other countries, threatened by fascist aggression in the near future. Anti-fascist unity, the pact of non-aggression and of mutual aid against the enemy, fascism, sealed with the blood of the July fighters, left republicans, socialists, communists, and anarchists, we want to keep it at all costs.

It is the lever that can save us, the given line, the possibility of victory in the cause of liberty throughout the world. If others guilty, conscienceless, break or threaten it, we don't want that guilt to be ours.

Furthermore, we are the only united movement that forms a single body with three branches: FAI, CNT, and the Libertarian Youth. While the Marxist sectors are devouring each other, engaging in public conflicts from the platform and in the press, reaching the point of insult and the most ferocious persecution—the annihilation of the POUM (Workers Party of Marxist Unity) by the Communist Party is an example—our movement offers the people the robustness of a united movement, a single line, always firm, facing reality and preaching unity by example, maintaining itself compact internally, and fighting energetically to impose anti-fascist unity among all the sectors who are today fighting among themselves and censoring each other so bitterly.

Part of the international brigade—The Tom Mooney Battalion

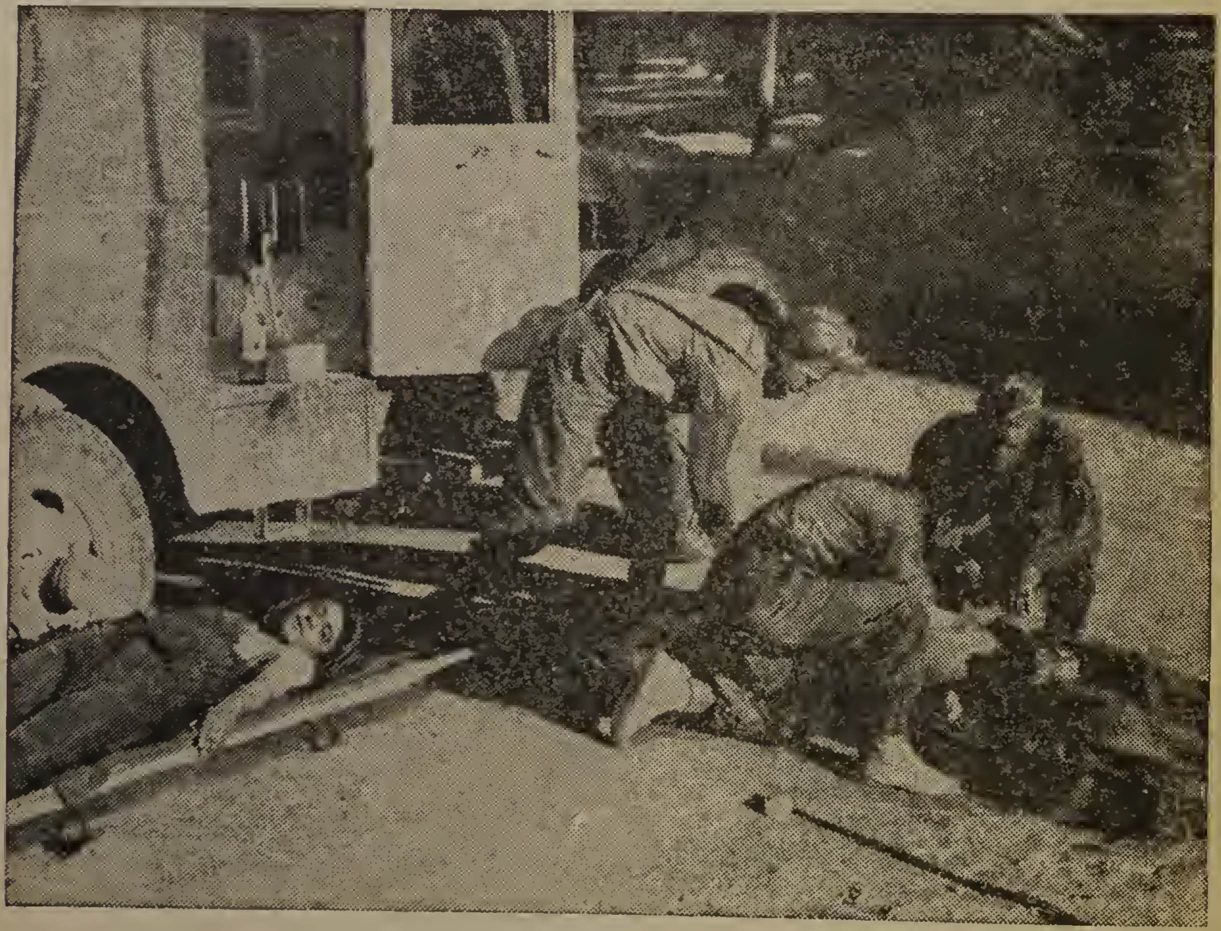
We have a right to give the workers of the world our opinion regarding aid for Spain. Although we are grateful for all the aid given us, for the outburst of romanticism that brought so many workers of brain and brawn to fight on our soil in the International Brigades and in the anti-fascist militia, working in the munitions factories and enthusiastically supporting all activities and aspects of the struggle, there was a job to be done that international libertarianism did not do, that the revolutionary workers abroad did not do. Far better than the solidarity of individuals who had come to our land would have been direct action against fascism carried out abroad. Better, and more effective, organized and calculated, converted into an expansion of the revolution capable of wounding the enemy by a flank attack and in the rear to such an extent that it would have greatly impeded the arming of Franco's fascist hosts, and the absolute impudence of Italy and Germany.

These words are not an accusation. They are a recognition of an error on the part of the international revolutionary movement, that can always be repaired. Let the libertarians in Europe and America think this over; let the masses of anti-fascist workers in general who do not know what to do to help us consider these words carefully.

The Great Asturias Tragedy

Finally, we appeal to the whole world, the proletariat of Europe, which is watching in anguish, its great heart gripped by what is and by what is yet to be the tragedy of Asturias, which, isolated from the rest of the Peninsula, is fated to be destroyed, razed to the ground, annihilated by the fascist hords unless intenational solidarity comes to the rescue.

We know that the dozing, old heart of Europe is hardly stirring. But we are addressing the libertarians, defenders of all just causes, eternal fighters for liberty and justice. ASTURIAS CANNOT PERISH, BECAUSE THE ASTURIAS IS THE REVOLUTION, IT IS THE LIVING SYMBOL OF OUR STRUGGLE AND THE CRUCIBLE FROM WHICH THE RESISTANCE AGAINST FASCISM CAN ARISE, MOLDED AS IT IS IN THE BLOOD OF ALL THE MARTYRS OF OCTOBER, WITH ALL ITS PASSION AND THIRST FOR REVENGE.



Loyalist soldiers, wounded in action, are shown being cared for by Dr. William Pike, American doctor who went to Spain with a unit of the Medical Bureau to Aid Spanish Democracy. The ambulance at the left was bought with American contributions.

The I.W.W. on High Seas and Waterfront

A History and Tradition of Action that Presages Great Things for the Future.

By

JOHN S. MORGAN

It's the same wheel in any industry, put your shoulder to it.

Briefly described Marine Transport Workers Industrial Union is, within its industry, a mass One Big Union; it is also a vanguard union in marine transportation. Comprised of wage workers only, it is democratically governed by its members whose enrollment is at all times voluntary. It does not go into time agreements with the employers.

Background and Tradition

The Industrial Workers of the World organized the M. T. W. I. U. actively in 1914, propagating the program of "One Big Union" for workers both on the ships and on the docks. For a time it functioned as a minority group within the old corrupt craft unions.

But in 1917 the M.T.W. pulled a strike of 4,000 longshoremen on the Clyde Mallory Line Docks for higher wages. The same year it carried on a strike of seamen for higher wages on the Atlantic coast. In both cases the demands were granted by the ship owners and stevedore contractors. As a consequence of these strikes the A. F. of L. unions—International Longshoremen's Association and the International Seamen's union—were given time agreements. They cashed in on the efforts of the M. T. W. I. U.

Also in 1917, this I.W.W. union organized a strike of 8,000 longshoremen at Philadelphia, won demands for 85 cents an hour, time and a half for overtime, and complete control of hiring and job relations. Before the strike wages of only 45 and 57 cents an hour were paid.

Helping the Revolution

In 1919, when the democratic nations were supporting the Russian imperialist whiteguards against the revolution, the union struck an effective blow against reaction by striking in protest against the attempted shipment of amunition and other war materials to the Czarist General Kolchak in Siberia. The centers of that strike were Philadelphia and Seattle. The ships held up in Philadelphia, Chester and Camden alone numbered 268.

Again in 1919 it participated in the five-day joint general strike in Seattle and cooperated financially with the Winnepeg general strike which lasted nine weeks in the face of an A. F. of L. international opposition.

In 1921 the ship owners, wishing to effect a wage cut, locked out the organized seamen and, owing to the corruptness of that union, 115,000 seamen stampeded out of the A. F. of L. International Seamen's Union; 35,000 of them came into the M. T. W. I. U.

Under the banner of the M.T.W., 5,000 New Orleans longshoremen went on strike in 1922 for higher wages. The strike was won; the owners raised the wages and gave a contract to the International Longshoremen's Association of the A. F. of L.

Moscow Wrecking Crew

The communist party at its Red International of Labor Unions Congress in Moscow laid down a program to wreck the I.W.W. (1922) because the I.W.W. refused to go under the control and domination of the Moscow Communist International. From that day to this the communist party has been trying persistently to wreck and discredit the I.W.W.

The first international convention of the Marine Transport Workers Industrial Union of the I.W.W. was held in 1922 at Chicago. In 1923 it pulled a seamen's strike, stopping all movement of shipping at San Pedro harbor and a large part of the shipping on the rest of the Pacific Coast, the Gulf and the Atlantic. The demands in this strike were: three watches, the eight-hour day (at this time most ships were working two watches of 12 hours each, and the release of class war prisoners.

No signed agreement was asked and none was offered. Owners and government announced a wage increase and three watches on deck, some of the prisoners were released. The strike was called off.

In 1923 the M. T. W. I. U. organized 4,000 longshoremen and opened a branch hall in Hoboken, fought a pitched battle against political gangsters and police of Tammany Hall, who were supporting the I.L.A. of the A. F. of L. This latter outfit, always a racketeering job trust, was supported in its fight against the I.W.W. union by the communist partyites.

International Solidarity

In 1925 the M. T. W. I. U. actively supported the British seamen's strike by tackling and picketing British ships in American ports. Then in 1926 the M. T. W. I. U. was the only organization in the marine transport industry to actively support the British general strike. In the face of organized opposition from the A. F. of L. and the communist party the M. T. W. I. U. picketed English ships in American ports.

From 1927 to 1933 the union carried on job action on individual ships, organized a direct action union for marine workers' relief of the unemployed, held many propaganda meetings, distributed educational literature propagating the One Big Union, shorter hours and the employment of more men on ships and docks.

In 1934 it was the M. T. W. I. U. membership that comprised the militant minority group of workers that precipitated the May 1 longshoremen's strike in the Gulf ports for higher wages. The A. F. of L. interfered in this strike and called it off for a time agreement between the I.L.A. and the bosses with an increase in wages.

Then in the same year, the M. T. W. I. U. organized a strike of the seamen, May 18, in support of the Pacific Coast strike and that of the Gulf longshoremen. When the A. F. of L. got the Gulf longshoremen back to work, the I.W.W. members within reach were placed in prison. This caused the disintegration of the mass of striking seamen; they went back to work despite the efforts of the I.W.W. to keep solidarity with the West Coast.

The communist Marine Workers' Industrial Union played the part of Judas in this strike when they circulated a leaflet stating that the strike was no strike and urging the seamen to go back to work. The title of the leaflet was, "A strike or a Shakedown?" It was issued by the Marine Workers Industrial Union, a paper organization of the communist party.

The Perpetual Judas

In 1934 the M. T. W. I. U. members comprised the vanguard of the big strike of unorganized maritime workers on the Pacific Coast; the A. F. of L. called it off for arbitration. In 1935 many job strikes on individual ships were called by members of our union.

In 1936-7 in the big maritime strike on the Pacific, Atlantic and the Gulf coasts, the M. T. W. I. U. members participated actively. Two members were killed and two were injured while on picket duty.

In this strike the communist partyites interfered with the strike funds. They managed to get the inside track to the cash box. On the Atlantic and the Gulf the money they got control of was diverted from the strike. It passed into the hands of lawyers and politicians in fake injunction appeals to the state and the courts while the strikers were half starving on the picket lines. To some extent the strikers overcame this difficulty when a little beef was brought in off the range for the Gulf under the able supervision of the direct actionist I.W.W.'s. A piece of meet in the soup stimulated the energy of the strikers, thanks to the M. T. W. I. U.

In the spring of 1937 the union took the initiative in organizing the marine transport workers of the Great Lakes. A new hall was opened at Buffalo, N. Y., and preparations are now being made for a real One Big Union on the Lakes at the opening of navigation next season.

The I.W.W. Will Win

The bosses, the A. F. of L. and its offshoot, the C.I.O., and the Moscovite communist partyites, or red fascists—these constitute the triple alliance against the One Big Union. They are forming all kinds of fake federations and confusionist moves to stave off the progress of the One Big Union. But despite that opposition Marine Transport Workers Industrial Union of the Industrial Workers of the World progresses and stands out as an authority in marine transportation and as the only real hope for the marine transport workers.

The only organization in the world, the One Big Industrial Union, democratically governed by its members, is the Industrial Workers of the World—the I.W.W.

Royalty is Out of a Job

By

BERT RUSSELL

There Isn't Much Work for Kings Any More but the King Business is Trying to Stage a Come-Back.

The ranks of the unemployed kings were increased by one when Edward of England was unkinged. Just as when Alphonse, the Kaiser, and Salassie were demoted, the sale of newspapers and the amount of tea drank was increased tremendously for a few weeks. But in all other respects the job of living and industry went on just as though he had not up and quit the people of England.

The poor and miserable workers of Wales for whom the late king said during his visit there, "Something must be done," are still poor and miserable. The coal mines where they had been working still remained closed and the ones that were operating are still doing so if it is profitable to the owners. They will continue to until such times as other kinds of fuel will make it unprofitable to operate. Kings haven't much influence on industry any more.

Several hundred years ago a king's actions affected all of his people's lives. And he did pretty much as he pleased. He could marry anyone he pleased and get rid of them when he was tired of them. If anyone said anything about it they lost their heads. If the king's actions weren't in accord with the religious belief of his millions of subjects it was a simple matter to change the religion of these millions until it was in accord with his actions. The king's actions were justification in themselves, the theme of plays and stories. But now about all they can use his skylarking around for is to get the peoples' minds off unemployment, wage cuts and killing of thousands of their fellow workers in Spain.

Whether to put Edward on the dole or find another job for him must have been a hard one for the unemployment administration there to decide. There isn't a lot of other things that a man can do if all he has been trained for since he was a kid is to be king. When you have a highly specialized guy like a king on your hands it gets you to thinking what in the world use can he be.

Displacement of Kings

There was a time when if a king lost his job he could create another by copping a sneak on some other fellow who was losing his popularity. The king served a useful function then, according to the prevailing ideas of usefulness. If a community ran out of food or clothes, or good looking women, it was the king's job to organize his men to go after some in another place. And if some other community ran out of the same things and they came robbing the king's people he had to get busy leading a fight against them.

Things developed so that there came to be an over supply of kings and shortage of kingdoms so some of them had to call themselves "Pretenders." It is funny to think of an unemployed king with an army pretending to be king. It is something like what Franco is doing in Spain. He has an army but no people or goverment, but Hitler and Mussolini are kidding him along into thinking that he is the dictator of Spain and his government, which doesn't exist, is the lawful government there.

In England they have been cutting down on their allowance of kings for quite some time. About a thousand years ago they had seven of them in England alone. But they kept laying them off until about a couple of hundred years ago they got down to one king and a Pretender. Finally they formed a trust of the kingdoms and put one king on the job for the whole British Isles. In the last few years they have managed to get along for short periods without a king at all.

This is going to show people a lot of things about kings they didn't know before, or if they did know them, they didn't let on. For instance, they put his brother on the job and even considered putting his brother's little girl in the position. Now if they can put a man who has never been trained for "Kinging" or a little girl who has just learned to write her name (and that is a pretty big job considering the length of some of them) to take a king's place it just shows how much is in this king stuff today. Anyone could do it.

The Job Isn't What It used To Be

Just think what would have happened a thousand years ago if a king took out on his subjects like Edward did and some other king got to hear of it. The other fellow would just muscle in on the ex-king's territory and the whole job of living and the industry of all the people would be disrupted trying to pay off the new gang of robbers. But now if a king quits, the ones that are hungry remain hungry and the ones that have a job will continue to have one so long as the boss permits them and, in general, nothing is disturbed. If another king is put in his place, industry still goes on as usual.

No one raids England on the chance that the defenses are disorganized. The king doesn't have anything to do with the defense of the country or conduct of war. The people may say all they want about how they love their king, how important he is and how they would die for him or without him, but even a king could get wise just how important he really is when they go on running the country to suit themselves without paying any attention to him.

It might have been the thing for a king at one time to do a little "can-can" dance to propitate the spirits to make sure of good crops, or to do a little leading to get some extra things to eat that the neighbors had, but modern methods of production have made these obsolete. Now if you want good crops you fertilize. And if you need more water and there is none due to fall in the area, irrigation brings it. And if there aren't enough shoes, machinery can be speeded up and that it all there is to it. Kings aren't necessary here anymore and if they did hang around a factory in their long silk stockings or two-feet fur hats they would be in the way.

Facts vs. Tradition

Divine rights, blue blood, and a family tree running back to the one that Eve picked the apple from, play as little part in the making of automobiles as does ancient witchcraft in fighting the bubonic plague. Modern technology recognizes facts not traditions nor wishes. If a tradition gets in the way of making a stream-lined train then it is too bad for tradition. Any movement built around a tradition of things as they once were, with its eyes closed to changing technical arts and subsequent social changes, will be crushed by the onward march of progress.

Our technological progress is smashing through our accepted traditions like a rotary snow plow through a snow drift. Facts move faster than minds and many are frantically clinging to the old way of things as a frightened man clinging to a sinking ship. As with the frightened man, our safety lies in casting off so we will not be sucked down with the ship of old ideas. The increasing capacities to spew goods and services in abundance on every one in society knocks the pins from under our old ideas and traditions.

As the aristocracy of learning was destroyed by the printing press and the aristocracy of royal blood was scattered to the winds by the changing mode of living, so the aristocracy of labor is fast joining its brother aristocracies in the garbage can of history. To attempt effectively to rebuild society on the basis of traditions and divine rights, as they are doing in Italy and Germany and other absolutist countries, is to attempt to roll back the wheels of history. Attempts to organize labor on the foundation of skill and in crafts is likewise reversion to a nigh forgotten age before the superpower machine. The development of the technical arts, the assembly line, and electric eye, has destroyed alike the need of kings and craftsmen.

American craftsmen may smile at and jibe the Englishmen for their adherence to royalty. But the I.W.W. sees a similar "living in the past" in the craftsmen's futile attempts to stay the march of progress by exalting skill as a basis of organization instead of the machine. The non-sensible authority of traditions blinds them to the present and turns their back to the future.

A few years ago this labor aristocracy was a sizeable minority. Their skill as craftsmen was zealously guarded and protected from encroachment by their unions. Birth and heredity began to be, the necessary qualifications for membership. Democracy was scorned even within their unions. The Aristocracy of Labor was founded.

But those kings are not getting the chance to abdicate for love. When they do it is not their love of some one else but the bosses' love of profits. They abdicate willingly only when they can't keep up the pace. Machinery has debunked their aristocracy. The Green Bottle Blowers is an example. To be a Knight of the Green Bottle cost one thousand dollars. Knighthood was in flower. Along came the machine and the last rose of sumber faded. The Owens machine took the skill on which another union, whose initiation was eight hundred dollars, was based. The ousted aristocrats sank into the ranks of the lowly commoners.

For the first time in the history of civilization, mankind has reached a point where the means of satisfying its needs are in excess of those needs themselves. As the method of production abolished the belief of divine rights and the machines have abolished skill, so the same advancing technology has antiquated all social theories based on scarcity. Thrift and incentive to thrift, back breaking toil and compulsion to labor, the fear of insecurity—all are of the past. And as extinct as dodos are the moral values of scarcity.

They Try to Come Back

The idea of king does not die easily, nor of its own accord. As men came to understand the natural laws of the universe so they gained confidence in themselves. When they gained confidence in themselves they lost confidence in kings and witch doctors. When there was no confidence in kings they became unemployed. But the age of kings is building for a come-back. It is appearing in many guises. They have changed their names to El Duces, Fuehrers and Commissars. They pose as being in accord with the time, and assume an interest in technology, invention, social conditions and, as the ex-king of England is coming to America to do, in housing.

Their promoters are those who have lost confidence in themselves to meet the situation developing from the changing methods of production, workers whose jobs have been wiped out with machinery and effect of technology on society. Like a scared child crying for its mother when faced with unfamiliar surroundings, they ardently pray to the traditional guardian of the tribe, the King, to save them from the unleashed "devils" of science. Asking a king to fix up modern technological development is like asking a Sandwich Island chief to fix a no-squint-no-squat radio.

Working people's courage and confidence in themselves and science, which has made possible the steamships, the railroads, radios and television, dwindle before the social necessity of the consumption of abundance. As their confidence in themselves diminishes so the thousand mile span between superstition and science fades away; as their confusion and fears increase the age of kings is ascendent. The dictators, the El Duces, the Fuehrers, are the modern Moses and tribal kings. Only renewal of confidence in ourselves, as working people, and our capacities to organize and build, can save us from a reversion to the age of kings, scarcity, the thumbscrews, the concentration camps and Siberia.

A World of Free Men

"I see a world where thrones have crumpled and where kings are dust. The aristocracy of idleness has perished from the earth.

"I see a world without a slave. Man at last is free. Nature's forces have by science been enslaved. Lightning and light, wind and wave, frost and flame, and all the secret subtle powers of earth and air are the tireless toilers for the human race."

Thus began Robert Ingersoll's "Vision of the Future."

It will remain a vision if we do not retain confidence in ourselves as workers but put our faith in the Edwards, the Benitos and Adolphs. Dreams are made reality only by those with the confidence in themselves to go ahead and attempt to make them so.

"Daring, daring and more daring," said Danton, when fighting the King of France.

"Confidence, confidence and organization," says the I.W.W. when fighting the "Kings of Scarcity."

To Those Who Preach Passivity

You bolster exploitation with your creed
Though blood upon its whiplash never dries.
You do the work of hired thugs and spies;
Like them you serve the System for your feed.

The world's great Wrong cries out; you do not heed,
But drivel rot with heaven-uplifted eyes,
Then creep away behind a cloud of lies
To kiss the palsied hand of murderous Greed!

This is the work for which you get your pay:
To keep the world unchanged in sullen "peace"
Where serf-men toil at tasks that never cease,
Heartbrokenly, from bitter day to day—
The Crime upheld by preachers and police
While Lust, unhindered, battens on its prey!

The Story of a Worker's Education in Economics

By Ralph Verlaine, x229442, I. U. 620

It was June, 1932. The champion of the Forgotten Man was comfortably installed in the White House. A "lame duck" session of Congress was engaged in increasing the heat and humidity of Washington D. C. with the argumentative hot air of politics. Headlines in the brass-check journals were dedicated almost exclusively to the meaningless mouthings of ranting Democrats. Amidst all this fanfare and hautbois, I was graduated from a Roman Catholic institution of higher education not a mile away from the United States Capitol..

Franklin Delano Roosevelt distributed the diplomas and received an honorary doctorate in philosophy for his efforts. He spoke of a new day dawning whose noonday would be effulgent with promise. With honesty, it must be admitted I was touched with the visionary spectacle of a new world of wider opportunities being erected under the benevolent direction of this enemy of laissez faire capitalism, this re-incarnated Pericles. The picturesque word-tapestry of a delightfully changed existence wrought under the beneficient leadership of Roosevelt was pleasant to contemplate. My education in the brutalizing realities of working class life was nil. After all, I had studied six years for the Roman Catholic clergy and my scholastic life had given me no basis for an appreciation of the fallacy of his remarks.

During my last two years of university life, I was possessed by ranking doubts of the validity of religion. Penetration into the sciences of biology, chemistry, and physics, worked havoc with my religious faith, and I was not averse to carrying my precious little heresies into the classrooms to fling them into the faces of the professorial clergy. At first, I shot embarassing questions at the theological doctors, but when they barricaded themselves behind the smoke screens of metaphysical evasions and sophistries, I changed my tactics to open challenge and fought them grimly to the glee of a small group of comparatively free-thinking students and to the undisguised horror of the larger group of the complacently pious.

Shortly before my graduation, I wrote to my four brothers and five sisters (mother and father were dead), announcing my withdrawal from the church, stating elaborately, almost pontifically, my reasons and welcomed them to take similar action. Their joint answer was couched in the bitterest terms of denunciation. I was disowned! I was the Anti-Christ! I was the agent of Satan! I was the epitome of everything connoting evil! It was too tragically funny to warrant a reply. Recollecting their attitude evokes from me a peel of spontaneous laughter even to this day. However, there was a discordant note in the chorus of anathematizing. One sister independently wrote me, mildly congratulating me, but chiding me for antagonizing the family and storming against the citadels of the whole of Christiandom, painfully pointing out the economic comforts and advantages I was losing by not currying favor with the Church, and by refusing to pander to the petty prejudices of its followers. Shades of Machiavelli! She expressed the desire to attend my graduation, but declared that to do so would invite the wrath of her intollerant brothers and sisters and jeopardize her comfort. She sent her good wishes accompanied by a check for fifty dollars.

My professors emitted a sigh of relief when I left the familiar hallways; but I felt a lingering hesitancy to leave. The thrill of manipulating test-tubes, of dissecting small animals, of peering down a microscope, and the delicious madness of rancorous debate on the battlefield of religious philosophy, were realities evaporating into mere reminiscences. I regretted the transformation. It had become such good fun tilting with the clerical windmills!

II.

Under the spell of Rooseveltian optimism, I set out to find these new worlds to conquer, to seek the bright dawn of a re-born civilization, only to discover very shortly that Mr. President was indulging his warm imagination, projecting chimeras and mirages with careless abandon. I made fruitless rounds to the banking houses, newspapers, hotels and congressmen. Applications for positions were easily acquired, but real jobs never materialized. I was impressed with the glaring fact that I was not alone in the search for work. I had a lot of company comprised of some hopeful, some discouraged, some rebellious.

My money was running low and I was perilously near to being broke, when I decided to work with my hands. I accepted a job as a hod-carrier at thirty-five cents an hour. The work was hard and there was obviously too much of it for one man. Each bricklayer worked with ease because there was a superfluity of them, or so it seemed to me. They kept me hopping with their shouts for materials.

"Hey, there! Bring me a load o' that Irish puddin'!" roared a husky son of Erin.

"Irish pudding? What's Irish pudding?" I asked a worker close by.

"Cement! Ya goof!" he bellowed.

All morning long I took abuse from the bricklayers who seemed organized in a conspiracy against me. When I laid the materials down near them they never missed a chance to squirt a stream of tobacco at my legs, and make caustic statements about my clumsiness. Once, when I was running with a load of brick, a giant of a fellow maneuvered a stick between my legs and I went sprawling headlong into a heap of rubbish. Laughter from all quarters went up over my plight. Their sadistic cruelty was beyond my understanding. Scratched, bruised, and limping, I went to the foreman with my troubles. He talked to the men rebuking them mildly for their conduct, adding that he would chastise them by firing me and in that way force them to carry their own materials! This curious speech in my defense called forth low laughter from the men as they bent over their work and renewed their campaign to discomfit me. It was all very bewildering.

The noon whistle blew. Workers dropped their tools with the alacrity of a child pulling his finger out of the fire, and reached for their black tin lunch boxes. I went to a nearby restaurant with an appetite completely out of proportion to my new income. After eating heartily, I proceeded to walk back to work followed by three men who ran up and intercepted me.

"You're the new hod-carrier, aren't you?" asked the huskiest of the three.

"Sure he is!" said another before I could answer. "What are ya stallin' fer? Plug 'im!"

"Yes. I'm the new hod-carrier. It's the first work I've found since I left college. Why do you ask?"

"A collitch bred scab, huh? Lemme slug da rat!" begged the noisy one, but the husky spokesman of the trio prevailed upon him to be patient.

"We belong to the International Hod Carriers Union, fella, an' we're on strike for six-bits an hour. We're workin' on the job you're workin' on but we struck 'cause we can't eat on the wage you're gettin'. You're doin' the work of three guys an' you ain't even gettin' wages enough for one," he said calmly and logically.

His two co-strikers clenched their calloused hands into four formidable fists ready to fly at my already bruised face.

"A scab's a scab!" insisted the third, "and dere's nuttin' ya can do but pick it off!" anxious to use his knuckles on my face.

At this point a policeman strolled over and curious, asked,

"What's goin' on here? Fight, eh?"

"No, sir. Just a friendly debate, sir. We have no intention of fighting. The bruises I have are the result of an accident I had, sir."

"Wot are ya debatin' about?"

"The state of nation, sir, and the difficulty one meets keeping his job."

"Reds, huh?"

"Oh no, sir, Democrats."

"Well, git along. Don't block the sidewalk."

The four of us swung around the corner and walked several strides in silence when one of the belligerents broke the tension.

"That was white of ya, mug."

"Yeh, you're a good egg," corroborated his sidekick, "I thought ya wuz gonna squeal to da copper."

"What are you gonna do 'bout the job?" the spokesman asked.

"What do you want me to do? I'm late for work already."

"Walk off an' stay off!" volunteered the sidekick.

"And if I don't . . .-?"

"We'll bounce ya off, see? We'll bounce ya off!" huffed the big bad wolves in broken chorus, forgetting what a "good egg" I was a few moments before.

"Listen, why do I have to walk off and stay off? Why can't I walk off and stick it out with you, win with you, and go back to work with you? The idea of seventy-five cents an hour appeals to me."

"Ya don't belong to da union!"

"Can't I join? What does it cost?"

"Ten bucks to our local!"

"Ten dollars! That's an impossible fortune! It's apparent you don't want new members when you put up a protective tariff like that. The jobless and hungry have no recourse but to take your jobs when you leave them."

"We don't want none of ya chatter. Ya ain't goin' back to work, ya see?"

III.

I saw that a return to work was plainly improbable. I had to retreat to the ranks of the unemployed, or suffer broken bones, and missing teeth at the hands of three strikers bent upon winning their demands for increased wages. It was my first contact with the wage.system, and the American labor movement. I was not favorably impressed by either; both left me frankly puzzled; but my mind received its first real impetus to think along economic lines.

With no money to pay my room rent I was in the streets. Hungry, dishevelled in appearance, my courage waning, I thought frequently of returning to the Church, of rescinding my convictions, and throwing myself at the snug mercy of my family, a repentent prodigal. But the thought was not pregnant with action. To concede they were irrevocably right and I was unalterably wrong would be too intellectually and morally humiliating.

In long-faced despair, I dragged by weary feet toward the railroad yards. A freight weighted down with young and old of the dispossessed, chugged to a stop with brakes squeaking and bumping cars clattering noisily. Crowds crawled from the tops of the box-cars, and scurried over the tracks. One youthful chap with a smutted face walked toward me and begged a match.

"How's moochin' in this burg, buddy? Any good?"

"I don't understand, young man?" I was not familiar with the unique jargon of the road. My young friend seemed surprised.

"How's the food, I mean?"

"Oh, it's good, if you can get it."

He proved quite capable of getting it and he taught me the art. I was an apt student, frequently besting my instructor on many of our foraging campaigns amongst the petty bourgeois bakers, butchers, and grocers. On one occasion a grocer growled his refusal to give my companion food, threatening to call the police when my colleague consigned him to a six-penny Christian hell amidst a torrent of uncomplimentary epithets. Promptly taking up the cudgels in defense, I delivered myself of a flow of oratory on the manifold miseries of the wretched creatures who huddled themselves around jungle fires seeking protection of the damp night air and a little warmth for their chilled bones. The grocer stood mesmerized. Shoppers came in and enjoyed the drama. I wound up by appealing to him as a man of Christian virtues, saying that what he does "for the least of these, His children, he does it unto Him!" The bourgeois repented his decision, giving generously of foodstuffs, enough to feed a dozen. My sharp buddy rose magnificently to the occasion and passed his dirty cap amongst the shoppers, collecting nickels, dimes and quarters.

My prestige in jungle society shot up like an arrow. My friend never tired of eulogizing me to the tramps, hoboes, and disemployed workers who filtered through the camp. He was a superb press agent, and his Wamba-like antics and enthusiasm irritated me to laughter—laughter in the jungle! Humor in the dark basement of a Dante-esque hell!

I lost my instructor. He failed to make a train under the watchful surveillance of railroad bulls. We had planned to go to New Orleans together to get a job hauling bananas. It was his idea. I missed him miserably—him and his quaint resourcefulness. I dropped off the train in Macon, Georgia. It was impossible to hold it down to Louisiana. My belley told me so. My eyes were bloodshot and burning with lack of sleep.

While standing before a restaurant window, gazing longingly at simmering hamburgers on a grill, guessing at the liberality of the chef, a gentleman brushed by me, hesitated, came back and asked if I were hungry. Upon receiving my frank reply, he invited me to dine with him. I waxed eloquent of my recent experiences while smoking his cigarettes. He was the very essence of tenderness and solicitude. Impressed with my eagerness to find employment, he declared he would do his level best to put me to work.

IV.

We drove in his car to the edge of the city, parked and walked a block. His attitude quickly changed. My whole world changed! I was thrown in a crowd of thirty or more men with scared, cowed looks in their eyes. They were manacled one to another. I demanded an explanation! I "stood on my constitutional rights as an American citizen!" only to be silenced by a strong fist wielded by a khaki-clad guard.

My charming benefactor of a few hours ago, received the munificient sum of two dollars for delivering me into the hands of these sadistic Georgia satraps! It was a frank and open "deal." Judas of biblical fame struck a far shrewder bargain. When I was safely manacled to my fellow prisoners he walked up to me and extracted from my shirt pocket the half package of cigarettes he had previously given me, sneered, and walked off with an air of having accomplished a clever feat.

We were pushed into trucks and hauled off like cattle to a dreary spot several miles from the city. Our manacles were exchanged for shackles around our ankles with eighteen inches of heavy chain from shackle to shackle. Our sleeping quarters were rolling iron cages, with iron bunks, crawling with a hundred varieties of vermin, and with a labyrinth of chains from bunk to bunk interlocking the wrists of the prisoners in their slumber thereby prohibiting a change of position while sleeping. If a strong prisoner turned in his sleep, he did so by taking up the slack in the chains and wrenching the arms out of the sockets of a weaker brother-in-bondage.

Into the night I wailed against injustice. I did no wrong! No charges were preferred against me! I appeared before no judge! I was not sentenced! Why? Roosevelt spoke of the dawn of a new day!

The Rights of the Forgotten Man! Piddling politicians! Deceivers! Liars!

I raved until sleep stilled my cries like a gentle opiate. The guards aroused us at dawn with brutal shoves and brutal words. Before the cage lay a washtub of the tenement variety. In it was water to splash into our faces. Sanitation on a chain gang!

We were marched into a big tent that served as the commissary and messroom. A tin dish, a leadish spoon, and a tin cup were given each prisoner. Into the dish was dumped steaming unseasoned oats; into the cup was splashed black chickore heavy ladden with salt peter. That and a chunk of dried bread constituted our unvarying breakfast diet. Many times the same thing appeared at supper. There was no noon meal. Upon very critical inspection, a piece of something faintly reminiscent of a carrot or a bean might be distinguished in the Dada-istic hash.

Our work consisted in clearing acres of rocks and tree stumps and levelling off the land. But for refusing to eat the breakfast slop, I was put to cleaning out the vile open-air latrines. The stench sickened me and I fainted, falling into the human excresence around me. When I opened my eyes a guard was standing a few paces away to avoid the smell, bellowing orders at me. I started my second rebellion, yelling my defiance in a stream of profanity that would have burned the pink ears of my pious professors in the Catholic seminary.

My action did not go unpunished. My face was rubbed in the stuff of the latrines. I was beaten with hard fists and taken to the blacksmith who sharpened and repaired the shovels and picks, and had several links chiseled from the chain between my feet so that I would trip and bash my skull on the ground if I took a normal step. Before I was to leave the chain-gang most of the links were struck from my chain so that I shuffled like a geisha girl, or hopped.

As days wore on, I received a broken nose. lost weight; and skin eruptions, the result of prison diet, broke out on me from head to foot. (The Job of Messianic times was a piker next to me. He was fortunate in having stray dogs to lick his sores, but the baying blood hounds in this prison camp were trained to bite—not lick.) The fierce August sun blistered my back so that sleep was frequently impossible.

One prisoner in the cage suffered weakened kidneys. Chained, he could do no more than react to the urge for relief while lying in the bunk. He tried hard not to, so that the rest of us would not be exposed to the odor. The strong nauseating smell of dried urine compelled some of us to vomit making a stinking hell of the cage. There was no cleaning these messes until daybreak.

An elderly colored worker with white hair bunked opposite me. He was a man-mountain with rippling muscles in his back and arms. In early youth he worked lifting bales of cotton on the sidepaddlers on the Mississippi River near Memphis. His right hand lacked fingers; the rest of the hand was smashed into a hideous mass of contorted flesh. He lost the use of it while slaving for Henry Ford in Dearborn, Michigan. There it was where his economic education began. He was well-read, and having a special affinity for the quibblings of philosophy, familiarized himself with the works of Plato, Aristotle, Voltaire, Schoppenhauer, Godwin, and a host of others. Withal, he concocted a peculiar philosophy out of the material of his own experience.

V.

"I don't like to see you punished, son. But there is nothing so beautiful as a slave in rebellion. I rebel, too. But in a different way. When I'm out in the hot sun I'm supposed to work. But I don't. I just go through the motions when the guards are looking. When they're away, I don't even do that. Every now and then I break a rake handle. It makes the guards think I'm working hard. That's called sabotage."

Sabotage! The word sounded like sweet music. The logic of his philosophy was tantalizingly irresistable.

"When I lost this hand I resolved never to work for Henry Ford again, and to avoid all work, if possible. But, it's impossible sometimes, isn't it?" he said chuckling. "Son, I'm convinced the world is crazy. Suppose you and I were marooned on an island abounding in ripe fruits and eatable animals. We'd pick the fruit and eat it, wouldn't we? We'd hunt the animals and eat them, wouldn't we? We'd build a shelter and live in it, wouldn't we? Surely, we would. In spite of the fact that I'm tan and you're all white. America is just like the island I dream of. Everything is here. But here we build mansions and sleep in box-cars! We raise fine food, and eat garbage! We make automobiles, and walk! Why, America is one big nut house!

"When those chains are knocked off your ankles, don't imagine you're free. You're still a prisoner chained to the task of creating the good things of life for others to benefit by. You're a slave to the class that pays you wages. Yes, and robs you of the full product of your toil! I'm sure that here we're working for someone else, aren't you? I'm convinced we're not going to benefit from all this, aren't you?"

The old philosopher did not stay with us long. Gangrene was crawling up his left arm. It was the result of a filthy wrist chain chaffing the skin. He was removed to the hospital for its amputation.

After eighty-four days I was released. Sick, with sores and boils, coughing, I was a ghost of that fat young lad who dared to argue with priests.

I borrowed from clotheslines, a shirt from this one, a pair of trousers from that, until I acquired a regalia that suggested a miscellaneous column. To the Gulf Coast I went and basked in the warm rays of a Texas sun, regaining my strength. Then to New Orleans to haul bananas off the ships from the British Honduras and to be "discovered" by an erudite and young technical worker who steered me into a good position. I worked with youthful engineers, architects, and the like, freshly recruited from American universities. My own position bestowed upon me the grandiose title of "statistician." I worked until the mid-summer of 1933 when I was fired for lampooning the upper classes in swingy verse, and for my humorous tirades against politicians.

The losing of the position cost be no regret. I was suffering an acute nostalgia for the familiar faces of my old friends of yesterday before the world changed . . . changed me. I was curious to know what they were doing, so I welcomed any excuse to return to Washington.

With the fascination a criminal is alleged to have for the scene of the crime, I went to Macon, Georgia. Nearly fifteen miles west of Macon I came upon a few familiar landmarks that identified the place. No evidence of a chain-gang here now.

I stood in a setting sun that was casting its red glow over fields of soybeans . . . soybeans, waving listlessly in the warm breeze. The fields seemed drenched in blood . . . hot, human blood. I shuddered as with ague as I recalled in panorama the horrifying events that took place at this spot but a brief year before. Impossible! The wails of a youth crying out for justice in a world bereft of justice. His cries stifled with the hard fists of an agent of the State, the hard fists of a servile servant of . . . .

I walked along for many yards inspecting little white signs with bold black letters imposed upon them, shifting my gaze intermittently from the signs to the soybeans. In my heart welled up an uncontrollable hate that sent a sweat to my brow. In the flash of a moment I became class-conscious with a vengeance! I found myself uttering repeatedly a vow to organize my fellow workers to fight.

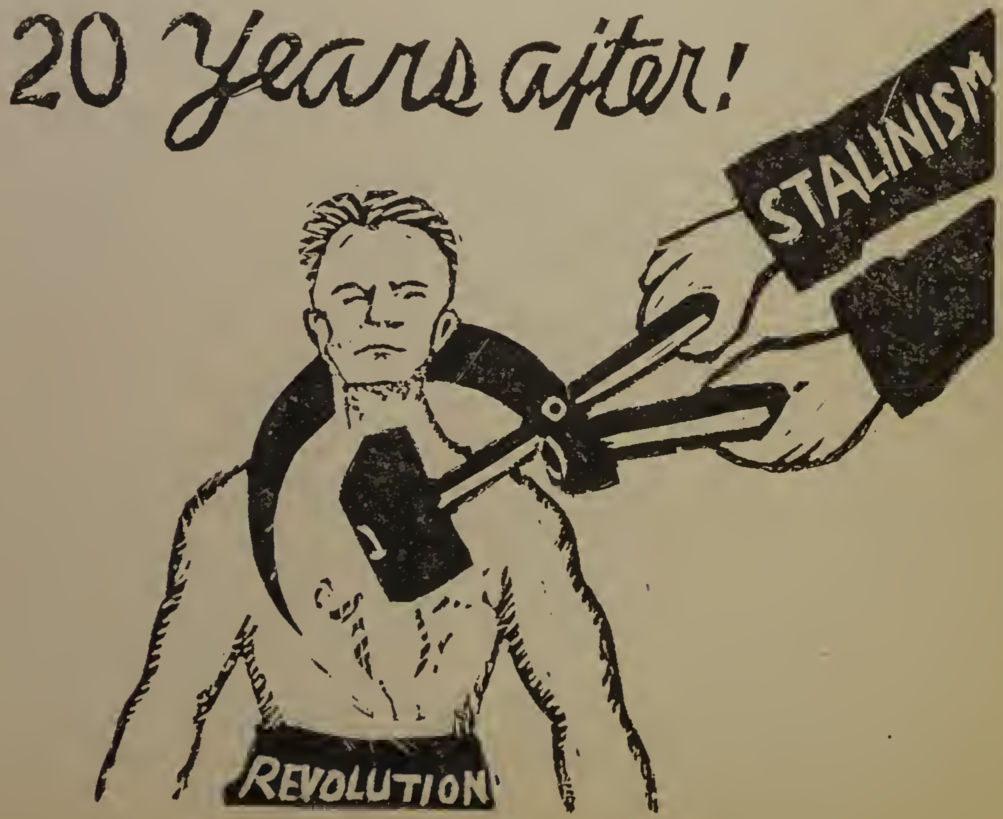
Each sign boasted in bold letters . . . FORD MOTOR CAR COMPANY! FORD MOTOR CAR COMPANY! FORD MOTOR CAR COMPANY!



To a Hard Working Lumberjack

By Carl Madsen, Card No. x193962

When your day's work is done and you are dog tired, and the boss tells you that you are fired—Jack, do you ever have a thought wondering why you have never fought the bosses who have imposed on you such conditions that the devil must be ashamed of the system?

It is the greedy master that keeps you there, eking out an existence bare. Did you ever stop to wonder why, after your day's labor you could not buy plenty to eat and plenty to wear? Then don't you realize that you were robbed out of your share at the point of production by an idle beast who does not worry or care the least if you have shoes on your feet or shirt on your back?

All HE is after is to pile up the jack. Oh, why must you always be humble and meek and perform like a band of wooly sheep? You have heard before and will hear again of a brave body of working men who are fighters now and have always been— the WEDGING POWER of all the workers, known by the name INDUSTRIAL WORKERS.

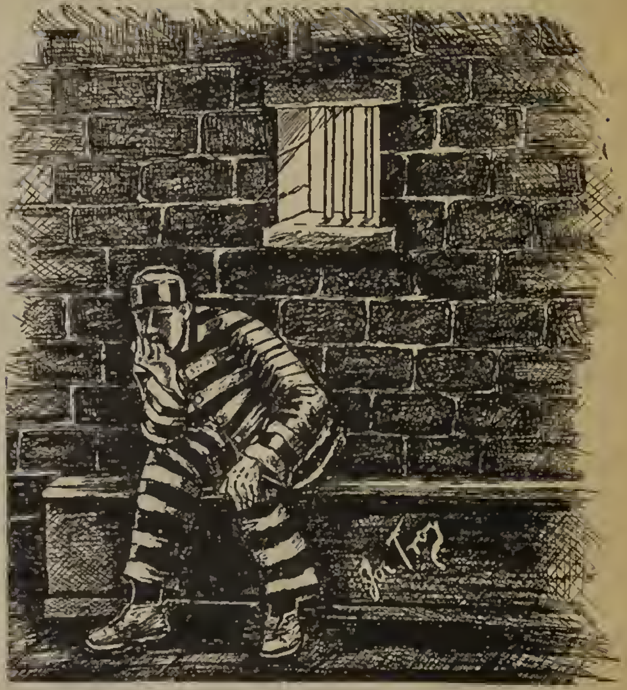
While some of you have stood close by and heard the moans and painful cry as the masters' tools and all their stools beat some of them up because they dared—the tales of exploitation to the world they bared.

Now, slave, do you ever stop to think that you might have been a potential fink as you sat on the fence with the unorganized mob, your only concern a menial job? You did not care if the hours were long, or how many workers you added to the unemployed throng.

Do you think it is right to speed up on the job while all around you—can't you hear the sob of destitute children or a workless working man?

It is up to you to do all you can, to organize yourself and your fellow man, in the ONE BIG UNION GRAND.

What Will Labor's Men In Jail Think This Christmas?



Christmas is celebrated in most prisons by having two meals instead of three. There is also an earlier lock-up, and the inmates have that many more hours with little to do except to contemplate what the outside world is doing.

In these prisons there are all manner of people—a regular cross-section of the outside world, except that the well-to-do are not there. Among these prisoners there is a sprinkling of men who are locked up for no other offense than that they did their utmost to make this a better world for all of us to live and work in. They are the Class War Prisoners of America. It is with them that the General Defense Committee is particularly concerned.

Some are young and some are old; some are famous and others unknown. There is Bart Dudek, for instance, in the State Penitentiary of Ohio. He is a young man, little known. Early one morning during an I.W.W. strike in Cleveland against the National Screw & Mfg. Co., he drove some of the girl strikers down to their picket line. On previous days these girls had been attacked by the plug-uglies hired to break the strike. So this time he had a revolver in his car. Police stopped the car, searched it, and that is why Bart Dudek will spend this Christmas—the fourth such Christmas for him—in the penitentiary. With him is Mike Lindway, another victim of the same strike, framed-up by the simple device of walking into his home without a search warrant and walking out again with some dynamite bombs and the story that they had found them in his cellar.

When the guards go their rounds this Christmas, and lock their charges up shortly after noon so that they themselves may go and make merry elsewhere, we want Bart Dudek and Mike Lindway in the "big house" at Columbus, and Jim McNamara and Warren K. Billings in Folsom, and Tom Mooney and Matt Schmidt in San Quentin, and all the other Class War Prisoners of America to know, when they contemplate what the outside world is doing, that they have friends on the outside who think well of them.

We want these men to know that their dependents also are not forgotten. When Mike Lindway thinks of his little girl this Christmas, we do not want him to have a picture of a sorry little waif who got no Christmas presents, and who is told by the neighbors that Santa doesn't come to her house because Mike is a "bad man," locked up in the penitentiary. We want Mike to know that little Mary Leona has her presents, that his wife is not in want, and that if the neighbors are curious enough they will find out that there are enough good people in America who are back of these Class War Prisoners and the ideals for which they suffer, to bring them these substantial tokens of friendship and good will.

Lindway's Chance for Freedom

The best thing that we can do for these men and their dependents is to get them out of jail. That of course is the chief concern of the General Defense Committee wherever it is possible. In the case of Mike Lindway in particular, we feel that it is possible, and that by fighting for his release we are erecting a safeguard against future frame-ups of a like nature. Without a search warrant or witnesses Kurt Gloeckner of the Cleveland police, bent on "getting" Mike, according to their own declaration, went into his home when he was away, and came out claiming to have discovered dynamite bombs in his cellar. Since it is possible to secure any desired evidence in such a way as this, the General Defense Attorney, Morris Wolf, moved to have the alleged evidence arrested. This was denied and a conviction obtained. The Court of Appeals agreed with us that such evidence was not admissible, but the Ohio Supreme Court set aside its own previous decisions as to the rules of evidence to keep Mike in jail.

We took the case to the Supreme Court of the United States but the "nine old men" said nothing. We took the case then to the Federal District Court, and we plan to take it, if necessary, back to the "nine old men" on a basis where they will have to say something—either that the rules of evidence must be changed to keep Mike Lindway in jail, or that Mike goes free. It has cost thousands of dollars to fight this case, and we expect to spend thousands more on it, for the security of every person whom powerful interests might seek to frame depends very largely on the ultimate decision in this case. If we have enough after such expenditures from our fund as our customary gifts of $25 to each prisoner in jail, and $50 to his wife, mother or other chief dependent and the various other gifts to other dependents, we will use it for the costs of this great legal battle.

Mike Lindway

The Harvest of Hate

But there are other casualties in the struggles of labor than men in jail. Sometimes the courts have ordered labor's spokesmen to be hanged. Sometimes instead of bothering with the courts, the great interests have their gunmen kill and cripple those who dare to strike.

Fifty years ago, on November 11, 1887, four advocates of the eight-hour day were hanged in Chicago for their participation in an orderly protest meeting at the old Haymarket. Last year when we sent our present to Lucy Parsons, the widow of one of these men, and the last living tie we of this age have with these men, she wrote back:

"I received your check for $50, and I thank you many, many times. You address me as 'Fellow Worker.' I am a 'Fellow,' but sad to say, not a 'worker,' for my life consists of yesterdays. I have only a few tomorrows left."

We who enjoy the shorter hours that these men gave their lives to win, should not let this sole surviving widow of that tragedy spend her few remaining "tomorrows" thinking the world has forgotten the good men who were hanged in 1887.

Paralyzed by a gunman's bullet in his spine, Dalton Gentry lies on a hospital bed in Orofino. He was one of the lumberjacks who struck in the summer of 1936 against the filthy camp conditions in the Idaho white pine belt. Who Will Make an End of War?

Labor Can Stop Capitalists Wars and Labor's Interests Demand That it Do So

By

Card No. x226183

Pacifists in theory are opposed to war under any circumstances. In practice they go to war or remain at home according to their individual desires or government edict.

Liberals are opposed to all wars excepting war for humanitarian purposes, such as making the world safe for democracy, or others with similar slogans.

The communists are opposed to war unless it benefits the diplomatic plans of the Soviet Union.

The capitalists favor war when their profits are preserved or increased thereby, at other times they are uninterested. Capitalists never go to war.

Governments merely reflect the capitalists' wishes in regard to wars and declare them when the capitalists bid them to do so.

Workers aren't supposed to have any views on wars either and, like the governments, are declared to be sitting in the game when the capitalists say so. Workers just do the fighting and leave the planning to others. "Theirs not to reason why; theirs but to do and die," says the poet.

And because up to now the workers have been content in the role of doing and dying, they are not taken into consideration when war and peace plans are made by the pacifists, the capitalists and their governments, the liberals and the communists. A case in point is the slogan, "Take the profits out of war."

The workers never make profits out of war anyhow, so their abolition wouldn't concern them. This concerns only the capitalists and those communists and liberals who have money invested in armament factories. And so with all plans in preparation for or against war. Workers are supposed merely to accept the outcome of the conniving of government diplomats acting for the capitalists.

The position of the U. S. government in regard to the Spanish situation is determined solely by American capitalists' investments, and the investors' sympathy for their brother investors in Spain. There isn't enough American capital at stake to declare active intervention on the side of the fascists but, nevertheless, the international brotherly spirit of capitalists imposes on the American capitalist, through the government, a position of neutrality that favors the fascists.

The liberals, though criticizing the neutrality act of the government, preferred the isolationist position until the Roosevelt speech suggesting the quarantine and "collective security." Since then the liberals have been devoted to justifying intervention. The liberals are like back-seat drivers, they will rant and rave about the way the ship of state is being driven but they will go along with it no matter where is goes.

The Slogans

In the event such collective action as suggested in the Roosevelt speech results in international warfare, the emotional and jingoistic slogans are already being prepared by the liberals. "If Japanese aggression—indeed fascist aggression in general— is to be stopped it will have to be by prompt collective action growing out of the nine-power conference of October 30." "The situation calls for strong and prompt action . . . the kind of action that will end the long successful game of bluff and bluster played by the fascist powers." (NATION, Oct. 23.) From these two quotations the slogan for another international war can be gleaned. It is going to be a "war against Fascism," or a war of "Democracy versus Fascism." In any event it will be a war that workers will have to fight, a war in which they will benefit no more than they did in the "War to end Wars."

One thing is interesting in this promoted war against fascism. To fight fascism in anoher country we will first install it here in America. According to the Industrial Mobilization Plan considered by Congress (reviewed in the INDUSTRIAL WORKER by Melvin Jackson in May and June, 1936) virtual fascism would be installed in the U. S. within twenty-four hours of the declaration of war. Just as we abolished all evidence of democracy to fight a "War for Democracy," just as we went to war to build peace, so it is proposed to install fascism in this country to endow the blessings of democracy on the "furriners."

The fascists will like it. The capitalists will like it because it will abolish all genuine labor unions and working class opposition. The government will agree with the capitalists, and the liberals with the government. The communists will consider it a victory for, having no democracy in the USSR. they wish to abolish it in other countries. And it is from the quarter that will benefit from fascism that we can expect the war fever to be stimulated.

Spasms like that in the NATION of October 23, "that we prefer support of a concrete program calling for collective economic assistance to the aggrieved nation and for embargoes against the aggressors" demonstrates the confusion of liberal opinion. Already the Neutrality Act, as administered toward Spain, has shown the one-sided purpose of government activities. The demand for the same sort of action toward the Sino-Japanese quarrel shows conclusively that liberals learn not one whit from experience.

Functions of Government

It is not embargoes or boycotts that are at fault. These are effective means. But the function of capitalist governments is to govern for the capitalists and to assist other governments in governing for the capitalists. To expect a capitalist government to administer boycotts and embargoes in favor of the working class is unreasonable.

If we want boycotts and embargoes to work for the benefit of the working class in other countries, then we, the working class, must administer them; and to do this we will have to use our own organization and not those of the employers.

The proposed boycott of oil to Japan by governments might work, and it might not. It depends on whether the governments want it to work. The patrol of Spanish waters by foreign governments worked in favor of the fascists. But if the workers on the oil tankers decide that oil is not going to Japan, whether or not an international boycott of governments has been imposed, oil is not going to Japan. And if the workers of the world decide that armaments are not going to be shipped to Franco, and they organize to this end, Franco isn't going to get any arms. If the workers of the world are determined not to buy Japanese goods then all government edicts in the world can't make them.

That workers will use direct action internationally regardless of the attitude of governments is not just a theory. It is a tendency that has been exhibited many times. When the government of England was going to ship armaments to the counter-revolutionists in Russia the workers said no. Armaments were not shipped. The I.W.W. longshoremen refused to load cargo for the same Russian counter-revolutionists.

Solidarity in Action

On September 11, 1936, at Philadelphia the Marine Transport Workers of the I.W.W. struck the United Fruit company S. S. "San Jose" because it carried dynamite which was to be re-shipped to the fascists in Spain from some South or Central American port. Members of the Sailors Union of the Pacific forced the "Admiral Nulton" to give up the loading of war gasoline. Unfortunately the I.S.U. seamen worked the ship that the I.W.W. members struck and the C.I.O. longshoremen loaded the war gasoline on foreign ships to be taken to the scene of war.

The boycott of Japanese goods shows how effective this action can be whether or not the government approves. Many other incidences could be mentioned of this kind of action during the Italian "civilization" of Ethiopia, but these few demonstrate that it can be done.

Direct action like this by workers is the most effective manner of stopping this country from getting tangled up in some foreign war and the best way to help our fellow workers in other countries. It is the best way to gain their respect and international support. And, last but not least, it is the best way for the working class organized in many different unions, to build up confidence in itself as a class.

Not one organization in America is strong enough today to carry out this program of direct action by itself. But all the labor unions have in one way or another proved that there is a militancy that can be directed into these direct action channels against war. Maybe they can be united in time to offset the confusion spread by the war mongers, liberals, and communists.

If the solidarity of labor can be practiced in time of war then it can be practiced in time of peace. The working class can control production and transportation to stop famine, unemployment and depressions. On the solidarity of labor depends all.

The Growth of Wage Slavery

By

JOHN SERSHON

Development of the Process of Wage Slave Exploitation from the Beginning of the Capitalist System.

The background for American Wage Slavery had its practical beginning several hundred years ago in England. It had its beginning with the advent of the factory, which in turn owed its origin to the invention of machinery, especially machinery for the weaving of woolen and cotton cloth.

Before the birth of the factory the work was performed in the home by the weaver on a hand loom. This manner of working in one's own home is now called the "domestic system." A later phase of the domestic system was the "putting-out system," by which a capitalist enterpriser put into the hands of cottage labor wool or cotton to be spun into yarn or woven into cloth by the various weavers' families who took the work.

The first real step in the direction of our present capitalism was when an enterpriser with capital set up a building of his own with improved machinery for the manufacture of yarn.

Weavers' communities would grow up around these factories, because the yarn made by the improved machines was cheaper to buy than to make by hand, and the weavers wanted to be near the source of supply.

Gradually with the appearance of new inventions all of the weavers' work was done in factories.

It was not until about 1830, however, that weaving machines seriously threatened the former hand looms.

The advance of the factory system and factory civilization, if it may be called that, is coincident with the advance of technology and machine invention.

The tempo of the industrial revolution, which usually is dated from 1750, was quickened immeasurably with the great textile inventions. Kay's fly-shuttle (hand weaving, 1773), Arkwright's roller spinning frame (1769), Hargreave's spinning jenny (pat. 1770), Crompton's loom (1779), Kelley's self-acting mule (1792), Cartwright's power loom (1785).

The invention of the steam engine by James Watt (1769) was an infusion of power which has carried over to the present day, although electric power in modern factories is more widely used. "It was first used in mining, but in 1785 it was applied to cotton spinning in some of the New Nottinghamshire factories and after that its use was extended so rapidly that King Wool was dethroned by King Cotton."

Not only was the textile industry revolutionized but also the mining and iron industries. Steam engines were used in the mines for pumping water, sinking shafts, hauling up coal and ore, and in other ways.

Such new methods and inventions as the system of steam blasts discovered in 1788, and Nelson's hot-air blast (1829) plus the huge demand for iron for new machinery, and for coal in smelting, was responsible for the great development of mining and iron manufacture. Bessemer's cheaper process for making steel came into use in 1866. The advance of transportation during this period was accelerated tremendously by the invention of the steam blast and the locomotive. New inventions of farm machinery brought about an agricultural revolution along with the industrial revolution. From these inventions and conditions there grew the system of economic production and social control that we call capitalism.

Workers Resist Wage Slavery

One of the characteristics of the new social order was the transformation of relatively free workmen to wage slaves. For at the very time that the worker abandoned his tools and his home as a please of work, selling his labor power to the enterpriser who now furnished the machinery and workplace (factory), he became a wage slave entirely dependent upon the master for his economic well-being.

"The aggregation of workers (in the factory) created new problems of discipline. When work was done in the household no regularity of hours was necessary. The craft worker enjoyed considerably freedom as to the manner and time of doing such work as was necessary for his support. Even when the 'putting-out' system had become elaborately organized it was not possible to exert much pressure on workers as to the time of finishing the work allotted to them.

"The aggregation of workers in factories made it possible to improve the timing of the productive process, the work could be made to flow along without interruptions; no groups of workers were obliged to wait for the group engaged on the earlier stages of the work. The division of labor that existed under the 'putting-out' system could thus be more effectively carried out, but on one condition—the subjection of the whole body of workmen to a systematic schedule."

The cottage weavers with their hand looms and personal job control were the envy of all the working class neighbors who did other work. "With all its usual distress and degradation, the trade of single hand weaving (requiring a minimum of strength and skill) offers half the liberty of savage life for which the uninstructed man is almost tempted to sacrifice half the enjoyments of the civilized. Thus, there is a well known feeling among farm laborers, the bricklayers and other ordinary artisans in this district, that it is very hard on them to be turned out at early hours every day instead of being able to take whatever hours they please, like the ribbon weaver, and like him, take Saint Monday and Saint Tuesday too, if they choose.

"Precisely the counterpart of these feelings is also found in the other sex. Notwithstanding the wretched state at which, until recently, the trade had been, it was impossible for respectable families to procure domestic servants. There is the greatest difficulty in prevailing upon parents to let their children come to service. The young women looked down with scorn upon it, and preferred the liberty of the Monday and Saturday, the exemption from confinement, and the little finery, with the liberty to wear it which the loom furnished them."

The supervision of every detail of the work, without any change in the general character of the wage contract by the capitalist employer, gave him authority over the workmen which was deeply resented. This resentfulness on the part of the new wage workers (now slaves) is given as a possible cause for the slow development of the factory system. "The great attraction of hand loom weaving was the degree of freedom enjoyed, the weavers refusing to leave their cottages for the factories even when the factory offered higher wages."

It was the efficiency of the factory machine which "ultimately forced the workmen to accept the discipline of the factory. As long as there was some measure of freedom of choice between cottage and factory the workmen preferred the cottage."

Neither riots nor machine-wrecking could prevent the fulfillment of the Industrial Revolution. It has continued its course to the present day.

Division of Labor Efficiency

One of the most striking features of industrialization was the increased use which was made of what is termed division of labor. With division of labor a workman made no complete article as before, but only one part of the whole product. In the manufacture of shoes, for instance, one man cut the leather, another sewed a part of the leather, another put on the soles, etc. The proficiency gained in repetitive tasks, coupled with the added use of machinery, increased the total output of goods to a degree never known before.

However, though the hours of labor were long and the discipline, as noted before, had its inception when the factory system came into being, not until recent times was there any completely scientific system for the performing of labor tasks.

Frederick W. Taylor as far back as 1895 was introducing scientific ways for causing the worker to increase his labor productivity. His two books, "The Principles of Scientific Management" and "Shop Management" laid down his theories of industrial management. There was a flare af public interest in Taylor's ideas about work in 1911 and 1912 but this interest soon petered out.

During the war the need for greater output for the murder of foreign workers revived interest in Taylor's principles in every country in the world. A conspicuous example was France, where Premier Georges Clemenceau early in 1918 called on the heads of all military establishments to study and to apply the methods of scientific management. Even in Bolshevik Russia in April 1918, Premier Lenin declared, "We must introduce . . . the study and teaching of the new Taylor system and its systematic trial and adaptation."

By invoking the patriotism of the men, the speed-up system was fastened upon the working class of the world with a vengeance. When the war was over the great task of repairing the damage wrought by four years of destruction was used as the basis for the continued use of scientific management.

How this work has been carried on until today is current knowledge. For those whose knowledge of scientific management is incomplete, however, let us review some of the outstanding features.

More Work Per Man

Scientific management, as the name implies, refers to the scientific methods used in running an industry, as opposed to industries run by casual or traditional methods of trial and error. Scientific management involves a minute appraisal of all of the elements having to do with the productive process. Workers and machine precesses, materials and tools, and equipment are all thoroughly scrutinized with the expressed object of exacting the greatest possible amount of wealth from the capital invested in a given industry.

"Labor control periodically furnishes the facts which govern the settling of base wage rates. In order to carry maximum net profits, a business must pay the least amount in wages and welfare work which will secure loyalty and satisfaction sufficient to result in continuous quality and quantity production."

Time saving is the mainstay of scientific management and to that end machines are made faster and more efficient; workers are regimented and reduced to the ignominy of a number and are speeded up in their work with mathematical precision that is diabolical. The strain of doing a single repetitive task in one rigidly specified way thousands of times in a day, and day after day is a monotony that is almost unendurable.

Scientific management is best divided into two elements, the element of "motion study" and the element of "time study."

"Motion study is concerned with the layout of the plant, the department, and the work place, and with methods or motion sequences employed by the workers. Motion study endeavors to establish the best way to do the work and to train the workers to do it that way . . . Time study is concerned primarily in establishing the correct or standard time for performing an operation according to the method determined upon. Each operation is broken down into its elements; each element represents a distinct series of motions of the worker covering a short interval of time convenient for study. A sufficient number of stop watch readings are taken of each element on different workers to be assured that the correct time for doing that element has been determined void of all unnecessary 'delays' and 'coasting.' All readings are 'speed rated' so that variations in the speed will be properly compensated for in the establishment of the final standards."

In studying the motions made by a worker in performing an operation a motion picture camera is sometimes used to determine the exact motions to be used in doing a particular task. The result is called a micro-motion study and after the right motions have been selected, the time for doing the work is divided into seconds, hours, etc., for the necessary fulfillment. Or as they are sometimes termed, "man minutes," hours, etc.

The very energy of the worker is also sounded in this way and by a process sometimes called the "survival of the fittest," after Herbert Spencer, only the strongest and the swiftest are hired by the capitalist masters as factory fodder.

"All possible motions performed by any worker are resolved into seventeen types or classes. For example, to reach for an article and place it closer to you would consist of four motions, namely, transport empty, grasp, transport loaded, and release.

"Graphic symbols and charts are used for designating the major steps taken and for tracing the flow of materials and man; also for recording the path of travel or motion sequence of right and left hand of each worker. These symbols and charts are then studied with a view to determining which major steps and which motions can be shortened or entirely eliminated.

"Revised charts are then prepared based on the proposed layout and methods. Unnecessary travel is eliminated, distances are shortened, production lines are straightened out, machines, tools and materials are brought nearer to workers, surplus motion and often entire operations are removed, two hands are made productive instead of one and material is conveyed by gravity, instead of by hand from one operation to another."

Incentives

In order to bring about the cooperation of the worker "in striving to reach or better the task time" two incentives are made use of, "the financial and the non-financial."

The financial incentive for practical considerations dictate that the incentive for industrial workers should take the form of bonus or premium based on the worker's regular rate of pay, whether this be computed by the day or by the piece.

Needless to say if the wage rate is "too high" the employer will see to it that there is an immediate reduction. "Unduly high wages have repeatedly demonstrated a tendency to make many workers irregular in their attendance and, frequently, more or less shiftless, extravagant, and sometimes dissipated. Men tend to become more thrifty when they receive such proper recompense for their effective days work, live rather better, save money, and work more steadily. In short, they more fully realize the value of money."

There are a number of piece rate systems based on time study and "recompensed" by financial incentives. All of them follow or are later adaptations of the original Taylor method. Some of these systems are the Henry L. Gantt plan, F. A. Halsey plan, the James Rowan (Glascow Scot) plan, the Carl G. Barth premium plan, the Charles E. Bedaux "stretch-out" plan.

The Bedaux system of B units is "a system of wage payment in which work is subdivided into units equivalent to the number of minutes that a task should take and the payment of the worker on the basis of the number of points of work accomplished in a given length of time."

The B. F. Goodrich Rubber Co. makes use of the Bedaux plan and Bedaux claims that more than 1,000 plants in some twenty-two countries, involving more than one million men are now using his system. Foremen under the Bedaux system receive a bonus for speeding up the workers under them.

Some of the qualities of a "good" foreman are, "1. The forman shall know all about the work which is done in his department. 2. That he be a good disciplinarian. 3. That he shall have the ability to crowd work through and get it out quickly." In short, the Bedaux and similar systems are a means of speeding up production without the use of greater man power.

The non-financial incentive is the manner of inculcating the workers with the idea that they can promote themselves to better positions by working harder, improving the quality of their work, by bringing out a pride in good workmanship, etc. Countless books of a psychological nature have been written for this purpose.

Labor saving machinery and scientific management are responsible along with the profit system for the great number of unemployed in capitalist countries today. This combination is also responsible for the degredation and robot like miseries of the working class.

A social scheme which places machines and profit making before the life values of human beings should be destroyed. Not destroyed in the sense of destroying factories or breaking machinery but by adopting the philosophers' dream of making the machine the slave of men a reality. The machine and machine civilization made use of in the right way would give to humanity an abundance of the necessities of life with an amount of leisure which is almost startling to contemplate. To do this we must be prepared to "take over the machinery of production and abolish the wage system." Only industrial organization can accomplish this satisfactorily, and only the Industrial Workers of the World (I.W.W.) is equal to the task.

The C. I. O. in Lawrence

By

A Lawrence Worker

Without Opposition from Employer or Police the Almost Indifferent Employes of the World's Largest Woolen Mill are Organized in a Lewis Union. "No spontaneous Striking," was the Organizers' Most Effective Argument.

In Lawrence, on September 15, some 9,000 employes of the American Woolen Company's Wood mill, world's largest woolen and worsted mill, voted on whether C.I.O.'s textile workers organizing committee shall represent them in collective bargaining.

The following day, 2,000 employes of the company's Ayer mill voted on the same question.

The two-day election was the largest yet conducted in New England by the National Labor Relations board. Of the 11,000 workers in the two mills, about 6,500 voted for the C.I.O., 3,500 voted against, and 2,000 did not vote. This gave the C.I.O. a majority and the power to represent workers of these two mills.

Outside of Lawrence, very little is known of the real situation in Lawrence and how this election was brought about. The following report will throw some light on the methods used by the C.I.O. to try to get control in the textile industry.

At the time of the vote of the Wood and Ayer mills the C.I.O. did not have one hundred paid up members in these two mills.

For months the Lawrence committee for Industrial organization with the help of Boston volunteers, had canvassed the workers' homes, and had asked the workers to sign pledge cards. The pledge was that in case sixty percent or more of the workers wanted the C.I.O. they would join the C.I.O., and only when they had 60 percent of the workers pledged, would the C.I.O. leaders approach the mill officials on the vote question.

Friendly Police

There has been hardly any interference by the police with the C.I.O. activities in Lawrence. In fact, most everything they asked for was granted, such as permit to pass out leaflets, etc.

In past attempts by other organizations to organize the workers they have always been met by vicious opposition by the police. The present attitude of the police is in part attributed to the open policy of the C.I.O. of being opposed to spontaneous strikes. They have often said in their mass meetings and also membership meetings that in as much as when a strike is on, before settling said strike the workers have to sit in conference with the representatives of the employers, they might just as well mediate first, and if nothing can be gained peacefully, then declare a strike.

Afraid of Strikes

These words had a deep effect on the workers as well as on the police and chamber of commerce, etc. The Lawrence workers are afraid of strikes. This cannot be blamed on the C.I.O., but on former strikes where most always the workers gained a raise in wages, but got more speed-up along with the raise, and the most militant strikers were done away with after a short time, if not right after the strike. Of course if the workers had got a strong union, no active member could have been laid off for his or her activities, but Lawrence never got a strong union after a strike was settled.

They have always joined the union by the thousands in time of trouble (most of them with the prospect of getting something for nothing), but after the strike, when called upon to pay, their dues, there was nothing doing. One of the old timers said:

"I have been assigned to do such work more than once after a strike, and of all the new members I visited, not two percent would pay dues; and the old members would pay providing we went to their homes to collect, but very few of them were willing to come to meetings. This is bad and makes it very hard to organize the Lawrence workers. And today under the C.I.O. it is not much better. A little new blood has been injected into the union, but by far too little of it.

"I was present when they selected the Wood and Ayer weave room representatives (shop committees) and in fairness to the C.I.O. organizers, I must admit that they gave the workers full power to select their representatives. Only, all the old-timers declined. Most of the weave shop committee are French Canadian with one Belgian and one German. A good representative group, but all new blood and somewhat green. To qualify to vote, or for shop committee member, you must have received 12 pays in a current year. I've only worked six weeks in 13 months, so I couldn't qualify in any mill."

Too Much Speed

The main grievance everywhere is too much speed-up. For the weave room, the workers seem to agree on four magazine looms per weaver instead of six. But right here is a source of trouble. Nobody wants to accept a cut in pay and it is a general belief that if the Wood and Ayer mill weavers want to get 4 looms, they will have to accept a cut in pay.

Again a Lawrence worker speaking: "I have worked in plenty of woolen and worsted mills in New England. I know the kind of cloth they weave in the many mills, how many looms they run and also the average pay. Compare first, the Lorraine Mill in Pawtucket, R. I., with the Wood mill. In the Lorraine they run six fancy worsted looms for about $30 for 40 hours. In the Wood mill there are four different kinds of automatics. There are the 2-shuttle Drapers, the Baker loom for three-shuttle work, the old magazine loom and transformed Knowles and then the new automatic speed loom. All with the same price list.

"The two-shuttle Drapers and the Baker looms cannot run fancy filling and fancy filling pays 10 percent up to three kinds, if you have 3 kinds of filling that means 20 percent extra. For colors in the warp 5 percent for each fancy, and as they make a lot of fancy worsteds on the magazines 4 kinds of yarn means 20 percent for the filling and 15 percent for the warp, that means that often a weaver on magazines get 36 percent above the price list.

"Now, good weaver's pay for the Draper and Baker looms is around 40 dollars, let us say $38, on the magazine looms $40 or better and the speed looms $50 and up. Of course, with business slack, small warps, waiting, and short time these pays look pretty sick some times. But that is a general condition.

"But do you think that the Wood and Ayer mill weavers will succeed in getting 4 looms with a proportional raise in pay when elsewhere they run six looms for less pay than a Lawrence worker could make on four looms with the present price list?"

Starvation Wages In Many Mills

The above does not apply to all of the Lawrence mills. For instance, the Lawrence Woolen Mill and all of the three small worsted mills in Methuen are paying starvation wages and those are the mills where the union can get but few members.

Then there are the Arlington and the Pacific Mills, two large companies. It is said that the C.I.O. feels almost safe in taking a vote in the Arlington mill.

But the Pacific mill is a harder nut to crack. They investigate every worker's record before giving him a job. You must apply at the employment office on a certain day (on Thursday). There they ask you every question they can think of. Then they send you home with the promise of sending for you when they need you.

Again quoting a Lawrence worker: "I put in my application a very long time ago, but never heard from them since. One is warned when filing his application not to repeat (that is, not to come again unless sent for); because if one does repeat the big shot in charge is going to make it very unpleasant for repeaters when discovered.

"I hear that the Wood and Ayer mill officials are absolutely reluctant to discuss the 4-loom plan and they name mills where workers are running 8 looms. But I believe that it is because they fear that the workers will demand a raise in pay; but for me, 4 looms first, the question of pay I am willing to let that wait for a while. This may sound yellow, but I am very sick of the 6 looms. It is too much for me anyway.

"The New Deal has not been put into effect enough for me to notice it here. If dividing up the work were tried it might not hurt us so much after all, as I know plenty workers who have not

Poor Henry Ford! The Bad Capitalist Did Him Dirt

By JUSTUS EBERT

Upton Sinclair's latest novel, "The Flivver King" is well named. It is all about Henry Ford and how he got that auto-monarchical way. Incidentally, it brings in three generations of Ford workers, through whose eyes much of Fordism is seen and described; especially with regard to its effects upon Ford employes.

In many respects, because of its cronological description of modern capitalism, together with its latter day effects upon the Ford workers, the city of Detroit, and American society in general, "The Flivver King" is a story well told. But otherwise it is apt to prove pernicious, as the tale of a mechanic-inventor idealist gone wrong, that is, as the tale of a superman who passed from an early phase of humanitarianism to a later phase of hard-boiled gangster, nazified capitalism; thanks to the bad capitalism about him.

In other words, "The Flivver King" is, in a sense, a lousy story, because it is the great man theory all over again. This, too, in a day when the tendency towards collectivism is being recognized on all sides, even by men who were never sicialists like Upton Sinclair.

Unsound Theory

Henry Ford, according to "Flivver King," was originally a noble character whom environment changed into a decidedly ignoble one. Poor Henry Ford! Capitalists and capitalism did him dirt to the extent of a billion dollars and a philosophy of futility and defeatism, not omitting his final dependence on a strong arm squad and Hitlerism. It's terrible, if true.

In these days when workers, even alleged socialists and communists, are electing good men to office, a la Roosevelt and LaGuardia, it will serve the purposes of pseudo-industrial unionism well to depict the good capitalists versus the bad ones (curses on the villains!) and to influence the organization of labor accordingly. However, it is a wholly erroneous and unsound procedure.

Thus it comes about that as a picture of "Ford-America," Sinclair's novel is disappointing. It is more biographical than fictional. It is also an over-simplification; an attempt to segregate Fordism, as it were, from capitalism, except as it is affected by the latter. Fordism is not described as a phase of capitalist industrial evolution, but as something growing up in the midst of it in a sort of primitive, pristine beauty, only to be badly affected by it.

Weak in Industrial Facts

There is no attempt to depict the evolution of the motor car and the motor car industry as a whole. The aim of the novel, perhaps unwittingly, is to make Ford at once its able hero and its great moral; the latter being, "don't 'make' a billion, lest you lose your original character." Another version of "What profit a man if he gain a whole world and lose his own soul."

So, apparently, there was no machine age before Ford. Nor was there any vertical industrial development before him. Nor were there any other men trying to invent autos (some of whom threatened Henry with infringement litigation, not mentioned by Sinclair)—Ford is the wonder worker of it all. Listen to this, for instance: Ford has to abandon his original model car; his competitors are pushing down his sales. So here is what happens according to Sinclair (page 69):

"A stupendous task confronted the Flivver King. Most of his forty-five thousand machines would turn out one thing and nothing else, and would have to be remodelled or else scrapped. Before any car part could be stamped, new dies would have to be cut, and there were more than 5,000 parts. There would have to be a complete shut-down, except for the making of new parts for the old cars, which would continue at Highland Park. "Henry (mark this) would create a whole new industry at the River Rouge plant, with a million and a half feet of new floor space." (Our emphasis.)

Here we have Henry as the creator of "a whole new industry!" Of course, this is twaddle. Henry was nothing of the kind. His dunderhead, non-creative salesmen had warned him long before the event that the change in models would have to happen! And his equally non-creative, stupid, thousands of laboratory workers, top-notch executives, skilled die and tool makers, and unskilled laborers evolved those 45,000 new machines and put them in operation—all in five month's time.

The Cart Before the Horse

In other words, Upton Sinclair is guilty of failure to point out the collective, cooperative, social labor which makes the Fords possible, and not vice-versa. He makes society dependent on the Fords, instead of the other way around. It's a crime against society that should be left to the bourgeois exalters of "great men." It's no job for a socialist like Upton Sinclair. That is, provided he knows what his socialism is all about.

However, read "The Flivver King." Its working class characters are well drawn. You'll pity Abner Shutt, and realize that the working class is full of his likes. After which you'll understand the working class as a whole better. Then there's his son, Tom, the very antithesis of old man Abner. A bright boy who goes through high school and college, only to become a Ford worker and then a union organizer. Our heart goes out to Tom, though we don't think it necessary for union organizers to be college bred. We've met many who only went to college to lecture about the labor movement to the collegians. Never mind, Tom is the calibre of man who is going to help the workers to victory.

"The Flivver King" is not very dramatic. But the march of the unemployed Ford workers to Dearborn and the murder of Tom by Ford thugs thrilled us and left us more determined than ever to work for the overthrow, not only of the Flivver King, but all of the other crowned heads of capitalism made possible by the exploitation of the cooperative, social labor of the workers whether in River Rouge or elsewhere.

The Story of Haymarket

Labor Agitator: The Story of Albert R. Parsons by Allen Calmer, International Publishers. Paper cover 35 cents.

It's a well told story of an American labor agitator with a long line of American ancestors who, after years of fighting to make America a better place to live in, died on the gallows, November 11, 1887, one of the immortal five murdered after the Haymarket affair of the preceding year to punish labor for daring to challenge the right of the money masters to do as they please with their wage slaves.

Mr. Calmer's book is short, 126 pages, and as he sets out to give a complete biography of Parsons beginning with his pilgrim father ancestors in Massachusetts, it is somewhat lacking in important historical detail. One might almost get the impression that the labor movement of those interesting years when the first big railroad strikes took place and when the 8-hour day movement was launched, existed exclusively in mass demonstrations and soap-box meetings. We are given little or no information about the forces at work in homes, factories, and union meetings that brought the workers out to public gatherings where the spell-binders such as Parsons and Spies could get at them.

On the other hand we are given a good deal of useful information about the workers' political movements of the time and about the anarchists. This, of course, is as it should be because Parsons was, during a number of his active years, a believer in political action as a means to achieve the emancipation of the working class, a belief which he later gave up.

It is in the discussion of Parsons' anarchist leanings that the biographer ventures a criticism which will not be altogether to the liking of most of those people who feel themselves, with justice, to be most closely related ideologically to the Haymarket martyrs.

Mr. Chalmer says (page 71) of Parsons' idea of the state: "He had never read Marx's and Engles' writings on the state (most of them were, of course completely inacessible to him) which pointed out that the workers must use forms of organized force, including the state, for purpose of crushing the resistance the bourgeoisie even after the masses have won power; that, while the capitalist state must be smashed, the workers have to put in its place a 'revolutionary and transitional form'—the dictatorship of the proletariat—which would pave the way for a classless society in which the proletarian stateform would 'wither away'."

Now there are many, including some who have read Marx, who believe that Parsons was right in thinking as he did that the state-form could well be dispensed with after capitalism has been overthrown. However, the quotation above seems to be the only place where the writer gives evidence of having attended that cock-sure school where everything is proved conclusively by selected passages from Marx and Lenin.

The author does a lot to clarify certain points that trouble some students who are inclined to believe in the peaceable intentions and actions of the Haymarket martyrs, but who are worried about the violent language they sometimes used. He explains, for instance, the circumstance under which the famous "Revenge" leaflet was composed and what Spies really intended when under terrific strain and excitement following the brutal assault of police on the McCormick strikers' meeting, he gave instructions to the printer. He points out that the possession of arms and drilling with arms by private groups was at that time still legal. Lacking this bit of information many a reader of labor history is apt to jump to the conclusion that workers groups that drilled with guns were outlaws.

He reminds us that these famous men, Parsons and the others, were real revolutionaries who had faith in the work they were doing, so much so that they expected that the revolution was right around the corner. And we get a fair picture, too, of that other class that trys hard to "do something for humanity"—the liberals, those good people who never know what is going on until it is too late to do much more than put a wreath on the monuments of the victims.

There is no need here to repeat the story of the Haymarket case. The fiftieth anniversary of the martyrdom of Spies, Parsons, Lingg, Fischer, and Engel has just passed and we have all heard the account of those stirring times again and again.

But we gladly recommend "Labor Agitator" and trust that many thousands will read it and pass it on.—C. K.

ly won on the west coast. Company gunmen, hiding in ambush, shot at him and other pickets with dum-dum bullets. One of these, Mike Stetz, is dead. James Whalen, chairman of the General Organization Committee of the Lumber Workers' Industrial Union No. 120 of the I.W.W. that conducted the strike, writes of young Gentry:

> "Paralyzed from the waist down for more than a year, there is little or no change in his condition since the time he was shot. The doctors at this hospital hold little hope for his ever regaining the use of his lower organs, and are doubtful that he will live for a length of time. We are faced with the problem of either exhausting the means of medical science by putting him under the care of a specialist with the possibility of him regaining the use of his body or taking care of him while he is in this sad condition until his strength and spirit leaves him. Frankly, the latter is more than a possibility in the near future. Meanwhile the boy wishes, and so do his folks, to be moved to a hospital near his home in Louisiana where his people can visit him.
> "Once we take him from the Orofino hospital we will have the responsibility of assuring him care. This means that an attendant must be with him during his trip to another hospital."

Will You Help?

To get young Gentry home, taking proper care of him, we are told will cost at least a thousand dollars; but it is much better to do what we can now than to send wreaths and sympathy later.

Such in general are the circumstances we have in mind when we ask our friends, new and old, to contribute once again to the Class War Prisoners' Christmas Fund. It is twenty-one years now since the General Defense Committee was organized. In that time we have defended thousands of workers and secured freedom for most of them; but the casualties of the class struggle accumulate, and the rulers of industry remain as vindictive as ever, their power to frame and imprison abridged some little bit by the decisions that this Committee has from time to time wrested from the courts.

This year we need funds as much as ever to accomplish the purposes of the Class War Prisoners' Christmas fund, so we hope you will respond to this appeal with a generosity that will warm your own heart when you stop to think this Christmas about the good men who are locked up extra early in order that more of the guards may get off to make merry elsewhere. We would like our gifts to reach them well before Christmas, so please send your contribution in plenty of time to lost many days work while some workers have done very little work since last March. I suppose if they made them all feel the pinch of hunger, they would be more ready to kick together."

Negotiations But No Action

To briefly sum up the situation in Lawrence. The workers have gained nothing since voting to be represented by the C.I.O. on September 15th. The C.I.O. is still negotiating, but nothing has been achieved to date. Very few members are paying their dues. The officials have said openly that they would collect no dues until they have gained something for the workers. (That I believe was a very bad slip on their part.) The C.I.O. officials are still running the union, the workers do not seem to want to run it, they would rather let George do it. The leaders are calling their members to meetings and are trying to induce local workers to take an active part in their union. The workers of Lawrence will get what they are willing to fight for and nothing more.

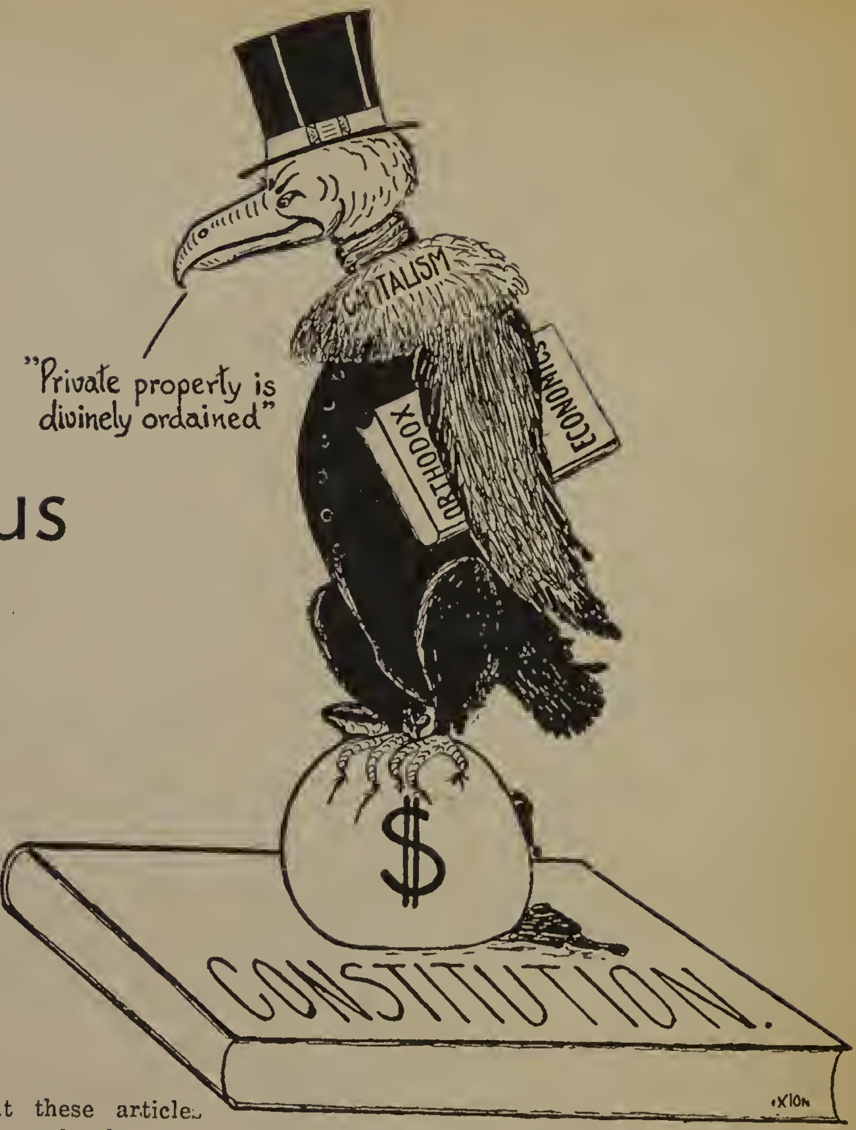
As we go to press we have word that young Dalton Gentry is on his way home to Louisiana.

The Modern Stegosaurus

Defender of Private Property

By

A. B. COBB



A correspondent complains that these articles have been too hard on the educators who, he says, "are sincere people; and home, press, and radio are each partly responsible for the miseducation of the young."

As to sincerity, the fox is as sincere as the hen, and the more sincere he is the harder it will be for the chicken. People who know Hitler assure us that he is well meaning. You can see that Mussolini is sincere by the way he sticks out his chin; and the odor of sincerity around Uncle Joe Stalin is as strong as the smoke from his pipe. We may conclude from these instances that individuals are to be judged not alone by their estimates of themselves but also by their effect upon others.

Moreover, it is not the individual educator who concerns us but the effect of the institution as a whole. And after making all due allowances for the evils that flow from other groups, it is only fair and just to hold the school system to be Public Enemy No. 1. They pick on the child in his formative years, full of life, hope, and ambition. They turn him lose in the world helpless, hopeless, and demoralized.

In the primary grades he is taught the three "Rs"; without that for a foundation civilization itself becomes impossible. But the vital facts about himself and the institutions that control him, these things he must learn elsewhere. In the secondary schools and in the universities he is introduced to literature, history and the sciences. But at all times the most important truths are held back. The scientific method is subordinated to the authoritariand method; nowhere will he find a consistent effort to apply scientific methods to social questions. When he has swallowed the whole works the most that can be said of him is that he is a Master of Alliteration, Distraction, Uglification, and Illusion. (Apologies to Lewis Carroll). The more seriously he takes what he has been taught, the more confused he will be and the more damage he will do.

For we have arrived at an era of change; new forces are at work in the world and the old authorities cannot help. To quote Marx and Engels:

"Uninterrupted disturbance of all social conditions, everlasting uncertainty and agitation distinguish our epoch from all earlier ones. All fixed, fast-frozen relations, with their train of ancient and venerable prejudices and opinions, are swept away, all new-formed ones become antequated before they can ossify. All that is solid melts into the air, all that is holy is profaned, and man is at last compelled to face with sober senses, his real conditions of life and his relations with his kind."

In such a situation the university man, whether graduate or instructor, is not only useless, he is an incumbrance and a nuisance.

Other Institutions

Ever since the adoption of the American Constitution we have been assured by men in high places that it stood as a general guarantee of freedom, that we have a system of government by checks and balances so well devised that tyranny can never raise its ugly head. Much has been made of the phrase in the preamble (to the U. S. Constitution) about "general welfare"; those voices are muffled that tell that back of all government, including ours, stands the right of private property, and that the term "general welfare" is merely a sarcasm.

The much advertised division of the government into three departments as checks upon each other has resolved into three wings of an army enrolled solely for the defense of privilege for the few, each sharing in the spoils and the guilt while trying at all times to shift the blame onto the other. Against such a combination the unorganized public hasn't a Chinaman's chance. If, against this unholy trinity, grown men have no show, what hope is there for the young?

Long before the child is brought into direct contact with the political state he feels the influence of other equally baneful institutions, church, school and press. Even at his mother's knee he is apt to fall under the witchery of the fables, traditions and prejudices handed down from the ignorant and credulous ages of the past. If he falls under the influence of the church he is scientifically humbugged, drilled to have faith, respect, confidence, in every one and in every institution, but none in himself. He must obey his superiors without fail and if he doubts he must never admit it.

If by some miracle he escapes the sway of tradition and religion, another, more powerful institution besets his way. Like all other such institutions the school appears as the benefactor of childhood, a bringer of wisdom and a guide to character. In reality it is a "whited sepulcher" in which to bury genius. New pharisees conjure up new phantoms. Long before he knows how abstract ideas are formed he is pestered by such weasel words as patriotism, heroism, liberty, truth, justice, and freedom. Here too he is taught to venerate the men and institutions that, like Jacob of old, rob their own brothers of their birthright. In the lower schools they hide from him his origin, evolution, and destiny; even in the university they will not expose the origin, purpose, and nature of the institutions that stand between him and the things he needs. The power of the press has been overrated; the church has long been in decline; in the more advanced countries the school remains the principal instrument for decieving humanity in a world of make-believe. No other tool has exerted so much power for evil and still retained a reputation as a benefactor. If the lost generation expects guidance from our educators it is sure "out of luck."

An Illustration

The value of the opinions of educators on social questions was demonstrated not long ago when President Roosevelt sent letters to about one hundred institutions of higher learning asking suggestions as to how to cushion the shock when some new invention displaces large numbers of laborers. So far but one answer has made the headlines. That one suggested a remedy neither new nor humane. The problem of over-population was referred to the medical profession. It was proposed that in the future doctors dispose of all persons found unfit, crippled, or useless.

Now if this reply had come from the Dog House —Maine and New Hampshire—it might have been taken as a personal reflection upon the president himself, since he suffers from the effects of infantile paralysis. But no, this answer came from the good democratic State of Georgia, from the Georgia Technical Institute. When the mechanical cotton picker gets going, the poor whites and blacks of Georgia will be just so many useless mouths to feed. Someone suggested feeding them to the hogs, but hog raising is no longer profitable. Why not call on the great engineer, Hoover? He is well educated and a good Christian to boot.

For more than a hundred years the ablest men in every line of thought have insisted that the application of scientific method to the various branches of knowledge is essential to progress and that theological or authoritarian method is the worst possible impediment. These men have shown that science has been a menial, a scullion in the house of knowledge.

As a result the modern university is much like the extinct monster, stegosaurus, said by authorities to have had a brain in its tail larger than the one in its head. As long as our schools subordinate scientific method to theological or hind-brain method, education is bound to be a failure. And as to those who insist on the present program or on returning to the past for guide posts, we are willing to grant their sincerity but must question their sanity. We should quit calling our professors such pet names as Prof., Prexy, and Puff-Ball. It would be more in line with their intelligence and dignity to say Honorable Stegosaurus or Big Chief Brain-in-the-Tail.

Education and "Humanistic" Approach

By

CHAS. J. MILLER

The question of education is rapidly taking a more important place in the capitalistic scheme of things.

By this I do not mean only in the sense of bribery of educational authorities to carry on intensified propaganda for the benefit of certain corporation interests, but in the broader sense of the whole educational policy.

In recent years education has become an ever increasing topic for discussion among the educators and those that control the educational institutions. Ever increasing in number and variety of conferences and meetings to discuss with, and instruct the educators what to teach and what methods to employ.

The question of general education has never in all history been as vital to the master class as it is at the present time.

In the past systems of society it was not a question of how to educate the slave class, but how to keep them in ignorance. Both the chattel slave and the serf were kept in ignorance, first, because education was not necessary in their performance of their work, second, educating the slaves or serfs would have been dangerous to the master class.

But with the coming of the capitalist system of production, with the introduction of power, machinery and the factory system based on wage labor, with the development of the machine age, it became ever more necessary to educate the workers so that they could carry on production with increasing efficiency. Out of the ranks of workers it was necessary to develop highly efficient engineers, technicians, chemists, mechanics, managers, superintendents, selling agents, and specialists in the various processes of industry. From top to bottom higher education was necessary to keep this complicated system of industry functioning.

And so the question of how to educate the slave class to run this complicated system, and at the same time keep them in ignorance of the slave character of their standing in society and of the method by which they are kept in slavery, became one of the hardest problems of the master class. And now, with the system cracking, crumbling and decaying, this question of education is becoming still more difficult to handle.

With millions of working class youths unable to get jobs, continuing their education into high school and some getting into college, the question of how to keep up the delusion of democracy and still keep the basic economic truths from the workers has become a gigantic task.

Among the defenders of the Democracies the most common solution of our social ills come under the head of humanism. Educators, preachers, reform speakers, liberals; in round table discussions, in forums where the speakers do all the talking, this subject of humanism is prevalent.

The popularity of "Humanistic" theory among these speakers is at least in part because it is a safe subject to talk on. Humanism deals with individuals through all strata of society. It does not recognize a class division in society that is far greater and more important than the individual. It does not recognize that the class character of society is so basic that, while we are all members of the human race, the two classes are as far apart in life as the whale and the small fish that enter the whale's mouth.

A Dizzy Doctor

Dr. Henry M. Wriston, the new president of Brown University, speaking before the annual convention of the New England Association of School Superintendents at the Statler Hotel in Boston on November 5th delivered a caustic attack on the current emphasis on the theory that economic factors determine every phase of existence. He asked for a "Humanistic" approach to the problem of life.

Asserting that economic determinism "is inadequate as a philosophy of life or explanation of action" and that "the great teachers of all ages with one voice repudiate so shallow, so superficial, so tawdry a conception of the dignity of mankind."

Then he pointed out that Karl Marx was the author of the theory of economic determinism, which forms the corner stone of his socialistic philosophy and that "just as we have come to fear and hate the system of Karl Marx, we swallow it whole without questioning its major premise." Unless this major premise is rejected," he added, "your escape from his (Marx's) conclusion, socialism, will be difficult."

Then he went on to say that there was no trace of the theory of economic determinism in the teachings of Jesus, Buddha and Confucius nor in the masterpieces of Homer, Virgil, Dante, Shakespeare, and Goethe.

Let us examine the above remarks by the head of an educational institution of higher learning.

First, he asserts that the great teachers of all the ages all with one voice repudiate the theory of economic determinism, then he admits that Karl Marx was the author of the theory of economic determinism (he meant the broader doctrine of historical materialism, of course), and then he goes on to say that there was no trace of this theory in the teachings and writings of some of the greatest scholars in history.

Will Dr. Wriston kindly explain how the great teachers of all ages could repudiate a theory of which there was not a trace in their teachings and writings and which he admits did not exist in their time as Marx wasn't born until 1818? As for the teachers since 1818 the present results do not speak highly for their judgement.

I would suggest that Dr. Wriston go to his professor of Psychology and have him psychonalyze his fear and hate for the system of Karl Marx. Maybe he could explain the reason for some of Dr. Wriston's utterances.

But the crowning assertion came later in his address when he said that by applying the theory of economic determinism to the whole educational process it would "impair or destroy great cultural, aesthetic, spiritual and emotional values, without giving the vocational aspect any significant effectiveness."

Can a working stiff, now out of a job, hungry, without a home, no decent clothes, his "jungle" invaded by the town clowns or state bulls duly appreciate what Dr. Wriston is saying to him, for after all he and millions like him do come under the heading of "humanistic."

He said, by applying the theory of economic determinism to the whole educational process, we impair or destroy the beautiful, your refining moral or intellectual faculties, your heavenly mindedness, your feelings and passions, without changing the situation for the better as far as your job is concerned.

Just think, by applying the theory of economic determinism, replacing our present capitalistic slave system political democracy, with an Industrial Democracy, we could insure economic security for every man, woman and child by working thirty hours or less per week from the ages of twenty to forty-five and the rest of the time be free, not only from work, but from worry; free to cultivate our "cultural, aesthetic, spiritual, and emotional values." But the doctor would have us believe that we would thereby not only destroy these values, but would not better our present job situation. Of course we can't understand this. You must have a whole educational process of a Dr. Wriston or his like to get as fine a point as this one.

He said, "All history shows that men live and love and fight and die, are heroes and patriots; they will suffer and rejoice, they will endure torture and not flinch, and all for causes in which economics is only a small constituent. The dignity of mankind rises above any market price."

Why Do Men Fight

What are some of the major causes for which men fight and die, suffer and endure torture? Are they not starvation amidst plenty, unemployment, war, etc.? These questions are all fundamentally economic. Individually we can not solve them.

The human being is a social animal. Man cannot live as man alone. Our problems of life are social problems. This humanistic approach to the problems of life is an individualistic approach to the problems of society.

Were the chattel slaves of the south freed by humanizing the slave holders? Or were they freed because the land became so unproductive under a primitive method of land culture that the slave system had to expand into new territory in order to keep going and thereby same into conflict with a cheaper and more productive slave system, namely, the wage system?

How successful has this humanizing process been with the sponsors, donators and graduates of your universities? Are we proud of their record? Millions of dollars in profits each year (some of it trickling into university funds) while workers who produce these millions are turned out to seek relief or starve, their service no longer profitable, never having received enough to live even on what one would call a decent American standard of living. I can give concrete examples of this right in your home town.

No. You cannot humanize parasites. They are a product of a system of society and it is only by changing this system that you can get rid of them.

Man's social choice is not free, it is determined by his environment, his class interest in society.

Dr. Wriston's present position as head of an educational institution, as well as his own education and his standing in society is the result of the social system, past and present. Dr. Wriston did not make the system. The system made Dr. Wriston.

Robert Blatchford in his book, "Not Guilty," said, "Man does not create himself. What a man does depends on what he is; and what he is depends upon his 'bread' and his experience. Heredity makes, and environment modifies a man's nature. Both these forces are outside of man. Our moral and ethical concepts are based entirely on our social relations."

How to Approach the Employer

For a worker to approach an employer with a humanistic appeal to stop exploiting workers is as unsound as it would be for a hare to approach a fox with an animalistic appeal to stop chasing him.

This capitalistic, wage-slave cultural value that Dr. Wriston is so anxious to preserve is the very thing we must expose for what it is. Veblen in his book "Socialism" has this to say of this culture:

"The canons of respectability in profiteering are so powerfully implanted in the young of all classes in America by the schools, churches and private opinion of all good citizens that any effective action which can be stigmatized as radical, socialistic or Bolshevik, still seems impossible to contemplate."

Veblen knew his educators.

If the workers had to depend on humanizing the capitalists to free themselves of this slave system the task would indeed be hopeless. But such is not the case. Individualism is anti-social. This is a class fight. Society is divided into two economic classes. One, the minority class, through the ownership of the means of living, control all the other institutions. But they control only because they are organized, while the other class, the working class, is unorganized and disorganized.

The workers that run industry, can, anytime that they will organize for that purpose, take over the means of living, i. e., the industries and thereby wipe out the owning class. Not until this is done will there be any sense in the "humanistic" approach.

Hal Co

A child's dream of abundance or a man's can be changed to reality through the magic power of organized labor. The goods so lavishly displayed for the benefit of those who have money to buy are as nothing compared to what labor could produce and distribute freely to all mankind if freed from the restraint of the capitalists who, having all they want for themselves, are reluctant to grant the workers the right even to a bare existence.

Preamble of the Industrial Workers of the World

The working class and the employing class have nothing in common. There can be no peace so long as hunger and want are found among millions of working people and the few, who make up the employing class, have all the good things of life.

Between these two classes a struggle must go on until the workers of the world organize as a class, take possession of the earth and the machinery of production, and abolish the wage system.

We find that the centering of the management of industries into fewer and fewer hands makes the trade unions unable to cope with the ever growing power of the employing class. The trade unions foster a state of affairs which allows one set of workers to be pitted against another set of workers in the same industry, thereby helping defeat one another in wage wars. Moreover, the trade unions aid the employing class to mislead the workers into the belief that the working class have interests in common with their employers.

These conditions can be changed and the interest of the working class upheld only by an organization formed in such a way that all its members in any one industry, or in all industries if necessary, cease work whenever a strike or lockout is on in any department thereof, thus making an injury to one an injury to all.

Instead of the conservative motto, "A fair day's wage for a fair day's work," we must inscribe on our banner the revolutionary watchword, "Abolition of the wage system."

It is the historic mission of the working class to do away with capitalism. The army of production must be organized, not only for the every-day struggle with capitalists, but also to carry on production when capitalism shall have been overthrown. By organizing industrially we are forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old.

END CAPITALISM

If our capitalist masters were content to be just plain parasites like fungi on a tree or like the vermin that infest a mission flop house, there might be reason in their being tolerated by a good natured working class. After all, feeding a bunch of no-account idlers, even in the luxurious manner to which they are accustomed, would not be an impossible burden. Though, of course, it would still be a most unreasonable thing to do.

But our parasites are not like that. They are not satisfied with robbing us; they want to rule us as well. They want the whole economic machinery directed in a manner to suit their needs. They're arrogant about it too, and object even to the most apologetic protests from their host, the working class. It is as though a bunch of fleas undertook to order the dog around.

Workers go hungry, go to war, and eat beans when they prefer steak because the parasites want it that way; they rear their children in slums, work too hard and long at difficult tasks, and allow themselves to degenerate in mind and body because the lordly lice (the non-producing owners of the earth) declare it must be so.

This insanity has gone much too far already. There is not one sound, sensible reason to be found in all the world's philosophy why it should be allowed to continue. There is, on the other hand, every reason why wage workers should join the I. W. W. as quickly as possible and help to cleanse the world of the most obnoxious and dangerous parasite that has ever sucked undeserved sustenance from it—the modern capitalist class.

THE GENERAL STRIKE

The author throws more than a little light on the question of how the transformation of society from capitalism to industrial democracy can take place.

By

BERT RUSSELL

William Z. Foster, in his autobiography, pays his respects in a true C. P. conformist manner by relating the "folded arms" concept of the general strike as being held by the syndicalist. It is too much to look for the fact in this panegyric of the "correct line" that this idyllicism was treated as "childish" as early as the Paris Congress of the syndicalist C. G. T. in 1900, and that the term earmarks but one of the many phases of development in the general strike idea.

The point of view of the general strike, as with every important idea, has changed a good deal since it was first promoted as a revolutionary method by the pamphleteer, William Benbow, in England during the 1930's. And that which has changed, modified and transformed its value and tactics has been the practical experience of workers participating in general strikes.

In accord with the utopian ideas of the time, Benbow calls the general strike, the Sacred Strike, and spoke of it as a Holy Day. Previous organization and planning was not considered necessary to even mention, and the feeding of the people was to be dependent on the good heartedness of the owners of the foodstuffs. The utopian reasoning, that the poor were poor and miserable only because the rich were ignorant that the unequal distribution of wealth, of which they were the beneficiaries, was the cause, is reflected in Benbow's outlook. Therefore, the general strike was but a means of drawing the attention of the rich to the results of their riches. Once aware of the real condition the rich would immediately correct these evils.

His whole attitude is summed up in the way he solved the question of feeding the strikers for the duration of the month of the proposed strike. Pointing to the cattle in the fields, he suggested that the strikers send a "committee to plead" to the lord for these cattle to feed the people. If the first committee did not get the desired results (the cattle) then the committee was to be increased to plead "still more respectfully and energetically." With each succeeding refusal the number of the committee was to still increased "until the lord's cattle were forthcoming." It was perhaps with irony that Benhow suggested that the larger the committee the more respectfully would it plead with the noble. He was practical enough to suggest that the committee plead more energetically and that the lager the committee and the more energetic they acted the better chance they had of getting the lord's cattle.

However, in the first recorded general strike, called the Plug Plot because the strikers stopped the mills by pulling the plugs from the boilers, it was evident that lack of organization was disastrous and that the lord's cattle were not forthcoming to feed the poor. Neither did the rich see the error of their ways and make haste to correct the abuses. And they haven't until this day because enough workers have still not learned the lesson of organization and the real nature of the rich.

In France

France has been the most fertile field for theories regarding the general strike and this may partly be accounted for by the fact that the workers there have never engaged in a general strike. Talking, writing and passing resolutions in favor of a general strike are not a satisfactory substitute for the general strike. Nor are those most favorably inclined to the general strike the ones that do the most talking, writing and passing of resolutions.

The unions affiliated with the General Federation of Labor in France passed resolution after resolution favoring the general strike but when faced with the question of taking this action they did not bother to reply to the questionaire sent by the committee, "Are you in favor of an immediate general strike in the event that the railroad wokringmen should declare a strike?"

Nor did the politicians miss the benefit of this great talking point. Aristide Briand gained his popularity among the workers because of his great speeches in favor of the general strike when other politicians were opposing the measure. But after winning a high position in the government he called the railroad workers to the colors to operate the railroads under military control when a strike was initiated on the railroads.

During this period the French workers' ideas of the general strike was influenced by the experiences of the workers in the Belgium general strike, the Swedish general strike and 1905 strike in Russia. Without engaging in such action themselves they did learn from the experiences of others that a "folded arms" general strike was a "childish" conception. Zig Zag Foster apparently does not give the common herd the credit for learning from experience.

There have been general strikes in many countries and for many reasons and, with exception perhaps of the Plug Plot, all have been initiated and conducted by organizations of labor existing and functioning prior to the strike. Therefore, there is sufficient reason to believe that any future general strike will be initiated and conducted by labor organizations. That, at least, should be without question.

And the events of past general strikes, and even those not general, are sufficient evidence that the employers will attempt to break the strike with the use of militia and terrorism spread by vigilantes. Whatever name the vigilantes use, whether Citizens Committees of One Thousand, as in the Winnipeg general strike, 1919, or American Legion, Silver Shirts or Bergoff operators, they will be there to do their dirty slimy work.

Another condition, and less evident than the others, invariable characteristic of a general strike, though sometimes present in comparatively small strikes, is that the striking workers through their own elected committees assume some of the administrative functions of the political government. A dual government is set up by workers!

Workers' Control

Robert Owen foresaw this form of dual government developing from unionism, aside from strikes, when he addressed the convention of the Grand National Consolidated Labor Unions of Great Britain, 1835. He said in effect that "today there sit in London two governments, the political government in the Houses of Parliament and the workers' government in this convention, and some day this government will take over the functions of the other."

W. H. Crooks, from his wide studies of the general strikes, draws the justifiable conclusion that the essential nature of a general strike makes necessary the formation of this dual form of government. To substantiate his views he relates many incidences among them the following:

(Quoted from Strike Bulletin, Milan, Italy, about 1905): "The Chamber of Labor, in the name of the Milanese proletariat, has virtually taken possession of public power, and practically works the administrative and political mechanism of the town, which facts assume a profoundly revolutionary significance, showing the proletarian capacity to manage the proletarian commune."

(Quoting from the UNION RECORD, just prior to the Seattle general strike 1919): "Not just the withdrawal of labor, but the power of the strikers to manage will win this strike. Labor will not only shut down the industries, but labor will reopen, under the management of the appropriate trades, such activities as are needed to preserve public health and public peace." (The NATION on the same strike), "Before the (strike) committee appeared a long succession of business men, city officials, the mayor himself, not to threaten or bully, but to discuss the situation and ask approval of the Committee for this or that step." (emphasis ours).

The formation of a dual government by the strikers during a general strike is more definitely stated by Winston Churchill, when he was approached by the union officials during the 1926 general strike in England, with the proposal that the unions cooperate with the government to operate certain trains. He replied, "What government in the world could enter into partnership with a rival government, against which it is endeavoring to defend itself and society, and to allow that government to sit in judgment on every train that runs and every lorry on the road?"

The assumption of power over administrative functions considered the exclusive jurisdiction of political government is not confined to general strikes alone. Even small strikes assume some part of this power in controlling highways and closing saloons and keeping order. Nor does this assumption of power make a strike a social revolutionary strike even though the workers intended to maintain this control permanently. So long as the industrial control remains intact in the hands of the employing class the worker's control of governmental administrative power remains but a reform measure.

A general strike becomes revolutionary where the workers proceed further and assume the industrial administrative functions.

Where workers through their committees have taken over governmental administrative functions to protect society in the environs of the strike from pestilence, disease, hunger and terrorism, the period of their exercise of these powers is limited by the available stock of consumable commodities. Then, unless preferring to starve, they must relinquish their powers and end the strike, with or without the demands won,; or, the strikers can extend their jurisdiction over the control and operation of the industries where these necessary commodities are produced. Producing for themselves, the strikers can maintain their strike indefinitely. But time would bring increasing needs for raw material and machinery to maintain efficiency of production and necessitate a constantly increasing field of industrial control and in its train the transformation of the economic basis of organized society. The employers would be locked out. This consolidation of their control in the industries would minimize the risk of political adventurers taking control to build a dictatorship with its probable loss of freedom to the workers.

Thus the modern influences, that theorists contend makes the general strike less possible of success, such as oil burning ship, canned foods, air navigation, radio and automobiles, will tend to make the revolutionary general strike more possible of success because they will be under the control of the workers. Even the army marches on its belly and the belly of the army is filled from the industries not congress.

Even temporary effectiveness of a general strike is not possible unless a large number of workers are organized in labor unions. And unless there is a strongly organized group who know what they want and have sufficient knowledge of industry and technology to take the initiative, a group that has the confidence of the majority of the workers because of their previous actions and education among them, there is little chance of a general strike with reform demands developing into a successful revolutionary general strike.

A Lost Opportunity

For instance, though the workers of Germany were strongly enough organized to pull a general strike to beat off the fascist putsch of Von Kapp in 1922, they did not have the kind of organization or sufficient education and confidence to take over the industries then and run them for themselves. Instead, they looked to their political saviours to tell them what to do, with the result they left the industries in the hands of the employers who have since, with the aid of the workers' politicians, ground them under the control of the nazis.

But in Barcelona, Spain, not only were the industrial unionists able to take "time out" to settle the hash of the fascists but were able, because of their previous organization and education, to go back into the industries and run them for their own good. Unless they had been able to do this, their victory over General Godet would have netted them fascism but a few weeks later.

Had the Barcelona workers been content to become party to assuming just governmental administrative functions nothing substantial towards the social revolution would have been accomplished. But sufficient numbers of them were organized and educated to direct the movement into revolutionary channels and within a few months such accomplishments have been made which, irrespective of the final outcome, will stand as a concrete example of the capacities of our class through our unions to rebuild society on a basis of workers' control and ownership. It proves conclusively that the working class will not perish without masters.

The step that marks the revolutionary general strike is workers taking over control and operation of the industries for themselves, whether it takes place under civil war conditions as in Spain, or whether in times of comparative peace, it is an outgrowth from a general strike with reform as an issue. The time will not be chosen and we can't predict it. But it will be workers organized and educated for the purpose of running industries previously to the event who will be the ones to put it into effect.

Predictions have been made, theories have been worked out, and they could be again. But no good purpose would be served by doing so. We cannot set the time or call the event into being but we can prepare for it, because we know what it is going to take to do it. It will require the technical and working force organized according to their function in the industry of production and distribution of the necessities of life, prepared to take the step when the opportunity arrives.

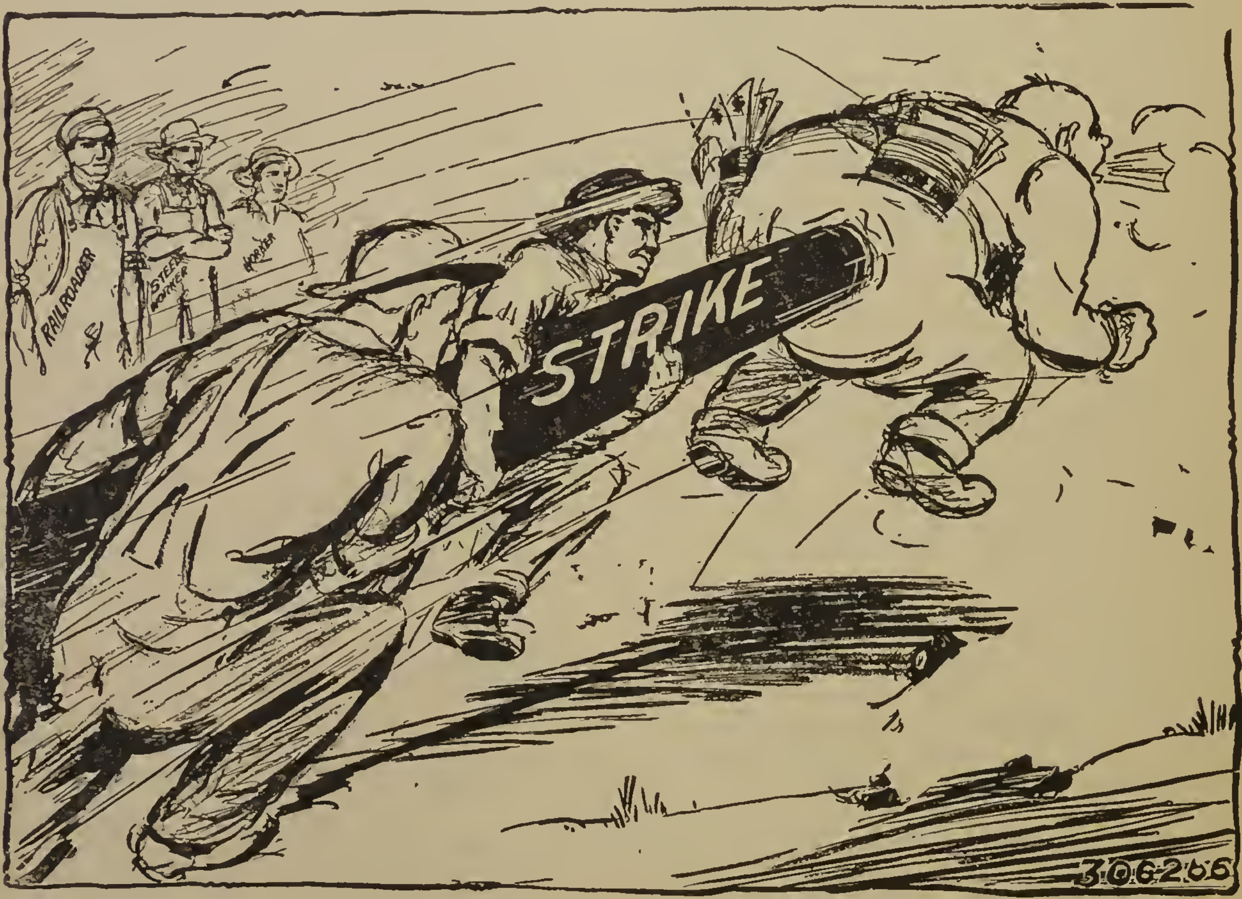
Three questions are all that we need be prepared to give a practical answer to:

1. How would the job we are working on, or last working on, be run in the event we were faced with the problem tomorrow of running them on our own?

2. Where would we get the raw materials we use on this job?

3. How would we distribute the commodities we produce on this job?

If enough workers can answer these questions of industrial procdure and organize now in accordance with the manner of carrying out these practices, the revolutionary general strike will not be a theory to talk about. It will be something to do.

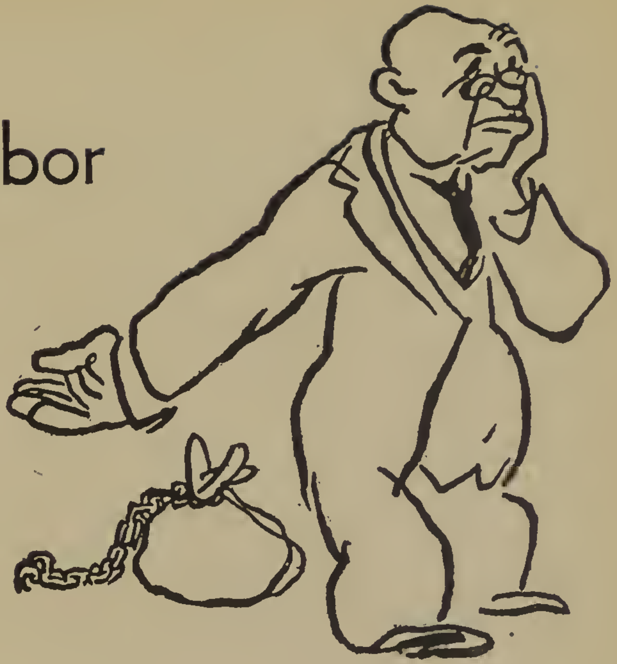


THE GREATEST GENERAL

The radical press is the hope of the nation, of the world. Often it is crude, coarse and banal, —what would you have from the unrespectable?— but always honest and straightforward. What it prints is the truth as it sees it, the utterance of honest men and purposeful. Support it, you who stand for love against hate; freedom, sympathy, kindness to human beings against poverty and exploitation. Support it, you who hope for the dawn. The commercial press is—commercial. In the radical press you will find the two words that make the Captains blanch—General Strike!

That will be Manhood's move against Money's federal courts—if it comes to that.—Luke North.

Yes, We Have a Labor Government



By VIOLET CLARKE WILKINS

Card No. X216219

No doubt you will have read about our recent federal elections here in Australia. The farce and futility of the whole business was very apparent in states like Western Australia, where we have a so-called Labor Government in office.

The present gang of labor fakers have been in power here just over four and one-half years, yet we find on their own official figures that there are over 5,000 men on relief work, and likely to remain on it permanently.

The Labor party when it won the state election in 1933, introduced a relief work scheme which is based on an allowance of one shilling per day per head in each family. They allow a man to earn one pound per week over and above that, to pay to the landlord for rent. For example, a man with a wife and three children is allowed to earn 35 shilling per week, plus 20 shilling for rent.

The maximum that a relief worker is allowed to earn is 59 shilling per week, so any of them who are unfortunate enough to have more than five to feed must feed the surplus ones out of the allowance of the others.

The Labor government also amended the police act so as to make it a criminal offense for anyone to "obtain relief work under false pretences."

Politicians Live Well

For example, men have been sent to prison for failing to notify the relief department that one of their children had died, and continued to work for and draw as wages 7 shillings per week more than the Labor party reckons they are entitled to do! The Labor ministers who enforce these conditions draw on an average 30 pounds per week in salary; and the ordinary members of Parliament draw 12 pounds per week; and yet, whenever they are asked to increase the relief work scale their invariable answer is, "We would like to do it, but there is no money to make it possible."

Any sane person knowing the conditions the relief workers have had imposed on them by the State Labor government would realize the utter futility of wasting time and energy trying to have the same party elected to the Federal Parliament as a means of getting better conditions for the workers, but the commies, as you fellow workers in the U.S.A. call them, or the comics, as we call them here, came out in full support of the Labor party, even though the Labor party turned them down with contempt!

This latest twist of the comics only goes to prove, of course, that the workers should shun all parliamentary crooks, under whichever label they travel, Republicans, Democrats, Labor, or Communist. They are all fundamentally the same and their first objective is to grab a well paid job for themselves and for their friends and relatives next. By the time these are fixed up, there is nothing left for the bulk of the poor mug workers who voted for them.

Comics Attack I.W.W.

One gratifying thing about this election was the large number of informal votes cast, showing that large numbers of workers are alive to the humbug and hypocrisy of the politicians.

When these people are ready to take the next step, line up with the I.W.W., and fight on the industrial field, then we workers will be able to get some, or all of the good things of life for ourselves instead of for the slimy politicians, as at present.

At the beginning of this campaign we were honored by a visit of Mr. J. B. Miles from Sydney, the boss of the Communist party in Australia.

At a public meeting here when our members criticized the policy of the comics in supporting the Labor party, Mr. Miles got very abusive and after refusing to debate the subject, made the astounding statement that the I.W.W. had "scabbed" scores of times in America.

Our members demanded that he produce proof of his statement or withdraw it. He would do neither, so he was called a dirty, rotten liar, and the meeting was held up. He then said he didn't mean that members of the I.W.W. had worked when there was a strike on, but that the I.W.W. had gone against the line of the Communist party in regard to the seamen's strike and elsewhere.

Of course, he was made to look like a fool but we all know that politicians have hides thicker than a rhinoceros, and little things like being proved to be dirty liars do not seem to worry them.

Perhaps many workers in the U.S.A., although they know that it makes not the least difference whether the Democrats or the Republicans are elected, may be under the impression that the election of "Labor" or Communist politicians would make a great improvement in the standard of living. The example of how "Labor" governs in Australia should help to dispel any false hopes in this direction.

As long as the present system of wage-slavery is allowed to continue, it makes no difference whatever as to how the boss labels his puppets who run the State machine for him. He may label them Labor, as in Australia; Popular Front, as in France; National Socialist as in Germany; Fascist as in Italy; Republican and Democrat time about, as in U.S.A. The system by which the workers are exploited is the same regardless of the label under which the exploitation is carried on.

So away with all crook politicians, "Labor" or Comic, Republican or Democrat. Line up with the I.W.W. and fight for the good things of life where they are produced.

PROGRESS IN THE MEN'S CLOTHING INDUSTRY

By

A Clothing Worker

Origin and development of a labor misleader and of an organization miscalled a labor union.

In the year 1911 on the advice of my relatives I started my career in the shops where men's clothing is manufactured. My aunt paid a woman $5 to teach me how to make hand buttonholes in men's coats. That teacher was the first exploiter I came in contact with before I reached the big shops.

Small contractors brought unfinished goods to her house and she would make the girls work on the coats while she charged them from $5 to $10 for the privilege of working. Most of the girls were young Europeans and put in months working for nothing in order to learn the trade. Actually it required only a few days to learn, but the teacher played all kinds of tricks to prevent the girls from learning too soon.

She would teach them how to make the buttonhole but refuse to show them how to put in the last stitches so, after a girl had made a whole coat, the boss would put in the finishing touches in another room so the girl would not have a chance to learn how to go on her own. This teacher would tell us of Polish girls who worked for her for many years. She expected us to do the same.

But after working four weeks as an apprentice I started out looking for work. I went from shop to shop until I landed in the Leopold Morse Co., in Boston, Mass. The company employed 500 people all of whom worked piece work. The wages earned were from $25 to $45 for the men and $14 to $18 for the women or girl workers. There was a 54-hour week. However, there was no clock to punch and workers often came late.

We younger workers hated the piece work system because we had to fight for the work and because of other unpleasantness that goes with piece work, such as the better work being given to the ones that bribed the foreman and the harder work to the newcomers in the shop.

During the noon-hour workers would talk about the piece work system, about the contract system, and about the 54-hour week; the general conclusion was that "we must have a union in Boston."

In February the Boston workers in our industry went on a general strike. Five thousand tailors were out demanding the abolition of the piece work system, shorter hours, and the abolition of the contracting system. We were out for three months under the leadership of the United Garment Workers of America of the A. F. of L.

While we were picketing the shops in zero weather and while many pickets took trips to the hospital after being hit by policemen with clubs, the union shops in New York and other cities were making coats for the Boston market.

However, with the coming of the spring season it seemed that the Boston manufacturers needed their own particular brand of suits so two great men came to Boston to settle our strike. They were the late Samuel Gompers, president of the Federation, and the late Congressman Meyer London, the socialist.

It took them less than two hours to settle the strike. We were not asked to accept the terms, we were just told that the agreement had been signed. We did not get week work or the abolition of the contract system but we were told to celebrate the fact that we had union recognition and the 48-hour week, which was a provision of the state law.

The Contract System

The bad thing about a contractor is that he is a man with small capital who convinces the big manufacturers that he can produce better garments at less cost than the inside shop can.

This is the way a contractor cuts costs. He rents a second or third rate loft, badly heated and badly ventilated, and drives the workers to the limit of human endurance. He drives in over time and straight time and always holds the threat over the workers' heads that if they don't produce, if they don't hurry—well, he is a poor man and will not be able to meet the payroll. And many times he cannot meet it anyway, and so the workers have to wait.

Those of us who listened to the many speeches during the strike and learned from them that a union is the workers' Training School and something about "in union there is strength," after the strike was over religiously attended union meetings.

The first meeting we attended the secretary told us that we should be out in the park for a walk and discussed the color of our stockings. We waited for the meeting to start, but we went home disappointed; there was no meeting. We discovered later that meetings were held, that certain people attended but that our presence was not needed.

When the war broke out in 1914 in Europe the American clothing manufacturers were hungry for the war profits. In order to get all the war orders would yield, the clothing bosses needed two things: They needed absolute peace in the industry and the MAN to do the job of regimenting the workers for that purpose.

The Bosses' Man of the Hour

In the cutting room of Hart, Shaffner & Marx, Sidney Hillman was cutting under-collars. Someone said that he attended night school, that he knew something about spouting radical phrases, but he was vouched for—he could be depended on.

He was coached by the manufacturers in what to do and how to do it. At the 1914 Men's Clothing Workers' Convention, Sydney Hillman caused the split in the union with his radical phrases and his talk of industrial unionism, and with other things that he suggested to the corpse that was the United Garment Workers. He had his faction organized, in the 1914 convention the split came, and Mr. Hillman proceeded to organize the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America. The tailors became revolutionary over night and shouted for industrial unionism, through the mouth of Sydney Hillman.

No one knew where his traveling expenses came from but he traveled from city to city with his running mate Joseph Shlossberg, the S.L.P. man, in 1915.

The crusaders for industrial unionism for the tailors arrived in Boston. Many meetings were held and there were a lot of secret meetings somewhere. But the slow New England manufacturers did not respond to the call so quickly as did the manufacturers in other towns. They had to be sure of their share of the spoils before they would sign with any union, industrial or otherwise.

Those shops that needed the union label sent for the A. F. of L. men to keep the workers on the job, I remember a fat-necked man named McCarthy who came from New York and made a speech in the middle of the shop at Leopold Morse Co. telling us that "this man Hillman is a bum," and that we should be thankful to our good company for giving us a chance to work, also that he had arranged with the Boston Police Department to give us full protection against anyone who dared to stop us from earning an honest living; and finally, "that the good American Federation of Labor is working with the city government for American unionism." To prove that he was not telling lies he pointed to the door where two uniformed police were stationed for our benefit.

I felt a cold chill in my bones and a lump in my throat. I was not able to understand that one union was scabbing on another. There was something wrong somewhere, but where I did not know.

However, I couldn't work under police protection, the scissors fell from my hands and my eyes filled with tears. I walked out into the street to be greeted by 50 other workers who honestly believed Mr. Hillman was a revolutionist and worked for the benefit of the tailors.

The War Comes

The year 1915 was a slow one for the tailors in Boston. There was not work enough in the shops, so for one year I went without work because I sided with the Amalgamated against the A. F. of L. The Leopold Morse Co. was the only one working.

The next year was the beginning of America's war preparations. Uniform orders began to pour into the shops; EVERYONE that was able to hold a needle was put to work.

One day the shop foreman stood near the buttonhole makers' table where two girls were working on a navy officer's overcoat. He kept on shouting, "Faster, girls, faster, the boat is leaving at 3 p. m." One girl collapsed and was taken to the sick room. The foreman asked everyone if they had a cousin or a friend who could work and whom they could bring in.

The same situation prevailed in every department and in all the shops in the clothing industry. In May, 1916, Mr. Hillman and his crew came to Boston and signed agreements with every shop and then announced the establishment of the Industrial Union for tailors, the A. C. W. of A. We received books with constitutions and preamble. The preamble was very revolutionary and the last paragraph read, "The industrial and inter-industrial organization built upon the solid rock of clear knowledge and class consciousness will put the organized working class in actual control of the system of production, and the working class will then be ready to take possession of it."

I looked at this preamble and felt that the one year I lost when I left the Leopold Morse Co. was not in vain; at least we have a union for the workers, a union that will be our educational institution, that will abolish the nationalism and the many petty, ugly things, including piece work and the contract system.

The war was on. We were too busy and tired to think of meetings. We worked all hours—Saturdays and Sundays. The orders had to go out, that was all. If anyone refused to work he was obstructing the government in saving the world from the German tyrants.

We Make Demands

In 1918 the war was over. The shops were packed with work, prosperity was riding high in the clothing industry. We began to attend union meetings and to search for this education we had been promised.

The Russian revolution was on and we read something about shop committees. I asked for shop educational classes, for industrial union schools for the tailors. The younger workers agreed with me. We were making demands that union money be spent to teach the workers about industrial unionism and that a shop bulletin be issued.

Someone nominated me on the joint board. I saw that a rush was made to the next room where elections took place—loud noises, the paid officials were in a rage when they came out. I was not elected.

That day I was called into the office by the local secretary, Mr. Albert. "I want to talk to you privately, please," he said. The panicky look in his eyes and the slimy, sugary smile on his face when he put his fat hand on my shoulder made me feel like someone was emptying a sack of ants on the back of my neck. I looked at the man without asking him anything.

He began to talk rapidly. "We have known you since 1911, we know you went to night school and we are glad that a girl that works in a tailor shop finds time to educate herself. I have an offer to make you—a very attractive offer. You will never have to work in a shop again . . . You're married, I venture to say? . . .

"Who's is talking of marriage? I want to offer you a job in my office, you will be my assistant secretary. Your pay will be $48 a week. Listen, young lady, forty-eight dollars a week, that is more than you can hope to earn in a shop or in any office."

"Are you creating industrial union classes?" I asked.

"What classes? What do you bother with such nonsense for? The tailors don't need industrial unionism."

At this point his sugary smile vanished. He grew red in the face and began to shout, "Your job is to keep your mouth shut, sit in my office, do as you are told by the union officers, and attend to the clerical work around here."

I pictured myself in that dingy office taking orders from Mr. Albert. "Thank you very kindly," I answered, "but I would rather work in the shop." And so I walked out of the office feeling that our union had been stolen from us—or perhaps it had never existed.

We Get a Convention

The 1919 Amalgamated Clothing Workers' convention was held in Boston, in the Tremont Temple. The delegates were chosen by the paid officers. A meeting was called of all the tailors to inform them that they were assessed $1 each for the entertainment of out-of-town delegates.

We didn't get a chance to discuss the things we wanted the convention to take up, especially the abolition of piece work. We didn't get a chance to say anything about the things that concerned us. The chosen delegates were busy phoning sightseeing bus companies about the cost of showing the delegation from out of town the important sights in Boston.

In our shop our bookkeeper took up a collection for flowers to be sent to the convention. I was astonished. This shop that was the hardest to organize in 1913—many union picket heads had been cracked at the door of this boss—now out of a clear sky, he ordered the bookkeeper to take up a collection for flowers for our convention.

Why, if we wanted to send flowers to our convtntion that was our own affair—we should have discussed that among ourselves, but if the boss orders flowers for our convention there must be something wrong. I personally, refused to contribute . . .

Great men were to address the convention and everyone was invited to attend. The Boston capitalist sheets printed a lot about the convention. We all went to the largest hall in the Tremont Temple to hear the great men.

The then great revolutionary artist, now a likspittle of the Communist party, Robert Minor, put his hand on Sydney Hillman's shoulder and said, "Friends and comrades, I take great pleasure in presenting America's greatest labor leader, Sidney Hillman."

Hillman's voice sounded as though it came from a distance. He said a lot of things about what industry could or could not do. In concluding he was very much concerned about the industry. No one really know what he meant. He was followed by someone who told us that we must organize banks and explained the nature of banks. An elaborate band played some songs and we went home, cold and disappointed.

The next day a grand ball for the delegates was to conclude the convention's business. At the ball I asked Minor how he as a revolutionist could say about Hillman what he did.

"My dear Rebel Girl," he said, "you don't understand strategy."

The 1919 convention gave the tailors banks and the banks own large apartment buildings, where the petty bourgeoisie enjoy modern comforts.

In 1926 I lived in Poughkeepsie, N. Y. There I found that two large shops were making men's coats. The machine work was done in the shops with scab labor, while the finishing was done in the homes by housewives and little children. Upon making inquiries I found that the coats were cut in New York by union cutters.

"How about the A. C. W. U.? Don't they know about this?" I asked.

"Sure they know, but they are not interested in organizing the tailors, they are in the banking business."

In San Francisco

In 1930 I landed in the shops in San Francisco, Calif. I found that the largest ready-made clothing shop in town, the Strouse shop, was controlled by the A. C. W. of A. The firm borrowed money from the Amalgamated bank and the workers were forced to take a reduction in wages on that account.

Finally some of the workers rebelled and they were told by Mr. Rinish, the union manager, if they didn't like it they could go home, and that he could get plenty of cheaper help from Los Angeles.

One girl in the Strouse shop slapped Rinish in the face for a personal insult because she objected to continuous wage cuts.

The House of Oliver, another Amalgamated shop, asked the union to permit them to put in piece work. The workers objected because it was a special order shop where one worker has to do several operations. The workers called a shop meeting in their union hall. When they came for the meeting they found the hall closed.

The local union president and vice-president called a local union meeting to discuss the Oliver shop situation. They found that Mr. Rinish had six professional gangsters there. They took the vice-president, Bill Roads, by his hands and feet and threw him through a glass door, cutting the ligiments in his feet, while Mr. Rinish told him, "that is what you get for objecting to piece work."

Bill and four other workers, including myself, were fired from the shop of the House of Oliver for talking against piece work. The boss wanted piece work, therefore there should be piece work.

Mr. Rinish was later killed by a worker from the Strouse shop because he brought that worker from Los Angeles and because, when he arrived in Frisco, he found wages so low that he objected. Rinish told him that if he didn't like it he could quit and that he would get him another job. One day the worker asked Rinish where that promised job was.

Instead of answering him Mr. Rinish simply spit in his face and told him to get out. The worker, crazed from hunger and humiliation, pulled out a gun, and killed Mr. Rinish. He was later caught by the sheriff and killed for resisting arrest.

A Perfect Sellout

In January, 1937, Mr. Sidney Hillman signed for a 10 per cent increase in wages for all tailors. The tailors ware not consulted. The agreement was signed in January but the raise was not to go into effect until May 1. The clothing manufacturers immediately began to run their shops full speed, over time and Saturday work—nothing extra for over time. They filled the stores and stock rooms. After the raise went into effect the shops closed and the tailors are walking the streets. Edward Levinson in the N. Y. Evening Post tells us that:

Mr. Hillman is president of the N. Y. Amalgamated Bank;

Mr. Hillman is president of the Chicago Amalgamated Bank;

Mr. Hillman has been president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers union for 23 years with a steady income;

Mr. Hillman is a member of the Labor Board and a member of the Committee for Industrial Organization (C.I.O.).

The offices of the A. C. W. of A. are more elaborate than the bosses' offices. The business agents are dressed like bankers, but there is never a union meeting to discuss shop conditions. The workers in the shops experience double fear: They fear the boss for if they should get fired the union will not help; and if they get reported to the union as being kickers they will sit in the employment office of the union for months and never know the reason why they don't get jobs.

Knowing these facts from experience the worker accepts his fate like a slave that is chained for life. The boss extracts the union dues from the pay envelope. Business agents and employment office clerks are never changed. There are always the same names on the ballot. No one knows who nominated them. The wages in the shops are exactly what they were in 1911, before we had any union at all. The girls average from $14 to $18 a week, the men average from $25 to $35 a week. We all work piece work.

It's not a Labor Union

During the New York City municipal campaign all the shop chairmen were told to call the workers to a special meeting in Webster hall. When the workers came in after work, tired and hungry, the well-paid business agents closed the doors and the workers had to stay to listen to speakers urging them to vote for Mayor LaGuardia and all Labor Party candidates. Later we read in the capitalist press that the Amalgamated gave $5,000 to the LaGuardia campaign.

The tailors walking the streets, wondering if their next month's rent will be paid by some friend or relative or if they will be forced to go on relief, have nothing in common with this union or this union's president. The great Amalgamated banks will not give them one penny and LaGuardia, after his victory, will not stop the sheriff from evicting tailors any more than he will stop him from evicting any other slave who is dumb enough to delegate his power to a politician.

Those workers who are shouting "hurray" for the C.I.O. type of industrial unionism will do well to examine the A.C.W. of A. In 23 years the clothing bosses have become richer than they ever were, the tailors are poorer. They have nothing to say in their union. Mr. Hillman, between trips from New York and Washington and attendance at White House dinners, has long forgotten what the inside of a tailor shop looks like. His well-dressed, well-barbered $75-a-week business agents are continually telling the tailors that they should be glad they are working, and when they are not working the business agents lock themselves in their offices and are not to be seen.

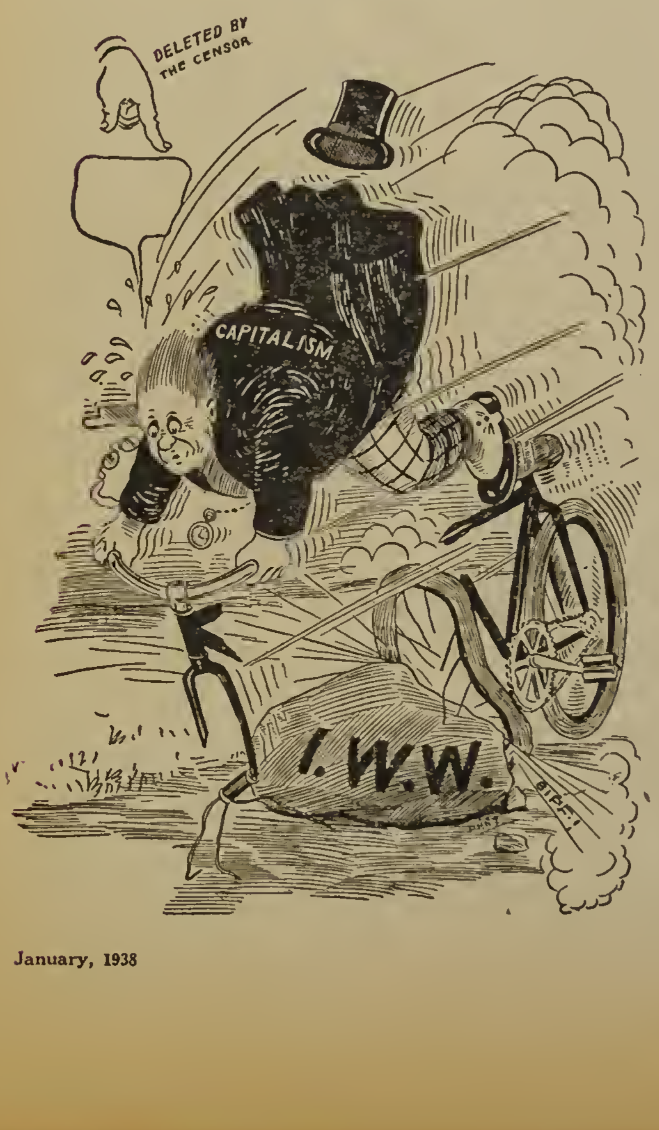
The capitalist press well appreciates the services of Mr. Hillman and sings his praises. Another World War is about to come. The workers are to be regimented on a national scale. The men that will help lead our young to be slaughtered and our older industrial slaves to help gather the gold that the next slaughterfest will yield for our exploiters, have been chosen—and how well they have been teamed!

Mr. John L. Lewis, mill owner, mine owner, and faithful servant of the American coal companies; Sydney Hillman, bank president, and faithful servant of the American men's clothing manufacturers; David Dubinsky, well-paid servant of the ladies clothing bosses; and all the other well-paid men and women in the C.I.O. controlling group who have demonstrated to the boss class their ability to prevent workers from gaining anything or learning how to gain anything for themselves.

The intelligent working men and women of the United States who are capable of reasoning and who can see that only through industrial solidarity can the working class, as a class, make this world a better place to live in, must help to build the only workers' organization—the Industrial Workers of the World. Make the workers in the shops, mines and mills be the legislative body for the interests of those who perform useful work. Lawyers and politicians will never do it for them.

UNAUTHORIZED

BY C. M. RUPEL



The "leaders" said with manner most emphatic,
"We never planned or authorized this strike."
And the union cannot function
For it hasn't got our sanction
And it's bound to be erratic
When the bosses cannot rule them as they like.

But the Workers calmly went on organizing.
They said, "We'll build it of the rank and file.
We'll ignore the would-be leaders,
And dispense with trouble-breeders,
And results will be surprising,
Now we've let them know we do not like their style."

Now, it's good to know the hours have been shortened,
And it's good that the wages have been raised.
Every self-respecting worker
That is not a chronic shirker
Or a hopeless scissorbill, is truly heartened,
And gladly will admit those methods should be praised.

Failure of the Workers Alliance

By L. NICOLAS

In La Revolution Proletarenne

Translated by JOSEPH WAGNER

A split in the Spanish U. G. T. is engineered by the Communists.

Readers of this magazine will no doubt recall the pact that was concluded towards the later part of July, between the National Confederation of Labor (CNT) and the General Union (UGT). The entire press in loyalist Spain hailed the act as "an historic event." Yet, in the two months following the event almost no attempt had been made to put any part of the adopted plans in operation. Of the numerous Liaison Committees, elected by the two organizations for the purpose of creating local united councils, the press has mention only of one case where such a thing was accomplished, that between the metal workers' unions in Madrid. The only statement issued by the National Liaison Committee to the press, mentioned other cases without, however, naming the localities. (Solidad Obrera, Sept. 9.)

The sabotaging of the alliance between the two unions is mainly due to the deep set hostility of the communist agents within the UGT; the communists are fundamentally displeased with the pact; because of that, they are contesting the right of the General Executive Board to conclude such a pact without submitting the question first to the National Committee of the UGT, which is made up by the Executive Committees of the Federations affiliated with the UGT. It would be a mistake, however, to believe that in their action the communists were prompted by a desire to uphold democracy within the union; they are simply relying on the fact that by devious maneuvering, of which they are past masters in all countries, they managed to obtain a majority favorable to their policy in the National Committee. They want to accomplish at any price the complete domestication of the labor union movement in Spain. They make use of every possible method in order to attain that purpose: towards the CNT they are using cunning and flattery; in the Levant they did not hesitate to create a peasant organization, in opposition to both the UGT and the CNT organizations; and in the UGT itself, they managed to create a split. The following are the facts:

The Stalinist agents being aware that the majority on the General Executive Board is composed of left elements grouped around Largo Caballero, decided to destroy the Board. Through the Executive committees, with communist majorities, of the different Industrial Federations, an ultimatum was forwarded to the GEB of the UGT, ordering that body, in virtue of article 33 of the Constitution of the UGT, to call a National Committee meeting within a week. They based their ultimatum on the fact that the signatories constituted a majority of the said National Committee. The order of business they proposed for the meeting was extremely important: Report of the GEB; the aid to be given to the Popular Front government in carrying on the war; the problems of production and workers' control of industry and the adaption of the most important of them to war conditions; the intensification of agricultural production; cooperatives and collectives; the scarcity of food and the fight against speculation; the municipalization of city services; the unity of action with the CNT; election of officers to vacant posts in the unions . . .

The General Executive Board answered the ultimatum through a letter addressed to the signatory Industrial Federation Executive Committees. We reproduce the essential passages of the letter from Claridad of Sept. 9.

"The Executive Board received the document bearing your signature, demanding the calling of a meeting of the National Committee. We are astonished to see that you are basing your claim on article 33, since in conformity with article 9, your federation is suspended for non-payment of its taxes to the UGT. Seeing that at the last National Committee meeting several federations that participated, debated and voted in that meeting, without having the right to do so, the GEB decided that this should not be done again and so it unanimously decided to apply to your federation the first part of article 9."

(The first part of Art. 9 says: "Organizations in arrears with taxes for two consecutive quarters, stand suspended.")

The ruling affected nine federations, miners, leather workers, clothing, gas and electricity, drugs, wood, teaching, banks and exchange, and oil, representing a total of 200,000 workers. On Sept. 6 the GEB sent communications to all the local unions of the suspended federations, inviting them to communicate directly with headquarters in order to re-establish the bond between them.

The Stalinites retorted with a violent campaign making much of the sentimental arguments, that the exclusions were hitting at the heroic Asturian miners; they evoked all the technical arguments on the one hand contesting the validity of the debts, on the other hand offering to pay them up. On September 24 the suspended federation committees invited all the Industrial Federations of the UGT to a conference where the question of suspensions should be examined. Of the forty-two federations affiliated with the UGT thirty-one answered the call favorably and participated at the conference. Three federations: Transport workers, Agricultural workers and Metal workers remained loyal to the GEB. The excluded federations and those in sympathy with them declared themselves the only regular organization and elected a new General Executive Board. Thus the split within the UGT became an accomplished fact.

Viewed from the angle of democracy within the labor movement, it would have been more logical to have called a special convention which could have settled the issue, instead of invoking the delinquency. However, such a call for convention was difficult under the actual conditions. How can a true representation be obtained from such a highly industrialized district as Asturia where the war was raging, or from the Bay of Biscay district, occupied by the fascist forces?

Naturally, men of the Caballero type deserve to be treated with the greatest circumspection. The fact of having radically changed his political attitude three times in six years, is by no means a guarantee of stability for the future. The massacring of socialist and anarchist workers in 1931 and 1932; the enacting of drastic legislation for the defense of the bourgeois republic against the workers, and then from that position flopping over to a camouflaged Stalinism, contributing to the bolshevization of the socialist party and of the UGT, in order to arrive finally to the idea of labor unionism free from political party domination, the road he traveled in six years was indeed a tortuous one. But, in spite of all, the left wing of the UGT contains many sincere rank and file militants, and their present position of barring the road of Stalinism, is in conformity with the interests of the working class.

We give below some of the arguments used by them in the Correspondencia de Valencia, in answer to the open letter of the Political Bureau of the communist party, tendering its "outstretched hand" to the anarcho-syndicalist CNT. The first article as reprinted by Solidaridad Obera of Sept. 17, follows:

"The document published by the 'Bureau' is one more irrefutable proof of the theoretical and practical inconsistency of that group of would-be leaders, who for so many years past was dragging after them what they call the vanguard of the revolutionary proletariat, in all the quagmires, and who so often in the past acted in a manner becoming to the sixth column.

"Just as on the day when they abruptly decided to jump into the workers' alliances after having fought against them with fire and blood; just as when they suddenly decided to fight with all their energy for the democratic and parliamentary republic after having demanded, holding the knife at our throat, that we break entirely all the ties that might have attached the working class to the bourgeoisie; just as at the time when of a sudden it threw itself at the feet of the socialists after having for so long vowed that their unity with the revolutionary socialists would not be accomplished until all the reformist roots would be first pulled up; just as at so many other culminating moments of the revolutionary development, these apostles of iron discipline and of the firm and immovable 'line,' made a complete turn and upheld that which the previous day they absolutely condemned."

The second article contains a warning to the CNT. We take it from Solidaridad Obrera of Sept. 19, where it was reprinted:

"The communist party persists in its eternal false position; its present attitude lacks all seriousness. We were right, when speaking of the document of the Political Bureau of the communist party, we said that nobody will trust them any longer; that all they wanted was to make a toy of the CNT pretending to be for unity and for the restoration of the Popular Front.

The communist party has once more betrayed those who naively would have liked to see in that statement of the Bureau, a change in their tactics. The communist party is not causing anti-fascist unity. It shook it up and broke it and today, by following their suicidal tactics, which the Bureau itself declared to be incompatible with the interest of the war and the revolution, makes the solution of the problem of unity more difficult. It creates an atmosphere of hostility, using the most repulsive methods against the two great labor union federations. These are the great merits of the communist party."

The Correspondencia de Valencia has been suspended since. The stranglehold of the Stalinists is so strong not only in Spain but in other countries as well, that the disappearance of Largo Caballero's publication passed over in silence. People, the organ of the French General Confederation of Labor (CGT), and the Populaire, organ of the French socialist party, did not even mention the fact to their readers. And yet, a few weeks before, Largo Caballero was for these papers the grand champion of Spanish democracy. What sort of a convention would that of the UGT have been in such an atmosphere, where even a Caballero or an Araquistain cannot freely publish a paper, or speak at a meeting? And what can be the status of the common rank and file militants?

The explanation of this despotism is that there is a widespread discontent and grumbling within the unions. The appreciations of Claridad, a strongly communistic paper is extremely significant in this connection. We reproduce from its Sept. 6 issue:

"Every meeting is a fight in which no quarter is asked or given; in which, at times, one encounters the same passion as in the battles carried on in former days with the enemy class. Every election for any union function, brings forward, with bitterness and strife, all the instruments of agitation and propaganda, which we workers were in the habit of using when the bourgeois governments were calling us to the ballot box. Vote soliciting for candidates, anonymous tracts containing dire threats, strange behaviors and uncalled for manifestations. Such are the outward consequences of these suicidal battles, that some forces are interested in fomenting within the locals of our glorious union. But have those trouble makers given any thought to the internal repercussions of these fights?. If they have, then surely they would have put the brakes on some of their activities of which we are complaining. Such negatively aggressive policies will damage the labor unions most of all. These damages are manifesting themselves by a lack of activity, by the absence of energy with which to confront the actual and momentous problems of today. This road leads nowhere except to the entire discrediting of the unions, making them unfit for the special tasks that are incumbent upon labor unions.

"Calmly but earnestly, we take the liberty to warn the unions. We are forced to seriously consider the situation. The present time is certainly not the proper time for us to indulge in internal fights that will weaken our forces and further divide the energies of the working class. We have consistently urged the unions that they hold regular meetings and conferences. We have done so with a positive point of view; we believed that the unions, through their meetings, could realize a constructive plan of work, of which the immediate result would have been increasing material support to the government in its war work; overcoming the shortages in production by intensifying the work, putting in operation all the wheels of industry and agriculture, and generally orienting themselves towards the objectives that should be the same for all of us. But, if union meetings and conferences are to serve only for maneuvering, by using methods of Ignace Loyola, for breaking up everything that is now united and preventing the unity of that which is still separated, then it is better not to hold these assemblies."

The Stalinites certainly must have run up against serious resistance in order to make them speak thus.

The Opinion of the Left Socialists

The Madrid socialist organization makes known its appreciation on the situation in an open letter addressed to the Executive Committee of the Socialist party of Spain. This Madrid organization has in its ranks such outstanding socialists as Largo Caballero, Araquistain, Pascual Thomas and Llopis. We are reproducing parts of the letter from the Information Bulletin No. 49, of the FAI-CNT:

"A people is invincible on condition that it is not made to lose confidence in its aspirations of liberty, on condition that it will not see emerging from its own bossom and from its collective sacrifices, a new tyrannical power, and internal despotism that would freeze up its enthusiasm in the fight for freedom at home and in the long run its resistance to tyranny from the outside.

". . . Its knowledge that there is a political organization that is working above anything else, for the increase of its own power, having the secret ambition of becoming the sole organization both during and after the war, shatters the morale of the fighters on the front and of the workers of the factories and fields.

". . . We are referring to the Spanish section of the communist international. We are holding this party mainly responsible for the misfortunes experienced by the republican cause in the last three months, and we hold that party responsible for the even more serious disasters that will come in the near future unless an immediate remedy is found.

". . . Until three months ago there was a real unity of anti-fascist action in Spain. All parties and the labor unions were collaborating directly in the control and responsibilities of the conduct of the war. That unity of purpose and action has been diminishing from day to day. By whose fault? By the fault of the communist party in the first place, because it was they who first set up a conspiracy to remove from power the people and the organizations that would not submit to the orders imported by the communists; later they slandered the very personalities whom they have raised up on the pedestal, when they saw in them an obstacle for their partisan schemes, whether on the war front or in the state offices. They took the ridiculous attitude that political parties, and particularly the communist party, are privileged bodies of almost divine origin, charged with the mission of directing public conduct and that the labor unions were only good to do the work and blindly obey the newly selected aristocracy, as if people who follow a manual or professional calling had less capacity for the affairs of State than those whose calling is nothing but politics, and at times, what sort of politics!

"The communist party declared war to the death to those in the UGT and in the CNT who were opposed to its totalitarian policies, which is by no means a dictatorship of the proletariat. It broke the cordial relations existing between that party and the left wing of the socialist party since the October revolution and during the first months of the military insurrection in 1936. And now they even have the nerve to state that it is our party that has changed policy.

"The left wing socialists are now the same as they were before. They are not responsible for a single act of hostility against the communist party, but the communists are guilty of many such acts. The left socialists still desire the political unity of the two parties, subject however to three conditions which were formulated and established as a basis of discussion by a conference of their groups in April 1936.

"The united party should be at all times subject to an exclusively national direction and responsibility; in any case a national convention should have the right to terminate the unity.

"We are disavowing the campaign of force and persecution carried on by the communist party on the war fronts and in the rear; it is revolting to the socialists who are upholding the dignity of their party and their own dignity as men and Spaniards. The injustices and the favoritisms introduced by the communists were never considered favorably in Spain; the misguided leaders of the Spanish section of the Communist International should have taken this in consideration . . .

"Something more was destroyed: a government that was more truly Spanish through its aims, and was the most efficient both internally and internationally than Spain has had since the beginning of the war; this government was for the unity of all the parties and of the labor unions; thus it was for the comprehension of all the parties and of the workers supporting political unity. By the destruction of that government the confidence of the soldiers on the front and of the workers in the rear was shattered. In spite of the fact that the war was a tragic affair, costing rivers of popular blood, the communist party did not hesitate to profit by it in order to further its policy of absorption and of speculation.

"If the recent unfortunate war operations at Brunete, which have been rejected several times in advance by the military technicians, who considered them fated to failure, if these operations were due only to military errors, we would keep quiet about it, and would only ask for the discharge and the punishment of those guilty of having wasted so much of the people's blood; but in these operations the military objectives were subordinated to petty political ends: to the glorification of some communist chiefs, who conducted them, in case they would have succeeded. The intention was to demonstrate the superiority of a government that could come back and save Madrid, in contrast with a government accused of having deserted the city; to demonstrate also that if such an easy victory was not won sooner, this was due to the unreasonable resistance of those who confounded inaction with prudence, of those who confounded the opposition to the partisan passions of communism with the anxiety for not spilling criminally torrents of popular blood. The pityful results have demonstrated to who was right."

Summing up its position towards the communist party, the Madrid socialist organization concludes:

"Policy of division and spectacular policy at the cost of thousands upon thousands of dead and wounded without any strategical gain, such was the policy of the communist party. If we would be as evil minded as they, we would say that these policies are made for the purpose of creating the moral and the material conditions for a complete defeat.

"We prefer, however, to believe that it is only a question of errors of judgment, and of the maneuvering of poor and mechanized intelligence that can believe that victory is near and that the communist can attain it by themselves.

"If that is the case, they are erring profoundly. Victory will be the result of the combined antifascist forces or there will be none. For, of two things one: either the communist party will alter its policy which leads to defeat, or it will have to be removed from public affairs as the enemy of republican Spain."

The open letter adds that in justice it is necessary for it to state that even if the communist party is the most responsible for the present situation, yet it is not the only one. Without mentioning the socialist party by name, the authors of the open letter are accusing the socialist party of unexplainable complicity inside of that party:

"There are an infinite number of forms of treason. But that of wanting to liquidate one's own party for the benefit of another party, that is unprecedented . . . of such an act only an antirevolutionary, anti-democratic unscrupulous minority, seeking power for the sake of power could be capable."

Playing With Words

By CHAS. J. MILLER

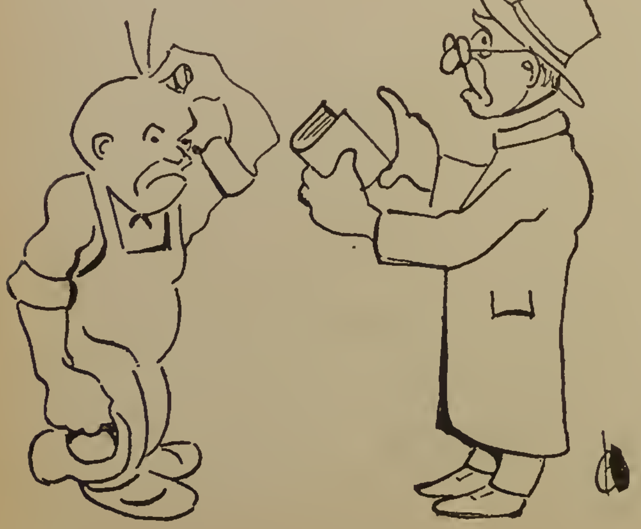
The greatest universal indoor game is Playing with Words. It is the favorite passtime of educators, trade union leaders and politicians of all shades. Next time you hear one, note how the words roll out, tumbling, twisting, turning inside out, somersaulting. You will be surprised what tricks they can do with words.

The game is as old as language itself. But at no time in history has the game reached the heights that it enjoys today. In the early days there were no telegraph, telephone, news reels; no newspapers and news systems as we know them today, no loud speakers to carry the words, no radio hookups that reach into the far corners of the earth.

When a person played with words in those days, if he spoke the words they could reach but a small number of persons and if it was the written word it did not reach so very many. It was a slow process. Today, when the President of the U. S. plays with words he is heard around the world.

There is another important factor involved in the game of words. In the early days the ways of living, the system of society was comparatively simple and the words to explain them were simpler and nearer to the root. Today, with the highly complicated system of living and with the rapid changing within the system the words used to describe the changes are so far behind the changes that many of the words used to describe the changes are meaningless and often silly when applied to reality.

What are some of these words and combinations of words? Here are a few that are overworked today. Heading the list I would put down, Democracy, and Democratic Countries. Then you have, the Public, the Consumer, the Rights of the People, Identity of Interest between Capital and Labor, Arbitration to Settle Disputes between Capital and Labor to Secure Justice, and so on.



Now, when people hear that word, Democracy, they immediately see a picture of a country that is governed by representatives, collectively elected by the people who are politically and socially, equal. There is not a country that could stand up to this test. So long as some people control the means of living of other people a Democracy is impossible.

Next, you have the play on the words, Public and Consumer. Now, these two words mean the same people. We all come under the head of the Public and we all are Consumers. But when the player on words uses these terms he invariably means that the public's and the consumers' interests are identical. It is only when you examine who the public is or who the consumers are that you realize that you cannot lump them together under either head on the assumption of identity of social interests.

The public is made up of two separate economic classes whose interests are opposite. One of these classes controls the means by which the other class lives and as long as they do control the means of living there can be no equality between them in the social, political or economic sense.

And the same holds true in regards to the other term, consumer. It is true that we all consume, but, there are two totally different forms of consuming. One is destructive consumption, the other productive consumption.

If you consume to reproduce or you produce more than you consume you are a productive consumer. But if you consume without reproducing, then you are a destructive consumer.

A fire that consumes your home is destructive. A fire under a boiler that generates power to run a plant is productive.

The working class is the productive consuming class. The capitalist class is the destructive consuming class. You cannot lump these two classes under one heading because their social interests are opposite.

With these brief explanations you can readily see that to accept these words at their face value as used by these players with words is a dangerous practice and will account, in a great measure for the confusion and mess we are in.

Starting on such false premises you cannot possibly arrive at a sound conclusion. We must not take the Word for the Reality. It is the reality that counts.

IN THE COURSE OF EVENTS—

By GEFION

When Larry Holman was fourteen, he came to the conclusion that he was fed up. The old man's grumbling, when he came dragging home from the mill at night, made him so damn sick and tired that he couldn't stick it any longer. The squalor of the ramshackle dump where they lived was getting his nanny. The everlasting bickerings of the old lady, the howling and squabbles of his half-starved kid brothers and sisters were getting in his hair. The stink of unwashed diapers hung in his nostrils wherever he went. So one fine afternoon, Larry rolled up an extra shirt and his other pair of socks, went to a can in the wood shed where he had planted a dollar and sixty-five cents, saved from his paper sales in town, and beat it. At any rate, he thought, it will be one craw less to fill.

Larry skirted the town till he came to an uphill grade where the trains for Seattle slowed down. He laid down behind a stump and waited. Over him crept a feeling of release—a feeling as if he had just escaped a nightmare. His plans for the immediate future were hazy. He had no clear conception of where he was going or of what he intended to do. He thought vaguely of going south. Anyway, things would shape themselves somehow.

Night came. Frm behind the hills, the moon rose full and with a benevolent grin on its golden face. It climbed over the tree tops and flung a dancing streamer of silver through the green waves of the Sound. A steamer coming in from the Pacific sounded two hoarse and emphatic warnings at an outbound lumber schooner. It growled back angrily, as if to say: "I heard yer the first time, Stupid."

Larry lay drowsing behind the stump and let the noises of night soak through his being. He was not worrying about what the old folk would say or think of his sudden and unannounced departure. He didn't feel sorry for them nor for himself. Somehow, he felt that the tears shed over his disappearance wouldn't cause a tidal wave. He knew the factor that would determine the parental feelings would be: "Well, it's one less to feed and clothe." And, anyhow, he would drop them a line as soon as he got somewhere and connected with a job. Then from the north came the shrill, warning whistle of the southbound freight.

Larry had thought that he was alone. But out of the night there came men. Young and old men—straight and bent. Men with bed rolls upon their backs. Grouchy men and humorous men. Working stiffs without a dime in their pockets. Stiffs with a dollar or two in their jeans. Human beings with empty guts. Some who had been lucky enough to connect with the flesh pots. They came from behind stumps and trees. They came clambering up over the embankment. They drew back in the shadows, waiting. Larry kept to himself, waiting, and with fear hammering his ribs.

Then through a cut in the embankment, the locomotive's headlight cleaved a blinding channel through the night. A long-drawn whistle, then two short ones and the train began slowly to gather momentum again. Larry sprang from behind the stump and swung himself up on the rear end of an oil tank. He saw the others come from their hiding places like distorted figures in a flickering film and scramble aboard—some with the agility of youth, others with the angular stiffness caused by the calcified joints of old age. And the train with its freight of goods and humans was swallowed by the night.

Larry's dollar and sixty-five cents had gone with the wind long since. The seductive movie houses of Seattle had gotten most of his hoarded wealth. Jobs were as scarce as hens' teeth. His overalls looked like an introduction to a washtub wouldn't harm them any. Fuzz was sprouting on his chin. He had in his mouth the vapid taste that comes from the missing of meals, and he didn't feel any too favorably disposed toward the world in general. But he would be damned if he would slink back to the old folk—not for all the tea in China.

He was mooching up Yester Way. On the corner of Second Avenue, he felt the eagle eye of the patrolling flatfoot rest suspiciously on the back of his neck. He geared his steps a notch faster and succeeded in making the corner before the Law could make the prescribed inquiries as to his right, if any, to be on earth. He drifted down toward Washington Street and got talking to a kid of his own age—a wise punk, who knew the ropes. They decided to beat it to Tacoma.

And from his new-found partner, Larry learned the gentle art of bumming back doors for lumps.

He absorbed the intricacies involved in making the right approach for nickles and dimes. He learned that in the dark crevices of life there were practised certain sexual peculiarities which were not strictly in accordance with Hoyle. And his normal instincts revolted against the whole lousy affair—bumming and all. He told his sidekick what he thought of it. They had a row and parted.

So Larry began making the rounds of the shops and mills—only to be told, "Nothing doin'." More back door bumming—one had to eat. More job hunting. Then one glorious morning, Lady Luck took Larry gently by the paw and lead him into the golden valley of jobs. He was taken on as general roustabout in a box factory at the bank-busting salary of two and a half per diem. And Larry clung to his job like a green cowhand to a bucking mustang. For months, he felt he was on the road to riches. He sent the old folk a five spot, telling them how well he was doing, and best regards to the kids. Then one fine day, the can was tied to him and several others—Reduction of force necessary, due to seasonal lack of orders, the notice by the timeclock had it.

Life is a stage. You are the master of your soul. Life is what you make it. Don't watch the clock if you wish to succeed. Every cloud has a silver lining. Half a loaf is better than none at all.

Larry had heard all these chin-whiskered bromides, and many others, time without number during the course of his young and hopeful life. His school teachers had drummed them through his skull. He had read them, set off in bold type, among the intellectual claptrap of the papers he had peddled in his kid days. His old man, twisted and toil-worn, had mumbled the one about the half loaf whenever there had been a wage slash at the mill.

Oh, yes, Larry was well acquainted with them all. And he had come to believe that they just about epitomized all the wisdom that had ever emanated from the brain pans of the wise guys.

When Larry got canned from the box factory, his visible means of support consisted of eleven dollars and four bits. He had on a pair of new overalls, a warm logger's shirt, and his feet were encased in a pair of fairly good brogans. And hard knocks had begun to teach him a thing or two. This time he didn't blow his dough on the movie joints. Oh, yes, he took on one or two—mostly depicting the remarkable adventures and lion courage of Hollywood cowhands wiping out, single handed and by the bushel, foul villians and slavering seducers of fair maidens. But he had been taught a lesson in moderation when his dollar and sixty-five cents had gone by the board. And he knew that if he failed to connect with a job of some kind before his present eleven bucks were shot, there would again be the old song and dance of, "Madam, will you please—?" And, dammit, he detested that.

But jobs were hanging as high as the rowan berries that the fox couldn't reach. Larry rustled the shops and mills early and late—Nothing today—Sorry—May come back some other time. And his wealth dwindled until once more he found himself on the bum.

And so Larry Holman grew into manhood. Now and again a job. Then back on the bum. Thirty days for vag. Lousy—Boiling up in the jungles. Sick in the county hospital with pneumonia. Kicked out half cured, weak on his pins, without a dime. Every cloud has a silver lining. You are the master of your soul. Life is what you make it. Ha, ha! This guff, Larry came to realize, didn't quite jibe with the sharp-edged corners of reality. Well, what t' hell, one had to learn!

Yes, Larry trod the pathways of life. He learned a little here, discarded a screwy notion there. He learned to see and to listen. He found the delights of libraries. The kicks in the pants that life gave him did not make him bitter or sour—he realized that he had a lot of company—but he preferred to be alone. When in the company of others, he spoke quietly and he learned the knack of finding out indirectly what others thought and believed. He paid attention to their words, but most, he observed their actions. When in the jungles, he would sit off by himself and let the talk of the other stiffs drift through his brain. Now and again a truth floated to him and stuck. He would roll himself a pill and mooch off, meditating the while on what he had heard and on how it shaped up with actualities.

A manifested freight was rumbling south through the night-blanketed land of sunburnt California. The monotonous grey hills billowed in the distance as if they were dirty circus tents that the wind was trying to lift from their moorings. Somnolent farms and villages fitted by and in the pastures cattle were lying in the dim moonlight like models in the relief map of some enterprising real estate shark. From the top of the train, they were no larger than Nurnberger toys, out there against the dark earth.

Larry Holman sat on the top of a refrigerator and watched the cars on the highways zoom by. They looked like swarms of enormous beetles that were scurrying from their burrows, trying frantically to escape some impending catastrophe. Overhead an aeroplane was buzzing its way eastward like an angry gadfly.

Once again in his life, Larry wasn't quite positive as to destination or immediate plans. He had been north as far as there were land and jobs. He had been east and gotten a gutful of mass production and the speed-up. But he had never yet feasted his orbits on that boasted-about, bragged-about, screamed-about chamber-of-commerce paradise known as Sunny California. So, now, here he was and he felt somewhat like Mark Twain in Innocents Abroad—a lot of blah—nothing much to get excited about, at least not as far as first impressions went. Well, he would hold her down till he struck the gold-paved avenues of the City of Angels and see for himself if the aborigines of that burg were of a clay different from that of ordinary saps.

Larry turned his back to the wind and rolled himself a cigarette. He lighted it under his coat and sat gazing into the night. He was getting on to twenty-five now. Hard work had put tough muscles on his bones and he looked out into life unafraid. He had learned self-reliance and how to think. In his busy life of helping to build up the bosses bank accounts, he had found out several things as to how this little hen yard, called life or society, is thrown together. And he had come to the conclusion that as matters stood, they were rather dizzy. The hinges could stand a little oil. It was tough mathematics to strike a balance. On the one side, warehouses stuffed to the rafters—out here, John Workox with just about enough dough, when "gainfully" employed, to buy back a mere handful of crumbs from what he had turned out. To say nothing of the millions of workless pounding the sidewalks looking for non-existing jobs or for dimes. It was worse than trying to figure out a Chink lottery ticket—it couldn't be done, at least not by the equations used by the good bosses' yes-men.

Once in the jungles, Larry remembered, an old bewhiskered stiff had stood up from his java can and declared to a gang of wise buzzards that the working class and the employing class had nothing in common. And, further,that there could be no peace so long as hunger and want were found among millions and the few who make up the employing class had all the good things of life. And he had furthermore declared that, goddamn their dirty scissorbill hides, all the moron wise cracks in the world wouldn't alter the case.

Old Whiskers' statements had drifted to Larry through the smoke from the fire and the laughter with which the others tried to ridicule him. Larry had then thought that the statements originated with the old stiff and he had come to the conclusion that they weren't badly thought out for a broken down old dingbat. Later he found out his error. But it didn't matter. They were the truth—the kind of truth he and all the other pack mules needed before they could do much about getting accounts balanced.

And now he sat here on the top of a rumbling freight and thought about life and its peculiarities. The moon had disappeared over his shoulder and was sinking behind the coast range. Now and again a dog barked at the passing train. Cows rose from their sleep and the earth steamed under them. They humped their backs to get the stiffness out of their joints, then they lowed a throaty welcome to the morning's milking time. In the distance, roosters were proclaiming to their seraglios that it was time to shake a feather. Slowly the sun crept up over the eastern hills and bore on its pale rays the first gray light of a new day.

Larry didn't find the City of Angels a New Jerusalem. Nor did he discover any vestal virgins daintily treading avenues of gold—at least not around those parts the burg set aside by the best people for the scum of earth—Nay, nay! On the whole, Larry thought it was the dreariest hoosier lay-out he had laid eyes on in many a moon. And as for its denizens, well, he found them on par with the rest of Moronia—no better nor worse—just another cross section of dear and beautiful life.

Larry set out to explore the city and its sand-blown environs. And he couldn't, for the love of Pete, figure how a couple millions of bipeds had gotten corralled in this gray and joy-forsaken corner of the globe. But when he made inquiries, those who had been in town long enough for a clean shirt looked at him as if he had been goofy enough to ask: "Why does one enter Paradise?" He went out of town and gazed at the mountains and came to the conclusion that the bloody things looked like Sahara set on end. Well, well, each to his own taste. He was damn certain that he wasn't going to make the burg any more crowded than it was.

Larry was meandering down the skidroad. The sour stench from eating joints that hadn't changed grease since they were first opened filled his nostrils and brought vivid olfactory recollections of the acrid diapers that had been part cause of his leaving the parental gables. Bleary-eyes winoes were guzzling barrel wash in the doorways. He met stiffs he had slaved with up north. Things weren't so hot, he was told. Not t' helluva lot going on and wages lousier than ever. Same old tale. So Larry decided that it was time for him to get out of this crummy hole and rustle a master in some other part of the great open spaces.

II.

The strike on the Sherman Dam, Federal Reclamation Project, was rolling into its fourth week. Larry Holman had been on the picket line practically day and night since the morning when the duly elected strike committee had let it be known to their kind and benevolent bosses that from now hence it would be nix on low wages, rotten chuck and lousy bunkhouses.—Here are our demands, look 'em over and let's have your answer by eleven.

At eleven, the Brains, with befitting calm and kindly-stern miens, had informed the committee that the demands were simply preposterous. Why, the present wages were positively as much as could be paid. And hadn't they themselves on several occasions partaken of the food served in the cookshack and found it excellent? They certainly had! The boys had better go back to work. The boys should realize that altho the project was being done by contract, they would virtually be striking again' the Gov'ment, and that simply wasn't done. Yes, the boys had better return to work and they, the Brains, would sincerely see as to what could be done in regard to the bunkhouses. They would, they admitted, grant that the sleeping quarters could possibly stand a little improving. The committee said, "Oh, yeah?," and turned on its respective heels.

A meeting was called of all the stiffs. The refusal to grant the demands was reported by the committee. The stiffs voted nuts on going back to work and a strike was called immediately. So, now, Larry and his fellow workers hiked the picket line for miles, keeping out scabs. And they sang songs of class rebellion and solidarity.

Larry reported to the nightly meeting at the picket camp that he expected trouble. The chairman wanted to know upon what he based his assumption. Larry said that he had observed several new mugs being added to the company's gunmen, and that some of the pickets in town had sent word that the company apparently was figuring on moving a gang of scabs in from some eastern point. So Larry thought it best to be on guard and warned the other pickets to watch out.

Larry's suspicions proved true. Up over the yellow desert road that lead to the job there came several mornings later a convoy of trucks loaded with a collection of derelicts and barrel house scum. Each truck was amply protected by company gorillas. The picket line closed its ranks, tensely awaiting developments. Larry stepped in front of the first truck so that it either had to stop or run over him. It came to a standstill. A gunman jumped from the driver's seat and pointing his sawed-off shotgun at Larry, he wanted to know what in the goddam hell was the matter here. Larry said, "Do these men know there is a strike on this job?

The plug-ugly let Larry know that it was none of his damn business what they knew.—Them guys was gonna go t' work and no goddam red was gonna stop 'em, see? The thugs from the other trucks put in an appearance. Like a row of mephetic figures from the exhibition of a venereal disease quack, they formed a fence across the road. Pickets went out around them and yelled to the human flotsam in the trucks not to scab. They answered with a barrage of empty booze bottles. The pickets retreated toward the road. A bottle missed the line and struck a gunthug on the skull and laid him flat. The one next to him whirled and emptied his shotgun into the ranks of the pickets. Larry saw three men go down and lie struggling in the yellow sand. His heart pounded against his ribs. He sprang at the gorilla and before he had time to turn, Larry had the gun twisted from his grip and rammed the butt of it into the base of the thug's skull. He saw him make a half-turn and drop with a dull thud in the middle of the road. Then it was as if an army trampled him underfoot and all became night.

Larry vaguely felt himself floating up from a deep shaft of darkness. A strip of light crept between his eyelids and a sharp smell of disinfectant filled his nostrills. He tried to open his eyes, but they felt as if two heavy weights had been placed upon their lids. He could dimly see a barred window. A white-clothed person came toward him as if he were emerging from a fog. Larry wanted to know where he was and what had happened. The man answered: "You're in the hospital ward of Las Palmas county jail—What happened is none of my business."

Larry tried to sit up, but pains shot through his head and chest. He fell back upon the cot and discovered that his head was wrapped in bandages. He tried to remember what had happened—then he saw the gorilla drop in the road and remembered the other thugs laying him out —"Christ, my skull is busting—the mugs must surely have given me the works." He asked the attendant if any bones were busted. "No, but's a wonder—You've been out for two days."

In the afternoon two gumshoes came—Name, birthplace and age? And they let Larry know that he thought himself a tough guy, eh? Well, he was going to get the rope for this. Larry wished they would get t' hell out of the joint and let him alone. The next day a bespectacled lug came and droned through a warrant, charging that on such and such a date, anno so and so, at or about 7:30 o'clock A. M., Larry Holman, aged 27, had wilfully and with malicious forethought caused the death of one Jess Bullock, special guard, Sherman Dam, United States Reclamation Project, Las Palmas County, State of New Mexico, by forcefully striking him at the base of the skull with the butt end of a shotgun, wrested from the hands of aforementioned Jess Bullock, now deceased, by the herein named defendant, said Larry Holman.

Larry twisted himself up on an elbow and looked incomprehensibly at the mug that had done the reading: "Did I actually croak that fink?" he asked.

"Yuh evidently did—He's as dead as a doornail—And who's yer attorney? It's a federal charge, ye know, bein' committed on Gov'ment property."

Larry told him that he didn't have any mouthpiece nor any dough to hire one. He would have to think the whole jumble over before he could decide on anything.

Two days later, he was removed to the jail proper. Larry crept around his stinking cell, trying to work some of the pain and stiffness out of his joints. Several days later, he was brought out to the visiting pen. Three stiffs from the picket camp yelled at him through the double screen:

"How are ye, Larry? We'd been here long ago, but the Law wouldn't let's. How are ye making it, old boy? Got any smoking? Anything ye need? We've wired the Committee in Chi and they are sending a lawshark down here to take charge. We're taking up dough for yer defense."

Larry said never mind to trouble about him. What he wanted to know was how it came that the finks didn't bump him off. The stiffs from the picket camp yelled that they had charged the gorillas as soon as they had knocked Larry for a goal. They had gotten several of their guns away from them and told 'em that the healthiest thing for them to do was to scram before they were made into salt and pepper shakers. The finks and the scabs had scattered all over the damn desert like a flock of flapping buzzards. But before they could get Larry out of the way, a gang of bulls from town had rushed them and put the pinch on him. The guys that the gunfink had fired on were doing okay, and Larry needn't worry—they'd stand by him till hell froze over—"And, goddamned, we won our demands—no more scabs after the last performance, and the dear bosses suddenly had a change of heart. All the guys went back to work yesterday, but we was elected as a committee to see about yer defense—and we're figuring on pulling another strike in protest against yer being in the can."

Larry said nix on that—the stiffs needed the dough and never mind him.

A deputy marshall unlocked Larry's handcuffs and told him to sit on a bench inside the railing separating the space set aside for spectators from the court room proper. The room was alive with buzzing voices and craning necks. From the streets came the rumble of traffic. Larry sat quietly and gazed at Lady Justice, hanging in glum fly-specked righteousness above the high-backed oaken chair intended for Hizzoner. His attorney nodded him a greeting and motioned him to sit over at his table. They spoke together in low voices—defense, jurors, witnesses.

The jury box was filled with twelve good men and true. They sat solemnly with hands crossed over their bellies. Some were young, some middle aged, some fat and others lean, but it was as if they had all been molded by someone who simply had refused to variate. They had not all been accepted yet, but Larry's attorney whispered that he thought they would do—best that could be expected in a hayseed community. Mebbe the prosecution would challenge one or two more, but he didn't think so.

At the press table, the reporters were yawning and sharpening their pencils. A lone woman sat among the half dozen men. She was a mere slip of a girl. Her hair was golden and bobbed in a manner that gave to her face the expression of a whimsical kid. She wore a simple dress of black with thin white stripes, and her only ornament was a broad white collar falling over her shoulders. She seemed the only one among the reporters to whom the outcome of the trial had any interest. Now and again she would look over at Larry with gray, deep eyes set widely apart as if to evaluate what kind of person he might be. She also seemed to know his attorney as now and then she passed him a slip of paper and received from him in reply a negative shake or an affirmative nod.

A paunchy bailiff in horn-rimmed spectacles and with a mug that looked as if it had been painted with permanganate of potassium, stood up and droned, "Hear ye, Hear ye!—." A door leading to the judge's chambers opened and a white-haired, withered mummy in black robes scuttled across the floor and seated himself in the high-backed oaken chair. A moment later, the clerk of the court came trailing in with an armful of ledgers and documents. He boomed at the attorneys and the court room in general that the case of the United States vs. Larry Holman was now called. The prosecuting attorney thereupon got on his feet and let it be known that, may it please the court, the jury was acceptable to the prosecution. Hizzoner looked boredly at Larry's attorney. Yes, he, too, accepted the twelve good men and true.

And after the prosecutor had stood up and in a lugubrious and solemn voice had told the court and the jury what a culprit the United States intended to prove Larry Holman, he proceeded to march forth his army of witnesses. The Brains from the Sherman Dam came. Yes, a strike had been called on the project prior to the day—four weeks or thereabout—when our Mr. Bullock met his untimely death. Yes, the strike had been caused by the unreasonable agitation of the defendant, Larry Holman, and other agitators. Yes, on several previous occasions, the pickets, as they called themselves, had prevented willing and eager workmen from entering the job. Thanks, sir, that's all. The defense may take the witness.

And the defense took the witnesses and succeeded after much hemming and hawing on the part of the Brains to bring forth spluttering admissions that all the men had voted to strike when their demands were rejected—that all the men had walked off the job when the strike was called—that the demands—"Do you recognize this copy?—were for better wages, better food and the improvement of the vermin-infested sleeping quarters. And was it not also a fact that all these demands had now been granted? Yes, they were —the job simply had to be finished at a certain time.

The Brains further, and with equal reluctance admitted that Larry Holman knew his onions when it came to the work he had been called upon to perform on the dam—further, that he had always been a peaceful and unassuming person.—That's all.

And forward swaggered or slunk the company gorillas and stool pigeons. They stood up, one by one, raised their right mitts and swore to tell the whole truth and nothing but, so help me. Yes, they knew the defendant. Yes, they saw him in the court room—that's the guy sitting over at that there table. What happened on or about such and such a date, at or about 7:30 o'clock A. M. on the road just where it enters the United States' reclamation projects, commonly known as the Sherman Dam? Would the witness please turn to the jury and in his own way tell the gentlemen of the jury just exactly what took place on said morning? The witnesses would and they did tell the story in their own way. Now and again there came from the defense attorney an objection as to the statements being immaterial, irrelevant or mere hearsay. "Objection overruled—Proceed."

Yes, the witnesses told how they had been sent to town with the company's trucks to bring out a group of workmen shipped from the east to go to work on the dam. How the pickets had prevented them from getting to the job by blocking the road, how they had refused to move on, and how finally, after calling the men in the trucks foul names, Larry Holman had wrenched a shotgun from the hands of Mr. Bullock and struck him over the head with it, then and thereby causing his death.

And the defense took the gorillas and finks in hand and after much squirming on their parts forced them to admit that Bullock had first fired into the ranks of the pickets and wounded three persons before Larry Holman had twisted the gun from him and struck him down—and that had it not been for the other pickets' coming to Larry's rescue, the gunmen would in all likelihood have killed him. And was it not a fact that Larry Holman had been confined in the medical ward of the Las Palmas county jail for several days, due to the beating he had received at the hands of the gunmen? And was it not also a fact that the company had the preliminary hearing and the trial postponed until the effects of said beating had disappeared? Here the prosecutor objected to the defense's "leading" questions. "Objection sustained—Proceed."

Recess came and Larry was permitted to walk in the corridor after he had come back from lunch with the watchdogs. Two deputies were stationed at the end of the corridor to prevent escape. Larry stretched his legs and wondered how much longer the show would last and what the jolt might be, when the girl from the press table came up and offered him her hand. She said:

"My name is Ella Brant—I'm reporting the trial for the Workers' Voice."

Larry said: "It's a pleasure to know you—I was wondering who you could be—but you shouldn't have come all the way from Chicago for this affair."

He looked into her face and decided that her gray, wide-apart eyes were as clear and beautiful as the lakes of his native north. They walked together and talked about many things under the watchful eyes of the deputies. She said, she hoped for an acquittal, but one could never tell when it was the case of a worker. Larry thought one could nearly always tell—It generally resulted in the stiff getting a jolt. "But," he said, "this is the class war, and until John Workox learns to organize—and to organize right—that is all we may expect." Then the deputies yelled that it was time to get back into the court room.

Larry walked to the witness chair and in his low and calm voice answered his attorney's questions as to what lead up to the killing of the gunman. The prosecutor then took him in hand and among many other things wanted to know if he wasn't a red, eh? Larry answered:

"If you mean, 'Am I a union man?', I say, Yes. If yoh mean, 'Am I radical—that is, a person who wants the workers to receive the full product of their labor, by their owning and operating the machinery of production and distribution?'—if that is what you mean, then again, from the bottom of my heart, I say, Yes."

The prosecutor looked at the twelve figures in the jury box with a smirk: "I thought so—That's all."

The prosecutor had just gotten through fanning the air. His voice had taken all the hurdles of the oral racetrack. It had soared to a hoarse, shrieking crescendo as he painted to the drowsy after-dinner-belching twelve good men and true a lurid picture of all Larry Holman's nefarious tendencies and murderous activities. It had nose-dived into a string of low, fear- quavering gulps as he unraveled for the bilious gentlemen the horrors that would overtake the sacred American home and their own law-abiding bailiwick should they fail to heed his plea for the infliction of the death penalty upon that self-declared red culprit—the murderer of that respectable and peace-loving citizen, Jess Bullock—"Gentlemen, your duty is clear!"

Larry' attorney stood up. He begged the jury to disregard the good prosecutor's attempts at taking impassioned flight. He drew an outline of the underlying cause of the strike and what lead up to the killing of the gunman. He told of the low wages, the poor food and the filthy bunkhouses that the men had to indure. He depicted the life of the migratory workers—the misery they had to put up with. He reviewed in details what had happened on the road the morning when the gunman had fired into the ranks of the unarmed pickets, and concluded with a plea for acquittal.

One of the prosecutor's apprentices had the final say—a bumptious paraphrasing of what the big shot had already spouted.

The mummy in the high-backed chair fumbled with his notes. He wheezed his instructions to the jury as to what was the law and what wasn't. He summed up, more or less, what the prosecution had contended took place. And, on the other hand, what counsel for the defense had maintained was the case. They, the jury, could find the defendant guilty either of murder in the first degree or of manslaughter.

Larry Holman's twelve peers came back six hours later. They filed into the jury box and slumped into their seats with all the solemn bovinity and bucolic dignity that they could muster. Larry was rushed from the county hoosegow. Once more, King Tut's second cousin emerged from the tomb in his funereal garb. He seated himself in his oaken chair and mumbled:

"Have you reached a verdict, gentlemen?"

The gents had. The foreman of the gang stood up and stated that they found the defendant, Larry Holman, guilty of manslaughter.

The jury was thanked by the Court. The prosecutor looked glum. Larry grinned at his attorney and said, "Well, that's that." Ella Brant's hands clenched and opened spasmodically. She looked at Larry and said it was a damn outrage. The stiffs in the court room tried to get to Larry, but the deputies said it was simply against the rules. Larry's attorney stood up and moved for a new trial. Larry pulled his coat tail and said nix on all this boloney—let's have it over with—and don't waste any more dough on an appeal, either.

Three days later, Larry stood gazing at the flyspecked Justice. Had the defendant anything to say why sentence should not be pronounced upon him? Larry said that he didn't have a syllable to say—wouldn't do him any good, anyway—Just let's know what the score is. Ten years in the Federal Penitentiary at Leavenworth, Kansas.

III.

The sun also shines over prison yards. It rises out there in the world over mountains and plains. It lifts itself into the heavens and its rays are reflected in the blue gun barrels of the guards as they, puppet-like, walk around the towers that like old world newspaper kiosks perch on the corners of the prison wall. Yes, the sun shines over prisons, too. It comes, bright and carressing and its warm light explodes against the high, barred windows of the cell houses and ricochets into the clear air in minute crystal threads. Yes, it comes and brings greetings from the world that is no more. And because it asks: "Do you remember—?" the days become long, they become long, dreary years.

It was Larry's first Sunday in the yard. He had been mugged and finger-printed. He had been taken by a runner to the bath house and shaved while stripped naked. He was now turned loose, a new fish, among thousands of other sons, who for one reason or another, or for not much of any reason, trod the fool's parade. He looked down at his monstrous Sunday garb—blue pants of a thick, undeterminable kind of cloth, coat of similar vagueness—where it touched the flesh, it felt scratchy—an ill-fitting cap. It all stunk of mothballs. Across his back, and across his pants legs there stood forth in jet back figures his convict number.

And so a new world began. A life of being counted. A life of being questioned and ordered around by officials and guards with mentalities that would make Hottentots appears college graduates. Long silent lines, long whispering lines, waiting for the signal of a club to move forward. Food that must have been made uneatable by design. Yes, Larry learned a few additional facts about the shady side of life. He came to discover that questions which were of no consequence in the outside world in here often became mountains of importance—Little pin pricks turned into deathly hatred—Drops of gall that made men kill. He learned of vile degeneracies bred in the dankness of prison nights, in the mouldy shadows of deadening prison days—whispered from cell to cell. Yes, Larry learned that it is not good for man to be alone. But of all this, the kind ladies and gents being shown the prison as if it was a zoological garden—of this they were not told at all.

He learned of prison finks and rats—guards and warden's pets. But Larry also learned that deep friendship may bloom behind prison walls. He learned of men who had stood pat, men who had gone to the hole rather than to snitch on a pal or fellow con.

And now and again, the prison's wildcat siren splits the air. All hands are herded to their cells. Guards excitedly count and recount the galleries. Finally the missing number is located—One short on five! At regular intervals, the siren shrieks its warning blasts out over the Kansas hills. Out in a ditch, or in a lone barn, the escaped prisoner lies hiding, his heart pounding in wild fear—"The bastards have found that I beat it!" Out on the Kansas hills, Kansas hoosiers are getting their shooting irons ready, slavering at the mouth in greedy expectancy of the hundred dollars allowed for the capture of an escaped convict.

Perhaps next morning it is whispered that he was brought back. A few weeks later, he emerges from isolation, palid and shaky. He blinks against the strong light of day. A large red 3 has been placed above his convict number. He has now to make himself accustomed to the fact that all his good time is gone—that it will be a long time before the 3 will be removed so that he may again have his petty, but all important privileges restored. Larry kept his promise to Ella. His first weekly letter went to her. It was short and laconic—he had not yet become used to having a prison censor peer into his privacy. He told her he had arrived—how to send her letters, should she want to drop him a line—am getting along as well as could be expected—Take good care of yourself.

But Ella had already found out a few things. From the authorities, she had learned what a prisoner could and could not receive. And to Larry, she sent the limit. Every other week a package of fruit. Now and then a money order for tobacco—but best of all—books. And for weeks, Larry's weekly letter became indignant protests. He returned her money. A few days later he finds in his cell a slip from the record clerk to the effect that such and such an amount has been placed to his credit. In the evening, a letter, properly opened by the censor, is thrown through the bars by the guard. It is from Ella, requesting him not to make things harder for himself. She is working—May she not, please, do little things for him to make his life a little more bearable? And long letters come from her regularly. They become the bright points in his life.

And Larry settles down to prison life. From the record clerk's office he receives the information that with the prescribed time off for good behavior, he will see the outside world in six years and eight months. In the day time, he works in the stone shop with a number of others—post office bandits, counterfeiters, mail defrauders—some intelligent and keen witted, others as stupid as Paddy's pig. He trains himself to forget the outside. He bends all his efforts to keep himself in trim. His spare hours, he spends reading and digesting what he reads. With all his might, he must forget that he has to spend six years here—perhaps ten, all depending upon future fickle circumstances.

Yes, Larry learns all the ropes, all the ins and outs of the Big House. The days go. Summer comes to an end and one fine morning the prison yard is covered with a glimmering carpet of beautiful snow. For a day it lies there white and lovely. Then it becomes specked and foul with soot from the power house smokestack. And then Christmas comes. A tender letter from Ella and the little presents he may receive. There are a few extra things on the tables in the mess hall. The prison band blares forth tunes appropriate for the season. On the visitors' gallery, two girls appear and sing Heilige Nacht. The convicts stare at them greedily. Then life settles back into prison routine again and winter creeps forward on leaden feet toward another spring.

And the years became pages in the tome of time. Larry tried to make of the outside world a mere haze of faint memories. He tried not to think of what lay outside the red brick wall. But Ella's letters came as constant reminders that the world was there as much as ever. Larry tried not to think of her. But at night when taps had been blown and the light went out, and he lay gazing through the barred windows at the stars in the black sky, she came to him. She came vividly. He could recall little things about her that he thought he had never noticed in the court room. He saw again the dark dress she had worn and the soft white collar on her shoulders. He saw her as she walked with him in the corridor. He looked again into her gray, wide-apart eyes, clear and beautiful as the lakes of his native north. Yes, she came to him in the sleepless prison nights.

And as his time came near the end, she wrote to him that she was going to Seattle—"You will come there to me, won't you?"

Larry was walking down the long corridor leading through the administration building to the outer gates. He had been dressed out. A runner was leading the way. In his hand he held a white slip. As they came to the double barred outer gates, he handed it to the guard. The gates swung open and Larry Holman stood on the outside again.

There comes to a man now and then a day in his life he will never forget. Over the Kansas hills lay the warm light of a late Summer's day. Here and there, the leaves of the oaks were turning yellow—harbingers of autumn. Larry stood still and looked up into the blue ether. His gaze followed the horizon.—How immense the world was! He had been given a ticket for the street car going to town. But Larry wanted to walk—to feel the earth under his feet again. A dog came toward him. It wagged its tail, as if to say, "You're a pretty good Joe, aren't you?" Larry stooped to pet it. It lifted its head and licked his hands—thus he received his first greeting in the outside world.

The train was speading westward through the night. Its wheels sang their staccato clickety-clack—clickety-clack. Larry could not sleep. He sat gazing into the black, wooly night. Now and again, he would take from his pocket Ella's last letter and re-read it. He tried to figure in what part of Seattle the address she had given could be. And morning crept over the plains and in the west loomed the sawtoothed pinnacles of the Rockies. Now and then a stiff with a bundle on his back would stand off on the right-of-way while the train speeded by. He stood there so alone as if he were the last human in the world. And the groaning train began to climb the grade through the mountains. Larry saw again turbulent streams roar through ravines. He felt in his nostrils the warm fragrance of sun-heated pines.

Another night with stars glittering in the dark sky like islets of fire in a black sea, and the outlines of Seattle came through the morning's haze.

Larry sprang from the train and walked through the station. His eyes sought Ella.—Well, it was early and maybe she had misunderstood his last letter as to the time of his arrival. Or perhaps she had changed in those six years to the extent that he didn't know her. He walked to the street and there by the side of a taxi cab, she stood.

Laughing and with outstretched hands, she came to him. Free and unashamed, she kissed him. Larry looked into her gray, wideapart eyes.—Yes, they were lovely eyes, clear and beautiful as the lakes up north.

She gave an order to the driver. He swung the cab and speeded across the lower part of the city toward West Seattle. Before a small house perched high on a hill, he came to a stop. Ella said:

"Come, this is where I have been waiting for you."

They walked through the rooms together. Ella asked questions. Now and again she would stop and look at Larry intensely as if to make sure that her senses were not playing her false. Then she said:

"And now, we shall have breakfast—You and I, Larry—the first meal we ever had together."

And with deft hands, she prepared the food and the fragrance of coffee filled the rooms. They sat eating together and chatted over the thousand and one things that came into their minds. They talked of the future—of their future together. Larry had to tell of the prison. In a few simple words, he told her of what she had meant to him in those years. He told her what the books she had sent him had meant—of what they had taught him. He said:

"Soon I shall go out and hunt myself a job. I shall try to take up life where I left off—only now we are two. I have learned in the years that have passed where I fit in. Through practical experiences and reading, I have learned what this class struggle means. I feel no compunction over the fink that I had to bump off—it was either him or my fellow workers. They took six of the best years of my life, and that is okay with me. I shall enter the ranks of the workers again, just as another worker, and I shall do what I can to help enlighten those who still believe that there is a pot of gold awaiting them at the next turn of the road. I shall help to make them see that the only solution, their only way out, is through organization, through the power of class solidarity."

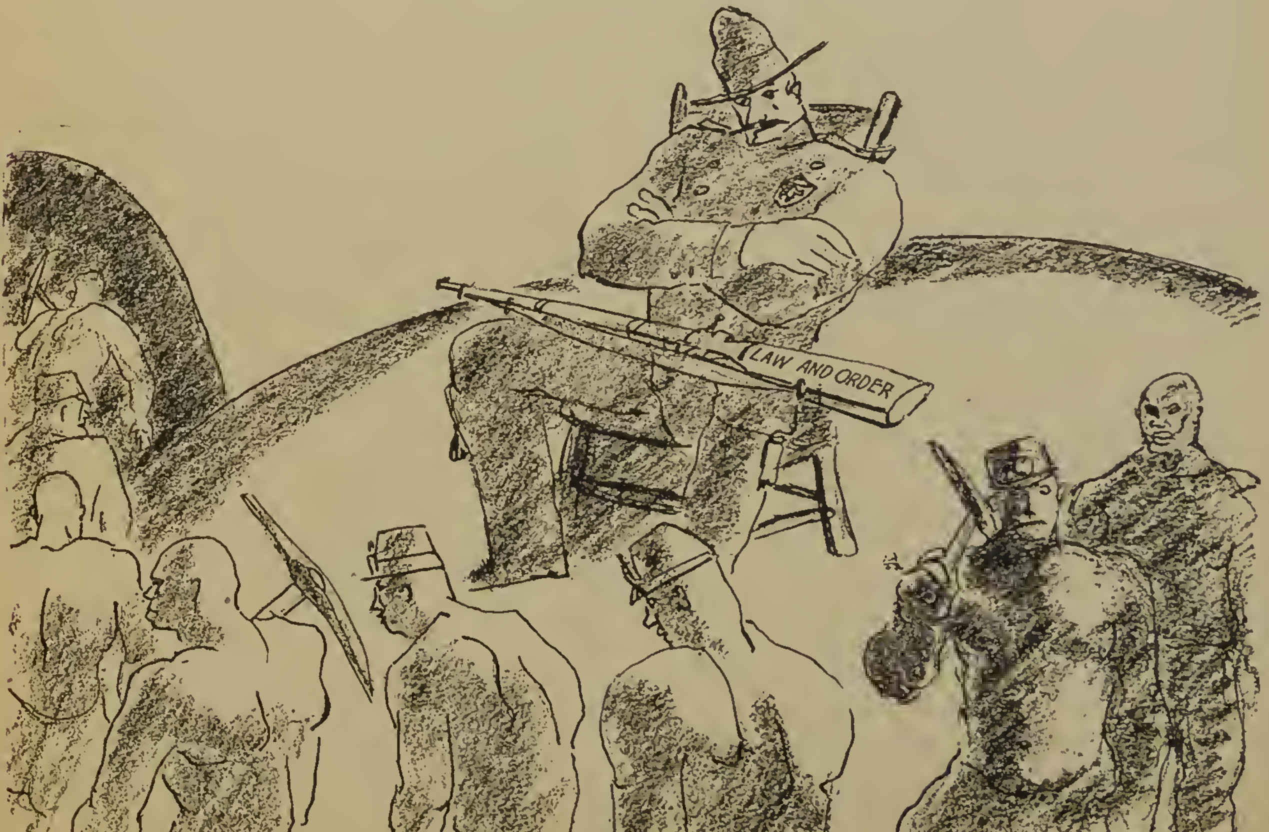
In the night, they sat together under a tree on the hillside. Below them lay the bay with the light of the city gamboling in its rolling waves. A ferry was crossing from Seattle. A hoarse blast from a steamer gave warning that it was on its way. And on the hills of Seattle, the lights shone in the mansions of those with limousines, in the shacks of those with only weary feet to carry them over the roads of life. They sat together. Ella said:

"It is lovely to have you here.—It is good to know that you are free."

But Larry sat silent. He drank in the night. He let the presence, the fragrance and loveliness of the woman by his side sink into his hungry being. Then he said: "Yes, it is good to be here."

The End.



"Speak No Ill of the Dead"

By RALPH VERLAINE

X229442 I. U. 620

A platitude is challenged. A militant working class silently rejoices. The master class mourns the loss of a labor lieutenant.

He is dead. A career of smooth, slick, and unconscionable betrayal of working class aims is finished amidst drippingly tearful and maudlin obituaries splashed lavishly across the pages of the kept press throughout the world. King and capitalist wear long elegiac faces at his passing. Militant working class hearts thump with freshly revived hopes.

Born in Scotland in 1866, a son of an agricultural worker, he yearned in early life for the lucrative limelight of unchallenged leadership and proceeded in his maturing youth to bend his efforts in the direction of his dreamy goal. With a scanty academic education completed, he migrated to the City of London to acquire employment as an addresser of envelopes; next, as an invoice clerk. His leisure moments he dedicated to study that prepared him for a brief and spasmodic journalistic career. At eighteen he joined the Socialist Democratic Federation, a radical organization reflecting the revolutionary ideologies of Karl Marx with a dash of Bakunin. At twenty-two he became a secretarial attache of an aspiring statesman from whom he learned the tortuous, zig-zag trails and by-paths that form the course of a politician's life. Through close association with his liberal employer he became saturated with the sweet intellectual poisons of liberalistic opinion, absorbing bourgeois psychologies with the facility of a damp mop picking up dust. With one foot in the bailiwick of the radicals and the other in the camp of the Liberals, he began to fashion a super-opportunistic philosophy of his own.

The advocacy of "dynamite against the capitalists" by the Marxist Socialist Federation proved too harsh a dish for his palate and he withdrew to enter the polite Fabian Society, comprised of such personalities as Sidney and Beatrice Webb, George Bernard Shaw, H. G. Wells, and other notables in the realm of letters. It was here he divested himself of his last shreds of class-struggle influence, and polished his vocabulary of idealistic gradualness and peaceful evolution that permeated all his writings and speeches. In his book "Socialism" he wrote, "The foreign outlook, phrases and criticism of the Socialist Democratic Federation never quite fitted themselves into British conditions; whilst the Fabian Society, much more successful in adapting socialism to British evolution, never succeeded in applying it to the movements of contemporary politics, and never faced the problem of how to organize the masses so they might be available for the advancement of socialist legislation."

When the Independent Labor Party of England was formed in 1893 by Kier Hardie, a colorful Scottish miner, John Burns and Tom Mann, and supported by Friedrich Engels, he did not join, but waited patiently for a year while it grew in membership and exploitability.

He, with twenty-eight other candidates ran for office in the general elections of the House of Commons in 1895. "Nationalization of land and public control of the means of production, distribution and exchange" were among the platform planks. Wage-workers showed an apathy for the new politics, and the support of the petit-bourgeois shopkeepers was nil.

A rash of long and momentous strikes broke out among the coal miners and metal and machinery workers in 1896 and 1897. Picketing was legally forbidden, and the State declared the union responsible for the illegal actions of union men. The House of Lords in 1900, acting as the highest tribunal, decided against a union, forcing it to remit damages in the case of the Taff-Vale Railway versus its angry organized employes. The workers were champing to take direct action against the masters and their "slugging committee," the State, to break the law en masse, and force the government into static docility. But the trade union officials, aided and abetted by the leading lights of the Labor Party, quelled the incipient wave of revolt with the oil of political oratory; in brief, they convinced large sections of the wage-earning class to substitute the useless use of the ballot for the guaranteed efficacy of job-action. The Labor Party grew and elected two candidates in 1900.

So What?

The iniquitous Taff-Vale decision was reversed in 1906. The Labor Party claimed a victory. But the truth of the reversal is that union strong boxes had been looted by the government's habitually handing down decisions favorable to the prosecuting corporations, and the workers began ominously to murmur and grumble against this too obvious collusion between "their democratic parliamentary government" and autocratic organized capital. The change in the law was motivated by the desire on the part of the government to avert serious industrial conflicts, the inevitable crystallization of working class moodiness. It was clearly a victory for direct action—not for the Labor Party.

From 1911 to 1914, the English toilers, weary of the promises of labor politicians and leaders, were forced by the sheer economic pressure of decreased wages and increased prices to resort to the syndicalist tactics of direct action. Strikes flared in one industry after another, and frequently in several industries at the same time, to the horror of the bourgeoisie who feared a revolution at hand. Workers decided it was better to starve in idleness than add to hunger and privation the added pain of labor. The flames of unrest leaped to new heights in the history of the British Labor movement, only to be smothered by the smashing thunderclaps of war over Europe.

Conservative labor leaders collaborated with the masters to convince the workers via press and public speech that German competition was the root of English working class poverty, and enlisted the lives and services of the wage-slaves to fight again another war for the benefit of the master class.

The embalmed villian of our piece, floridly called for peace amidst ubiquitous cries for war, a voice in the wilderness. His attitude made him internationally conspicuous. Despite all his labor treacheries, some radicals of today try to mitigate his crimes against the working class by exaggerating the courage of his stand against the mass murder of war; but upon a more studious inspection of his life, it can be discovered he succumbed to the philosophy of the bitter-enders.

In a letter to the mayor of Liechester he wrote, "Victory, therefore, must be ours. England is not played out. Her mission is to be accomplished. She can, if she would, take the place of esteemed honor among the democracies of the world, and if peace is to come with healing on her wings the democracies of the world must be her guardians. There should be no doubt about this. We cannot go back now, nor can we turn to the right or left. We must go straight through." And in parliament he tersely proclaimed, "This country, if it retains any shred of honor at all, cannot accept a peace which means the sacrifice of Belgium's sovereignty to any extent."

The foregoing paragraph is hardly evidence of unbending pacifistic bravery. It leaves one with the conviction he was opportunistic even in his objection to war; that, while trying to create an enduring reputation as a pacifist, he capitulated to the greed of the war-mongers.

After the war the dole and unemployment insurance were granted, in order to forestall an imminent revolutionary clash of the classes, according to the testimony of Lloyd George and Lord Derby.

The rotting corpse, the ghost of our story, was alive to the issues then, writing pamphlets, tracts and treatises against syndicalist activity in a country where the peaceful ballot was available to the workers. He proved himself a capable defender of the status quo and won the undying admiration of a frightened capitalist society, without estranging himself from the working class.

Miners

In 1921, miners faced coal operators who demanded an increasing pillage of profits from the black wealth wrung from the toil of those who sweat in the murky bowels of the earth. To assure the success of their impending strike the support of the transport and railway workers was solicited, creating the "Triple Alliance" of British labor. However, the leaders of the railway workers decided against the will of the rank and file, and cancelled participation in the proposed strike. The betrayal has become famous as the "Black Friday" of the English labor movement, and is connected always with the name of J. H. Thomas, official of the railway workers' union, and later member of three cabinets in the country's "Labor Government."

The miners suffered the cruellest defeat in the annals of British labor, accepting humiliating wage cuts totaling $2,500,000,000 yearly. The labor leaders and pink political charlatans injected through the hypodermic needle of class-collaborationist propaganda the virus of working class defeatism from which the British wage-slaves have not completely recovered to this day. The only sop for the bitter tears of misery the outstanding labor champion could throw to the beaten workers was: "The defeat of the miners in the coal lock-out turned the tide toward political action. The effect has been to emphasize the political aspect, the importance of public opinion and parliamentary control. The British labor movement is at heart more political than industrial in its emphasis and is consciós of this." Thus the workers were asked to cease fighting for higher wages and shorter hours and to bend their energies toward putting new faces in high places of government.

In 1923 the King estimated him the only man capable of restoring a modicum of England's parliamentary glory, the only man who could dress the windows of decadent capitalism and give them the effect of scintillating brilliance. He was royally asked to form a cabinet.

Three years later the miners, facing a deeper wage-cut were ready to resist the masters' greed for increased profits once more. Direct action again was showing its effective fist among the workers. Economic pressure, not a lofty intellectual appreciation of the logic of direct action, forced its use in this instance, even as it determines, in the last analysis, all human conduct and shapes the course of history.

The King's Cabinet Former again attempted to channelize the wrath of the miners with . . . "There is talk about the miners, railwaymen and engineers coming to an agreement. No greater calamity could come over the country than that there should be raised a great block of unions on the one side and capital on the other engaged in a great suicidal fight in industry. What I want to see is a real combination of workmen demanding their rights and doing their duty to society while they are making that demand, and so appealing to the moral and intelligent sense of society that public opinion would stand by them and see them through their difficulties. The biggest union that can support the miners is the union of public opinion and reason. I want to see every right-thinking man and woman, whether railwayman, engineer, or in any other trade, stand by the miners in their claim for a living wage and decent human conditions; I want to see all organs of public opinion, the churches and the chapels, the House of Commons itself, stand by and see the miner gets his due and is not sacrificed to profit-making capitalism."

In brief, this messiah of England's working class, endeavored to assure the wage-slaves their hopes lay in the sickly altruism of the very institutions and side-shows of capitalism!

The Big Strike

Three million workers abandoned their jobs on May 3, 1926 in sympathy with the miners. Day by day the strike grew in numbers and momentum, until it acquired the earmarks of a General Strike. The King's union, representing the Labor Party, and J. H. Thomas of "Black Friday" fame were on the General Council in charge of the strike. Both declared themselves opposed to the whole demonstration. Both did much to officially break it. The strike was called off ten days after it began. The cause of the miners was again defeated.

Claiming to be a socialist, he served the propertied interests with scrupulous conscientiousness; as a leader of labor, he strained every energy to deprive the workers of their power to strike; as a man of broad internationalist feelings, he deprived exiled radicals of the right of asylum on British shores; as a nemesis of fascism, he violated every capitalist-democratic precept by withholding information from his "peers and his people." While appealing to the working class, he spoke and wrote in the terms of "the people," "the whole people," "the nation," "the community," never in the terms of "the workers," "the working class," or "labor."

This is not so much a condemnation of a man as it is the condemnation of an economic system that creates the type of human being he exemplified. In the battle for more of the good things of life, too frequently talented men of working class origin will attempt to acquire them at the expense of others. The gullibility of an improperly educated working class is their opportunity. The life of any labor leader, honestly delineated, should be a warning to the wage-slaving class that until it turns to itself, spurning all offers of assistance from governments and powerful personalities, every day is lost!

J. Ramsey MacDonald is dead! Long live faith in direct action methods!

FACTFUL FABLES

All About Civilizing The Uncivilized

Once upon a time the Coming ruling class of a great empire called Samsland decided the time had come, to Expand some more. Looking around for a place to dump their Surplus Products, ere long they fixed their eyes on the Land of Dixie as the best Undeveloped Market in sight. The more they gazed on it, the Juicier the Plum Looked and the Easier the Pickings.

Soon, therefore, their Patriotism and Indignation was stirred to the Nth Degree. "This Land," they said, "is indeed a fair and plenteous Prospect. It is a Shame to allow it to remain Undeveloped. The trouble with its inhabitants is that they are Too Lazy and Unprogressive. They have too much to Eat and too little Progress. We must do something about it!" And they Did.

After talking it over, and all Compromise failing, the usual happened. The Coming Class decided to declare a war "to make the Continent safe for Human Liberty and the Union." This was done, only the war lasted Four Years instead of the Ninety Days the Military Experts set for convincing the Dixieans of the error of their ways.

Anyhow, the Coming Class won the war, as usual. Having won it, they, of course, proceeded to carry out their Good Intention, which was to Civilize the Uncivilized. It was a long and painful process, but, finally, it succeeded. The Slaves were Freed. They were thereafter no longer attachd to their Jobs, nor their Jobs to Them. They were now, like their White Competitors, perfectly free to hunt a Master and, if they could find none, it was Just Too Bad for them, and that was all there was to it. Furthermore, their "Ol' Marseters" were also freed. Planters could now become Plutocrats, that is they could provided they had the Wherewithal. If they didn't, well, they, too, had to Work for a Living, just like Everybody Else; for all were now, under the New Dispensation, Free and Equal. Besides the Right to Work, if not the Opportunity, was generously guaranteed to all Able-bodied Citizens, regardless of Race, Creed, Color, or Previous Condition of Servitude. Better Still, Everybody, except Women, Imbeciles and Convicts, were given the Ballot and allowed to Vote as to whether the Republicans or Democrats should do the Talking and Skinning. Conquered and Conquerers were all Equal Before the Law. Nothing that bayonets could do to promote Progress was left undone.

It is not surprising, therefore, to learn that the Land of Dixie was soon on its way to a Highly Civilized State and destined to be one of the most Profitable Enterprises ever initiated. Its mines, forests, fields, water-power and petroleum ponds were seized on and so rapidly and Efficiently Developed that, today, one making a Survey of the Situation is compelled to admire if not approve of the Devastation accomplished in so brief a space of time. It is Perfectly Wonderful what the Coming Class did to their First Conquered Province. Schools, not only for the Supreme Whites, but for the "Niggers" even, rose on every hand. Churches and Factories and Slums blossomed side by side everywhere. All the Blessings of their Old Home Town, the Coming Class brought with them to the Land of their Desire. There, Down in Dixie as alsewhere, Progress and Poverty marched hand in hand, both, according to the Coming Class, being "God ordained" and "unescapable." "As it was in the Beginning," they said," so it will be in the End. Some men come into the World ready Bridled and Saddled and some Booted and Spurred ready to Ride them, by the Grace of God, Thomas Jefferson to the contrary notwithstanding." And did they ride? They Did, and No Maybe about it, for everywhere the Coming Class was triumphant.

Not a Superman or Slave is left in Dixie. Only Princes and Paupers dwell therein today. Where once Bumper Crops were regarded as Blessings showered by the Almighty on His People, they are now looked on as Calamities visited on them by a Malevolent Diety bent on taking away their Constitutional Right to a Fair Profit.

The Situation is, indeed, terrible to contemplate; for no sooner had Henry ben Wallace, the Greatest Secretary of Agriculture since Joseph ben Jacob, finished plowing under Ten Million Acres of Blooming Cotton in a Laudable Attempt to put more Rags on Naked Backs than here comes Father God and Mother Nature undoing all his Good Work by producing a Perfect Season which, in turn, enabled the Inefficient Sharecroppers to flood the Market again! This time with 18,243,000 Bales, the Biggest Crop of Cotton ever produced by the Backbones of the Republic.

As a consequence of this act of God, Nature and the Backbones in Sabotaging F. D. R.'s Plan to Produce Less in order to Have More, a dire peril threatens the Land of Dixie. This becomes clear, or should, when it is Known that Too Much Cotton down there means Less Clothes on their Backs, Less Food on their Tables, and More Bankruptcy, Want and Misery everywhere for Everybody. Yea! it means Even Worse—it means No Money to send North and East for Radios, Autos, Frigidaires and, and, Everything. Worse still, it means Unbalancing the Budget again, And that means, as you know, or Should know, the End of Everything in Sight.

Cvilizing the Uncivilized is Alright, but what's the use of Producing So Much of Too Much and being Forced thereby to go Naked and Hungry for our Pains?

It's a funny World in which we Pay Men to Produce Less in order that we may Have More," says John D. Rust. It sure is, it sure is!

For a Virtuous Working Class

By T-BONE SLIM

Always too late!

Yesterday they made a raid on subway spitters. A good way to win a home for the winter. Just splash out a mouthful of Copenhagen in the subway and another mouthful of Billingsgate in court and you're all set—90 days on the Island.

Cost of living coming down all the time—but you must live in jail.

Industrial Giants

An industry that can't support its workers should be junked. No use fooling around with it. Hang up our teeth properly on a nail and dedicate them to posterity. Let the politicians master the ceremonies, workingmen's friend preferably—you know it wouldn't do to have workingmen's enemies in there all the time.

Ten thousand dollars per annum they get for being labor's busom pal. Gawd! Heart and soul, and I don't believe they'd do it for a cent less.

An employer that can't so manipulate his slaves that they have plenty of salt herring and burlaps should be sent to an elementary school, and a child be put in charge of his works, to begin with. If then he doesn't learn, we can always use him peeling spuds or walking the dog. Industrial Giant! Put the glass on him or polish your specs.

All that blundering can't be ignorance.

Helpless

A country that can't nurture its workers or suckle its young may as well declare itself bankrupt and cease being a country, and sub-divide itself into cemetary lots (we've got to find use for it somehow).

A working class that can't pry a living from too mush of everything is pretty helpless—pretty helpless . . . well, not pretty, but helpless. They even have to be told to join the I. W. W.

Politicians can't give you anything, they can only take away from you—a one way street. You pay their wages. They tax you and then give you some of it back when you get pale around the gills. Don't get pale, that's bad . . . Here, have a plate of veal fricassee, I hate to throw it to the hounds.

Virtue

"Capital and Labor are just a big happy family," says the press. I suppose that means Capital is master and Labor is mistress, am I right? And the squaw does all the work? Right again? And never goes on squat-down strike?

Lena and Axel had busted a chair trying to sit on it both together. There was much racket and the missus upstairs hollers, "What are you doing, Lena, are you fighting?"

"No, missus, just loving."

"That's nice, Lena, don't fight."

Collaborate? So, Mr. Labor, if you're going to collaborate you may as well join the bosses' union where he can get at you better. If you already collaborate you are already in a bosses' union—a girl that listens is already seduced; a citizen that stops is already bummed.

Join Labor's One Big Union, put the bosses on the bum; learn to worship, honor, and obey your class and we'll hold a big communion, for to us all things are come.

Loyalty of Slaves vs Solidarity of Workers

By A. B. COBBS

The dictionary tells that the word "loyalty" means allegiance or obligation to government, a superior or to a principle. But from A to Z you will find no complementary word to express "allegiance or obligation" of governments or superiors toward inferiors. This is no oversight but results from the fact that the institutions that run the world take no heed of the welfare of those who toil. Whether a man comes from the farm, logging camp, mine or factory; regardless of his previous value as a producer; regardless of his docility to church, government or party, the day his needs prompt him to ask some show of appreciation, a mite more of what he has produced, every organ, every group that he has been loyal to, turns against him. He is a pariah, an agitator, a red, "He stirreth up the people, crucify him." Loyalty on our part is returned with contempt plus hatred.

A good place to see this one-sided loyalty in its simplest form is in a new country like the great plains of the West. Many years back Wyoming was seen to be a fine grazing place for all kinds of stock. The cattle-man came first with large herds to fatten on the rich grasses. Wyoming is a high plateau, not adapted to farming, and much of it is still government owned. It has had winters requiring much hay for winter feeding. Many men are needed in the summer to put up the hay, and to care for the cattle. In the fall the cattle are gathered; some are shipped to market, the rest pastured close to the hay-yards. The men who did the summer work are turned out to get through the winter as best they can.

An Age-Old Struggle

Into this paradise, slowly but surely the big sheep men drove their flocks. They, like the cattle kings, had use for many men during the warm months, to put up hay, take care of the lambs and shear the sheep. Like the others, they turned out the workers in the fall, to eat sage-brush and snowballs until spring.

Now cattle and sheep do not get on well together. Sheep eat the grass close to the ground and tramp down much more than they eat. So the cattle men decided to fight. The land, being government-owned, legal methods could not stop the sheep. So the cattle-men decided to use force. At first the "loyalty" of the men was relied on to maintain the rights of the owners: cow-punchers murdered herders and herders killed cow-boys. Later, both sides were reported to have hired professional bad men and killers from the cities. A small war developed, troops were called in and a sort of compromise effected. But to the present time, jealousy and ill feeling smoulder in all the plains cauntry; sometimes it breaks out in a small way.

After the World War and the tractor had made horses scarce, some big companies were formed to buy western horses. Some were used for work purposes, some were butchered and canned for the European trade where horses meat is eaten. As soon as the horse outfits began to buy hay-land and to run in the wild horses, sheep-men and cattle-men almost forgot their old enmity to combine and make it hard on the horse runners.

But as the years go by a new feeling has developed and is further developing among those who do the work. Men who drive horses from the desert one year may work sheep or cattle the next. Towns are closer together and the auto makes travel and communication easier. Men who once fought each other, now eat at the same table and drink at the same bar. Experience has tamed the wild unreasoning loyalty of the early days.

Class Consciousness

Nowhere is manhood and loyalty held in higher regard, but time and hardships have mellowed and broadened the outlook of those who do the work in summer and have to ride the breadline in winter. The feeling of brotherhood and solidarity has taken root and in time will bear fruit.

That time will come sooner if we who see the need, will do what we can to cultivate and irrigate that feeling: we must fertilize it with the knowledge that loyalty to property and its owners breeds poverty and injustice: while solidarity with our fellow worker will bring a better world order.

The struggles between the cattle, sheep and horse ranchers were small compared to the events that transpired after the discovery of precious metals, the war with Mexico, and the freeing of the slaves in the South. People swarmed from every country on the Globe in an endeavor to obtain some of the new-found wealth. In this mad stampede all other fecings were crushed by greed for gain.

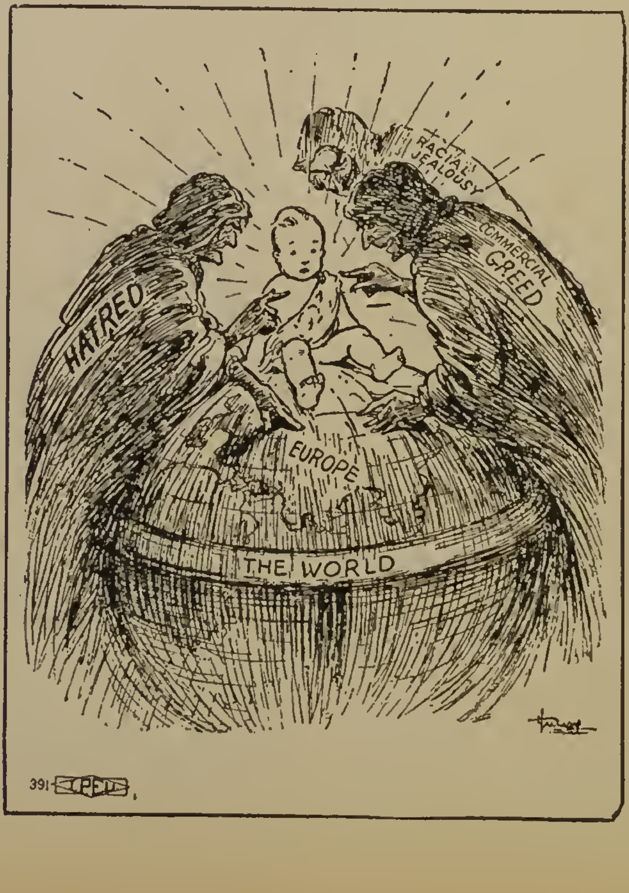
In a few years, however, the resources of this vast empire passed under the control of a few large corporations. Exploitation of the producers became as direct and raw as it had been under chattel slavery. The new conditions brought out a new form of loyalty, class solidarity, which found expression in the Western Federation of Miners and later in the formation of the Industrial Workers of the World. Under the banner of the latter organization the word "Solidarity," synonymous with the "One Big Union of Labor," had more meaning and was carried farther than ever before in the history of the world.

Ideas, no matter how valuable, must have an organization to back them up if they are to materialize. So when the World War came it found the new idea of Solidarity unable to withstand the attacks of age-old prejudices fostered by the phony institutions that support the owning class. State, Church, Press, and even the theater were used as advertising agencies to deceive the people. We were told that we were to fight for Freedom, Liberty, and "To Make the World Safe for Democracy." As soon as the war was over they told us brazenly that it had been a war for markets and to safeguard some loans Wall Street bankers had made to certain European nations.

The spirit of Solidarity was not dead: even in the midst of war it broke out in strikes, insurrections and finally in the Great Russian Revolution. Hope was entertained that a new and better world was to be born; but this dream turned into a night-mare. Labor unions were spied upon and disrupted; insurrections of workers and peasants were suppressed by fire and sword and Russia, with armed intervention from without and internal dissension within was turned into a land of desolation.

The effects of the Great Revolution were almost as disastrous in other countries as in the homeland. In all the world there was enthusiasm and hope for the new experiment. Yet there were thousands of cheap characters who used this feeling of Solidarity for their own advantage. The number or rats, finks, and shysters was so large in some of the radical groups that honest workers were crowded out. One organization was so foul that a judge stated from the bench that it appeared as though it had been promoted by the U. S. Department of Justice. The mental and moral equipment of the leaders of other-Pro-Soviet groups is so low that today the remark of Judge Anderson seems quite appropriate, when applied to them. Their conduct even more than events in Russia has turned the sympathy of the American people into suspicion and contempt.

But in spite of these back-sets the spirit of Solidarity moves forward. The English worker knows that the conquest of colonies lowers his own standard of living to that of the conquered races. The Italian worker will receive no benefit from the rape of Ethiopia; the German will get no good thing from the Nazi intervention in Spain. If Japan should conquer all of China, the Japanese workers and peasants will not receive one little grain of rice more than they do now. Loyalty to capitalist institutions has brought disaster to the workers: Solidarity among those who produce wealth will bring a better world.



Preamble of the Industrial Workers of the World

The working class and the employing class have nothing in common. There can be no peace so long as hunger and want are found among millions of working people and the few, who make up the employing class, have all the good things of life.

Between these two classes a struggle must go on until the workers of the world organize as a class, take possession of the earth and the machinery of production, and abolish the wage system.

We find that the centering of the management of industries into fewer and fewer hands makes the trade unions unable to cope with the ever growing power of the employing class. The trade unions foster a state of affairs which allows one set of workers to be pitted against another set of workers in the same industry, thereby helping defeat one another in wage wars. Moreover, the trade unions aid the employing class to mislead the workers into the belief that the working class have interests in common with their employers.

These conditions can be changed and the interest of the working class upheld only by an organization formed in such a way that all its members in any one industry, or in all industries if necessary, cease work whenever a strike or lockout is on in any department thereof, thus making an injury to one an injury to all.

Instead of the conservative motto, "A fair day's wage for a fair day's work," we must inscribe on our banner the revolutionary watchword, "Abolition of the wage system."

It is the historic mission of the working class to do away with capitalism. The army of production must be organized, not only for the every-day struggle with capitalists, but also to carry on production when capitalism shall have been overthrown. By organizing industrially we are forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old.

THE FOUR-HOUR DAY

Business people who live directly, or politicians who live indirectly, from profits, should not be consulted on any grave economic problem such as that presented by the poverty of millions of Americans at a time when all could be enjoying life with abundance. These people may know the answer but if they do they are going to keep it quiet.

The way to end poverty is to put more people to work. Wealth, the opposite of poverty, comes from work, and from no other source. Now if all those who swill in idleness as well as those who hunger in unemployment were put to useful work along with those already working, it would help. If those who now work at useless occupations —contributing nothing to human knowledge, wealth, or pleasure— were added, the army of labor would grow to such proportions that wealth would roll out in such profusion that poverty would fade away, never to return.

Naturally, the work would have to be divided among the workers and that means the leisure would be divided up too. There would be no more over-work with poverty, unemployment with starvation, or parasitic idleness with stolen wealth.

That's a workers' program for the solution of economic problems. and in spite of the fact that employers don't like it the workers can put it over.

Yes, it's a big job but modern labor is equal to handling many big jobs as it has often shown. The way to start on this one is to organize in the I. W. W. and take the four-hour day.

Unionism at the Crossroads

By

A FORMER COAL MINER

An industrial union without rank and file rule, instead of being a powerful instrument in the hands of the workers, is an industrial stockade wherein workers are herded and regimented like sheep or cattle in a stockyard corral.

The maritime unions of the Pacific are in the grip of a serious crisis. In fact American labor, as a whole, is at the crossroads. The sinister forces that prepared the stage settings for the triumphant entry of the black hordes of fascist reaction in Europe are busily engaged today on the American labor stage, (the trade unions), in the same nefarious intrigue which brought complete enslavement to the workers of Italy, Germany and other fascist countries of Europe.

In Pacific Maritime Federation we find that the splendid spirit of solidarity borne out of the struggles since '34, the invincible power generated through the closer cohesion of the component parts of the Federation and the comradely relationship that has sprung into being because of the shoulder to shoulder fight against the common foe—all of this is now threatened because of the intrigue and machinations of an unscrupulous coterie of peanut politicians, who believe in unity only if they are in the saddle with absolute power to direct the destiny of the union.

Lewisism

Working hand-in-hand with these admittedly disruptive political elements is the arch-betrayer John L. Lewis with his self-appointed "Committee for Industrial Organization." The keystone in the shaky arch of the C. I. O. is the United Mine Workers of America, of which Lewis is president.

Lewis' record in the United Mine Workers of America is the blackest page in the annals of American labor. The sell-outs and betrayals during his stewardship had almost completely wrecked the United Mine Workers of America when the resurgence of labor unionism swept over the country in 1933.

With a membership of 500,000 in 1921, through the disastrous leadership of Lewis, the U. M. W. of A. membership dropped to less than 100,000 in 1933. During his dictatorship the U. M. W. of A. had not won a strike until 1933 when Lewis began to pile up fishy "victories" with the help of Administrative forces and operator cooperation. Before 1933 Lewis was contemptuously referred to by the miners as "the swivel chair hero of a thousand lost battles." In the disastrous national bituminous strike of 1922 Lewis sold-out to the coal operators of the central competitive fields, (Ohio, Indiana, etc.) and left the miners of West Va. and Kentucky striking while the miners of the central competitive fields filled the orders and supplied the coal for industry. His entire tenure of office has been characterized by treachery, tyranical domination and open betrayal of the mine workers.

In 1933 the union Lewis had almost strangled to death was resuscitated by the spirit of unionism which was aroused in the rank and file of American labor by the lowering of their standard of living through the rapidly rising high cost of necessities. And Lewis, the shrewd and unscrupulous labor politician, held on to the dictatorship of the U. M. W. of A. with the connivance of coal operators and the intimidation of his army of pluguglies and under-world gunmen.

However, despite operator support and the assassination of over 100 union coal miners of Illinois by gunmen, the Illinois mine workers (District No. 12) refused to bow down under the chafing yoke of Lewis dictatorship. The Illinois district had always been the backbone of the U. M. W. of A., but today, under the Progressive Mine Workers of America, it has escaped the Lewis dictatorship, though only to fall back into the reactionary A. F. of L.

Lewis, Self-appointed Dictator

John L. Lewis who now raises the hue and cry against the machine-rule of the A. F. of L. Executive Council was never elected to his position in a fair and square election. Paradoxical as it may seem, Lewis actually appointed himself as president of the U. M. W. of A. When John P. White resigned as president of the U. M. W. of A. in order to devote his time to the operation of a silver mine in Colorado, Frank J. Hayes, as Vice-president, was automatically induced into the presidency. John L. Lewis, who was employed in the International office as a statistician, got himself appointed by the International Executive Board to fill out the unexpired term of Vice-president, made vacant by Hayes' induction into the presidency. Lewis then hatched a scheme for Hayes to make an extended tour of Europe to gather data about mines and the miners' unions. Frank J. Hayes being a drunk, Lewis then proceeded to grease the skids for Hayes upon his return and to prime the Executive Board for his own appointment to the presidency. Hayes played the sucker and swallowed the bait, hook, line, and sinker; and Lewis succeeded to the presidency of what was then the most powerful and militant labor organization in America, without even the formality of an election.

Elections that have been held since that time have been tragic farces. In fact Hitler's Nazi elections have been far more democratic. And the danger of being killed because of opposition is less in a Nazi election than in one conducted by the well-paid tools of John L. Lewis.

Miners Still Under Dictatorship

"He has changed, now," retort his Moscow stooges when rank and filers confront them with his record. But the facts concerning the present situation in the U. M. W. of A. will convince anyone that John L. Lewis hasn't changed any more than a leopard can change its spots. Of all the army of high-paid office holders in the U. M. W. of A. today, not one man has been elected to his office by the rank and file. Every one of them is an appointee of Lewis and holds his job by virtue of his blind obedience to the dictator. Any sympathy manifested by an appointee to the rank and file is sufficient cause for summary dismissal. Many of the district representatives were formerly employed by the coal operators as gunmen. In fact, to be a buffer between the operators and Lewis, on the one hand, and the rank and file on the other hand, the representative must be qualified as a gunman, as well as a yes-man.

Underground Rank and File Movement

But Lewisism has failed to crush the spirit of rank and file revolt in the miners' union. There is, today, a strong underground movement to get autonomy for the districts; that is, the right to elect their own district officials. In the 1936 convention, held in Washington, D. C., it required all the subtle maneuvering of Lewis, the intrigue of his Moscow stooges and much bloody work of his beef squads to defeat the resolution for rank and file elections in the districts. And, it will take more than all of those forces to stem the rapidly-gaining tide of rank and file revolt. The exact extent of the revolt cannot be accurately measured by Lewis' henchmen, even with the help of the Moscow G. P. U. Because of the danger of losing their jobs or their lives. the miners carry on the movement in the same secretive ways they so cleverly employed in the day of the Baldwin-Feltz gunmen regime. Only today they must be more careful, because the penalty for opposing Lewis is more severe than it was for "talking unionism" in the black days of the Baldwin-Feltz reign. An honest analysis of the present situation in the Miners' Union would reveal that more democratic rights are enjoyed by members of Nazi labor unions in Germany than are enjoyed by members of the U. M. W. of A.

C. I. O. A Self-appointed Committee

The Committee for Industrial Organization is the creature of Lewis and other labor skates of Lewis' stripe, with the help of some of the biggest exploiters in the country. Sidney Hillman, one of the committee, is the master stategist of class-collaboration. His success as a labor leader (?) is due, not to his popularity with the makers of men's clothes, but the his ability as an organizer of the bosses into associations for the maintenance of higher prices for men's clothes. Major Berry, czar of the Pressmen's Union, another member of the Committee is a multi-millionaire in addition to having the record of being a more effective strike-breaker than Bergoff or any other strike-breaking agency in America. One of his greatest strike-breaking feats was the crushing of the Allied Printers' Strike in New York City in 1923. This strike was so effective that there was only one four-page news sheet issued at the beginning of the strike. Each of the New York newspapers divided the space and put their paper's mast head at the head of their allotted columns, until Berry could get his strike-breaking machine functioning. He used the treasury of his organization to ship scabs from every spot in America and borrowed money from banks which was paid back from special assessments when the printers were later forced back to work. A good man for the Committee for Industrial Organization, eh, what! David Dubinsky of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union has, perhaps, the most progressive front of all the Committee, but rank and file rule in his organization is a mockery with the possible exception of Local No. 22. Antonini rules the Italian Local No. 89 with an iron hand, and a more crooked labor faker was never spawned in the slimy bog of labor politics than this character. He is one of Dubinsky's right-hand men.

John Brophy, the C. I. O. "Director" once headed the communist controlled "Save the Union Committee" in the Miners' Union and was the "white hope" of the communists when he ran against John L. Lewis for president of the U. M. W. of A. The Lewis steam-roller made mince meat of his candidacy. He than started to make his living peddling scab shirts. Later he begged forgiveness from czar Lewis and today serves his master as "Valet De Chambre." The others on the Committee are of about the same ilk as those described, and it would be a waste of space to elaborate in greater detail on these labor-betrayers.

Success of C. I. O. Smells Fishy

No intelligent working man can view the phenomenal "success" of the C. I. O. in the plants of the U. S. Steel Company, the General Motors Corporations and Chrysler Company without entertaining the thought that class- collaboration played a hand in these "victories."

When the C. I. O. made its appearance on the stage, the workers in U. S. Steel and the auto industry had already begun the organization of independent rank and file unions. The rapidly rising cost of the necessities of life was lowering their standard of living and driving them to organize for self-preservation. The labor advisers of the steel and auto bosses, knowing something about the history of labor struggles, expected the workers to organize and initiate sporadic "irritation" strikes. The Roosevelt Administration also expected such to be a natural reaction of the workers to the devaluation of the dollar. The Brain Trusters fully understood that reducing the gold-content of the dollar would result in a general decrease in the real wages of the whole American working class, and consequently strike trouble.

Upon the basis of this knowledge, what better arrangement could be made than to have the workers organized in a controlled organization? Remember how General Johnson, W. P. A. Administrator, used to rave against the A. F. of L. and how he propagated "Vertical Union" with a level-headed leadership? Now, we can understand what was meant when John Lewis' Pacific stooge, Harry Bridges, reported to the District Committee of the National Maritime Union. Lewis stated that "the main job of the National Maritime Union was to eliminate the unnecessary job actions now prevalent on the vessels of the Atlantic and Gulf."

Quit Organizing the Unorganized to Disrupt the Organized

When the C. I. O. appointed themselves as the saviors of the American working class—they announced it as their avowed purpose to confine their activities exclusively to the task of organizing the unorganized in the mass production industries. To this the rank and file of the trade unions gave their blessing as well as material support. Little did they dream that they were arming an enemy that was biding its time for a treacherous attack on their own union. But, that is just exactly what has happened. Today, the C. I. O. has drifted far afield from its original policy of "organizing the unorganized" and is now engaged in a slimy game of political intrigue that has for its objective rule or ruin of the independent unions that already have 100% organization in their respective fields. In fact, the task of organizing the unorganized has been almost completely abandoned in favor of the policy of capturing existing unions to be used for political purposes.

Strange Bed Fellows

The C. I. O. has attracted to its organization staff the most disreputable aggregation of blood suckers that ever stuck their beaks in the bowed backs of the oppressed workers. Disqualified professors, unemployed scissor-sharpeners, Delancy street shoe-string peddlers, free-lance soap boxers, wagon-men, tinkers, back-sliding sky pilots, and a motley assortment of variegated peanut politicians, all vie, one with another, to shout from the housetops, praises for the name of him who is their common benefactor: "The greatest labor leader of all time," and this is echoed backward and forth frem every rostrum of the C. I. O.

In addition to the parrots mentioned above, the C. I. O. has a propaganda machine, seemingly of limitless financial resources, which turns out tons of leaflets, pamphlets and press releases written by highly-paid intellectual prostitutes. And every word is designed to dope the brain of the American worker while casting a halo about the head that has hatched more schemes for betraying the workers and regimenting them in straight-jacket "unions" than any other labor faker who ever appeared on the American scene. The communist propaganda machinery also functions as an auxiliary in making a tin Jesus out of this arch-betrayer of American labor.

The coalition of communists and other faker elements with Lewis to straight-jacket labor in regimented unions constitutes one of the most unholy alliances ever consummated by enemies of the working class. Yet, there is nothing accidental about this conspiracy. "Birds of a feather flock together." The fundamental tenet of both their creeds is unquestioned obedience to the whimsical orders of an absolute dictator. Just as surely as the finer particles of sand filter through the larger pebbles and finally find their level at the bottom, so individuals of like natures through the logic of events, ultimately find a common stomping ground. In the case of the communists and Lewis, the stomping ground would seem to be the lives and destiny of the American workers.

Lewis and the communists have a tacit understanding to the effect that they "use each other" in furthering their own avowed separate ends but the intelligent element of the workers know full well the ends sought by each is a common goal—the regimentation of labor in straight-jacket unions and the harnessing of the unions to the bandwagon of a Labor Party.

Of course Lewis needs disciplined-briefcase organizers who will take orders without questioning the results of their action on the workers. And the commies considered themselves fortunate to get the opportunity to place their 13th St. (New York) "leader graduates" in a position to do a little "mass work." "Mass work," or more accurately speaking, organized disruption, is a requirement imposed on every party member.

In addition to the commies, "ham and egg" political careerists of all stripes have boarded the Lewis band wagon. Union halls will cease to be the council rooms where workers gather to discuss their present plight and formulate plans for economic salvation. Under the Lewis-Commie setup the union halls will become the arena where megalomaniac peanut politicians will bravely fight it out in lengthly word battles to the utter disgust and ultimate disaster of the workers. The union hall under the C. I. O. has already become the plaything of men who play the game of labor politics as a business.

The union hall must be kept free of these business politicians if labor is to make gains on the economic front. And that is why unions are organized in the first place. A labor union is an instrument of combat on the economic battlefront, the sector where the real fight is carried on. We organize unions to wring concessions from the bosses in the every-day struggle and through our experience we perfect the organizations to carry on the production of needed things when the economic collapse of the present system of exploitation makes possible the building of a new civilization. Furthermore, during the reign of dominant economic classes in previously existing systems of exploitation, the submerged class developed weapons of struggle peculiar to, and fitted only for itself. The instrument developed and successfully used against the feudal barons by our present masters was the parliamentary system. The tremendous sums of money necessary to carry on a political campaign precludes the possibility of the workers using this instrument in their struggle. The only instrument of combat the workers have used to advantage has been the economic union. It is something they grab on to instinctively in time of struggle, the same as a man will grab a club to fight off a wild beast.

Labor Party

But, despite the fact that all attempts of labor to organize a Labor Party have proven to be labor's undoing, all "wings" and "splinter groups" of the communist party, together with C. I. O. fakers, have been assiduously brewing this diabolical concoction for the past seven years in order to drug the minds of the workers to accept the dictatorial decrees of the political messiahs.

In the first place so-called "Labor" parties are never controlled by labor. And the record of "labor parties" in other countries is nothing but the sad story of sellouts and betrayals of the workers on the economic field for temporary advantage, or, pelf and place for the political leaders on the political stage. We only have to look to England and Ramsay McDonald for confirmation of that fact. Yet, every country in Europe has had its McDonalds and Hendersons. Men who sold the heritage of their class for a stinky mess of political pottage.

The workers have never controlled a so-called "labor party" because the composition of such a party is such that the workers can become nothing more than pawns in the game. Petty business men, ambitious lawyers, abortion doctors, ministers of the gospel phony liberals and homely widows suffering from unrequited love—all madly dickering for leadership over labor. And worst of all the farmer who works his "hay hands" from the rosy fingered dawn till the dismal setting of the summer's sun, too, would embrace labor, and for the same reason as the others—economic advantages. John Farmer like every other employer, seeks the services of working men for as small a wage as he can get them to work for; while on the other hand, the worker naturally tries to get as high wages as he can command. To talk about the unity of these two diametrically opposed groups is ridiculous.

But the "labor party" brew will be dished out soon by Lewis and his coming allies as indicated by the remarks of Lewis in a recent radio speach. This is score No. 1 for the communists, because Lewis has really "bent over" from his former position on the subject of a labor party. The perfection of the C. I. O. labor party political machine, however, will be the dawn of Lewis' day.

When the initial danger period is past, Lewis will use the commies to help eradicate the misguided organizers who have gone down the line sincerely believing that democratic procedure would be introduced after the initial organizational drive had been completed. Then will come the axe for the "splinter groups," Trotskyites, etc. And after the C. I. O. has put the new house in order, we can expect Lewis and the commies to get down to the work at hand—mass betrayal that will make pale into insignificance the wholesale betrayal of the German Workers by the commies. However, we are not so pessimistic as to believe that American workers have not profited by the disastrous mistakes of the German workers.

The history of the working class struggles, and especially those of Germany, proves that the workers lose faith in their union in proportion to the hope they place in political messiahs. The workers initiative is strangled, energy is dissipated and hope of economic salvation is killed in vain search for a mystical utopia in the boggy swamps of political opportunism.

Conditions Workers' Minds To Accept Fascism

And the greatest danger of all from a so-called labor party is this—it systematically conditions the working-class mind to succumb to fascist reaction without a struggle. Experimentations by Pavlof, the Russian scientist, and verified observations by Watson, American psychologist, prove conclusively that human and animal behavior on the whole is the result of conditioned reflexes. Constant repetition of a given function or, numerous reiterations of a statement tends to promote an automatic response. Men, for instance, who have served in the regular army, will stiffen up and assume a military bearing upon the approach of an army officer, even though they have been out of the army for years. In fact some have been seen to click their heels together and come to attention when suddenly confronted by a uniformed officer.

It is upon this scientific principle that all communist propaganda is based—the leaders of the communist party are infallible, and Lewis is a great labor leader going down the line with the communists! The principle is again used when they decide to assassinate the character of a rank and file leader who will not do their bidding. "If," correctly reason the communists, "we repeat often enough that Bill Smith is a counter-revolutionary and an enemy of the working class, the lie will take root and with constant repetition, become firmly embedded in the workers' minds." The communist propaganda machine in Germany had so doped the brain of the workers that they looked upon Thaelman as a demigod who could never lead them to defeat. Instead of placing their reliance in the economic unions, they centered their hopes in Thaelman. The disastrous result is now a matter of history. Just another communist mass betrayal added to that of Russia.

Spanish Workers Show The Way

Compare the capitulation of the German workers to the heroic struggle now being waged by the Spanish working class. The Spanish working class had not been exposed to as much of the "leadership opium" as their German comrades. On the contrary, they had a traditional rank and file, direct-action movement under the C. N. T. And when the motley assortment of political messiahs had thrown up their hands in despair and were ready to capitulate before the first onslaught of fascist reaction, it was the workers of the C. N. T. and the rank and file of U. G. T. who, with clubs, stones and improvised weapons climbed the barricades and showed the world what heroism really is. But their minds had not been conditioned to blindly accept the dictates of "infallible" leaders. They had learned that the emancipation of the workers can be achieved only through the action of the workers themselves.

C. I. O. Emasculates Industrial Unionism

Not only has the C. I. O. changed its policy of "organizing the unorganized" to one of disruption in existing unions, but it has distorted the very idea of industrial unonism. Industrial unionism means that all workers in a given industry be organized to act together. Certainly the C. I. O. Steel union, with over 200 separate contracts expiring at different times, is not an industrial union. Nor, is the U. M. W. of A., with over 30 separate district agreements, and industrial union in fact. An industrial union, if it is to be the genuine article, must be something more than merely, "industrial in form."

Industrial unionism in Lewis' hands has been "stretched" and "extended" as well as emasculated. His commie henchmen in their mad jurisdictional greed have gone so far toward mass organization as to organize workers of a cracker factory into the Auto Workers Union (Toledo). While in Passaic the C. I. O. commissars saw fit to decide that the proper industrial union for biscuit and cracker factory employees was in the Textile Workers Union. Of course conditions have changed considerably since the time when the commies were whooping it up back in New York for their own "little baby," "The Bath Towel Makers Industrial Union"! What the C. I. O. is really doing is giving the badge, "industrial union," to everything they can get into to mask the craft form of the setup and to conceal their reactionary intent.

C. I. O. Strike Breaker

The C. I. O., while still in its swaddling clothes, has a strike-breaking record, that must excite the envy of Bergoff and other scab-herding agencies. In Detroit the workers of the Gordon Baking Company pulled an effective sit-down strike and were about to win the fight when the C. I. O. entered the fray on the side of the boss. The strikers were members of the Bakery and Confectionary Workers International, a union that has fought for industrial unionism on the floor of every A. F. of L. convention since the idea was born. But this fact didn't deter Double Cross Lewis from breaking their strike. The strikers were tricked into vacating the plant and a crew of scabs already recruited moved in and took the places of the strikers.

Then Lewis' Detroit stooges proceed to organize the scabs with the blessings of the boss. The scabs, now members of United Bakery Workers of America No. 30 (C. I. O.) have been whitewashed while the union men who struck are walking the streets looking for a job. A strike at the Freihofer Baking Company plant at Philadelphia was broken by the C. I. O. with the help of police and private gunmen. The C. I. O. shipped their scabs through the picket lines under police protection in much the same fashion as Bergoff does his work. In Rochester, N. Y., they signed an agreement with a bakery concern providing for lower wages and proceeded forthwith to corral the workers into the Amalgamated Clothing Workers Union. How is that for scabbery and distortion of the idea of industrial unionism!

A Frankenstein

Ironical as it may seem, industrial unionism, which has been the hope of millions as signalizing the dawn of Industrial Democracy, is now being distorted by the protagonists of political dictatorship into a Frankenstein monster. An industrial union without rank and file rule, instead of being a powerful instrument in the hands of the workers, is an industrial stockade wherein workers herded and regimented like sheep or cattle in a stock-yard corral. The American working class must be aroused to the imminent danger that lurks behind these fake "industrial unions." We must defeat these would-be Hitlers and Stalins and establish the genuine article on the firm foundation of rank and file control.

Incipient Fascism

Upon the basis of the evidence we can come to no conclusion other than that the C. I. O. has all the earmarks of incipient fascism. If we blindly accept the orders, or, meekly acquiesce to these power-crazed dictators our minds will be conditioned to accept with enthusiasm the totalitarian state with all its accompanying misery, privation and abject slavery.

The Sun Goes Down

By COVINGTON HALL

I.

The Sun goes down, and over all
The blue-black curtains of nighttime fall;
The lights burst out along the street,
Adown which thud the workworn feet
Of regiments who day by day
The hand of Want and Famine stay,
Upon whose patient shoulders rest
The empires of the East and West.

II.

The sun goes down: the silent mill
Is lying dark and dumb and still,
A broading monster on the hill;
Its muscle, brain and hands are gone,—
The sullen Thing awaits the dawn,
The coming of creative mind,
By which alone the Thing may find
Itself alive, no longer dead;
For, come the morn, will sound the tread
Of those who serve it for their bread.
The great machine again will live,
Again their dole its servants give;
And they shall strike, rise, anger-rife,
Demanding of it peace and life;
And they who govern it will then
Throw larger crumbs unto its men;
And for awhile of joy and pain,
The mill will grind and grind again.
Then will the Leaders cry, "Well done!
A glorious vict'ry has been won!"

III.

The sun goes down; the world goes 'round,
And once again I hear the sound,
The muffled roar of workworn feet
As burst the lights along the street
Where seldom songs the farer greet;
And once again the soulless mill
Is lying dark and dumb and still,
A brooding monster on the hill;
A sphinx that has not answered once
The question asked by sage and dunce:
"What hold you in your womb, O Mill!
What, for the Massmen, do you will?
A wider world? A freer Race?
Or cringing Serviles begging "grace"
From those who scorn the calloused hand
And hunt the Thinkers from the land?"

The sun goes down, and over all
The blue-black curtains of nighttime fall.

Maritime Merry-Go-Round

By C. WEED

The year 1937 saw many happenings of major importance in the Marine Industry. The long drawn out Maritime strike terminated on the Eastern and Gulf coasts on January 24th. But, another vitally important issue arose . . . The Copeland-Bland Fink Book.

For several months prior to the strike the leadership of the Rank and File of the International Seamen's Union, had bitterly condemned this piece of anti-labor legislation. With the termination of the strike, the Communist element which was in the saddle in the Rank and File movement made a sudden about face and told the seamen to accept the book. "On May 1st we will take these books and make a huge bonfire with them in Washington," cried the leaders.

On the West Coast the Sailors Union of the Pacific took a determined and militant stand against the issuance of the Fink Books. "If you persist in forcing the men to take these books, we will tie every ship up against the docks," was the edict of the West Coast Sailors. Further in Frisco and other West Coast ports the S.U.P. secured injunctions restraining the Steamboat Inspectors offices from issuing the book.

On the East Coast the only organization that took the same militant, uncompromising stand was the Marine Transport Workers of the I.W.W. Numerically small, they picketed several of the steamboat inspectors' offices, and in the port of Philadelphia secured an injunction against the issuance of the book.

In the face of this militant opposition the government realized its impotence, and gave up the idea of being able to foist the book on the seamen without a bitter struggle; and compromised by making it optional for the men to take either a certificate of identification or the Fink Book.

Quick to jump on the bandwagen were the Commissars. They now told the men, "Turn in your Fink Books and take the certificate of identification." (We are still waiting for the May 1st bonfire on the capitol steps.)

For the three months immediately after the strike the old line I.S.U. continued to do most of the shipping. And although the Rank and File used every known method to capture the I.S.U., lock, stock, and barrel they were unsuccessful. Overnight, they formed a new union, and christened it . . . The National Maritime Union. At this time the C.I.O. was at its zenith, it was waging the big automobile strike and was receiving reams of publicity.

"Hi, Presto, we are C.I.O.," shouted the Stalinists, and thus was born the N.M.U. (To date January 1st, 1938, the N.M.U. has no C.I.O. or any other national charter.)

Immediately the disciples of Moscow were sent forth throughout the land to tell all and sundry, "At last we have democracy on the waterfronts. A Real Rank and File union, of seamen, by seamen, for seamen." And to prove it they absolved all FINKS from their past "errors," issued them books in the new union, and stamped therein: Strike Record Clear . . . C.I.O. . . . Henceforth the brothers shall not be known as FINKS but as misguided and misinformed brothers.

For the next four or five months the N.M.U. used the proven weapon of job action to batter reluctant shipowners into line. How successful they were is proven by the fact that at the end of the year 1937, 75 per cent of the shipping was being done by them. The baby had grown up, and was now a lusty man 52,000 strong. In fact he was beginning to show signs of thinking for himself. (Something the Commissars did not want him to do.) "This is a Wobbly plot," thundered the brain batteries of 11th Avenue.

"We must nip it in the bud at once. Why, the next thing we know the seamen will really be running this union. And then what would happen to our nice shiny pie cards? The PARTY would also feel the pinch, we would not be able to divert any of the seamen's monies towards it. This must stop!"

And so in the final weeks of 1937 we see the astounding parallel of a union which was built by Job Action, condemning Job Action. And threatening expulsion to any member who advocated or used it. To further their plans they dug down in their bag of tricks and pulled out the old reliable anasthetic—Relief. (Shades of the M. W. I. U.)

Thus we enter the year 1938 and briefly appraise the existing conditions in the maritime situation. On one hand we have a numerically powerful union—The N.M.U. Under the dictatorship of the Stalinists, a union whose policy is commited by the present officials to follow the party line. Where direct action is forbidden; the threat of expulsion being held over the head of any who dare to use it. A union which is making relief the paramount issue. A union with great economic strength, wasting it. And insiduously spreading the doctrine of a political party as the cure for the present chaotic conditions throughout the land.

A new entry into the picture is the newly formed A. F. of L. Seamen's Union. (The second in less than a year.) With a membership of possibly 5,000 mostly young, untrained seamen. A "union" with plenty of financial backing, a potential strike breaking agency. A nonentity.

And last but not least the Marine Transport Workers Industrial Union of the I.W.W. Numerically small, handicaped by lack of good speakers and finances. Its members are tried and proven, in the crucible of waterfront wars. By far the most enlightened of the maritime workers, they are spreading their message slowly but surely along the waterfronts. Hastening the day when all crafts, all coasts will be organized in the ONE BIG UNION.

A RADICAL IS MADE

By Beetee

"What makes a radical anyhow?"

We were lying around the fireplace, he on the davenport, I scattered over one chair and part of another. The room was dark but for the flaming glow of the fire. It was warm. We had eaten well and hoisted one or two. We had temporarily settled our differences of opinion in a rush of words, interruptions, raised voices—as though each feared he would not get a chance to get in his views before time ended. Pages from life were opening and closing, reminiscences, people, and ding philosophy.

My companion soloed a while and then, getting no answer, he kept right on, telling the story of how one rebel was made.

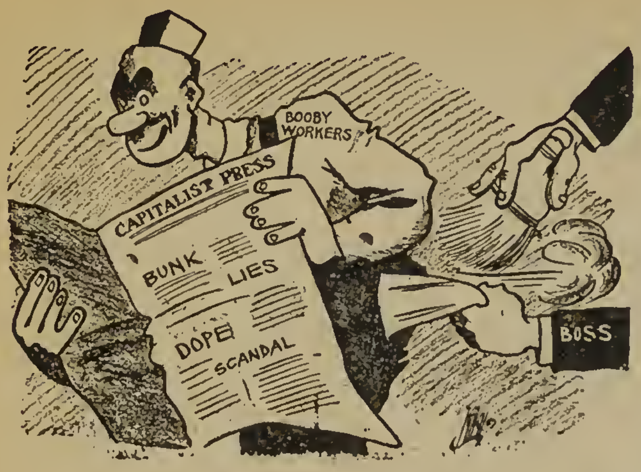
They are queer animals, radicals are. No one seems to know what makes them, or what makes them run when made. Some say that they are sensitive to the suffering around them, that they can't stand to see suffering and they become radical on that account. But I've seen some of them that wouldn't turn a hair at the most bloodcurdling affair. Others say it's because they are intelligent and know what it is all about and are motivated by the understanding that in a certain direction and in a manner of acting and talking to others, there lies a better way of living.

Well, I've met some that seemed to know nothing when you pinned them down to it and yet were as steadfast and as hard-fighting as those that thought they knew it all, or those who are forever bewailing the fate of some poor innocent brat thrown out to live on his own in this cruel world, and all that sob stuff. For instance, look at that fellow we were talking about a while ago.

I first ran into him in a can up in Fort William at the head of the Lakes. The government had banned freight train riding and had the mounties, those riders of the plain people, as the stiff calls them, who "get their man" by riding freight trains. He had just got out of doing thirty days for freight train riding in Sudbury and was picked up again at Nipigon and got thirty days more at the farm.

He was a big kid, about twenty years of age. Rather quiet. I didn't pay any attention to him until some fellow workers who got into a mixup at the Sioux Lookout government camp were transferred to Fort William. Their coming had been heralded and was looked forward to with interest as their activities had been getting quite a lot of publicity. The papers said they had run amok in riot and that one of them had tried to kill a "provie" with an axe. That was all lies, of course, but still they had the reputation.



It was an industrial farm we were in, run dormitory style which gave us a good chance to get together and talk. Well, those fellow workers got more questioning and advice on how they should have acted by the rest of the fish than they did from the bulls and judge. What was the I. W. W.? What did they want to bother about things like that for, worrying about the poor saps that didn't know how to make it? They could speak, they were wise guys that should get into some racket that paid. What did the wobs want anyhow? Weren't they just like communists and athiests? They sound like Christ-killers one moment and Christ himself the next. How would the I. W. W. work? Would there be any police? This was an important question. How about money? And women? Hah, it wouldn't work. The I. W. W. is crazy.

Lesson's in Jail

Every time a bunch got together it started all over again. And the fellow workers would bat it out with them over and over until "Tamarack Slim," the Oxford graduate screw, would annouce that they must foregather somewhere else.

The big kid would ask questions and listen and ask some more. He had a brother, a garment worker in Toronto who, he said, talked like the fellow workers at times.

There was a long-haired kid, in for riding freights too, who smart-cracked and capered around like I don't know what. He was skinny and sickly looking but seemed a pretty solid rascal. He was always playing sick and wouldn't work.

The big fellow kept looking up the fellow workers when they were by themselves and ask more questions. Some of the scissorbillest did that too. Someone radioed in the new General Strike pamphlet and we gave it to him to read. He came back and wanted to know if a libertarian was the same as a libertine which he had been reading about in "The Hush," a scandal sheet from Toronto.

When he was going out we gave him some letters to get out for us. Bill, one of the swampers who always boasted that he never worked for a living but made it boosting (he didn't count the years he put in jails as working) came to me with a look in his eyes as though he had seen the second coming and said:

"You never can tell about these guys. The last one I ever expected would leave his weed, passed it to me as he left. The big shoniker kid gave me a deck and a half."

Well, I thought, he has done a good turn for the reputation of his race and then just forgot about him. Just leaving tobacco in the jail when you leave doesn't make a radical.

About a year later I ran into him again. He came into the hall at Port Arthur just as the pulp workers' strike was due to break that fall. It appears that when he came out he went right over to the hall and lined up. He stayed on the picket line all through that strike and was one of those that took that 18-hour hike in below zero weather to catch the scabs in the camp before they were out of bed and to drive them out of the camp.

That winter he worked in the slave camps and he must have made every one of them that one winter. He was no sooner in one than he would get into an argument with the push and out he would be sent. Or he would get to talking about what should be done with the slave camps and they would give him his time. Several times, because he got quite hot when saying good bye to the push, they sent for the provincials but he made it out in time.

Finally they caught up with him at the air port camp at Nakina. They gave them clothes in the airport camps, old army issue; but as he lasted only a few days before the inevitable argument. They wanted to take the clothes off him. He wouldn't give them up and a provie was rushed in to arrest him. They took him to the town lockup but the camp workers pulled a strike and wouldn't go back to work until they were assured that he would be released and allowed to keep the clothes. But in the meantime the provie piled him on a speeder and took him down to Long Lac and from there to Port Arthur on the train. They gave him another thirty days although no one knew where he was until he was let out. I remember reading an article of his in the Industrial Worker where he related that they took not only the government issue of clothes from him but also some of his others.

In 1935 I ran into him again in Toronto. He hadn't had much schooling but he had been reading a lot and had ideas by this time. The trouble was that he had read something of everything and hadn't got it all straightened out in exact order. He was het up about Swedenborg. He wasn't religious but he figured that Swedenborg gave him an idea how to talk to the fellows that were religious. He got wised up to the commies by now too. He had always been of the opinion that our talk about the commies was a little biased but now he had changed his mind. I don't remember just what it was about. He talked of money, and Tim Buck's wife, and that commie woman who got a rap out of Estevan with Sam Scarlett that time. Whether there were any grounds for his story or not they were in his bad books.

Making the Harvest

He was working at a warehouse and the A. F. of L. and the A. C. C. L. were trying to organize the drivers. The A. C. C. L. seemed to be winning out by their patriotic talk so we thought we would attend the next meeting. We didn't get very far after the speaker made it plain in answer to our question that the truck drivers would have to go through picket lines if they had a contract. I was asked out at this point and he soon after. He lost his job a couple of days later.

We knocked around together for a few weeks when we could but he didn't care for dancing or girls. He wanted to read and argue about the commies and the I. W. W. I got him some anarchist pamphlets from the libertarian group there and soon he was using this as ammunition against his opponents. He seemed totally wrapped up in clearing up this mess of capitalism. If he had stayed there a few weeks longer he was going to act as chairman for soap boxers coming through.

Heading for the harvest later that summer I ran into him again in Winnipeg with a speaker that had been running some sort of summer school in Sault Ste. Marie. He was going out to help some 110 dings do some soapboxing. As we were all going the same way we threw in together. The mounties were riding the freights again and we got put off somewhere between Portage and the 'Peg and the next day they ran us up the North Canadian National line. It took us about a week to get to Saskatoon and in the meantime we learned a good deal of one another. He was getting more bull headed and argumentive all the time. But he was backing up his arguments with more facts. The only time he could keep out of arguments was when he was singing songs out of the little red song book. Quite a few things happened, and in our discussion of them we learned how they fit in the makeup of things in general.

We missed the freight out of Saskatoon to Rosetown on the Goose Lake line and so hit the highway. A fellow in a car picked us up and before long the driver and I were in an argument on economics. The driver was sympathetic to Bible Bill's Social Credit outfit in Alberta, but as he said, "with reservations." I might have known from that last crack what he was but didn't wise up until later.

I kept hedging him on Marxian economics without mentioning Marx because this fellow had said that he had a farm and, in spite of what commies say, old Charlie Marx and farmers don't mix. After driving about an hour he made a turn off our road so he let us out. Before driving off he gave us quite a spiel on how he would like to carry on the conversation and wondering what a fellow like me was doing bumming rides. He then introduced himself as the ex-premier of the province of Saskatchewan. Anderson, I think his name was.

The next fellow that picked us up was a farm implement salesman and in good spirits. He started talking about the good times coming for him and what was wrong with the working man was that he wanted too much wages. High wages were harmful to the working man he claimed and went on to tell us of an incident to prove his point.

He hadn't done any selling worth anything until recently. And then it appears that some I. W. W. agitators started organizing the harvest hands around Rosetown and were going to demand $6.00 per day for a six-hour day. They were doing a lot of talking and arguing with the farmers that were wanting men for ten hours for $2.00. The farmers got so excited at the propsect of having to pay such high wages or having trouble with the I. W. W. that they had been placing orders for combines so they could do their own threshing without hiring any help. More combines were sold in that district in those few weeks than had ever been known to sell there before. When he told the story I recalled the statement of the capitalist economist, Andrew Ure, of a century ago, that inventions are a "creation destined to restore order among the industrious class" and he added, that "when capital enlists science in her service the refractory hand of labor will be taught docility."

The petty-capitalist-farmer was going to teach the harvesters docility with the combine. The salesman owed the I. W. W. delegates a cut on the commission.

When we got to Rosetown we found, sure enough, the 110 delegates had been there, and did plenty of talking and sticking up stickers. But then he had moved on. So we caught the local heading towards Druid. As it was getting dark it started to blow and then hail. We were set out at some station but as it was still blowing we decided to hold it down until morning.

Next morning we found we were at Plenty and we also found that someone else besides the harvest hand had been taught a little meakness. Here the delegates had been busy too and the farmers had been buying combines. Grain that otherwise would have been cut and stooked had been left to ripen fit for the combine. What the hail hadn't laid low, it had shelled. The harvest hands started heading away from this section right now. The delegates we were looking for had been here and plastered the town with stickers and had moved on but that same day doubled back to Dodsland only to have some townspeople sic the police on them and they got three months in Prince Albert for "defacing property" with stickers.

A Fighting Radical

The big fellow and I broke up here. Each thought he knew a good spot to harvest. He wrote me that winter from a slave camp in British Columbia and wanted to get something started but as the other fellow workers thought it useless, I let it go by the board. Someone told me he was back in Toronto and then the next thing I hear of him is a head in the Industrial Worker this summer reading "Lou Walsh, Killed in Anti-Fascist Fight."

He went to Spain and got bumped off. And you know who was there too? That long-haired kid that was in the Fort William jail farm where I met Lou. He had an article in the One Big Union Monthly later last summer, telling about it. I guess he has grown up by now and cut his hair.

"I'll tell you no one knows what makes a radical but the memory of those two kids always stops me blowing my top about the youth of today. You never can tell when you are talking to the radical of tomorrow."

He stopped. It was quiet. The fire was dying out. I peered sharply to see his face for his voice was strange when he said:

"Hell, I feel like I sent Lou to Spain and his death."

MODERN MURDER

By GUSSIE PERLMAN

(Dedicated to Sacco and Vanzetti)

They kill no men as they used to do,
It was too gruesome a sight
To send a being to his doom
From nature's loftiest height;
Or to let him cry and groan
Under a torch and flame;
It is an eternal horror
An everlasting shame.

Then came this age of science
With wisdom most sublime
This era of defiance
The pet child of all time.
They tactfully have modified
The implements of war
Nor would they stone,
Nor break a bone
As in the days of yore.

No mocking cries of children
No shrieks, nor women's tears—
A ticking clock,
An electric shock—
Allayed are all the fears.
The gods now well may envy
The efficiency of men
Who hush a life within an hour
Create and crush again.

Here is a gift to mankind,
A brother in the nude;
Dissect his heart, dissect his brain,
Pray, tell us was he good?
O! Great men, you pure fine souls,
You find he was misfit,
To spend a life in men-made goals,
Or eat some beggar's bit?

Here us, you, we're all misfit
We, who cannot sing of bigots' gains
Nor send our blessings to the skies,
Our songs of praise for tears and pains!
We who cannot sink
Into the greedy sphere
Of ego's might
We who seek to live as men,
We who wish to stand upright.

Now we misfits shall strike a blow
At the robbers of our bread,
Of every slave a man shall grow,
Every despot shall be dead!

FOR HIS MASTERS' SAKE

By

BOB TROCHET

Dedicated to Fellow Worker Harry Owens and other members of the I. W. W. who fought and fell in the Spanish Civil War

You, just a witless Nazi soldier, are cringing against the wall of a trench. It is afternoon. The sun is bronze through the smoke.

Six nights ago, after you refused to accept the invitation to freedom that fell from the Spanish skies in myriad leaflets that eclipsed the sun, those strange, untrained but courageous fighters of the C. N. T.-F. A. I. took up the challenge of your stubborn mercenary generals, and laid down a barrage. It rubbed out all the front line—all but the short stretch of trench that shelters you. It rubbed out the front line as neatly as Generalissimo Francisco Franco has, no doubt, rubbed it out on his battle map back in his safe headquarters by now. Apparently he has also rubbed out your trench, along with the rest of the line. He thinks you were shattered and buried. You are forgotten! Lost! In six days no communication has reached you, not even fire from the anti-fascist forces. They do not know you're there.

A stray bullet has nipped the top from your ear. It is festering, and the pain spreads throbbing through your head.

Your stomach aches with emptiness. Sunday morning, at about the time you might be listening to your new Nazi religion were you at home in Berlin, you sucked your last gritty crumb of hard-tack, and scooped up some of the oily slime from the trench-bottom to wash it down.

You are not alone. There are about a hundred others in the trench. Some of them are unhurt; some are badly wounded. All the antiseptic and bandages were needed for the wounded. You could get none for your clipped ear. That is why it is festering.

You are cringing against the wall. Karl is standing next to you. He is too dumb to cringe. Back home he worked pouring steel for Krupp. That swastica ring on his little finger is his reward for piling up more surplus value for the Munition Kings in twelve hours than any other worker in the industry. He almost lost his precious little ring when a piece of shrapnel splattered the end of his finger into the mud. But it hardly bothered him. He just sucked the stub for awhile, and then let it hang down at his side. A drop of blood comes from the raw end every minute or so and drops into the water at his feet. You watch it drop while the afternoon passes. The sun begins to set. Still the blood oozes and falls. The water was brown this afternoon; now it's reddish. But that does not matter. Karl has lots of blood. He is as big as a horse, and his hand, even without the little finger, is the size of a fat ham like your Mutter used to serve for Sunday dinner . . . And you hated ham more than you hated Jews who hate ham, too. You fool!

Soon it will be night. Then you will lie down in the bottom of the trench and try to sleep. Karl can sleep standing up, like a horse. You envy him.

There is a commotion a few yards down the trench. It is an epauletted officer elbowing his way through. He uses the face of a corpse as a stepping stone to keep his feet dry. "I need more men to run a wire back to the next trench," you hear him growl lowly.

You strain your ears to catch his words, and that hurts. You wish to your new Aryan gods he would talk louder.

"Those murderous anarchists don't know we're here," he explains, "but if we run for it they'll see us and wipe us out. They'll place us before a firing squad if we surrender.

Those leaflets about freedom for all are lies. Vicious lies! A trick!"

He is fearful lest you fascist soldiers desert. You did talk about dropping your guns after you read that C. N. T.-F. A. I. leaflet, remember? But this same officer talked you out of it, even as he is doing now. "If I send a runner, he'll have to risk coming back again. The only thing to do is lay a wire to regimental headquarters, and get instructions . . . Who'll volunteer?"

All this, you think, is going to take time. You want to get out quick. "Let's make the rush!" you say.

"Shut your loud mouth!" says the officer, shoving you against the wall. You hit your ear. You want to kill him.

But before you can do anything, Karl says, "I'll go."

The officer nods, looks at the sky. "In two hours." He goes back down the trench.

Soon it is dark. You have almost forgotten about the wire. Then somebody nudges Karl, and he walks away, down the trench. You do not see them go over the top with the wire, though you are watching. You think you are tired enough now to go to sleep, and lay down in the trench. The water is as cold as ice tonight . . .

Someone wakes you up. "They've stopped dragging the line," he says.

You sit up. "Did they make it?" The mud and water drips from your back.

"Don't think so. Only about a hundred yards of wire came off the reel."

He crawls away.

It begins to rain. You roll over on your side, and go back to sleep. The sky is grey all around when you wake up. The rain keeps you from drying. You are stiff and yet shivering with the cold. You squat in the trench, thinking of nothing. You wish. You wish you had gone out with Karl last night.

Comes evening, and you get your chance. The officer, slopping in the rain, asks for volunteers to pick up the end of the wire and carry it on through. Will you stay in this hole and rot consciously, or will you go as Karl did and rot as Karl is rotting, unconsciously? Possibly, you will get through. Anything is better than this.

"I'll go," you mumble.

"In two hours," hisses the officer.

You wait nervously. You are anxious to be gone. With tormenting reluctance night hedges in. Hasn't two hours passed yet? At last somebody nudges you. You follow him down the trench.

Someone else climbs over with you. A shadow. You don't notice who. You don't care.

You snake your way along on your belly, letting the wire slide through your hands to make sure there are no breaks. Every few yards it is held out of the muck by a forked stick, a tangle of wire, a little pile of rocks, anything that came handy when Karl was pulling it thru last night. Somewhere ahead is food, water, bedding, comparative safety. You wriggle faster.

You lose the wire. You search to find it. A break, clean cut, as though by shears. This must be the end of the wire. This is as far as Karl went with it. Not far. You grip the end and worm ahead.

It is time to locate a support. You reach out your arm and feel around. You touch something sticking up, but you can't tell what it is because the gumbo is thick on your hands, like heavy gloves. You sidle nearer to it. But it is dark. You wish there were more light to see. There is. A star-shell flashes overhead. You look quickly at the thing you have found. It is a dead fore-arm reaching straight out of the mud. A huge forearm . . . with a hand like a fat ham . . . on the end of it. Most of the little finger is gone, but a swastica ring hugs faithfully to the stub. "Karl said he would take it through," you say to yourself. You hook the wire over the bent thumb, and crawl on . . . to give your life to the class that stays at home and waits for you to win their wars. Even if you fight and win . . . you lose! You still have a master. You still are a wage-slave. Perhaps, an unemployed and hungry one.

If you only knew the officer lied. Those anarcho-syndicalists told truths. They invited you to fight for yourself and your class . . . for freedom from the ravages of the wage system. You do think it was strange an anti-fascist aviator should fly over your trench and drop upon you nothing more lethal than a leaflet. He might have blown you to bits. Too late to consider the C. N. T.-F. A. I. message now. The earth is drinking your blood as it spurts from your neck . . .

All About Sitting in The Game

Once upon a time there was a Great Labor Statesman named Grand Chief Prenter. He rose to his Exalted Position by Seniority, that is to say, by his ability to hang on to his job until the guy next above him croaked. Then he stept into his shoes. The empties Prenter stept into were those of a still greater Wizard. His name was Grand Chief Stone, the originator of Business Unionism, which, to hear the Labor Statesmen tell it, was destined to give Socialism the Knockout Drops and make their version of Capitalism what it ought to be, a still greater blessing to all its beneficiaries.

The main idea seems to have been that the Unions would own the Banks and that the Brothers, being the Unions, would all get rich drawing Interest from Each Others' pockets, not to mention the Rents, Profits and Bonuses that would flow into the Altrurians' treasuries from coal fields, Florida swamps and Equitable Buildings, etc.

Hearing of the Plan to perfect the American Plan, the Saturday Evening Pest, official organ of the Best Babbitry, could not believe its ears. I don't blame them. Besides, the news sounded Too Good to be True, and Was. Anyhow, the Great Pest decided to Interview the Great Guy. It Did, the Interview running something like this:

"What, Mr. Prenter, is meant by Labor Capitalism?"

"Labor Capitalism means," replied Mr. Prenter, "that we of the Brotherhood are tired of sitting on the Sidelines and seeing all the Cream go to Capital. We have, therefore, decided to sit in on the Game and get our Fair Share of the products of Labor's toil."

"But how can you do that," inquired the astonished Pestman, "and at the same time Save our Country from Socialism?"

"Our operations," haughtily and confidently replied Mr. Prenter, "have proven that Marx and Lenin knew less about Economics than Gene Debs and Bill Haywood knew about Unionism. Beside Myself and my lamented Predecessor, all four were Pikers. We know what we are Talking About and they Didn't. They refused to Sit in On the Game. We welcomed the Opportunity to do so. And, what are the Consequences? Look at our Magnificent Business Enterprises. Look at our Chain of Banks stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Look at our fellow Labor Statesmen rushing to Get In On the Game before we get all the Gravy. Everywhere our Praise is being sung. Wall Street rings with Approval. All eyes are on Us because we have Proven that Labor can Sit In the Game with Capital and come out, not only with its Shirttails Intact, but with the Winnings. By so doing we have proved Marx and Lenin economic ignoramuses, Socialism false, and Saved our Country. It, our Country I mean, not Labor, owes us a debt of Gratitude it can never repay. However, the idea of Pay Day never entered our minds. Our motto always has been and still is 'Service'."

"Marvellous! Marvellous!! Marvellous!!!" cried the Pestman. "Wall Street cannot allow the Brotherhood to get it where the Gobbler got the Axe! What a Remarkable thing Business Unionism is!" And he rushed off and wrote a Great Story all about it in the Pest.

But, sad to relate, hardly were the Bonuses on the Equitable equitably distributed than the Good Thing Blew up. Banks busted everywhere and so fast that Uncle Sam had to finally declare a Moratorium in favor of the Financiers and, not only did Florida and California "land values" Not reach the Sky Blue and Beyond limit predicted by the Great Economic Astrologer Arthur Brisbane, but they shot nadirwards with sickening rapidity, whole shoals of Gudgeons and Suckers dropping off the Shoestring on their way to the Bottomless Pit. It was horrible! In fact it was worse, for there were the Facts affirmed by Marx and Lenin, Debs and Haywood staring the Union Businessmen in the face and coldly asking: "Well, what are You going to do about it—Sell the Workers another Share in the Shell Game, or tell them the Truth: that The System is Finished and that their only hope of salvation from wholesale starvation is through One Great Revolutionary Union that will forever end the Game of Grab and Gimme?"

Moral

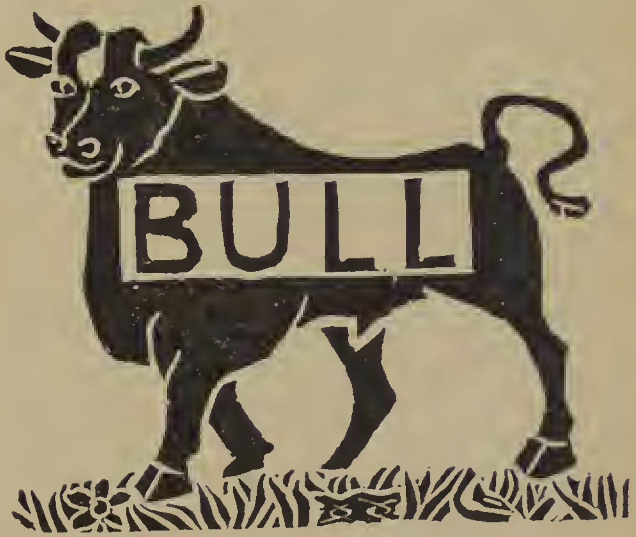
The Interests of Capitalist and Laborer may be Mutual, but, as the Sainted Redbeard hath said: "When the Lion and the Goat lie down together the Goat is usually inside the Lion." Yea, verily!

P. S.—Who ever heard of a Union of Goats binding themselves by Contract to help keep Lionism a Going Concern? Nobody. Unless they are two-legged, Goats ain't that dumb.

Everybody's Candidate

By Card No. X22063

We take great pleasure in introducing the Honorable Mr. Cureall, "Everybody's Candidate" for the office of President, Vice-President, Senator, Representative, and what have you. His colossal program for attending to everything at once in a manner guaranteeing to please everybody is, on this memorable occasion first given to the public.



Ladies and Gentlemen: The problems confronting us are many. It is my humble intention, as your servant, to solve them all. I shall solve the taxation problem by putting an end to all taxes. At the same time it is my intention to balance the national budget and to give each state and community from the surplus revenue of the government sufficient funds to balance their own budgets and to undertake any expenses that they deem necessary. I am prepared to guarantee honest, efficient, economical, businesslike government—and for the first time that such government has ever been offered to any people. I intend to drive the wolf from the door of every American home—put five cars in every garage if you want that many and seven chickens in every pot if you want that too—and thereby end this buyers' strike that is causing such grave concern to the business class of America.

Some may say that such objects, though worthy, are mere political promises, incapable of fulfillment, and mutually contradictory. Bear with me, ladies and gentlemen, and I shall show you that this is not so. This is a practical program—to cope with the many serious problems confronting us today, sweeping over us like a great tidal wave, and gnawing at the very roots of our civilization like a rat!

First of all—to balance our budget—to solve the problem of taxation by abolishing taxes—and at the same time provide honest, efficient, businesslike, and economical government. The only way to do any of these things is to do them all. If elected I shall do them all by the simple expedient of abolishing the government.

In the place of our filibustering Senate and our House of Representatives, in the place of our coon-hunting vicepresident and our fishing president, in the place of all this complicated mechanism that has been built up by our forefathers to give us bigger and better headaches, I propose to substitute just one public officer. And to insure the preservation of that great democracy born on Bunker Hill and preserved at Gettysburg, he shall be elected by popular acclamation—and I shall run for the office. His title will alike manifest his outstanding position and his businesslike character, for he shall be called the Lord High Auctioneer, the only public official in American life.

It shall be his great duty to conduct an auction in the privilege of writing the laws of America. This auction shall be carried on in the presence of the public, and be broadcast over every network of the nation, thus assuring responsible honest operation of this greatly simplified government of ours. The question of a tariff on cane sugar is before us, let us say. Under this new dispensation the right to set that tariff will go to the highest bidder. Any economist will tell you that the cane and beet sugar corporations will pay for this right under open competition, just what it is worth to them, no less and no more. Consequently they will have no kick coming. And since the price they pay will go into the public treasury, instead of as heretofore, into the pockets of the legislative bodies, the public that they gouge through such legislation will have no justified complaint either.

In short, instead of paying congressmen for the laws they want, they will pay the public treasury for the laws. Instead of the crooked, dark, and devious ways of the lobbyist and the politician, honest, public auctioneering will determine the result. Please, ladies and gentlemen, do not misunderstand me as considering that our politicians have been dishonest. They have been among the most exploited men in this country, giving the corporations laws worth far more than these corporations ever paid for them.

That is my program for honest, efficient, business-like economical government. It will save us the great overhead of having a government, by doing away with the government. It will provide unexampled revenues for the public treasury—so much revenue that no taxes will be needed, and thus there will be no tax problem, and there will be an abundance of funds to carry on great works for the public good.

We are in the midst of a great business recession. Our economic life is far more upset by the great Buyers' Strike than it has ever been upset by any strike of industrial labor. There is a simple remedy for this—a remedy that is nothing more than justice. We live in a great credit system, with the banks as the great agencies for administering this credit. All that I ask is that they administer it equitably.

I do not ask that they become unbusinesslike and give us money without proper evidence of credit —I merely ask that they treat all evidence of credit alike. With one great exception they already do this—but it is the great exception that causes this Buyers' Strike, this present Recession, and the recent Depression. This one great exception is this —while every other evidence of credit is honored at the banks, the most common evidence of credit —these little bills that we receive the first of each month in envelopes with windows in them—like this one from my butcher, and this one from my dentist, and this one from my grocer, and all the rest of these bills that have perplexed me sorely just as they perplex every other person receiving them—these are evidences of credit not respected by the banks. All that I ask is this: that a law be passed requiring the banks upon presentation of these bills, to cash them.

Think of the simple beauty of this arrangement! What objection would you have to getting these bills, if you could take them down to the bank and cash them? What hesitation would you have to buy a car, and thus keep our auto industries running, if you knew that when the bill came, you could take it down to the bank to cash it, instead of having to pay it? And of course the banker would extend credit to the store for the amount of the bill, and the storekeeper accordingly benefit. The banker would send it in to a Federal Reserve bank, and so on, and so on, according to our practice with other evidences of credit. It is all so perfect, so complete, and withal, so simple. It is nothing more than justice to all, and special privileges to none. And it will solve the great economic problems confronting America today.

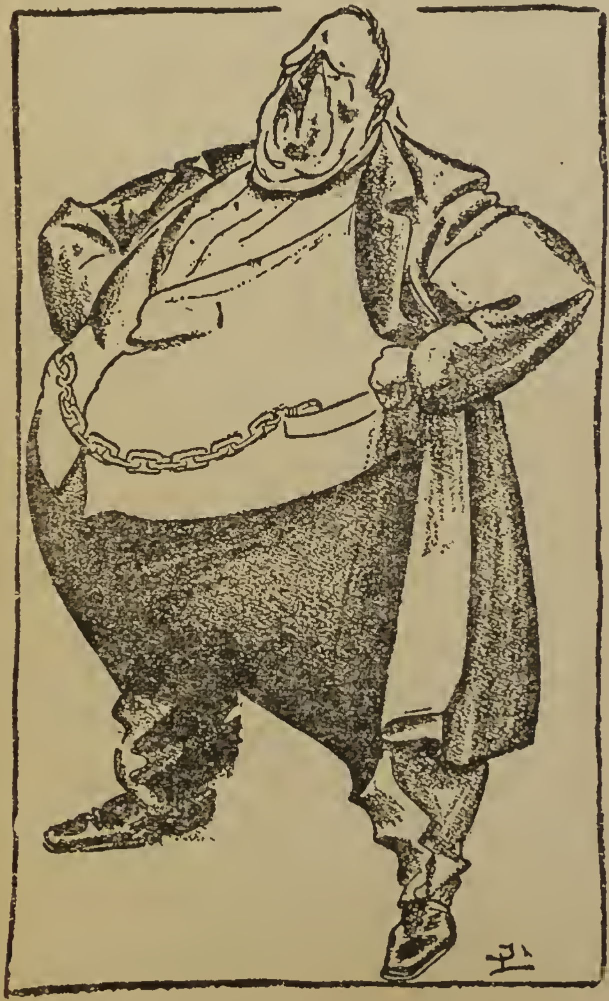
Now as to war. Since the Kellogg pact of 1928 we have been saved the great horror of seeing one nation declare war upon another. No war has been declared since that time—instead governments just send armies out to kill people elsewhere instead. Many are duly horrified at the daily reports we have heard from Abyssinia, Spain and China of the terrible suffering of the wounded, the agonies of the dying, the destruction of homes and whole cities. We all share this joint horror of war, and it is only partly mitigated by the assurance we receive from each one of the so-called aggressor nations, that their purpose and ideals in these military expeditions are among the noblest and most worthy that mankind could entertain. We are assured by many of the great leading minds that war is necessary to the full life of man, that pacifism would make us a pack of moral weaklings. This weighty consideration must be borne in mind in any attempt to cope with the problem of war or to determine our foreign relations as a great civilized nation in a community of nations. We are perpetually reminded that we cannot maintain the prestige of our country in a world of warriors if we too are not a warlike nation armed to the hilt. And that too is something to remember. Again our great industrialists and our great labor organizations like the great and glorious American Federation of Labor are mindful of the amount of industrial activity brought about by big-navy programs and by war in general. The great advantages of war in this respect beyond all other industrial activity, is beyond dispute—for no building of warships ever gluts the markets, and no war ever results in an overproduction of anything. Even this new labor organization that has appeared on our horizon, though not like its parent federation, as yet openly pledged to a greater navy program, has entered upon the field of our foreign relations, and urged a boycott upon Japan—the Chinese some years ago adopted the same policy with the present invigorating results that have so stimulated our scrap-iron and other industries. All these factors, I say, must be borne in mind, and with them the horrible spectacle of the wounded and the dying, suffering the supreme agonies for the prestige of the governments that have thrown them at each other's throats.

I have a solution that meets all these considerations and warrants the hearty approval of us all —the man who objects to being shot, the man who objects to shooting others, the wife who objects to becoming a widow, the industrialist who seeks a market in war, the great labor organizations that also seek the stimulus of militarism to increase industrial activity, and the great minds and philosophers who appreciate the moral grandeur of men giving up their lives in war, and the necessity of belligerence to our integrity as a nation in a community of equally civilized and warlike nations.

I say, let America take the lead in this moral grandeur by starting a great Crusade in which all the nations can be allies fighting side by side, instead of against each other. In that way no one will be killed, which is a distinct advantage over any other type of war. To have an object to such a crusade, worthy of the great sacrifice of means and materials, I propose that we rally the nations of the world for the Conquest of Atlantis, that great lost continent between the old world and the new! What could be a nobler vision! By what other enterprise could the glory of the stars and stripes be more enhanced! By what other means could American hegemony in the politics of the world at large be more readily achieved?



It would be a great Crusade in which not a single life need be lost. Sending our battle ships and tanks and great cannon to the bottom of the ocean is precisely what every pacifist has dreamed of as a "consumation devoutly to be wished"—and there would be no end to the market for war materials. The glory and grandeur of war would be there—the romance of the Crusade—and if perchance a general or two were left behind, what monuments and memorials we could raise to the great men who gave all in the Conquest of Atlantis! Lest any carping critic complain that there is nothing there for us, let me answer him in advance: What is there for us anywhere that we can get by war that we can't get much, much cheaper by buying it in the good old American way, instead of fighting for it, and then paying both the war debt and the previous owner for it afterwards?

These are the great problems confronting us, and my simple and fool-proof and eminently practical solutions for them. There are other problems, and I have solutions equally simple, and equally satisfactory to everybody, for all of them—for I am Everybody's Candidate for Everything. I cannot touch upon them all, and must content myself with this fundamental program of no taxes, balanced budget, abundance for all, cheap, honest, economical government, and a foreign policy for America that would be the glory of all time.

But as I was coming here this evening, I was approached by an old lady—a dear friend of mine —who besought me, with tears in her eyes to do something about the crime problem. She was not afraid that anyone would attack her, or rob her, or kidnap her, for she is old and has nothing of which she could be robbed. She is afraid that her son will become a criminal, for, as she tells me, her son "hangs around street-corners, and that is where gangsters and criminals are bred." So again I approach this problem of the crime wave in the same simple way with which I have coped with these other great problems. Since crime is born on the street corners, we will do away with the street corners, by making all the streets round like circles.

Remember, when election day comes around, that I am yours for a square deal. Thank you!

On Boring From Within

By
BERT RUSSELL

In which it is clearly shown that we cannot Build a new union by working inside an old one.

The advent of the C. I. O. on the American labor scene has been the grounds for the rebirth of scholastic arguments long thought crucified on the cross of experience and fittingly buried with the rest of the superstitions and myths of the primitive strivings of the wage workers. Aside from the possible immaculate conception of the Saviour, John L. Lewis—of his being born again after being bathed in the blood of refractory miners—the ghost which the Faithful are most ardently trying to blow life into, is the historically discredited doctrine of "Boring From Within."

Though at the danger of being burned at the stake as a materialistic heretic and non-believer in the revelations of St. Marx and his desciples, Lenin and Stalin, Hayes and Berger, Foster and Browder, a review of labor history in relation to this doctrine is in order. Experimental science of the twentieth century has more to offer us than has the jesuitical logic and dialectics of the dark ages.

As soon as the A. F. L. became the foremost labor organization of America, numerically if in no other way, the socialists set out to capture control of it to further party aims.

In 1893, they were successful in putting over in the A. F. L. convention a program including "the collective ownership by the people of all the means of production." But the following year, 1894, Gompers, opposed to the socialists, maneuvered successfully in having this rescinded. Apparently as compensation for this setback, the socialists were able to elect their candidate for president of the Federation. Gompers, however, resumed this position the following year.

This frustration, on the eve of success as it seemed, spurred the Socialist Labor Party to officially forsake the salvation of the A. F. L. and to promote the dual paper organization, the Socialist Trades and Labor Alliance. A faction, however, tantalized by their near-success retained faith in changing the A. F. L. and the difference between the factions culminated in the formation of the Socialist Party, 1900, which adopted officially the policy of boring from within the A. F. L.

Socialists in the A. F. of L.

Despite their exorcism of dual unionism and wailing allegiance to the Federation, Gompers scorned the socialists and never missed a chance to give them a raking over the coals. But he was canny enough to use their support to counter-balance the growing sentiment favoring the progressive groups which formed the I. W. W. in 1905.

The socialists' influence in the A. F. L. grew. In 1911, their candidate for president of the Federation, Hayes, received 5073 votes, against Gomper's 11,974. In 1912, the socialists lead the industrial union advocates in polling 5929 votes against the 10,934 craft union votes in the convention. Their party membership grew to 110,000 and votes polled in the presidential eleection, 1912, were 1,000,000.

The socialist leaders became impatient. The realization of a party similar to the German Social Democrat with its party funds, its officials and well paid jobs, its power to demand some of the politicial patronage-dispensing authority of the regular parties, was just around the proverbial corner. There seemed to be just one fly in the ointment to their quick ascendency with A. F. L. support. Though the political parties were asked out of the I. W. W. in 1908, many members of the I. W. W. still placed some confidence in independent workers' political action and the means such a party offered in putting across working class propaganda. These members and their sympathizers maintained membership in the S. P. or supported it in other ways. Bill Haywood was a member of the S. P. executive board. This was a touchy problem in the party's relationship with the A. F. L. and as absolute proof of their loyalty to the principles of the A. F. L. the party convention, 1912, virtually ruled out the I. W. W. members. The I. W. W. members and their sympathizers left.

With this positive evidence of their good intentions, the socialist leaders turned hat in hand to the A. F. L. officials for praise and reward. They got none. The craft union officials figured it out this way: "If the socialists don't believe in interfering with our racket by running around with those I. W. W., and they promise to be faithful to us, what is the use of giving them anything? Any gifts we have to spare we had better give to those we are not so sure of."

From this time on the Socialist Party lost influence not only in the A. F. L. but as a political party.

Another Party Tries

The communists who after the war took up the boring from within methods had an even more dismal experience. Without the understanding bred from experience of the old socialists, steeped in the rule or ruin policy of the Moscow Messiahs, controlled entirely by intellectuals out of touch with the working class, the communists did little but confuse and disrupt. Where they did gain success in taking over the officialdom of a union they milked the treasury for party funds; or the ones elected as officials promptly forgot their former radical views, if they ever had any, and used the powers in their hands for their individual good.

Aside from the political parties, boring from within had other advocates who had less influence. Foster's Syndicalist League seems to have exhausted itself by publishing the pamphlet "SYNDICALISM." Moreover, there is little evidence that even Foster himself was affected deeply with revolutionary syndicalism in his organizing activities in the lumber, steel and packing industries. He gained a seat in the officialdom and retained it at the price of endorsing and playing ball as official ball is played.

The anarchists followed the policy of each to his own individual conception, helping, obstructing, nullifying, and duplicating the work of others. As officials of unions their actions vary greatly from their ideals. We see anarchists on the executive board of the International Ladies Garment Workers fraternizing with politicians and working hand in hand with the state drawing up codes for the government to enforce.

It was not the labels of socialist, communist, anarchist, or syndicalist, with all their hysterically imagined implications, that accounted for the disappointing showing of the borers. Even those innocent of radical beliefs, those popularly referred to as liberals or progressives, failed equally as brilliantly to reform the conservative unions even the slightest. Those quaint persons, ex-wobs, ex-socialists, the ordinary run of scissorbills, who tell us that they are working for the same things as the I. W. W. but are doing it in a "different and better way" have nothing to show for all their efforts of pushing "good men" into the office of union leadership. After seeing their heroes one by one go the way of all flesh afflicted with piecarditis and exercise of authority, it must be plain to them that they are kidding no one but themselves and might just as well wave the red flag over their march to defeat.

Why Boring Fails

Why have all these groups and individuals failed to achieve the metamorphosis of the conservative unions into revolutionary industrial unions?

Primarily because a collective bargaining agency is an institution of capitalism and can function only in this way if it is to exist. Woven of and into the fabric of the "the catch as catch can, no holds barred" competitive system it functions as do all other capitalist institutions. Likened to a capitalist bank it may be more clearly shown. The function of a bank is to arrange debts in such a way that the investors are assured a profit on their investment. Now it is possible that a philanthropist could be appointed as the official of the bank, but to carry into his every day banking operations his philanthropic ideas by loaning money without interest, or charitably cancelling debts, would inevitably lead to the destruction of the banking institution and not, as the borers from within assume, to a reform of the bank to a philanthropic institution. Aside from all doubt as to the bankers' sincerity and philanthropic integrity, the outcome is seen to be inevitable if the bank is to continue to operate.

So with the A. F. L., C. I. O., and other conservative unions. Allow for the sake of argument, radicals could be officials of the conservative unions. They could not put their radical policies into practice without destroying these capitalist collective bargaining agencies. Those who have attempted to do so with these outfits, at the expense of their functioning as collective bargaining agencies, have just sowed disruption and dissension and only by their removal or the changing of their ideas, have the organizations managed to survive. Look at the C. I. O.—A. F. L. rumpus and the weakness it has caused in the ranks of labor's collective bargaining agencies. The whole cause is, not as some would have us imagine, a fight between craft and industrial unionism, the attempt of political aspirant to make a collective bargaining agency function as something foreign to its nature, as a political vote catching machine.

Political parties are not interested in building revolutionary industrial unionism but are motivated in their boring from within relations to the conservative union by one thing; namely, the necessity of obtaining a secure mooring among the working population upon which to anchor their party.

Political Party Roots

Political parties must needs have their roots in an economic group, whether that party be republican, democrat, progressive or socialist. The two old line parties are rooted in the economic groups of the vested interests. Where so-called labor political parties have attained any degree of stableness, as the Independent Labor Party in England and the Social Democrat parties in many countries of Europe, it has been only by sinking suckers into the necks of labor unions. The labor unions supply the blood and substance of these parties and only at the expense of their own health.

The labor union's role, in political party plans, is a source of campaign funds and as substantial evidence of their control of votes by which the labor politicos can bribe the old line parties for favors and some share in the political patronage of job dispensing for party lights. To gain this evidence of strength does not require building rank and file revolutionary industrial unionism. It merely sequires the control of the officialdom of the labor unions. This is adequate for their political purposes. The training and education of the union members to the benefits of rank and file control and the development of their abilities to control industry for their own use, as revolutionary industrial unionists propose, is not only superfluous to the needs of a political party but is an actual menace to its aims.

The exercise of rank and file control would nullify all the benefits of gaining control of the official machine. Even where the political partisans have appeared progressive by supporting the industrial form as a substitute for the craft form of unionism it has been merely as a political slogan or to facilitate better control of the members for the party when it should arise to official ascendency. Their cries for the industrial form of unionism can be likened to the cuckoo advocating to other birds the building of good nests so that later on the cuckoo can lay its eggs in them.

For the run down at the heels intellectuals and aspiring ex-workers, the control of the finances and votes of the labor unions would make for the realization of their dream of a third party with well-paid jobs and authority to dispense patronage to the hangers on. Revolutionary industrial unionism would only blast the hopes of this political borer from within. If there was chance of this kind of success with this tactic they would not want it.

Speech Making Leaders

Foster depended for success on the methods that the syndicalists adopted in France, of gaining control of the official positions and passing resolutions and making speeches about revolutionary syndicalism. But syndicalists prove no different from the socialists and communists after being in office for any length of time; and in the land of Foster's inspiration, France, the C. G. T. officials were equal to Gompers and the Social Democrats of Germany in following the masters' wishes in regards the World War. A resolutionary-speech-making leadership does not make a revolutionary-feat-making rank and file, nor leadership either.

The pitfall to even temporary success of the borers from within appears to be the contaminating effects of the spoils of office, the exercise of authority and high salaries. Even their venerated prophet, St. Karl, did not reveal a revolutionary nostrum for the poisonous effect of officialdom, and it remains the dragon on guard against the Knights of the Bore. Man will protect a woman from everyone but himself, it is said. The opportunist will protect the interests of the rank and file likewise.

Any influence that the political borers have attained in their activities has been while they were tacitly supporting dual unionism. The hight of the socialist influence was in the '90s when the ghost of the Knights of Labor was not entirely laid to rest and up to 1912 while they were still friendly to the I. W. W. The communists have time and again tried to bolster their prestige by forming dual unions and then running them back into the A. F. L. both before and with the T. U. U. L. splurge. And even their present prestige, such as it is, is only because of the dualism of the C. I. O. Immediately the S. P. cut itself off from the I. W. W. officially its influence waned. And without doubt, on the consummation of the C. I. O.—A. F. L. peace the communists will go as flat as a pricked balloon. And they know it and will stand in the way of such a peace.

But without organization not even situations favorable to getting to first base with their political ball can be taken advantage of as has been shown conclusively in the development of the C. I. O. Even though the progressive elements and those who know what the score is, far outnumbered them; the politicians control by dint of their organization.

Whoever would influence the conservative union member must, as history shows, have organization, avoid all contact with the germs of officialdom and promote dual unionism. But even then, it still remains that a capitalist institution, whether bank or labor union, cannot become a revolutionary institution or even part of the new society. Such an attempt would destroy the institution, as the politicians are doing with the A. F. L.—C. I. O. without building anything to take over whatever functions are necessary to the working people.

The Job on Hand

Neither the banks nor collective bargaining agencies need be the objects of destructive intentions. As capitalism is destroying itself, so it is destroying the institutions that make it up. The job on hand is to build the structure of the institutions that will carry on when capitalism sinks to its doom. Therefore, it could not be a dual organization, as the C. I. O. is dual to the A. F. L., but would be of entirely different structure and aims, not attempting to duplicate the capitalist functions of conservative unions. In short, it would be the Industrial Workers of the World. The material for this purpose is at hand, the resources, the working men and women.

To destroy any of the institutions of capitalism, whether they be the A. F. L.—C. I. O. financial institutions or industrial administrative agencies, without having first built an organization structure to carry on whatever necessary functions these institutions were caring for, as well as to carry on the new responsibilities of the new conditions, is to court disaster as surely as it would be to tear down an old house before a new structure has been built in which to move. To bore from within the old structure in an attempt to build a new one is fruitless. But while in the old structure, we can build the new one by its side and the necessary arrangements can be quickly completed when the old capitalist system and its institutions, the banks, the industrial administrative agencies, and collective bargaining agencies collapse in decay.

"By organizing industrially we are forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old."

The "Uncontrollables" in Spain

By SOPHIA FAGIN

These last few days you have been reading—with a great deal of interest, I am sure, the newspaper accounts of the fighting going on in Teruel. You have been cheered by every victory, especially in the light of the long period of military failures from which the loyalists are now emerging.

But regardless how concerned you may have been about news from the front, if you were dependent upon the ordinary sources of information, I am almost positive that you are not familiar with the nature of the military leader whose division is responsible for the decisive loyalist victory. His name is Vivencos. Before the revolt of Franco, he was a transport worker in Barcelona, and an active member in the anarcho-syndicalist movement—the CNT. When Franco revolted, Vivencos joined the other thousands of CNT men in their march to wrest Aragon from fascist clutches, after they had crushed fascism in Barcelona and the rest of Catalonia.

It was not long before his courage and innate ability as a fighter were recognized, and he became the commander of a column of 200 men. As the war went on, the prestige of his column rose to its present status which is second to none in the military ranks of the loyalist forces. Certainly, you will agree, others who have done less have gotten greater commendation; but the nature in which the news is repressed and the sources from which it is gotten have so worked that the knowledge of this man and many more like him are kept from the reading public.

The extent of this conspiracy of silence can be estimated if we recognized that the majority of the military leaders on the Aragon front are anarcho-syndicalists. Yet, if your only source of information about syndicalism in Spain is the capitalist, or the Communist (Stalinist) press, or even often the liberal journals, you are likely to associate the term anarcho-syndicalist with the word "uncontrollable."

At the beginning of the struggle, when reporters got their information from more direct sources, or through direct observation, the tone of the articles of liberal writers about anarcho-syndicalists in Spain was somewhat different. Now when "information" is merely the interpretation of some intermediate agency, it has often little relation to the facts

One of the reasons I want to discuss the Spanish labor organization, the CNT, is that it is so completely misunderstood, and the cooperative weakness of the corresponding organization in this country does not successfully counteract the misinformation by other partisans. It has thus come to pass that the militants of the CNT-FAI, the most realistic and fervent anti-fascist fighters—those who recognize that only through a revolution in the rear can the war be carried out successfully in the front and its victories gather significance—it is they against whom the slogan "uncontrollable" has been often directed.

The origin of the slogan is not clear; its natural habitat seems to be in the communist, liberal, and capitalist press. It is a dirty and dangerous word because it has no limits and is so ill-defined that you can use it against anyone whom you cannot control, regardless of the nature of your control or how it is opposed. It is like the slogan, "slacker" used against conscientious objectors during the World War—it means nothing special, but generates a great deal of heat and no light.

Another reason for which I wish to discuss the anarcho-syndicalists in Spain, is that they were among the first to oppose fascism on the battlefront of Spain and they did so with such a complete fearlessness that Ralph Bates, the English novelist and their political critic has had to say, the proverb for impossible bravery in the future must be "as brave as a Spanish anarchist."

Moreover, their influence was probably the greatest single force in the Spanish labor movement, and their teaching determined the tone of all Spanish radicalism.

And finally I want to talk about them because their efforts at social reconstruction have met with much material and moral success among the masses of the Spanish people, and they have begun a trend toward the liberation of all Spain. They are creating a new revolutionary pattern which does not make oppression a sina qua non of liberation, and dictatorship a first step to social and economic democracy. . .

On July 19, 1936, as we all know, one of the very popular undeclared wars of modern history, broke out in Spain. It took the form of a military uprising of the army generals, who compensated for their lack of home talent with Italian brigades, German war machinery and the paid donations of the Moorish Mohammedans—all generously offered to save Christianity from the infidel and politics from the radical.

But for many previous centuries, another undeclared war has constantly been fought, now overtly, now covertly, on Spanish soil—a war less publicized, it is true, but none the less serious; a war with as bloody battles, as significant international complications, as complete an allignment of forces. And this other undeclared war, this basic undeclared war—is the CLASS WAR!

In Spain the war of the classes was particularly acute. The peasants lived as peons, or oriental farm hands, on the vast properties of the feudal lords. It was no unusual thing for them to hunt weeds and dry grasses as their only nourishment in the frequent times of famine. The industrial workers likewise suffered under extremely low living standards and the numbers of unemployed were high. Reliable authorities of every political complexion assert that Spain's middle class was so small as to be almost negligible.

On the opposite side in the class struggle there were the three parasitical classes of the church, the army and the aristocracy. The Spanish catholic church has a long history of wealth and reaction. In Spain there was one priest to every 900 in the population, a figure to be compared with Italy's one to every 20,000. The Church has been the chief capitalist, landlord and banker of Spain. As the greatest landowner, it naturally has opposed all land reform. As an investor in industrial enterprises, and the leading banker, it fought the organization of labor. Down to 1931, it controlled at least half of Spain's meagre school system, and with 45 per cent of the people illiterate (compared with about 4 per cent in France) the church opposed every educational improvement. The moral disgrace of the church is testified to by the selling of papal indulgences at a few pesetas each; (and when signed by an arch-bishop they could be had at bargain prices in stores announcing, "Bulas are cheap today"); their unpopularity is further evidenced by the fact that the typical dirty joke in Spain, corresponding to our "travelling salesman" number here, is about a priest. (Small wonder that every uprising for the last 100 years has involved the burning of churches and the killing of clericals!)

The army was equally degenerate. Its only function since the 16th and 17th centuries when Spain was the great colonial power has been to suppress internal disorders and to provide an officers' caste as a catch-all for the idle sons of the rich. Its ratio of officers to men is about three times as high as in the French army. Completing the line-up on the side of reaction is the aristocracy—the absentee landowners, the few industrialists, the remains of a nobility—all entirely dissociated from the Spanish masses.

Anytime the workers or peasants tried to improve their miserable conditions (and their uprisings were frequent) landlord, clergy and army ganged-up together to preserve law and order and wage slavery. When the republican government came to power for the second time in 1936 through legitimate electoral channels, and mildly and vaguely threatened their hegemony, the army officers decided that things had gone too far; this despite the fact that the first republican government of 1931-3 had done little more than write a very pretty constitution of which even a mild democrat has admitted:

> "The proclamation of a republic and the adoption of a constiution again settled nothing. The old feudalism remained. The village bosses—the caciques—still held their power, the Church still controlled wealth and education, the monarchists still dominated the army, the wealthy few still owned the land."*

It is true that this government and the popular front government had made some effort to gradually relieve the army of its topheavy useless officialdom, but the half-hearted nature of this rejection is amply described in that realistic novel by Elliott Paul called Life and Death in a Spanish Town:

> "When the government that succeded Alfonso's was organized, Azana, who as president in the tragic days of 1936 was made Minister of War. He knew that the Spanish army had been built up by the monarchists to take care of sons and relatives and that of the inordinate number of officers there were few who were not hostile to republican ideas. Instead of disbanding the army, which was of no use except as a threat to free government, Azana proceeded more cautiously. He retired the officers who were most flagrantly hostile to his regime, but in order not to stir them up too much he consented to pay them their full wages as long as they lived. They had done practically nothing when they were on active service, but that did not satisfy their ideal. The prospect of full pay, and no work whatsoever, was alluring. It bolstered up their disrespect of a government of the people and made them feel that their enemies, the people, were afraid of them." (p. 37-8)

So we find one of their number, General Sanjurjo going to Berlin in 1936 to discuss ways and means with Mr. Hitler, and returning a few weeks before the uprising. We find workers organizations constantly warning the government of the militaristic plot but the government knew these men personally, and felt "They couldn't—they wouldn't—do this to us," and therefore ordering neither arrest nor dismissal of any of the militarists who were conspiring; the government thereby permitted the barracks, the churches, the palace and some of the offices of the State to be converted into centres of conspiracy and they prevented the arming of the proletariat. Many provinces in Spain fell into the hands of the rebels because the civic governors did not have orders from the government to give arms to the people.

Thus we return to our starting point in the morning of July 19, 1936, with fascist troops marching into Barcelona, the nerve center of the industrial capital of Spain. The militarists reckoned on having a two-or-three day job, involving the wiping out of the most vital region of Spanish territory and the habitat of the most revolutionary workers in Spain. But they reckoned without their host. When the military emerged early that Sabbath morning from their barracks and the churches in which they were the guests, the workers rose from their slumbers, rose to the occasion and militantly and successfully defeated the trained armies with their miraculous enthusiasm, their crude weapons, their bare hands. And on the morrow, when the professional soldiers have been routed, and their civilian accomplices—especially the factory owners—have escaped, the workers must continue production on their own initiative. They must supply and strengthen Spain so that the struggle against fascism may continue. And the only avenue left open to them is to socialize industries. Thus the revolution comes to Catalonia, and in varying degree to the rest of Spain—in the form of a war measure.

The workers, who for many years had dreamed of being their own masters, and learned and planned and fought for that dream, realized it in the first week of the fascist revolt; but socialization, freedom, equality are to them not merely war measures—they are life measures—the only way a people can survive and progress. The military uprising they saw as but a single item in the class war; victory in the battles of one meant success in the battles of the other. And so their slogan became, "War in the front; revolution in the rear."

The democratic republic had given them neither bread nor land nor security; it had not dared to antagonize the wealthy nor to crush the fascist plotters. It offered only the classic phrases of unity and liberty... and then procrastinated its way into complete debility. It did absolutely nothing during the first days of the revolt but change ministers three times, try to keep the arms from the masses of the people whom they neither knew nor trusted. Could it be this the workers defend with their lives against such odds? Could they fight so spontaneously, so fiercely merely to return to the conditions before the rebellion?

No they couldn't. Even Companys, head of the Catalonian Generality, recognized in which direction the wind was blowing:

> "Some republicans still believe, still dream of the possibility of establishing a political and social panorama similar to that which existed before July 19. This only demonstrates their blindness or their lack of loyalty. I have said it before, and I repeat it, that the moment has come for the workers to take over political power . . ." (Info. bul. 1-5-37)

The policy of social reconstruction was advanced by that organization which contained approximately 90 per cent of the organized workers in the area first attacked. It had provided the leadership for the military offense and sacrificed its great comrades on the battlefront. It guided the syndicates in their conduct of the industries and agriculture after the revolt was quelled. It was the united revolutionary working class of Catalonia, Aragon, the Levante. It was the anarcho-syndicalist CNT.

Background

Let us pause for a moment to review the history and the ideals of the labor organization of the National Confederation of Labor (CNT) and its ideological leadership in the Iberian Anarchist Federation (FAI). Spain has traditionally been the home of anarchism, from the time when the seeds of non-authoritarian communism were planted in Spanish soil by Bakunin, way back in the middle of last century. From then until 1910 when the CNT was formally organized from the various anarchistic sections of the Spanish labor movement, its active partisans have gained expert inside information about the jails of Spain and lived much of their public life "sub rosa."

Both the terror of the state and the teaching of the anarchists made a pure and simple trade unionism impossible in Spain. Thus the CNT's aim was two-fold: 1. Under capitalism, to raise the material and cultural level of workers and peasants by direct action and the education of the masses; 2. the establishment of a new society based on libertarian communism, stressing not the conquest of political power but the conquest of the land, factories, means of production and the natural resources. It has constantly taught the workers that to turn to the state—be it autocratic or democratic—to establish advantages for the worker, is to misorient their struggles and to dissipate their energies; for the purpose and the raison d'etre of the state is to protect the interests of the class which is economically dominant, and therefore to suppress the workers. Rather has it counselled its members that through direct action alone is social betterment to be sought and social revolution to be accomplished. By direct action of the workers themselves—in their syndicates and communities—rather than by the dictatorship of a political party, however revolutionary, is society to be organized after the revolution.

Federalism rather than bureaucracy is not only the theory for the post-revolutionary society, but the pattern for the organiaztion of the CNT in practice; thus the CNT is constructed from the bottom up, and much stress is laid on the autonomy of the separate syndicates. Paid officials there are, but only in the large unions were the work requires more than volunteer labor. Officers are elected for only one year, and their remuneration is strictly the same as that of the workers in the respective trades.

Recognizing that the Spanish social transformation is impossible without the peasantry and the intellectual worker, the CNT unifies peasants, agriculture workers and white collar workers also —to the total tune of about 1½ million workers in pre-July 19th Spain. There were approximately 7,000,000 workers in Spain then and about 1 million of them were organized in the other strong labor organization—the UGT, which is led by the social democrats. (If space permitted we would present a more complete picture of the Spanish situation—and perhaps a fairer one—by describing the UGT and other organizations—however small and uninfluential—in the labor movement there.)

Before the present events the CNT and FAI published not only their daily papers in Madrid and Barcelona but about 40 weeklies and 5 monthly reviews. To say the anarcho-syndicalists were completely dominant in Catalonia means that they organizationally controlled the region which contained ¾ of Spanish industry, one half of its wealth, and a large per cent of the Spanish populace.

The slightest aquaintance with the role of the anarcho-syndicalists in their destruction of attacking fascism and their construction of a new society should serve to destroy any superstition of them as wild-eyed visionaries, adrift on a cloud of idealism. A superficial knowledge of their tolerance, their most sincere efforts at unity with other anti-fascist forces should serve to dispel any of the stereotypes of them as irresponsible bomb-throwing maniacs.

They Take Over

We have already seen how the revolutionary change in economic relations in certain parts of Spain was a sina-qua-non of continuing the war, and recognized as such even by the traditional opponents of socialization. But the people of Spain and the CNT were not content to wait for government requests that people continue Spanish industry and agriculture. (In fact, many of these so-called requests did not come until the people themselves had already made the required changes in ownership and production.)

Work on the social front was carried on with that same spontaneity, enthusiasm, and success as that on the military front. During the first months of the war we can recall reading one after the other inspired and astonished accounts of how industry, agriculture, and transportation, under the aegis of largely autonomous workers groups, flourished and progressed.

Let us take as an example of these accounts an article which appeared in the New Republic about one year ago, written by the international journalist, Mr. Ravage. He tells us that the CNT took over the railroads in Catalonia directly after the rebellion, and that for the first time in his long acquaintance with Spanish travelling conditions, trains were running on time. The CNT management in the railroads immediately increased the rolling stock 25 per cent, doubled wages, reduced hours—and on top of all, were able to reduce fares. With all these, they were breaking even by February 2, 1937, and preparing to save for an amortization reserve. The workers' control committees, he continues, enjoy evident autonomy; in every plant, shop or office—especially in the numerous enterprises where there are both CNT and UGT workers, debates go on constantly. Of these Mr. Ravage says, "Their educative value to speak of no other, can hardly be overestimated. They removed the threat of discord." They had their final fruit in the pact between the two labor-union federations signed on October 22, 1936.

Unfortunately, time does not permit our indulging in many descriptive accounts of socialization in production, though the stories of the new life—in fishermen's villages and textile mills, in orange orchards and amunition factories are all inspiring. Everywhere there has been possible a reduction of hours of labor required, and an increase in wages; everywhere volunteer labor works cheerfully far beyond the number of hours settled for.

Some notion of the extent of this accomplishment comes from the recent Daily News press dispatch that the Catalonian factories, running 24 hours a day, provide more than one half the war materials made in Spain for the loyalists; moreover, the CNT declares that ¾ of the land in Catalonia, Levante and Aragon is collectivized; no more than this amount because the CNT does not want to force the workers.

Libertarian in Practice

Here we get a clue of the libertarian nature of the entire social revolution. The stories of forced collectivization that have been circulated around by certain of the press seem to have no foundation in fact. In every proclamation of collectivization one can read there is a special clause noting that small producers are privileged to work outside of the collective, if they wish; that members who have joined the collective may leave after the harvest if they so desire. This is no war communism that will have to be corrected and completely contradicted several years hence by a "new economic policy." This is no nationalization, with some distant central government sending the local syndicate an order stipulating the number of hours to be worked or how the crop is to be raised.

The autonomous but federated communites go about the humble task of eliminating insects in the orange orchards with the same earnestness and skill with which they met the task of destroying the fascist invaders in their territories. Local councils regulate money content of wages in relation to prevailing prices, but try to get uniformity throughout in the "real" wage. Wages are increased for those having family dependents at set rates. About the problem of having a uniform policy on this matter throughout the country, or at least the province, hc CNT spokesman talk in their typical manner:

> "Although the anarcho-syndicalist unions are in the majority in the province of Levante, they still recognize the need of coming to an understanding with the socialist unions on this plan. For this purpose, the convention recommends an intensive campaign of agitation and propaganda so as to persuade the backward workers who are still swayed by Marxist ideas."

So much for the theory and practice of the syndicalists on problems of economic adjustment. Another of the great sources of misunderstanding about the attidues and actions of the Spanish unions is that of their stand on the problem of militarism, defense, the single command. There is a widespread notion that anarcho-syndicalists are by principle opposed to the unified command, which is related to the general feeling that they oppose organization of all kind and admit no sort of discipline.

The actual fact of the matter is that the syndicalists were the first to clamor for the unified command. In the first few months of the war we find them declaring:

> "All the weakness in the organization of the anti-fascist troops are due to:
> 1. Shortage of armament and ammunition;
> 2. Lack of a common plan of war operations at all fronts;
> 3. Lack of unified command." (Info. Bul. 11-2-36).

What they definitely do not want, however, is a command which is dissociated from the workers or not responsible to them. They want no chance for a new military dictator to be nursed in the ranks of the anti-fascists. They want the general military headquarters to be composed of all the anti-fascist sections, and matters of policy to be referred to this headquarters.

To learn the syndicalist position regarding discipline in the ranks of the anti-fascists we can turn to no more authoritative source than Benventuro Durruti, whose soldiers were admittedly among the bravest, whose slogan was "We never retreat," and on whom rests much of the credit for the defense of Madrid in the first months of the war. He was a leader in the moments of peace between the fighting just as he was at the front, for Durruti's batallion is known for success it had in socializing every town it passed through on the way to the front. The column would help the local organizations to establish economic councils and coordinate the work of the syndicates or communities. Of the problem of discipline, Durrit said,

> "Much is said about, but little is understood. In my opinion, discipline is respect for one's own responsibility. I oppose the barrack-discipline, leading to brutality, hate and automatism. But I also deny this false 'liberty' which does not correspond to the necessities of the war, and usually is the excuse of the coward. In our organization of the CNT the best discipline reigns, because our members have confidence in the comrades represented in their Committee, whom they have entrusted with the right of leadership. In war time one must submit to the chosen leader. Otherwise war operations are impossible." (Info. Bul. 10-15-36.

That he was successful in carrying out this sort of discipline is testified to by this statement of one of his militamen, made at Durruti's funeral:

> "Durruti was no general, he was our comrade. Not a very decorative position, but in this proletarian column popularity is not exploited. There is only one idea: Victory and Revolution!
> . . . Durruti's greatness was due to the fact that he hardly evry commanded but always educated. The comrades used to go to his tent—after his return to the front line. He explained and discussed the reason for his operations to them. Durruti did not command, he convinced. Only by conviction, a clear and precise action is guaranteed. Everyone of us knows the reason for his action and is convinced of its necessity. Thus everyone wants to obtain the best results of his action, at any price. Comrade Durruti gave the example . . ."

Then the same militiaman explains how everywhere the column of Durruti advanced, they collectivized, and

> "When resting in villages, the column forms a community with the inhabitants. In former times one used to say army and people, or even the army against the people. Today there are only a fighting and working proletariat. They both form an inseparable unity. The militia is a proletarian factor, its character and its organization are proletarian and must remain so. The militas are exponents of the class struggle."

On the Battlefields

Another long-nourished misunderstanding, springing this time from slander, and entirely unbased in fact, is the claim that the anarchists, especially in Catalonia, were reluctant to go to the front, and preferred to stay at the rear, and as it has sometimes been put, "toy with the revolution." Moreover, this libel continues, the syndicalists kept the arms from the front and saved them for the fight behind the lines with other anti-fascist elements. This is not, at least at its primary sources, a mere misunderstanding—it's a downright sources, a mere misunderstanding—it's a downright lie.

Perhaps the first, and one of the most well known and heroic marches of the syndicalists into other parts of Spain was Durruti's leadership, which we have just described, of a column of 9000 through the Aragon front into Madrid—with not a defeat to their record. Vivencos (whom we talked about at the opening of this discussion), Jover, Ortiz and many other anarcho-syndicalist leaders and their batallions have from the first days of the revolt fought on fronts near and far from their homes. The Libertarian Youth Organization of Catalonia has repeatedly urged the Government to send them into battle. "We are tired of waiting for a command to go to the front," they have insisted. Yet the conspiracy of silence permits the old delusion about "anarchist" slackers to go on. Whatever delusions there may remain on the anrcho-syndicalist attitude on the subject of mobilization must be dissipated by the reading of the program put out in February of last year by the Peninsular Committee of the FAI on mobilization:

> "1. Mobilization of all men and women capable of war activities. For this purpose and with this aim in view, should be suppressed all activities which do not assist in the prosecution of war, especally de luxe entertainments and mere frivolities, in view of the fact that men in the trenches are often short of bare necessities.
> 2. All arms to be sent to the front, and all armed to be employed only on war jobs.
> 3. All idle gold or other metals should be delivered up to the War department, or should even be confiscated if the necessities of war require it.
> 4. All organizations of workers and anti-fascists should pool their funds in a common stock to be used for means of the war.
> 5. A unified command of all fronts, and all ministries under the control of the syndical organizations." (Info. Bul. 2-25-37).

I would prefer not to go into the details of the May uprising which has been so inadequately and incorrectly presented as a revolt in the rear on the part of the "uncontrollables." I will omit also the stealing—on a forged order—of tanks by the communists and the placing of these behind the lines—and not for use at the front!—in the Voroshilov barracks: all of which occured before the so-called uprising of the uncontrollables and the mythical fifth column.

It should be abundantly clear now that what the syndicalists opposed was the building of an army that was divorced from the people; the placing of the control in the rear in the hands of the old police, rather than in the workers' guard, and the use of the slogan "unified command" to build a bureaucracy which would crush all that opposed it.

Humanitarian Principles

If we pass from the anarchist position on defense and militarism to the attitude on repression of their enemies and "justice," we again are heartened by the humaneness of their approach. The theory of it is well expressed by Santillan, a longtime spokesman for the FAI-CNT and although later a member of the Catalonian cabinet and minister of economy, always an open critic of the practices and policies of the workers' organizations in control:

> "Society has a right to protect itself against those who attack its interests. But what benefit does society get from a delinquent shut up in a cell for months and years? In the prison cells and in the prison yards I used to think about the stupid penal system of the bourgeoisie and the State. In what way have we modified or revolutionized this system . . .?
> "I have been present, since July 19th, at the execution of military traitors. I have even commanded firing squads. I do not repent having done so. But today, when our comrades seem to have become accustomed to the idea that the only solution for a prisoner is to shoot him, I wish to revindicate my independence to tell you that it is time for us to think what we are doing . . . As a disciplined militant as long as the organization does not dispose otherwise, I shall approve all the sentences dictated by the popular courts, but I want to have the right to exclaim at any time that the jails do not convince me, the executions do not convince me, and that I am not convinced by the perpetuation of the old penal system. I want a new form of punishment and I don't find anything more adequate for those who have never worked than their reeducation for useful labor. Instead of sentencing an enemy to 30 years of prison I would sentence him to build 10 km. of public highways, or plant 100,000 or 200,000 trees."*)

Despite Santillan's criticism the comparatively humane and scientific penal practice in Spain has won the appreciation of non-partisan observers of all sorts.

The syndicalist attitude toward government and its adjustment to the revolutionary situation has brought vituperations of every sort and from all kinds of critics—some from its own ranks. Before discussing the concrete problems of Spanish syndicalism within the last year and a half, it is perhaps wise to state clearly what form of organization of society is planned for in syndicalist theory.

There is an erroneous and widespread prejudice that anarchists reject organization completely. This is true to a very limited extent only among a very limited number of individualist anarchists. Syndicalist-anarchists especially, recognize the need for organization, as the very existence of the CNT testifies.

*) Santillan, After the Revolution, p. 118-9.

Union Control

The anarcho-syndicalist plan for the organization of the new society is, as we noted before, pre-visioned in the present organization of the CNT. The ideal is one of a society of federated, autonomous syndicates in the towns and cities and communities in the villages. Every member of society is to be organized into some syndicate, even the public service workers and the military. This prevents any alienation from the workers and the workers' organizations of the army, the police force, etc.

Now, all syndicates are represented in the central committee of the labor organization, whose function is to take care of those problems which cannot be locally determined. Every effort is made to avoid bureaucracy in this organ, and preventative measures include: short terms, no higher wages than the workers in the corresponding industry, direct responsibility, and federalism rather than centralism.

The extent of autonomy in the local organ is very important in distinguishing libertarian communism from authoritarian communism. Wherever possible the individual syndicate is the authority in its area. When a problem is the concern of all, it must be referred to the national committee. Policy is determined not by the national committee but when a decision is made, the disciplined militant is expected to follow it, as you have seen from the quotations from Durruti and Santillan. There is no more guarantee that he will follow it than there is that there will be no split in the various and sundry Marxian parties.

One of the differences between libertarian notions of discipline and the so-called "revlutionary discipline" of the Marxists is that the syndicalists retain always the right of criticism, regardless how the vote goes. Santillan's quote abundantly illustrated this.

The anracho-syndicalist, does not have a "repressive state" as such. Repression of a sort, must and does exist in the transition to libertarian communism. But it is largely a matter of degree and point of emphasis that distinguishes it from the repression of an authoritarian state, be it bourgeois or "proletarian." Probably the fact that the anarchistic person is a humanist, that he emphasizes the individual—his integrity, the development of himself, as being all-important, the end toward which every effort is directed; the fact that he never loses sight of the proposition that to sacrifice an individual for the sake of the masses is to burtalize the individuals in the mass—at least to some extent, accounts for the anarchists' peculiar reluctance to repress.

There is always thorough representation to those of different opinions who have a common aim; thus, when anarcho-syndicalists were dominant in Gijon (to the score of a 90 per cent majority of the people) they turned over representation on the Gijon economic council to every organization on the basis of its existence, rather than in terms of the number of its following. You will recall also, the selection quoted on the decision regarding uniform wages in the Levante, where the minority group is consulted despite its small numbers.

Now if the revolutionary syndicalist organization is not able to gain the support of the workers it cannot accomplish a revolution over their heads by consituting itself a repressive state. One must have the potential support of the widest masses of people before any revolution can be successful. This does not mean that one sits around and waits for unanimous vote of approval on the social revolution; it means that one does not—largely because one cannot—accomplish a revolution of the society thereafter, unless the support of the masses is behind one. That is why, although one strives to get all the workers into the anarcho-syndicalist organization, one must—if different factions do exist—give representation to all of them.

If on the basis of this discussion you wish to regard your national committee of all syndicates as a political power, there is nothing to prevent you from doing so. The syndicalists generally prefer to think of it as an administration of things rather than a government of the people. (This; of course, can only be approximated at the present time).

Position on the State

The bourgeois state to the syndicalist is merely, as it is to the Marxist, an executive committee of the dominant class, and can therefore not be used to bring about the destruction of this class. In the pre-revolutionary situation you are to ignore the state and its machinery; for to use it is to divide your efforts that might better be expended in building a strong labor union movement, and to misdirect the attentions of the workers.

Now let us review what the anarcho-syidicalists actually have done in Spain and how their actions square, or fail to square, with their theories. And regardless what are our personal attitudes, on concrete situations, we must agree that if the fact does not coincide with the theory, one or both must be modified; and if they both continue unmodified, along side of each other, confusion results.

Before the revolt, and during the February elections which ushered in the popular front regime, the CNT and FAI did not carry on their usual anti-election campaign. They permitted, for the first time in their history, the question of voting to be a matter of individual conscience. While we can see how the tenseness of the situation and the cospicuous differences between a fascist government and one where some modicum of freedom is permitted might be a strong temptation to make a choice, we do not see how voting, on the part of an anrcho-syndicalist can be reconciled with his convictions regarding the nature of the bourgeois state and the political process.

Actually the elections made little difference in the struggle for power, for if the workers did not disregard them, the fascists did; and regardless which side would have been elected. the dominance of the fascists could only be checked in a military struggle. The popular front government did not even offer (as its protagonists claim) a breathing spell or a preparation for better resisting the fascists.

It is true that the prisons were opened and 30,000 political prisoners released, and that much land was decreed to the land-starved peasants. But there were both spontaneous unofficial moves on the part of the workers themselves. After they had been accomplished, the government, seeing that the workers meant business, came in tardily and passed decrees OK'ing these steps.

At the outbreak of the revolt, as we have noted before, the Popular Front government was completely bankrupt. It did not predict the uprising, it did not prepare for it, and what is more culpable, it sabotaged those who were prepared to fight by refusing them arms. What was true of the central government was also true of the local governments. And so, after the first days of the rebellion, economic councils of workers and Committees of Public Safety and Defence arose and took care of all the new business and all the old business of the localities. The actual governments were only theoretical; they were a sort of a rubber stamp to be added automatically after things had been decided on in other bodies. No one came to the governments for advice or permission.

Labor unions increased in membership, because the only way to have a say in what was going on was to be a member of one of the unions. The labor organization stamped your passport and distributed your food and contributed to your militias Non-workers accepted steps like socialization because there was no alternative way to keep them fed and clothed, and protected from fascism.

The justification of the entrance of the anarcho-syndicalists in these economic and defense councils seems to me to be contingent entirely upon the composition of these councils. When these were representative of the workers and soldiers—that is, a replacement of the parliamentary-geographical state—their participation seems to me to be an honest fulfillment of their aims—for they would thereby be joining with other workers to assure the victory of the revolution. As soon as these organizations gained, however, the membership of parties with no bond in any syndicate or agriculturel organization—and from that step became adjuncts to the state, participation by anarcho-syndicalists seems to me to be a violation of theory.

In all their propaganda the anarcho-sydicalists were clamoring for an all-Spanish Defence Council or Eeconomic Council which would coordinate the local organizations of that sort already in existence and make possible a unified command. But while this was being publicized, the Madrid government gradually sputtered its way back into existence. It found ready loyalty among the small numbers of the bourgeois and the communists, who though almost insignificant in number were extremely bold and articulate and seemed to hold in the palm of their hand the key to Russian aid of Spain.

They traded on the vestiges of a revolutionary reputation to achieve prominence and bourgeois support on the slogans of unity and a democratic program. The CNT recognized that to antagonize these anti-fascist parties might have meant to incur harm in the war and sabotage at the rear. The CNT-FAI apparently took the war against fascism more seriously than other organizations and individuals who devote much of their time to mouthing slogans and discovering plots, fifth columns, and nests of uncontrollables.

Their desire for anti-fascist unity determined the position of the anarchists. Susequent events make it clear however, that the structure of this organization, rendered possible (though not inevitable) the hegemony of political groups, non-representative of the masses of the people. When that became abundantly clear to the anarchists, they moved out; and have since refused to collaborate with the Negrin government.

The anarcho-syndicalists refuse to stuff anything down the necks of the workers, even if that thing be revolutionary unionism. Yet their propaganda against the Negrin government must go on, along with their fight against fascism. That they are not slighting the latter is testified to by their constant activity at the front. That they must not slight their work of exposure of the Negrin government, not only to save Spain for after the war, but to have her win the war, should be clear to all.

No civil war can be carried on for so long a time without some definite hope and proof of social ameliorization for the volunteer fighters. But Negrin declares:

> "Economic reforms, which have been carried out in Spain since the beginning of the civil war, have been accomplished according to the law, and once the smoke has blown away it will be seen that they have gone no further than reforms already carried out in other countries which pass for being conservative strongholds. (Edgar Ansel Mower's article in The News, 9-22-37).

But this cannot be an expression of the sentiment of the people who so many times have risen in revolt and sacrificed the lives of their dearest so that Spain would be more than a "stronghold

JAY EFFIE

What do new inventions add to the comfort and wellbeing of the working class? Not much, as this article on air conditioning shows.

Air-conditioning is being hailed as the latest advancement for the comfort and health of human beings. It is presented as further evidence that capitalism does provide the working class with the better things of life.

A small fan or cheap filter is now added to the familiar items which usually include the old jollopy and the ceramic toilet bowl. A little reflection will show that these, as well as other benefits, are secondary or co-incidental and, in many instances no benefit at all.

Artificial Weather

The prime motive in creating artificial weather is to make profits. Most all worth-while installations are made for production or sales promotion purposes. Air-conditioning for industrial process has been employed for more than 30 years. The conditions to be maintained are governed by the requirements of the product. The science has been applied to more than 200 different products:—Textiles, rubber, films, paper, clay products, etc. Some require warm and moist conditions, others cold and dry. It may be for drying, fermentation, baking, or storage. Maximum production, not health or comfort is the object here. Only in rare instances where the efficiency of the occupants can be increased, do the workers get a break.

The biggest strides were made during the World War when increased capacity and out-put was a paramount concern. Much of the data gathered and facilities acquired during that slaughter is now incorporated in the equipment that supplies ocean breezes and mountain air in the homes of the upper crust.

Complete air-conditioning systems for guests and patrons of swanky hotels, stores, and restaurants are also being installed. Here the elite satisfy their desires in regal atmosphere. Haile Sallasie with attendants waving palm leaves on a broom handle is poor by comparison.

Banks and loan offices are also being equipped. One of the first portable cooling units this writer knows of went into a bookie joint. The suckers are given soothing comfort such as comes from the wings of a vampire fanning its victim. A warm show in the winter or a cool matinee in the summer at one of the higher priced theatres is more justifiable. Here the total comfort of a large audience is more equal to the profits of the owners.

A Boost to Prosperity?

To many people air-conditioning has become a magic expression. Back in 1930 or '31, Hoover looked to air-conditioning as an avenue leading back to the prosperity to which we had been accustomed—thereby prolonging the profit system, as the automobile industry had done.

His forecast started a mild rush to the new industrial frontier—the capitalists looking for markets and the workers looking for jobs.

A well-known home appliance company came out with a small gadget selling for $13.50 that would do everything—even to adding ozone. Others would revitalize the air with a wad of metallic wool in the stove pipe. Haberdashers' windows displayed air-conditioned hats and underwear. "To protect the public" the real weather makers took measures to inform that air-conditioning embodies the control of temperature, humidity, purity, and movement of the air.

"Comfort cooling" is a more recent term that takes in less territory. Real comfort cooling is an expensive proposition.

To meet more purses, attic fans that cool with night air, have been introduced. Electric companies have enclosed literature with the meter bill to household customers. Tests show these fans are comparatively satisfactory where climate conditions and room arrangements are suitable. Pulling down the shades on hot sunny days, remains the proletarian system.

A system called the "By-Pass" is patented. It is a system whereby a fee is paid for using the same air over again. It may make Selden, who years ago got a rake-off on every "self-propelled vehicle," look like a chump.

More Work But Not More Jobs

The best that workers can expect from air-conditioning is more work. Trade schools and technical institutes have enrolled thousands of young men for training in this field which combines heating and ventilating with refrigeration.

More work, however, does not necessarily call for more workers. Many are doomed to disappointment and the heart-breaks that go with failure to attain the coveted jobs. What is needed is more effort to get "the works" not work. Reconditioning our social order is of greater importance than air-conditioning. Line up.

THE INDUSTRIAL WORKERS OF THE WORLD

The I.W.W. is a labor union, its work lies in the industries. When its members are not on the job they are trying to get there, primarily, of course, becaus they like other workers have to work to live; but also because they are bent on introducing unionism—the right kind—to all the workers of the world.

Unionism that doesn't aim at organizing all the workers is a puny sort. It may, for a time, by cooperating with employers achieve success, but in the end pressure from the army of workers it excludes will break down the barriers it has erected for the protection of a comparative few. The unionism of the future—and it is needed today—will be broad and big enough to include the workers of all the industries; and that means that it will eventually spread over the world, in complete disregard of the political boundaries that divide the people of the world into mutually hostile nations. That's the scope of labor organization in industry as the I.W.W. sees it.

What Real Unionism Demands

There is a type of unionism which, while agreeing theoretically at least to the proposition that all workers must be organized, would limit the scope of its demands on industry to what it calls a fair wage and security for workers. Aside from the fact that this dream of security under capitalism is utterly impossible of realization, it is plainly nothing but a slave's conception of an ideal slavery. A condition in which the workers, like cattle, machinery, and materials will be taken care of by a master class that clothes the practical business of exploiting slaves with humanitarian frills.

The I.W.W. is not deceived by the hazy promises of a servile security under capitalism. Its members know that capitalism has not made good as a provider for humanity and that now and in the future, as long as it lasts, it will prove less capable than ever before to protect the right to live and to enjoy life.

Whether capitalism breaks down of its own weight or not, the I.W.W. knows that it is the task of the workers, acting in their own interests individually and collectively, to take charge of the machinery of production and distribution. That means the workers must be organized, not just to demand more wages from an employer but also to operate industry on their own. It goes almost without saying that this process of organizing must take place on the job, any job and every job. In other words, the transition from private ownership and control of industry to public ownership and worker control is the work of a labor union organization and not for any other.

It is reasonably clear too, that unless a large part of the working class is prepared to take over its new duty of management or, at any rate, has some considerable preparation for the task, no matter what happens to the present economic structure they will not be able to profit for themselves. Willing or unwilling to be subject to a master class, if they are unprepared to take over when a great crisis causes the closing down of industry because no profits are to be made for the owners, the workers will still be slaves; masterless slaves begging for a master. If the workers don't want to, or are unable to rule themselves it is certain there will be some one to take over the job.

At this point it may be necessary to remind that whoever, or whatever class takes over the industries, will be the ruling power. Will it be the state? Will it be a few super-trusts? Or is it possible to turn time back a century and re-establish the small scale ownership of an earlier capitalism? Or, finally, will it be the working class, the industrial workers of the world, organized in one big union, that will take command?

The last question is already partly answered in the preceding paragraph. It won't be the workers who take over unless they are prepared.

The Preparation

Now, no amount of theoretical education will enable the workers to get this preparation. What is needed is education on the job and, especially in the job branch meeting where job questions are discussed and decisions made by the workers themselves. Workers who have learned how to handle sensibly the immediate problems that confront them in the every day struggle are far advanced in the kind of schooling most needed in the big job of taking over the world for the workers.

When the functioning job branch is part of an industrial union, and the industrial union is part of the one big union, the Industrial Workers of the World, then we have the set-up that is required to meet any situation that can ever arise in the struggle of class against class. What the workers of modern industry can't do through such an organization is not worth doing at all.

Well, the structure of that organization is here. It has many functioning branches where members are learning daily how to fight effectively to gain the things now within reach, from the employers while at the same time they are preparing themselves, though not always consciously, for the time when the working class will get along without employers.

What is needed now is more members in this organization, more functioning job branches, more workers learning through practical experience that when organized properly they have a power their employers are bound to respect; a power that will one day grow to such proportions that it will sweep wage slavery off the earth.

Help speed that day!

The "Uncontrollables" in Spain

of conservation." It is the expression of Negrin and his government. That government is a menace to the fighting people of Spain.

The Negrin government, representing the most backward and bourgeois elements in the country consistently fights the gains of socialization, tries to chain the army to its control, and flirts with the exiled industrialists to induce them to return to their old position of dominance. At the same time it betrays its non-democratic nature by its suppression of those who question its correctness and its motives.

Those who teach against it, and yet fight valiantly at the front, those who may be ranked among the uncontrollables, represent the hope of Spain. Just as the war in Spain is not a private matter, but an international one, so is the revolution. Libertarian communism in Spain would mean impetus to social progress the world over! It would be a real threat to fascism, and an inspiration to those whose government is an insipid democracy.

HEAVE HO!

Come lend a hand, ye workers!
Quit begging them for doles,
Quit asking them for justice
Who've neither brains nor souls—
Heave ho, heave ho, ye workers!

Come lend a hand, yea workers!
Come help us end the cause
Of joblessness and hunger,
Of poverty and wars—
Heave ho, heave ho, ye workers!

Assignment in Utopia — Wobblies One Meets There

By JUSTUS EBERT

Eugene Lyon's autobiography dealing mainly with Russia, entitled "Assignment in Utopia" (Harcourt, Brace and Co., New York), is just what William Allen White calls it, "a beautiful book." This is due, not only to its literary quality, but, despite the author's painful disillusionment, also to its ideal re-dedication.

Lyons was a United Press correspondent who was assigned to the land of Stalin from 1928 to 1934. He relates how, while there, he was, at first, a fanatical communist, protecting the alleged proletarian dictatorship and its supposedly great basic achievements, only, in the end, to be disillusionized, and to proclaim himself, not only a deceiver of self, but also of his American readers, all for the cause!

Following his spiritual revolt from a socialism, to paraphrase his own language, that professes to fill bellies only to slit them in behalf of tyranny that degrades a great idealism and a great people, Lyons re-dedicates himself to those human values and ideals of justice and liberty which had been his prior to his assignment in Russia.

It's a terrible picture Lyons paints of so-called Russian communism, one difficult of belief. In this respect his book is not beautiful, but as repulsive and as vile as the dictatorship which it depicts; a dictatorship at once inept and incompetent in all the arts, except those of intolerance and oppression in both of which it attains an unsurpassed excellence, according to Lyons. It makes gruesome reading.

What actually caused Lyons to write "Assignment In Utopia" Was it a journalistic flair for the sensational? Was it really a moral revulsion? Or was it, as some of his critics contend, a lack of guts peculiar to Utopians in critical periods requiring, to use the ruthless Bismarckian phrase, men of "Blood and Iron?" Possibly. But we hazard another guess, viz., his own pre-Russian psychology, due, in great part, to his early contacts with the I. W. W. in this country.

As he relates, before going to Russia to fill the United Press assignment, Lyons was a publicity man for a workers' defense league. As such he took part in the Krieger I. W. W. trial at Tulsa, Oklahoma and in the Sacco-Vanzetti trials, of which he wrote a book. In these trials, Lyons developed the humanitarian and libertarian ideals which he had previously acquired in East Side New York socialist Sunday schools. Apparently he could never divest himself of the deep sense of injustice thus inbibed in his formative years.

It is this aspect of his autobiography that makes Lyon's book interesting to old time wobblies. It contains well-drawn word pictures of Carlo Tresca, Vincent St. John, Fred Moore, Charles Krieger, John Beffel, all of whom he knew in the U. S. A.; and William D. Haywood, Bill Shatoff, George Andreytchine and Belinkes, whom he met in Russia.

Poor Bill Haywood! According to Lyons, "Out of one prison he had escaped into another prison. He was a pathetic ruin."

"Assignment in Utopia" is not pleasant reading for idealistis. However, it is instructive reading for all who are not wedded to dictatorship, whether so-called proletarian, party or personal dictatorships. To us it proves that though revolution has a tremendously transforming effect, its defects in an undevelopd people cannot be so repaired by five or ten year plans dictatorially imposed upon them, as to make specialists of them. The psychology for such revolution must be inherent in conditions covering more extensive periods of development and growth. All else is appalling tragedy, as this book makes evident.

However, Lyons shows that "adventures in idealism" have a way of repeating themselves, as in his re-dedication, despite all self-disillusionment and tyranny to the contrary. This is the most beautiful thing in an otherwise sordid human history. Without it life would be hopeless.

Preamble of the Industrial Workers of the World

The working class and the employing class have nothing in common. There can be no peace so long as hunger and want are found among millions of working people and the few, who make up the employing class, have all the good things of life.

Between these two classes a struggle must go on until the workers of the world organize as a class, take possession of the earth and the machinery of production, and abolish the wage system.

We find that the centering of the management of industries into fewer and fewer hands makes the trade unions unable to cope with the ever growing power of the employing class. The trade unions foster a state of affairs which allows one set of workers to be pitted against another set of workers in the same industry, thereby helping defeat one another in wage wars. Moreover, the trade unions aid the employing class to mislead the workers into the belief that the working class have interests in common with their employers.

These conditions can be changed and the interest of the working class upheld only by an organization formed in such a way that all its members in any one industry, or in all industries if necessary, cease work whenever a strike or lockout is on in any department thereof, thus making an injury to one an injury to all.

Instead of the conservative motto, "A fair day's wage for a fair day's work," we must inscribe on our banner the revolutionary watchword, "Abolition of the wage system."

It is the historic mission of the working class to do away with capitalism. The army of production must be organized, not only for the every-day struggle with capitalists, but also to carry on production when capitalism shall have been overthrown. By organizing industrially we are forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old.

Meat for the Wolves

When the prolonged cold of a hard winter results in a scarcity of game, the wolves on the icy steppes of Siberia hunt in packs and often (so we are told) they are driven by hunger to the point where the stronger turn on the weaker ones and devour them.

Whether this is true of the Siberian wolves or not, it certainly is true of the wolves of capitalism. These, in their pursuit of the profits gouged from labor, think it nothing at all to gorge themselves on the flesh of their own kind. Small capitalists are swallowed down by the thousands every year; but the slaughter reaches its heights when "times are bad"—meaning when there is great unemployment of labor and there are correspondingly fewer workers to exploit.

Then it is that there is a great howling in the arena of politics. The big capitalists try to cover up their raids for meat (profits) with a mighty yelping, while the little fellows snarl their protest at being chewed up.

It's all very interesting to read about in the papers but workers sometimes are misled into believing that they should take sides with the little disputants against the big ones. That's a fatal mistake. Little capitalists, like the big ones, live by exploiting labor, and as long as they live their ambition is to become big capitalists by exploiting more labor.

Labor's task is to organize itself to rid the world of the whole tribe of wolves. Labor should know that any meat the exploiters get in the form of rent, interest, profits, or subsidies comes from wealth produced by workers and that what the exploiters eat puts no fat on the slaves.

FIGHTING FOR SPANISH FREEDOM

By

Fellow Worker Raymond Galstad

It was June 1937, I sailed with a group of seventeen workers for Spain via the port of Le Havre, aboard the S. S. President Harding, to join the Loyalist forces. Of these seventeen toilers some came from the logging camps of Idaho, Michigan, and Minnesota, some from the coal mines of Pennsylvania; some from the textile mills of New Jersey; a few were maritime workers from the Great Lakes.

Searching the ruins of a house in Barcelona after a fleet of rebel planes had completed another brutal assault on the residential section, killing hundreds of women and children.

Upon arrival in Le Havre we boarded the boat train to Paris. There we contacted several labor organizations in order to have our itinerary arranged before leaving for the French frontier. We left our excess baggage behind, each of us taking only a shaving kit, a bar of soap, a towel, and a change of socks. The wisdom of this arrangement made itself apparent when we started our trek across the mountains.

The Climb

Our destination was Montpelier located in southeastern France near the Mediterranean Sea. We motored from Montpelier to Cerebes, a French border village. By fording a stream we eluded the French frontier gendarmerie. (It was rumored the evening before three men were killed while attempting to cross the dubiously "open" French border.)

Footsore, weary and rain-soaked we climbed the narrow passes and jagged rocks of the Pyrennees. This, in a dark and starless night was a most difficult and arduous task. Some of our group, completely exhausted, could proceed no farther without rest. We left them to wait for the next contingent and pushed on. Sixteen hours seemed like sixteen years at the shoe-dragging pace at which our weariness allowed us to move. Yet we smiled when we recalled that it took the mighty Hannibal several months to accomplish the same trail with his retinue of slaves and soldiers and giant elephants when he set out to conquer the Roman Empire nearly two hundred years before the alleged birth of Christ.

The Old Fort

At the foot of the mountain a motor lorry awaited us. We were carried to an old fortress located near the city of Figueres. Here we prepared for military service, attaching ourselves to the French syndicalist section of the International Brigade, and spent four days drilling and unloading munitions from the motor transports.

The old fort was built in the sixteenth century. It is said the labor power of five thousand captured slaves was required for over a period of twelve years to complete the structure. The refined instruments of torture used upon the unfortunates were still to be found in the underground chambers catacombing the courtyards. The chambers were now put to use by Loyalist militiamen as a place of safety against the splattering shells dropped from fascist bombers that roared in a streak of silver across the skies.

Albacete

Then to Albacete we traveled through the historic cities of Barcelona and Valencia. Railway service in Spain was rather irregular. Frequent bombings of bridges and tracks were responsible for interruptions in transportation service, necessitating continuous repair by railroad workers of the Confederation of Labor to maintain even a semblance of service. The generosity and goodfellowship of the Spanish people was touching. At every stop workers would board the train bearing huge baskets of truits, sandwiches and jugs of wine. Little boys and girl would be waiting on the station platforms singing the "Internationale" and "No Pasaran."

The city of Alabacete was the training center for the recruits of the International Brigade. We spent two weeks here learning the technique of modern warfare under the guidance of competent officers. Almost all of us had previous military experience so we were able to execute the most intricate maneuvers flawlessly with only a few day's drilling.

To the Front

While at mess one morning we recieved our order to report at the parade grounds with full equipment including blankets and extra bandoliers of ammunition. We entered barracks and strapped on our military regalia, struggled with our blanket rolls and marched to the parade grounds. Here we stood at ease while our officer-of-the-day delivered a stirring talk, explaining our leaving for the Saragossa front. We were told of the splendid victories of the International Brigade in previous encounters with the Fascist armies, and were advised to fight unflinchingly to uphold the marvelous reputation established by these working class soldiers who fought in the interests of their class.

A caravan of motor lorries that seemed endless approached us, and we clambered aboard and drove off amidst cheers dying away and giving precedence to the hum of chugging engines as we rode along. Mile after mile we traveled over a maze of dusty highways. The hot glaring sun beat mercilessly down upon us, but we thankfully drew in cool draughts of air with the coming of evening.

Our chauffeurs had a strenuous task, sometimes driving continually for forty-eight hours. The difference of defeat and victory often hinged upon the ability and endurance of these men. We were dependent upon the chauffeurs and their trucks for the bringing of foodstuffs, water, arms, and reinforcements. Fascist scouting planes ripping through the skies were always searching for them as a target for their deadly projectiles. Many of the trucks had been completely demolished and their occupants killed. Six miles from the front we dismounted from the trucks and with metallic equipment clanking and clattering in rhythm with our step we began our march to the tranches.

Facing Fire

Soon after we entered our trenches we faced a barrage of artillery fire that continued without abatement for two days. Shells burst around us as we dug ourselves in. Our artillery had been shifted to another sector previous to our arrival so we retalliated with machine guns. In the afternoon of the first day a squadron of planes flew over us. We thought they were ours, but we soon discovered they were not. Bombs came whirling groundward with a screeching, whistling sound that played havoc with the ears. They hit the earth with a terrific thud causing shrapnel and dirt to leap and fly in all directions. The planes swooped to the ground and raked the trenches with machine gun fire. Our casualties were heavy, and the cries of the wounded could be heard above the roar of battle. First aid was quickly applied to alleviate their pains. The disabled could not be removed to safety until nightfall. Messengers were dispatched to headquarters with urgent requests for artillery to reinforce us.

The barrage ceased early the second day and the Fascist hordes went over the top. We greeted them with withering rifle and machine gun fire. Their advance was halted abruptly and they retreated hastily in confusion leaving a tremendous number of dead and wounded in the fields. That night water, cool and fresh, arrived and also cigarettes to ease tense nerves. The next two days were comparatively quiet. Snipers exchanged shots now and then but no serious damage was effected in our numbers. Hot meals and laughter were our diet for a space while some of our men were collecting fallen fascists and administering medical aid to them, trying the while to jolly them along and to reassure them they were not going to face firing squads.

Our clothes were stiff with dirt and dried perspiration. Sweat sores harassed many of us, causing a great many discomforts, and we itched for action to make us forget them. On the fifth day our artillery went into the field and we advanced. Over we went with fixed bayonets and bags of grenades. Stretcher bearers followed close behind the militiamen plodding steadily forward. When we were within throwing distance of the enemy trenches our hands crept into the bags. The grenades did their work. The fascists fled leaving us in possession of their trenches and quatities of military supplies.

The victory took its toll in lives, however, and volunteers were asked to bury our dead. We went through their pockets relieving them of their identifications and personal effects. These were delivered to headquarters. It was the regular procedure to ascertain the numbers and names of the dead.

Wounded

On the sixth day I was wounded by an exploding shell. I was sent to the base hospital where I remained for five days. In order to make room for the daily stream of incoming wounded, arrangements were made for those of us who were declared incapacitated for further military service to be removed to Barcelona. In the hospital there I put in fifteen days of solid comfort while the doctors and nurses went about their routines with an element of kindness totally out of perspective with my notions of professional severility their careers normally demand of them. Each one of us felt like a petted hero.

Moscow Wrecking Crew

After leaving the hospital, I wandered through the city, satisfying my curiosity about many things. In Barcelona camps marionettes were elevated to the exalted rank of political commissars. The manipulation of the marionettes was pretty securely in the hands of the Stalinists. They monopolized the avenues of propaganda and indulged in the less arduous tasks of class struggle, or "civil war" as they conveniently disguised it. Skimpingly distributing cigarettes, chocolate candies, and the like, seemed to be the only practical assistance they gave, and even in doing that they did no better than the Salvation Army or the Y. M. C. A. in the 1914-1918 "war to end wars."

A shortage of tobacco was noticeable throughout Loyalist Spain. Most of the tobacco producing districts were held by the Fascist forces. It was nearly an impossibility to beg or borrow the weed in any form. The Stalinists had a monopoly and they used it to entice adherents!

They preached political propaganda day and night. Their lectures invariably ended up with the idea: "We're right behind you." I heartily agreed with them on that score. The first time I ever agreed with the Communists, if my memory serves me rightly. They generally were to be found in the security of an office miles "BEHIND" the front line trenches drawing a stipend of two thousand pesetas a month and arguing for a stabilized price system so that they would be the only ones with purchasing power. Of course the anarcho-syndicalists thwarted the Communists frequently in their capitalistic schemes by abolishing the price system completely in some of the industries which they controlled.

Need for Honest Perspective

To one who has seen the war in Spain closely and wishes to report it honestly, it is more than a civil war among Spaniards; it is more than a capitalist-fascist test for larger wars in the future. It is a CLASS STRUGGLE. It is Revolution. It is a fight for a progressive and sane way of living, against a retrogressive and insane way of existing.

On the insurgent side, Generalissimo Francisco

Civilian victim of Fascist air raid

Franco recieved aid from Fascist Italy and Nazi Germany. These two powers have aided the insurgents immensely with large numbers of troops, modern artillery, planes, small arms, ammunition, foodstuffs, and money. In payment for services rendered, Germany and Italy were to recieve valuable concessions in the coal and iron mines of the Asturias.

Soviet Russia, on the other hand, with its tempting offers of arms and men, succeeded in attracting a large number of the Spanish people to its cause, chiefly recruiting sympathy among the dispossessed petty bourgeoisie. The Stalinist adherents have managed to instate a number of their followers in the present form of government, and through devious ways to change the complexion of Revolution to Counter Revolution.

Stalinist Cops

The venomous fangs of the Stalinist Okranja has struck on numerous occasions. Many of the most militant members of the C. N. T.—F. A. I., labor organizations, have "disappeared," some have been found dead, others are in prison. In their insatiable greed for power, no less inimical to working class hopes than capitalist greed, they have deliberately sent the militant Catalonians to the front with inferior arms, witholding proper support from the artillery and airforce. This "tactic" resulted in gruesome casualties and heavy loss of life to these militants.

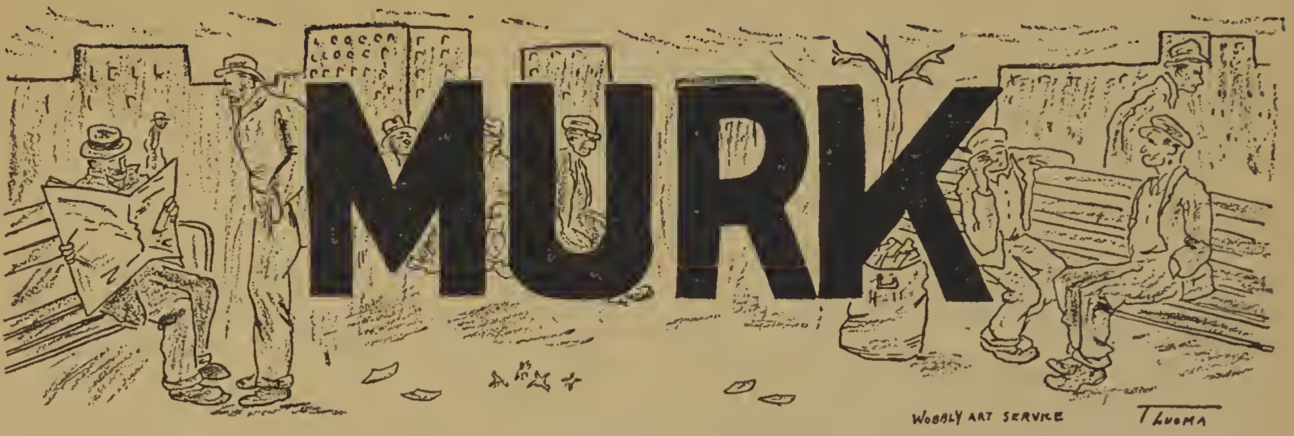
Last May the Catalonian workers' militia prepared plans for an offensive on the Aragon front. Had it been launched at that time it no doubt would have been a decisive factor in bringing the war to a victorious end. The Stalinist Okranja, through politics, succeeded in removing the leadership of the army and supplanted it with a command of their own. The scheme behind that gesture was to prolong the war and weaken the determination of the Spanish workers in the hope that they would finally submit to the will of the Stalinist regime. Despite all the agonizing betrayals they were subject to, the Spanish working class displayed fine courage an unflinching solidarity. At the outset of the war the workers' militia possessed no trained troops and had only obsolete arms, yet they defended themselves, not only against Fascist and Communist Spain, but against two of the greatest military powers in Europe.

The Neutrality Act of the United States' Government has been a factor of detriment to the cause of Loyalist Spain and has proved an advantage to the Fascist forces of Franco, who through his alliance with Germany and Italy has not been hampered by a lack of war materials. But, nevertheless, the Spanish workers have adapted themselves admirably to the situation, proving to themselves and to the rest of the world that the working class can take over the industries and manage them efficiently. Factories that have been expropriated are operated at full capacity, manufacturing amunition, rifles and field artillery, trucks, clothing and other supplies of war so that the Loyalists will not be dependent upon other nations for these equipments in the future. Engineers and technicians have wrought changes in industries that are nothing short of startling, even to converting old plants into airplane factories.

The suzerains have been driven from their vast estates over the protest of the Stalinists, and the tilling of the soil is accomplished by the workers and the crops managed by them. Although their agricultural machinery is not of the best, they have through cooperation increased the yield per acre in some crops nearly fifty per cent. Artesian wells and irrigation innovations have for the most part contributed to this end.

Complete Freedom

Young workers went regularly from the fields and shops to training camps to recieve instruction in military tactics. The victory won at Teruel recently was, no doubt, due to these youthful and enthusiastic troops. The determination of these fighting workers proves conclusively that the revolutionary Spaniards know what they want. They will never bow to a Stalinist regime. They know if they do accept, even temporarily, the idea of the dictatorship of the proletariat the penalty of death or imprisonment will await their militancy. The emancipation of the workingclass and the establishment of a new social order of, by and for the workers are their objectives.



MURK

By
THE GADFLY

In which the author goes deep into the "Lazarus layer of the proletariat" and comes up with a story showing the effect intensive mis-education and exploitation, alternating with hungry joblessness, has had on at least one brother worker.

TRASH——Old paper bags, cigarette butts, a ripped shoe, fouled candy-bar wrappers, last week's funny-papers. Filth——gobs of phlegmy spit, dog dirt, pigeon dirt, a decaying banana skin. Yesterday, an eccentric twelve-hour rain. Now, a hot, late August noon-hour. Writhing grey cement walks, thru the outer muck. Relative humidity, 90. Murk. The East Wing of Grand Circus Park, downtown in Detroit.

Men, dirty, bleary, out of work, sit on coarse green benches——greenest things in the park. Too hot to move——just sit. Only Eli moves, shuffling thru the trash and filth on the walks. Murk——he is used to murk, likes it, almost. This way half the time on the farm back in Georgia. Eli is murk, mostly.

This weather——it recalls to his feeble mind that farm, where he lived before he came north to work at Ford's. Five dollars a day, they told him. No one thought of how many days.

He is thinking vaguely of the crisis of his life on the farm, the occasion when he heard his wife was carrying on with Ezra Cobb. He remembers how her lips thinned out into that mocking leer she had with her when he accused her. Only when he choked her some would she talk. Then he kicked her clear off the farm with his boots. She was limping by the time he got her to the road.

It was raining then. Cold, too. She didn't have her coat or hat on. Her hair streaked over her face. She turned to him and leered again. Then her lumpy body collapsed. He left her lying in the mud of the road. He grunted, looked at the black sky, spat, and went back into the shack. She was gone an hour later. Next day he sold her coat and hat and her other dress for two dollars.

He wondered, then, what he ever saw in her. It took him two months of living without his woman to make him understand. She never came back.

Gradually, the fact that the West Wing of the Park is not as it was yesterday oozes into his consciousness. It is a labyrinth of brown canvas walls, like a sideshow of tents without roofs, and people are sauntering around between the walls, apparently looking for something, not knowing what—commercial people spewed out by the skyscrapers all around to eat lunch. Now they have eaten their lunches, most of them, and, having to pass thru the Park anyhow on their way back to work, they pause in the labyrinth to stare patronisingly at the artists and their art. This is the Art Fair.

Eli observes the change in the West Wing. He does not know what is going on. He never reads the papers. He only reads the Bible. Yet Eli does not speculate on the change; he merely sees it. By and by, with less thought than a dog smelling at a strange post, he slouches across the vacancy of Woodward Avenue and meshes with the crowd.

The canvas walls are heavy-hung with pictures, most of them unframed. Other pictures, on the ground, lean against the walls, against the benches, against anything. Wherever there might be a picture, a picture is. They are like brilliant butterflies clinging to the form of the city, laying their eggs——eggs which may hatch into worms of thought and gnaw the city's thick-leaved pretense down to the hollow skeletons which support them.

Five of the six men, out of work dwellers like Eli in the East Wing, are grouped about a large oil nude. They grimace, squirm, pass low remarks, display their vulgarity in general. They spot Eli approaching——holy Eli, the Bible reader. Expectantly, they watch him, cough when he comes abreast to attract his attention. He looks at the picture. No expression shows on his face. The bums are disappointed. They troop back to their proper place in the East Wing.

Eli goes on. He hesitates for a few minutes to squint at a man on a camp-stool sketching a charcoal portrait of a stenographer, she gazing at him the while with maudlin worship and the thrill of being arty. Eli goes on.

"——from real life," says a voice beside him. The dialect is strange to Eli. As a matter of fact, it is the off-spring of affected British and affected Boston, at one time mated in the speaker's mouth, the off-spring thereof being influenced by Detroit environment. However, Eli does not know that. Eli knows very little of anything.

He looks at the source of the peculiar lingo. It is a tall, bony man with a beret and excessively black eyes. The beret is not his normal headgear; it is an ad, his trademark. The eyes are unnatural. The pictures on the canvas behind him are of his doing. He pauses in his conversation, momentarily neglecting the Prospective Buyer to return Eli's stare.

Under the excessively black eyes of the Artist, Eli feels shifty. He looks down at his hands. The nails are filthy, long and rough because he has not lately been hired to labor and break them off.

The Artist resumes his sales talk. Eli dares to gaze at him again.

"Painted from life."

"Yes?" encourages the Prospective Buyer, a prosperously loggy individual, out to buy a corner on culture.

"Yes. I was coming home from a party with the grandest brandy drunk singing thru me, you know. It seems it was raining, but I didn't notice it. Too intent on working out a means of painting the fourth dimension, I suppose. I generally plan the fourth dimension on brandy. Anyhow, something tugged at my sleeve over near the front of a red brick building. I was almost at the curb before I could stop and turn around—trifle unsteady, you know. And—well, there was this girl, no hat or coat on, soaked with rain, standing in the doorway. Probably said something about coming in out of the rain, though I can't remember that part very clearly.

"Well, it looked like good material, so I rushed her right up to my study and——er——made this picture. Took me all the rest of the night."

"Hm," says the Prospective Buyer, feeling very Bohemian for listening to this kind of talk. "And what are you asking for it?"

The Artist sizes up the Prospective Buyer rapidly, finds him good, and says in the most casual tone, "Oh, about a thousand."

Till this point, Eli has been dully regarding the Artist. But the mention of so much money stirs him at least partially out of his life-long coma. He looks at the picture.

As the Artist has described the reality, so is the picture. The woman, bedraggled, in the rococco doorway, tinted with the jaundiced light of a street-lamp, the varnish-like glare of the pavement and the wet wall behind her——all that. But Eli sees more.

He sees on the woman's head straight, coarse, black hair, and her smile is a long, thin segment of a circle intersected by quizzical shorter segments at each end. Her wet dress displays the outline of her figure with geometrical clarity. Her emaciated shoulders and arms, dangling hands that might, for their massive grossness, be a day-laborer's. Her breasts—two drooping parabolas slung to the front of her under the rigidly plane chest. Her protruding hips—two conversing hyperbolas. Her calves and ankles, almost regular cylinders, such is the diameter of the latter. Her long, broad, flat feet.

He sees her again leering at him. He forgets he is in Detroit. He forgets everything that has happened since she looked at him just so in the rain on the road outside the shack and fell. His emotions are the emotions of that moment—wolf-ish hate. Showing his broken yellow teeth he rushes at the picture, rips it to cracking shreds with his dirty long nails . . . .

Whose was the hand that slanted back this brow? Whose breath blew out the light within this brain?—Edwin Markham.

It is the following morning. A weary judge is trying to pry from Eli's scanty vocabulary words which will explain his behavior. The Artist is present. He has not slept. He has consumed the night in cursing Eli. Yet he does not appear exhausted; he seems to be still cursing Eli under his breath.

After some fifteen minutes of the Judge's disinterested questioning, Eli's purpose begins to clarify. Then the Artist jumps at Eli, grabs him by the tattered lapels of his third-hand coat. Eli is limp. Yesterday's emotional crack-up has decimated his insignificant vitality.

"Do you mean you ruined my painting because you thought the prostitute was your wife?" demands the Artist, viciously. "Is that it? You think the woman looked like her?"

Eli nods stupidly. The excessively black eyes are cutting sheer thru his innate murk.

The Artist suddenly does a strange thing. He starts to chuckle. He laughs. He releases Eli and becomes downright hysterical. He falls into a chair. "His wife! His wife! His wife!" And he laughs some more. As tho turned off by a switch, he stops as spontaneously as he began. He grabs Eli again.

"Ass!" he cries, a trifle too dramatically. "There never lived a woman like that. She was the product of my own brain—my own brain! Do you understand?" He shakes Eli frantically, beating vainly against the dolt's animal immobility. "Smoke! I made her up. A dream! Why, you damned holy boob, a creature that shape could not exist! . . . . Five hundred dollars—at the very least—gone, because you—you, rotten swine—you can't appreciate the exaggerations of modernism!" THE END.

The Historic Mission of the I.W.W.

By MORTINER DOWNING

Production—Distribution—Acquisition and Consumption, all these four words equal and relative, spell the story of human life. At no point may the balance be disturbed. Production is the basis; neither distribution, appropriation nor consumption can be had except of goods in being. If the production lags so do the other three. If the production increases, under a sane knowledge every human being is benefitted. Under the present competition of capitalism a contradiction appears. Instead of human benefit the whole social system is shaken. Prices fall, wages shrink and all in proportion to the growth of production. This latter system, the I. W. W. was born to destroy.

So in 1905 appeared a new scheme of life known as World Industrial Unionism. Every producer should be organized in his special capacity. All private concerns are ignored. In the social world and in political relations the individual is free—his obligation is one only. Every human being must contribute to the general welfare, and this should be balanced by the need of all to respond to the duty that, "An Injury to One Is an Injury to All." Self and selfishness fade away, and an interdependent human race stands erect and proud. Misery vanishes. Happiness reigns.

To gain these ends the I.W.W. was born and still lives. It has faced its responsibility along a blood stained trail beset by terror and brutality, but it still lives. It shall triumph.

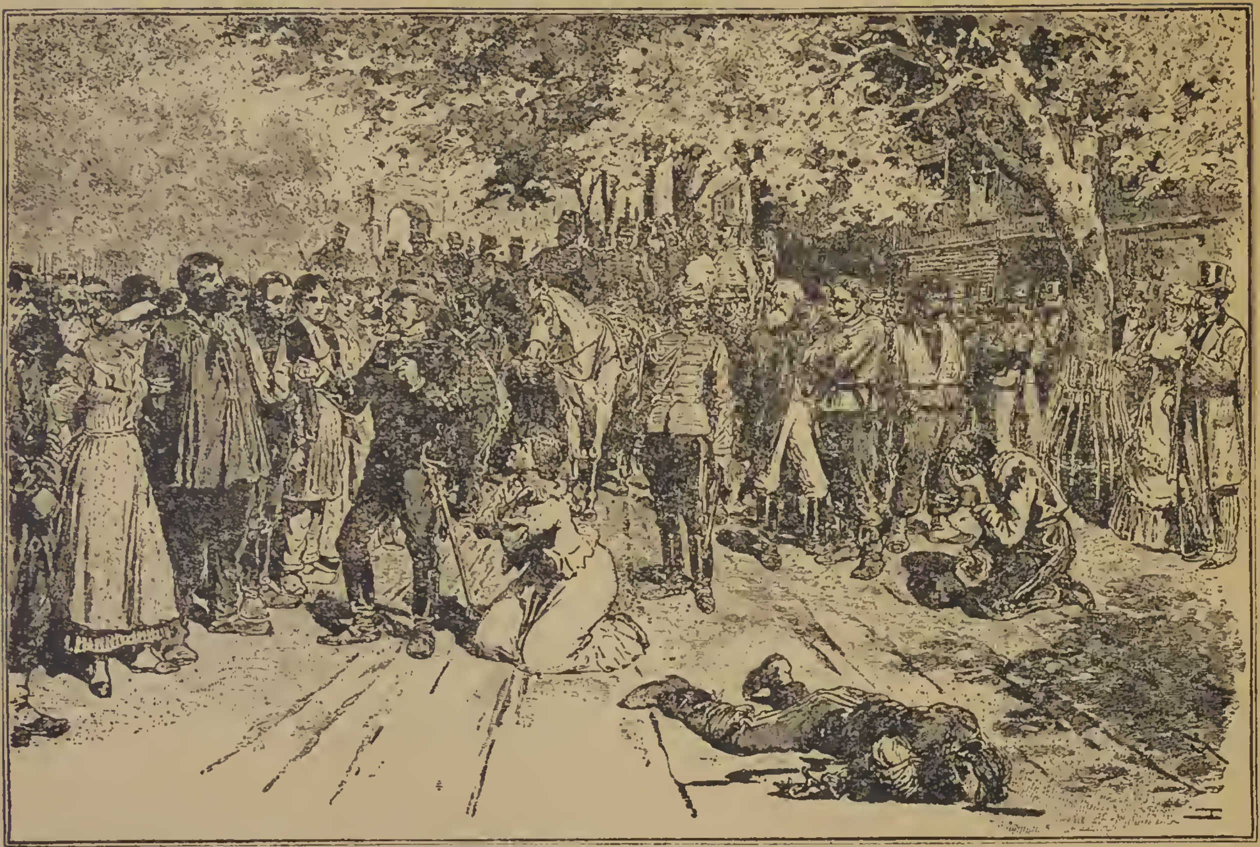
Mistakes of individuals, groups and factions have hindered, halted and sometimes confused. Short cuts have been heralded as revelations. But there is only one path toward a new life and that is the wide understanding that Production equals Distribution, that Distribution equals Acquisition and Acquisition equals Consumption.

To weld these into a purpose is the mission of the I.W.W. It is no greater, no less. Freedom from the wage system must be the act of the wage workers themselves. Politics, however enlightened, will not build up this new system. In all assemblies of talkers the orators will look out for themselves. So the wage workers, if they would be free, must meet at the point of production, where the only discussion is to save human labor power, to promote leisure and health. Scrap all mere talkers.

Wage workers must realize that the only good is security, or rather assurance that every baby born starts with the protection of all society. That everyone is a child in a world-wide human Commonwealth. Whether this can be done peacefully is a mere debate. It must be done at any and all costs. Either that or repression and suppression will be multiplied. On one horizon shines the sunrise on all the sky and land but on the outside is murk of murder, stealth and tyranny.

Workers of the World Unite, you have nothing to lose but your chains and a World to gain. Forget the past and face the dawn.

All Honor to the Communards!



GALLIFET SELECTS HIS VICTIMS

On March 18, 1871, in the midst of the war against the invading Prussians, the proletariat of Paris took charge of the city and commenced the establishment of workers' control in industry—the first such attempt in modern times.

How the capitalists took revenge after peace was made with the Germans is described in the following accounts from "The Civil War in France," by Karl Marx:

"The column of prisoners halted in the Avenue Uhrich, and was drawn up, four or five deep, on the footway facing to the road. General Marquis de Gallifet and his staff dismounted and commenced an inspection from the left of the line. Walking slowly and eyeing the ranks, the general stopped here and there, tapping a man on the shoulder or beckoning him out of the rear ranks. In most cases, without further parley, the individual thus selected was marched out into the center of the road, where a small supplementary column was thus soon formed . . . It was evident that there was considerable room for error. A mounted officer pointed out to General Gallifet a man and woman for some particular offence. This woman, rushing out of the ranks, protested her innocence in passionate terms. The general waited for a pause, and then with most impassable face and unmoved demeanor, said, 'Madame, I have visited every theatre in Paris, your acting will have no effect on me' (ce n'est pas la peine de jouer la comedie') . . . It was not a good thing on that day to be noticeably taller, dirtier, cleaner, older, or uglier than one's neighbors. One individual in particular struck me as probably owing his speedy release from the ills of this world to his having a broken nose . . . Over a hundred being thus chosen, a firing party was told off, and the column resumed its march, leaving them behind. A few minutes afterwards a dropping fire in our rear commenced, and continued for over a quarter of an hour. It was the execution of these summarily-convicted wretches."—Paris Correspondent "Daily News," June 8, 1871.

"The Temps, which is a careful journal, and not given to sensation, tells a dreadful story of people imperfectly shot and buried before life was extinct. A great number were buried in the Square round St. Jacques-la-Bouchiere; some of them very superficially. In the daytime the roar of the busy streets prevented any notice being taken; but in the stillness of the night the inhabitants of the houses in the neighborhood were roused by distant moans, and in the morning a clenched hand was seen protruding through the soil."—Paris Correspondent, "Evening Standard," June 8, 1871.

SYNDICALISM WILL TRIUMPH IN FRANCE

By

JOSEPH WAGNER

Curbed and almost crushed by the War, and diluted by infiltration of conservative elements, French Syndicalism re-asserts itself in recent crises and again shows the only way out for the workers.

Sometime ago, in an article published in the "Nation," entitled "Will France Go Syndicalist," Robert Dell, its author, who seems to me well acquainted with the French situation, expressed his opinion (which the present writer fully shares, that in all probability France will never tolerate a dictatorial regime of any kind, whether fascist or bolshivik, but, that when the present regime will give up its ghost in France, it will be followed by a Syndicalist commonwealth. He presented an array of facts in support of his thesis and the article was not only encouraging to the revolutionist but instructive to those of his readers who are fairly well informed about the objective, subjective and historical conditions peculiar to France and the French people in general and the French working class in particular.

However, I am afraid that most of the readers of the article missed the most important points raised therein. For, few people realize how hard it is to convey exact information to the American reader on social and political events taking place outside of the borders of the U. S. A. or at any rate, outside of the English speaking world, And, to be sure, it is just as difficult to convey precise information concerning American events to people of non-English speaking countries.

In either case, the average reader of newspapers or magazines is apt to get a more or less distorted picture of the situation, due to the fact that the meaning and expressions, though correctly translated have different values in different parts of the world, according to the different social, political and historical development of the various sections of the world. Thus, the term "republican," for instance, designates in many European and Asiatic countries some sort of a revolutionist, one who fights for, or at least desires a radical political transformation in his country, whereas in the U. S. A., which has been a republic ever since it formed itself into an independent state some sixteen decades ago, the term "republician" may—and generally does—designate a conservative, or even a rank reactionary. Yet, when reading foreign events even the well informed is liable to lose sight of such distinctions.

The above simple example could be multiplied indefinitely, but what particularly concerns us here is the misunderstandings concerning international labor situations. Even in labor and radical publications of all countries references are made to the "trade unions" movement in France, England, pre-Hitler Germany, etc., just as if the labor movements of those countries were the same, or mere parts of the same general body, and not as they really are—labor organizations belonging to at least three different and distinct systems of unionism. Failing to distinguish between them, and confusing them with each other, the stories read about them, often make no sense.

Trade Unionism

Up to the World War, the world's labor union movement, roughly speaking could be classified into three systems: (1) Trade Unionism; (2) "Free" or "Socialist" labor unionism; and (3) Syndicalism. (For the present we leave out of consideration the socalled unions "organized" by employers—company unions—the yellow unions organized by the Catholic and other Churches and those called into being and controlled by the various governments). Let us briefly examine these union schools in order to be able to make the contrasts.

Trade Unionism.—Although composed of workers, strictly speaking, trade unions are not working class organizations. They are not based on working class solidarity and on the recognition of the class struggle, but rather on capitalist business principles and practices. Trade unions do not even claim to promote or defend the interests of the working class as a whole; they do not even claim to represent the interests of all the workers in a given industry, nor even those of all the workers of a given craft or trade. Originally a trade union is formed by a restricted number of mechanics in a given trade, to benefit the members of the union thus formed by striving for a monoply over the jobs in the craft and by preventing by any and all means other skilled mechanics from working at the trade, and even preventing them from joining the union of their craft by prohibitively high initiation fees, by rigid technical examination, by the closing of the books of the union, etc. Thus trade unionism not only fails to develop class consciousness, it does not engender even craft consciousness.

In the industrially developed English-speaking world—the home of trade unionism—the craft union structure having become obsolete a long time ago, it has been subject to some modification in spots, from time to time, the latest being the C.I.O. movement. But the principle remains the same: repudiation of the class struggle, job monopoly on capitalist business principle. But this principle is even more obselete. Before the advent of big business there may have been some justification for the belief that a craft monopoly could be created by allowing into the union only as many workers as there are jobs; but in modern times with the great fluctuation in employment, with entire crafts being wiped out overnight, it is utterly ridiculous to think that a ratio can be maintained between the number of jobs in a given calling and the number of the members in the respective craft union. In order to man the jobs in a busy season, a large number of new members have to be admitted into the union and when times become "normal" (slack season) the members are thrown out of work in large numbers and are forced to compete (isn't competition the life of trade?) with each other for the few remaining jobs, in spite of union-established wage-scales, just as if they had no craft union at all.

One need not be fooled by the many inter-trade-union formations we happen to see on all hands: City, District, State Federations of Labor and the A. F. L.—into the belief that these indicate some sort of class solidarity, for they do not. These combinations are but the counterpart of the political machines and parliaments (city, state, national), where representatives of different and opposing interests gather to devise ways and means to keep peace between clashing interests and prevent open warfare between them.

For an example of the mentality engendered by trade unionism we may examine briefly one typical group of trade unionism in action, the building trades. Although all affiliated with the Building Trades Council, none of the crafts in the industry has any love or friendly feeling for the other crafts in the industry. Each of them feels in closer sympathy with the interests of the contractors than with that of the other building craftsmen. They reason: "Only when prosperous, can the contractor afford to pay us more wages." Consequently, the carpenters, for instance, hate to see the bricklayer, laborer, electrician, etc. get a wage increase for they figure that since the contractor can afford only so much for wages, the more he pays the other crafts the less chance remains for the carpenters to get their raise. Of course the other trades figure the same way.

As a rule there never is concerted action by the different building trades unions in the matter of negotiation of wage scales and working agreements. Even when the contracts of all the building trades expire at the same time, each craft negotiates separately and separate contracts are signed. As a rule most of the trades come to amicable settlement with the contractors, but at times one or more trades cannot do so and strikes result. The crafts at peace are displeased with such strikes because they interfere with business, with the regular and continuous work of the other craftsmen who consider themselves as "innocent bystanders." As the work of nearly all the building trades has to go on simultaneously, when one of the "basic" crafts is on strike the rest of the trades have soon to stop working unless some "scabbing" is done. If it is the carpenters who are striking, the bricklayers can work only a few hours when they have to quit unless certain carpenter work is done, such as setting door and window frames, floor joists, erecting bearing partitions, etc. This work in turn is tied up with the work of plumbers, electricians, etc. In some cases non-union carpenters are put to work, but more often, the bricklayers, laborers, plumbers, etc., do enough carpenter work to keep the job going. This is not done with the intention of scabbing on the striking carpenters, for they are all "good union men" and realize that it is unethical; they do it only in order to enable them to carry on their "legitimate" business, that of continuing to work at their trade as per agreement with the contractors.

And yet, practically the only reason for existence of the Building Trades Council is to maintain the closed shop in building construction, by preventing non-union men working on the building jobs. The Council is practically and exclusively a solemn pact between rival, and at times warring bodies, guaranteeing that the members of none of the affiliated groups will work on the same job with non-union craftsmen. Yet, in the commonly accepted interpretation of these unions, a union bricklayer becomes a "scab" the moment he picks up a plank and sets it up on the wall as a floor joist, or the moment he sets a window frame on top of the stone sill he has laid on the brick wall, whether the carpenters are on strike or not.

But the Building Trades' solemn pact works no more automatically than did the solemn pact signed by some three scores of nations, who agreed to apply sanctions to Italy in order to prevent her invasion of Ethiopia. Collectively these big hearted nations agreed to common action, but separately each of them got busy carying on her particular "business" in opposition to what she agreed on in the pact. It was not love for Mussolini, nor the desire to see Abbissynia exterminated that prompted the bolshevik rulers of Russia to furnish the gas and oil necessary for Italy to subjugate Ethiopia, but the necessity and the desire to do "business." And the same holds true of the Building Trades craft unions. For it takes some time before the carpenters' business agent is formally informed of the scabbing going on. He goes over and investigates, but as he has no power to order the other trades to desist from scabbing on the carpenters, he has to hunt up the business agents of the unions whose members were guilty of scabbing and induce them to come with him to "clean up" the job. But, by the time all this is gone through, enough scabbing has been accomplished to allow the job to go up another story. After which, other tricks can and will be used to get on with the job in spite of the carpenters' strike and the solemn pact of the Council.

"Socialist" Unionism

The operation of trades unionism in other industries varies in details from that of the building trades, but the underlying principles are the same. And whatever temporary and occasional benefits the members of these would be job trusts derive at the expense of the rest of the working class, it is certain that the interests of the working class are not advanced by trade unionism. Not because the workers composing it are anti-social, but because trade unionism in its pure and unadulterated sense is not a working class, but a capitalist "business" institution.

In many trade unions, socialists and other radicals are permitted to make fine speeches, and this may lead many to think that some of them are more "progressive" than others and that the entire trade union movement will eventually transform itself into instruments of working class emancipation. But this seeming "liberalism" means exactly nothing. It matters not whether you are a revolutionary socialist, anarchist or what not, once you get aboard the vessel of trade unionism—even if it is labeled C.I.O.—you travel not to some Utopia of your fancy, but where the vessel is headed for regardless of your political or philosophical conceptions.

"Free" or "Socialist" Labor unionism.—Up to the outbreak of the World War, the "Free" labor unions formed by far the largest, best organized and disciplined section of the world's labor union movement, embracing not only the numerically powerful labor unions of pre-Hitler Germany, but of the entire continental Europe, with the exception of France, Spain, Portugal, Italy and some other small sections where its influence was entirely or partly limited by that of the Syndicalists. These "Free" unions were organized, educated and led by the social-democratic parties of their respective countries, and in fact they were an integral part of those parties. Being largely the creations of the socialist parties, members of the "Free" unions, as a general rule recognize the class struggle and believe in the eventual passing away of capitalism and in the emancipation of the working class from wage slavery.

But in the social-democratic scheme the role of the unions was entirely limited to the day by day struggles in the shops and factories, regulating wages, hours and shop conditions, leaving the broader aspects of the class struggle in the care of the political party, whose leaders were alone considered fit to work out theories, tactics and strategies for the unions as well as for the party. Even in the strictly shop struggles more reliance was placed on legislation than in the direct action of the workers through their unions. As a rule, especially before the World War, party and union were but two departments of the same organization. A worker joining the union of his calling would automatically become a party member. In this partnership, the union was very much a junior partner and was kept in that minor role. The most active, talented and militant of the union members would be drawn away from union activity and used for the political section. Instead of developing union fighters, good parliamentarians were produced in abundance.

This arrangement reduced the unions to "pure and simpledom," to a mere appendage of the political party and prevented them from ever developing into independent organs of the working class, capable of carrying on their mission as working class organizations at such times that the political party would fail them as it certainly did when the World War broke out and the party machinery aligned itself with the war machine of their masters dragging their "Free" unions with them; and later when fascism came to power in Germany. The powerful unions of Germany having been formerly "integrated" into the social-democratic party, were taken over by the Nazis without a struggle and "reintegrated" into the totalitarian Nazi state.

With the majority of the European countries gone fascist or semi-fascist, with the socialist parties reduced to impotence, the importance of the "Free" unions in the class struggle diminished to near zero point. Even though they still have a large number of adherents, "Free" or "Socialist" unionism is turning into traditional "trade unionism," and politically they are reduced to supporters of a waning bourgeois democracy.

Syndicalism

Syndicalism.—In the romance languages, the term syndicalism means simply unionism, but in the course of time the term came to be internationally adopted as the name of a certain type of labor unionism. There is very little difference if any between syndicalism, anarcho-syndicalism and revolutionary syndicalism. The last term very well covers them all. Syndicalist labor unionism is based on the class struggle and the solidarity of the working class locally, nationally and internationally. Its main tenents are: (1) labor unions, by the use of direct action, are all sufficient for the everyday struggles of the workers against the employers: (2) labor unions by the use of direct action are the only agency for the overthrow of the present system of exploitation of the working class and the inauguration of a new, classless society; and (3) labor unions are the only organs capable of carrying on production and distribution after the present capitalist system is abolished.

In both theory and practice, syndicalism leaves no function for the political parties and politicians, and mighty little for the "labor leader." Rank and file initiative and rule is considered as the mainspring of progress; dictatorship of any kind is detested. According to the foregoing the I.W.W. belongs to this system of unionism although it has never so designated itself.

The most conspicuous representative of revolutionary syndicalism at the present time is the Spanish C.N.T. but as readers of this magazine are well acquainted with the C.N.T. in action, on account of its magnificent role in the Spanish war and revolution, there is no need to discuss it here.

Syndicalism in France

For nearly two decades preceding the outbreak of the World War, the French syndicalist C.G.T. (General Confederation of Labor) held the international stage center. The question asked by Dell, "Will France Go Syndicalist" was a very actual and pertinent question, often asked at the time by people, including politicians and statesmen of France and abroad. Dr. Louis Levine of Columbia University, in his book "Syndicalism in France," published in 1914 but covering the subject to the end of 1910 says: "What is the future that may be predicted for the General Confederation of Labor? Will the synthesis of revolutionism and of unionism that has been achieved in it continue more or less stable until the 'final' triumph of the revolutionary syndicalists? Or will the latter be overpowered by the 'reformist' elements who will impress their ideas on the Confederation and who will change the character of French syndicalism?" These questions cannot at present be answered . . ."

And Dr. Levine ends his book with this paragraph: "The struggle has already begun. The government of the Republic is determined to put an end to the revolutionary activities of the syndicalists. It is urged on by all those who believe that only the weakness of the government has been the cause of the strength of the Syndicalists. On the other hand, the Syndicalists are determined to fight their battle to the bitter end. What the outcome may be is hidden in he mystery of the future. Qui vivera-verra (who will live will see)."

Yes, the C.G.T. was a great power then in France. The government's determination to stamp it out, as Levine mentions, did not succeed, and the C.G.T. continued to grow in importance for another four years. Then the war broke out, and with it patriotic fever. But even so, on the eve of the war the C.G.T. felt that organized labor should prevent its outbreak. It proposed to the German Trade Unions that a general strike be called in France and Germany to prevent mobilization and war. The offer was coldly turned down. "When the Fatherland is at war, the German worker is a German first of all," was the answer.

As a reaction to this many influential leaders of the C.G.T. became favorable to defend the country against invasion. The tide had turned, war hysteria with foreign troops invading their country ruined for the time being the work of years. War opponents were either sent to the first line trenches to get killed there, or were thrown in jails. War industry drew new, peasant elements into the factories in large numbers. By agreement between the union and the war government these new proletarians were forced into the unions. The entire mentality of the French working class changed by this infusion of the traditionally conservative peasant element into the proletariat.

The bolshevik revoluton and the subsequent efforts of bolshevization of the labor organizations of all countries demoralized the French working class. The old guard of the syndicalists was scattered and the unions now lacking experience, could not resist the simultaneous attacks on its two fronts: on one side the bolsheviks and on the other the socialists who wished for "Free' unionism in France as a good hunting ground for socialist politicians. It seemed that the question asked by Dr. Levine: ". . . or will the C.G.T. be overpowered by the 'reformist' elements who will impress their ideas on the Confederation and change the character of French syndicalism?" woud have to be answered in the affirmative.

One of the 1936 sit-down strikes in Paris

Disruption and Revival

After the war the 'reformist" element was dominating the C.G.T. which was being transformed into "Free" or "Socialist" unions. In 1920 the revolutionary and the communist elements in the C.G.T. revolted and split from the C.G.T. taking more than half the membership. There were now two Confederations warring against each other, one affiliated with the Red International and the other with the Amsterdam International. Trouble soon developed in the seceding federation. The communists got into control excluding the syndicalists and using the unions as an auxiliary for the zig-zagging Comunist Party of France.

The excluded unionists formed autonomous industrial unions. For sixteen years a scandalous policy of disruption of the labor movement followed. Membership fell down especially in the communist controlled outfit and unionism became a by-word. The great mass of workers, who always take keen interest in the doings of the unions got disgusted and kept away from them. The conditions of the workers became unbearable. The fascists were parading the streets in military formation fully armed, making no secret of their intention to take power by force.

Then something that will seem strange to an American happened: The unorganized workers, filled with revolutionary syndicalist tradition, suddenly and spontaneously became active. They flocked to the meetings of socialists and communists, to meetings of communist and socialist unions and by heckling and other demonstrations forced all meetings into unity meetings, preventing speakers to talk unless they favored unity. In spite of their past grudges the socialist and communist parties formed united fronts and the two confederations and the autonomous unions made organic unity.

The fascist forces were routed, the Popular Front parties won the election and the workers started a series of strikes in 1936, that amazed everybody. The outside workers not only forced unity on the warring factions, but now flocked in uninvited (and most of the time unwelcome) and increased the union membership from less than one million to five millions. Sitdown strikes were inaugurated with unexpected success, thus demonstrating to all concerned that the old syndicalist tradition was still alive with the French workers.

Communist Instrusion

The masses were able to give a powerful push to the mired union machine and get it out of the rut in 1936, but, of course, they were not trained to officer it. So the communists, who are past masters in demagogy, succeeded to capture the offices of the most important unions but instead of carrying on the work of unionism so well started in 1936, they, as usual began to maneuvre for positions, to get rid of non-bolshevik officials in order to gain control for the communist party of the entire labor union movement. The net result was that not only no more gains were made by the workers since 1936, but they even lost some of the previous gains. However, the latter part of 1937, another push was started from below and the communists seem to be heeding the signs and are acting accordingly, or if not that, then they must have gotten orders from the incomparable Stalin, to tend to business and cut out all foolishness. But, I had better let M. Chambelland, the French syndicalist, talk to you through the "Revolution Proletarienne" for a few minutes:

End of the Year Fights

"As in 1936, the end of 1937 has been marked by some important social conflicts. Hardly has the successful struggle of the large department stores employees for the renewal of their collective contract been won, thanks to the occupation of the stores by the employees, than the strike of the Commercial Truck drivers, and that of the employees of the Food Stuffs depots has broken out. At the same time the Goodrich plant at Colombes has been occupied by the strikers on orders from the Chemical Products' Union. An attempt to vacate them with the aid of armed force caused several sympathy strikes in the neighboring metal shops, and for several hours there was talk even of a general strike in the entire metal industry. Then on Wednesday, Dec. 29, a general strike of the Public Service of Paris broke out.

"One cannot help laughing when one remembers the correspondence between the president of the Council (Chautemps) and the Executive Board of the C. G. T. last September. Mr. Camille Chautemps, in answer to some complaints from the National Committee of the C. G. T. promises but he also notes with great satisfaction that the C. G. T. renounces henceforth the methods of "occupation." With a C. G. T. that is determined from now on to respect property and the law, they will live in an idyllic social peace.

"Proudly the Board of the C. G. T. declared—unanimously, and that includes the Communists—that the Board accepts and approves the answer of the President of the Council. Yet in less than three months, we are assisting at a whole series of fights, which shows the foolishness of such fine promises. Less than three months later, under the control of the C. G. T., the employees of the large department stores are occupying, the workers of the Goodrich plant are occupying, those of the commercial transportation are occupying, those of the foodstuffs are occupying. Even the auto-bus barns were occupyed by the employees of the Bus transportation company. What would it have been if the tactics of occupying of the shops would not have been given up!

"The rank and file militants will get some good points out of these first lessons of the great year-end fights. Too bad for the big shots if they don't want to see them.

"In the first place the employees of the large department stores have demonstrated that the occupation of the shops offers an efficacy that no other tactics offer any longer.

"But it becomes immediately evident that here as in the old style strikes, the occupation is a method that should be employed only at the proper time, when the employers can be hit in a live spot, not at a moment when they can afford to meet the fight without much loss to themselves. I have no precise knowledge on commercial transportation or on foodstuffs, but at the time I am writing this it seems to me that the "occupants" are tiring out, that the bosses' truculence seems to indicate that they have a studied plan aiming at the destruction of the unions and that their plan has chances of success. I think that it could be said that if the strength of occupation like that of the strike, is in its suddeness, then its weakness is in its prolongation.

"Another thing: Increasing number of our militants, who were mixed up in fights, find that arbitration yields the workers nothing but deception. It is already a fact that in spite of the law, strikes break out before arbitration processes are gone through. And it is also a fact that even when it is invoked, arbitration awards are slow in coming, they are inconclusive and full of loopholes for the employers to crawl through. We see that enforcing of the awards are impeded and sabotaged by the Employers' Union. Does that mean that the union should hereafter reject arbitration and rely on its own efforts exclusively for obtaining results?

"Such a revival of direct action would dispel the mistrust, that is growing daily between the rank and file and the officials of the union. In support of this contention I will mention only the spontaneous rebellion of the metal workers in the Colombes district, who took action against the attempt to vacate the Goodrich shops with the aid of the Mobile Guard. At Colombes, it seems that it was the rank and file that forced the leaders to action, and to speak to the higher ups in a language we have not been accustomed to hear lately.

"Our leaders are sometimes forced to apply the famous saying: 'I am their leader, therefore I have to follow them." This is not very good. It would be preferable that the militants should maintain the initiative in the fights, we might then have some strategy. Never was our union so strong as at present and yet never were the efforts of the membership less organized. To take action only when the pressure from below is too strong, results in haphazard, untimely strikes, lacking connections, as it happened lately.

"Finally, we should note the evolution of the second Popular Front government towards the classical methods of representing the labor movement. First is the case of Colombes and the Goodrich plant. Then the intervention of the army in the transport strikes. And above all the threats against the Public Service workers of Paris, on general strike. It is false to say it was provoked by leaders. The leaders were in fact literally pushed to the strike by the masses, exasperated by the meager results their petitions to the government had. If Mr. Chautemps wanted to strike at those responsible for the strike, he should have fired Mr. Villey the Prefect, and called down Marx Dormoy, Secretary of the Interior who passed the buck to his Prefect. But, Mr. Chautemps preferred to rely on force: refusing to discuss with the strikers, sending them aggressive communication; bringing in the army to run the electric, gas plants, the subway and the buses. This entire beautiful program was to be put in application Thursday morning, unless the strikers during the previous night would vote to return to work.

"And do you know on what assurance they voted to return to work?

"The return to work was voted on the assurance given by the socialist members of the government that if they (the strikers) do not get entire satisfaction of their demands, they will resign their posts in the government.

"On that evening of strike, one could already feel the Noske air in Paris, and this answer of Paul Faure settled things. But, doesn't this affair show what the Popular Front is virtually dead, and that from now on the C. G. T. cannot remain in it if it really wants to defend the interests of the workers?

"The leaders may say and do what they will, but the workers will find their salvation only in the revival of full independence of syndicalism from political and governmental interference and in direct action. The great fights of the end of 1937 incontestably prove it."

Get a Better Boat, Boys

By T-BONE SLIM

I cannot understand why politicians persists in hatching their eggs in labor's nest; nor can I understand why labor permits it. Why do they not hatch their eggs in their own nest? Is their nest so foul they have to use labor's?

Rank and file tells me the Communist party is trying to hatch out some doorknobs in the N. M. U. No harm in that except that it keeps the nest occupied so that the seamen cannot hatch any real eggs. Since when has a politician turned into a highsea mariner?

Seamen maintain halls, pay the rent so that politicians can strut their stuff and take up seamen's time from important matters. Politics has absolutely no remedy for seamen's ills. Once politics gets into a labor union it cannot be bailed out, deeper and deeper sinks the yawl.

Seamen, you have a Jonah in your boat. Better change boats.

All th gains seamen have made have been without political action, and will be lost with it. Politicians follow labor action like a tern follows ships—but they do not go far to sea.

They have no action of their own so they appear suddenly in the midst of labor action. WHY? I wonder—why do the "leaders" appear after the action is started? Think it over.

Don't Know Their Own Stuff

My contention is: politicians understand neither political action or labor action. The best they can do is set one body of workers against the other. Workers themselves have no quarrel.

Political action is by its nature—slow. Were we to get our eggs through political action they would be over-ripe before they arrive—we'd be glad to get rid of 'em. So it is with everything political—relief comes to you thirty days after you are in jail for stealing bread.

You aren't supposed to be in jail, you are supposed to be dead—starved to death. Why couldn't you wait and let nature take its course? But why wait for jail or death just to please political muddlers? Why not join the I. W. W.?

Compromise is a loss to the workers.

When there is no mush in the cupboard, and none likely to be, it's a poor time to talk compromise; it, the mush, is or isn't present; and compromise spells isn't.

We do not need generals to get us "isn't," the boss hands us that without help from the labor generals of this work-a-day world.

We do not need labor generals to get us relief rations; the economic power of begging gets us the scrawny relief tickets automatically—begging adventures are followed by souplines, for uneasy lies the head that wears a crown.

Economic power will feed, clothe, shelter, and free the workers—generals never did, never will.

Join the I. W. W.

Economic power is the only power the workers have—only the workers have it. Parasites are using borrowed power—our power, our lawnmower, and our hired man tu push it. Let's make them return it. The world needs a haircut.

Revolutionary Syndicalism In Britain

By ETHEL McDONALD

Actually the organized labor movement in Britain is dead. This is due to the fact that parliamentary socialism is no longer trusted by the worker owing to the record of the two Labor governments. The workers have come to realize that parliamentary socialism supports Imperialism and Empire and is not the road to their emancipation, and parliamentarians feel that this has justified their criticisms and prophecies of the past thirty years.

This result however is barren or purely negative, because the workers do not appreciate the relation betweent parliament and trades unionism. It stands to reason that the workers could not be betrayed on the political field unless they were also betrayed on the industrial field. Reformism is the essence of trades unionism and it is reformism that reconciles the worker to the Capitalist system. The joint nature of the betrayal of the working-class was demonstrated in the mis-called General Strike of 1926 when the very persons who had previously betrayed the workers through parliamentary action also betrayed them at the time of industrial action through the medium of the General Council of the Trades Unions.

The classic example of the parliamentary and capitalist nature of trades unionism was found in the case of the late John Turner who was an Anarchist and also General Secretary of the Shop Assistants' Union First as organizer, and later as secretary, John Turner's duties compelled him to support parliamentarism, whilst his approach towards Revolutionary Syndicalism was purely academic.

The history of trades unionism in Britain proves beyond doubt that the Labor Party is the child of the craft union. Kier Hardie for example, only obtained standing as a labor leader when he identified the Independent Labor Party with the trade union. During the war the bloc vote of the trades unions robbed Ramsay MacDonald of his leadership of the Labor Party. Under James Maxton the influence of the I.L.P. has dwindled to nothing because the trades unions are behind the Labor Party. Every vote in parliament of the Labor Party, and of its different elements, can be traced to this or that union represented by the particular member speaking or voting. Today therefore, the task of anti-parliamentarism as such is to pass from its excellent criticism of parliamentarism as such to make war on trades unionism on the industrial field. The time has come to unfold the banner of revolutionary syndicalism and so give practical expression to the ideas of libertarianism or true revolutionary socialism.

It is only necessary to relate the details of trades union history in relation to the more important workers struggles to understand the reactionary role played by the British trades union leader.

Trades Union Activity

Let us begin with the demarcation disputes. These prove that the purpose of trade or craft unionism in Britain has been not to pursue the class struggle or to inaugurate socialism but to better the lot of one section of the workers at the expense of another section in a perfect cycle of futility. Here is the record of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers from 1865 to 1904 inclusive.

1865—Dispute with boilermakers over A.S.E. men working as angle iron-smiths.

1881—Fight with shipwrights.

1889—Blackleged fellow Trade Unionists during the strike at Silver's Works, Silvertown.

1890-2—Persistent demarcation disputes with Tyne plumbers and boilermakers.

1894—Demarcation disputes with scientific makers at Weymouth.

1895—Similar quarrel with steam-engine makers at Burton-on-Tyne.

1896—With milling machine hands and brass finishers at Earl's of Hull, and Thornycroft's of Chiswick.

1897—Historic struggle with master-class; supported by machine workers and steam-engine makers. Blacklegged by moulders, smiths and boilermakers. Last mentioned blacklegged because their funds were invested in Armstrong, Whitworth and Co.

1899—Demarcation fight with smiths on the Tyne.

1904—Same with Electrical Trades Union in Harland and Wolff's Yard at Belfast.

* The author is a member of the United Socialists, a British Anarcho-Syndicalist movement. She was in Barcelona for some time after the commencement of the civil war and edited the English radio broadcasts. After the events of last May she was deported, it is presumed on the initiative of the Communist party.

Time remedied none of these grievances. These demarcation disputes continued down to the very outbreak of the war. There are records of disputes over the studding of armour plates between boilermakers and engineers in which the employers were called upon to settle the dispute. Similar disputes arose over the making of bulwark stanchions and rudder quadrants.

Then there were disputes between the engineers and the plumbers over pipe fitting. In every case the employer settled the differences between the unions. In some cases strikes preceeded the settlement; not strikes by the workers against the employers but strikes by the workers against each other. There is the classic statement of the secretary of the Portsmouth Branch of the Coppersmiths and Metalworkers who complained "of the activity of the boilermakers, plumbers, etc., in claiming work that had been done hitherto by coppersmiths." This report declared that the purpose of the organization was "to prevent coppersmiths walking the streets whilst men of other trades are employed on work done previously by us."

No comment is necessary to show how thoroughly reactionary has been the role of trades unionism in Great Britain. From 1912-1914, the Herald of Revolt, the anti-parliamentary "Organ of the Coming Social Revolution," described in detail this phase of Trades Unionism.

Organized for Defeat

That trades unionism is unable to organize the workers' struggle has been demonstrated by the history of the great dock strike. Ben Tillet whose political and parliamentary record is that of a war jingo has retained his hold on the Labor movement purely and simply through ignorance and illiteracy of ordinary British Trades Unionists. In July, 1912, he published a manifesto on behalf of the dock workers giving the history of Trades Unionism since 1893. In that manifesto he showed that in 1911, the dock workers' struck without holding a trade union card, paralyzed shipping and won their strike. The following year they were organized into a trade union, struck again and were completely defeated. Further, in the second strike the trade union dockers of one port handled the goods sent by blacklegs from another port with the result that the workers were thoroughly demoralized.

The thing that brought about the defeat on that occasion has operated several times since, particularly among the railway workers; the accumulation of funds and the investment in the very industry in which the strikers were employed. As Dominion Secretary, Mr. J. H. Thomas persuaded the National Union of Railwaymen to invest its funds in a vast network of British Imperial finance that identified trades unionism with the ruling-class interests of the British Empire. In 1923, the peculiar organization for work and wages outlook of British trades unionism was demonstrated when the Clyde workers rejoiced at the promises made by Stanley Baldwin that the Government was placing more ship orders on the Clyde. At Tyneside the trades unionists protested that the warship orders should go to the Tyne. This is an index to the mentality and outlook of trades unionism.

We can pass over the General Strike. Supported by the Communist Party, the General Council of the Trades Union finally betrayed the workers' struggle and turned what was actually a revolutionary situation into a triumph for reaction.

The 1926 strike was the last word in the betrayal of the British miner that began with the Datum line struggle in 1921. From that date to 1926, the Miners' Federation steadily retreated. The miners threw up one leader after another and each leader betrayed them in turn.

In 1925, the mine bosses were in despair and the Government granted a nine months subsidy. Instead of rejecting this concession the parliamentarians and the trade union leaders rejoiced at a bogus victory, at a peace that was a capitalist preparation for war.

In 1926 came the strike and the debacle. This should have ended the history of trades unionism in Britain. It has not done so because the mind of the British worker is still reformist. He is afraid. Fear is the explanation of parliamentarism and trades unionism. It is our business to awaken courage and develop syndicalist activity.

Syndicalist Revival

There is some promise of such awakening in the Omnibus Workers' Strike in the spring of this year. The Transport industry, so far as the road traffic is concerned was completely paralyzed and it was admitted that the strike was directed not only against the company but also against the Transport General Workers Union. The trade union officials repudiated the Strike Committee and made agreements behind the backs of the workers with the 'bus chiefs and government traffic commissioners. The unofficial action was 100 per cent and the trade union leaders had a rough passage. Although the strike was finally broken there is not the least doubt the transport workers will rally again. The United Socialist Movement intends to develop powerful syndicalist activity among these workers. It should be pointed out that there are four opposing unions canvasing for the Transport Workers. Just consider what a chaos of organization, or rather disorganization this implies.

The condition of the Transport Workers in Scotland brings us to a complete indictment of current Labor Parliamentarism. In Glascow there is a Labor majority in the Town Council, a Labor Lord Provost and a Labor City Treasurer. This Labor majority has decided to have an Empire Trading Exhibition in Glascow during the coming year. The parasites of the world are being invited to visit Glascow. This creates a tremendous transport problem. It was necessary to keep the workers quiet. Accordingly, with their Marxist understanding of economics the Labor majority met the Transport Workers Trade Union leaders and came to an agreement. The question of hours, which owing to its tax on the nervous energy of the worker, is a scandal never dealt with. The agreement conceded to the Transport Workers from the age of 14 to 19 an increase of one shilling per week; and to those over 19 an increase of two shillings. This agreement is binding for two years. It covers the period of the Empire Exhibition and the union pledges the workers not to strike. This is trades union treachery up to date.

The United Socialist Movement, which is an anti-parliamentary body and continues the tradition of the old anti-parliamentary movement founded in 1906, is entering the field of industrial action with a view to forming an Industrial Union of Direct Action (I.U.D.A.). The purpose of this activity and method of organization is not industrial unionism in the sense of a vast centralized body outside the workship, although it is opposed to the craft form of trade unionism. Its theory and method is syndicalist and it intends to organize along the lines of solidarity, spontaneous action and no agreements with employers. In other words its activity is preliminary to revolution and its conception to what has become to be known historically as Bakunist and not Marxist.

The Industrial Union of Direct Action was first mooted in 1906 but was discarded for intensified anti-parliamentary agitation on the political field. The workers did not seem to be ripe for syndicalism. This organization, the I.U.D.A., is being revived to meet the situation. Glascow which is a highly industrialized center and a port and is a center of the important Lanaskshire coal-fields is the very place in which to build syndicalism. The coming Empire Exhibition, and its support by the labor parliamentarians and trade union leaders is our opportunity.

It may be that in the development of our activities here, the workers on the Continent may be able to give us great support. We should endeavor by economic action to throw up forces that will challenge and paralyze the Empire Exhibition. If we are successful in organizing the strike at which we aim we shall need the support of the Continental workers in proclaiming a boycott. Declarations to this effect by the French workers would assist our organization here. Not only is there an opportunity of evincing the power of syndicalism in Britain but the intention to re-open the Paris Exhibition would also afford a splendid opportunity to the French workers to strike. In this way a united syndicalist movement of action pioneering an entirely new era of struggle could be built in France and Britain. By this action, French and British workers are brought into line.

All About Saving Uncle Sam

Once upon a time there was a grand old man named Uncle Sam. He ran away from his Mamma Brittania when he was a youngster, or rather, he thought he did. But Mamma always kept an eye on him, hunching that some day he would grow rich, powerful and prosperous. He did.

After his imaginary escape from Mamma he landed on a big and exceedingly fertile island. Being even then a man of big ideas, he promptly homesteaded all the middle and most salubrious part of it as his private property. This he did to the violent protests of the Amerinds who, being there first, had acquired the hallucination that they had some rights newcomers were bound to respect. This hallucination, however, proved fatal to the Amerinds, for bows and arrows aint in with cannon and muskets when it comes to deciding who are the Chosen People, or who is to go back where they came from.

Well, however that may be, Sam and his crowd in time made themselves masters of a goodly slice of the island, and the more they saw of it the more they wanted. They were never satisfied. But before they cleaned up on the Amerinds, Sam and his Mamma, who still insisted on holding on to his apron strings, had a falling out. In the scrimmage, he licked Mamma, or rather, he thought he did. Humans are given to thinking many things that aint so.

Mamma let go of his apron strings, alright. but she took good care to see to it that the Right People were there to see to it that the Boy was well taken care of. He was. Somebody was always saving him. Everywhere he went, a whole slew of Doctors, Doctors of Law, Doctors of Divinity, Doctors of Philosophy, Doctors of Economics, Doctors of Doctors followed him day and night trying to swap him Panaceas for Property. Always they swore he'd die of heartfailure or belliake if he didn't take their dope. Even when he was young, strong and husky they'd scare him into swallowing some concoction that only made matters worse. They never let up on him, and are still at it. All thru middle-age and on they doped him. He got to be the Champion Patent Medicine taker of all time, an then some. And so it went, goes, and is going.

First Dr. Ima Donk cupped and calomeled him and next Dr. Elephunt sweated and casteroiled him, both insisting that if they cured the Symptons the Disease would disappear. About the only thing to disappear, however, was Sam's Property and the Patrimony of his children; for, as the old saying has it, Brains Come High, and it is a well-known fact that Experts are not in Business for their Health. So, as you can hunch, our good old Uncle all but took the count more than once. This thing of being Saved aint all it's cracked-up to be. Ask Uncle Sam. "He knows! He knows! He knows!" as the wise Omar saith.

But that aint the worst of it. This Saving has gone on now for over 150 years, and still they are doping him, this despite the fact that the old boy is just about shot. He is now really and truly sick. The Angel Azrael is knocking at his door. His recuperative powers are not what they were in the days before Doctors Big Bizz and High Finance were called into consultation by Doctors Repdem and Demrep. Nonetheless, they one and all still insist that "Dope, Dope and More Dope is what he needs to make him sit up and take notice once more." "Faith and Confidence," they swear, "is all he needs to feel as Prosperous as of yore." One and all they become indignant when old Dr. Commonsense butts in and says, "What he needs is a Major Operation. Cut the Graft out of his Guts and he'll live hale and hearty for at least another thousand years, happy in the midst of happy and admiring children."

Sensible as that sounds, however, and surprising as it seems to some people, his children will have none of it. Instead they order Dr. Commonsense out of the hospital and call in Doctors Bunk, Blah, Blatherskite and Buncombe, who immediately proceed by incantation to Exorcise the Hoodoo and bring Prosperity around the Corner, hoping that the sight of her will make the old boy forget the cancers that are eating at his vitals, as she often does.

These failing, and Dr. Commonsense being shut up in an asylum, some one suggests sending for old Dr. Hoss Sense, who lives at the Forksotheroad. "What!" cry his children, "send for that old idiot? He's been insisting for years that all Uncle Sam needs is to get rid of the Parasites that are sucking the lifeblood out of him. 'Get rid of the Parasites,' says he, 'and Sam will soon be strong and healthy again.' No, he won't do. He's worse than Dr. Commonsense."

So they called in Doctors Dumb, Dodge & Doolittle, who said: "Pooh! There isn't a thing the matter with him. He's all right. All he needs is a few days rest in bed and, maybe, a few drops of lemon oil and, possibly, a psychiatrist to get the delusion out of his mind that he is broke with one-third of his children illfed, illclothed and illhoused and more going on the rocks every day. That's all. He's okay except in his imagination."

"Wonderful! Wonderful!" cry all the Hoi Poilloi, and Everybody who is Anybody shouts: "Hurrah! WE told you so! Nothing is Wrong with Our Country! Nothing can stop US!" And it was even so as they had said, even More So. And one and all they departed to the Ballotbox and there voted another change of Doctors, provided none ever prescribed the Remedies suggested by Doctors Commonsense & Hoss Sense. After which Labor and Capital signed a Contract agreeing to Recognize each other, provided Brother Capital took no responsibility for furnishing jobs to the jobless and was, further, guaranteed the Profit guaranteed him by the Constitution, work or no work, crops or no crops, all Surpluses to the contrary notwithstanding.

This remarkable contract was supposed to act as THE KNOCKOUT DROPS to Uncle Sam's depressed state, but what I can't get into my nutt is howinhel Doping the Symptoms can Remedy the Situation or cure the Disease, or how you can get milk out of a Dry Cow. I may be crazy and I'm no Great Shakes as an Expert, but I'm all for calling in old Docs Hoss Sense and Commonsense and having them get busy on our good old Uncle before he kicks the bucket. And, you believe me, there is no time to lase!

Moral

Saving Uncle Sam is all right. He's worth it. But for God's sake, if not for our own and our Country's, let's hurry up and call in Surgeons before the Butchers harp and crown him. Therefore, Can the Bull and Get Busy doing something, for, as the Great Prophet Simple Simon saith: "The making of Much Palaver may be good Politics, and again it may not, but its Extension in The Record is the Limit; and he who talketh too often from the Fireside is liable to wake up finding himself wishing on his Sucessor what Buchanan the Benevolent bequeathed to Abraham the Emancipator—a Gordian Knot that only the Sword can Unite."

"O Lord of Love, look from above
On po' ol' Uncle Sam;
An' give him meat dat's fit to eat,
'Cause dis aint worf a dam."

MEAT FOR SUPPER

Morning

The alarm clock of the Andy Bromberger family shack reverberated through the dark and chilly bedroom. Its arm beat a buzzing reveille against the brass bell, finally to die in a metallic rattle. Andy had lain awake long. He stretched himself and yawned. For him there was no need of an alarm clock—Nay, nay! It merely saved him the trouble of striking a match to tell the time. In his toilsome ups and downs through life, the stern duty of being on the job promptly and in ample time to ascertain the score for the day, and to exchange possible morning's pleasantries with his boss, had petrified itself in Andy's innermost brain cells to the extent that he would rise automatically, no matter what hour of morning the benefactors of humankind decreed the toil of day should commence. And Andy Bromberger, honest worker par excellence, was not a little proud of the fact that no alarm clock was needed to get him out of the hay—that such galvanization was at all unnecessary in order to send him scurrying through a murky and chilly winter's morning to the fountainhead of family bread and butter. Of course, in summer it was mere kid's play to roll out. And then the alarm clock ticked its calm seconds through the brightness of morning.

Minnie Bromberger stirred at the side of her wakeful spouse. She stretched and turned over. Andy never could get it through his head why his old lady couldn't get out of the nutty habit of what she called an extra forty winks. It was nothing but namby-pamby. When it was time to roll out, it was time. But Minnie simply had to stretch and tuck herself in for her silly extra snooze. And it had ever been so.

He could dimly see the whiteness of her neck against her dark hair. He knew it to be a full and handsome neck. But the mornings were long gone and past since he last had pressed a kiss upon that neck and whispered words for Minnie's ears only. He felt silly when he thought of it. He stuck his legs from under the covers and groped for his ancient bathrobe. It smelt of stale sweat. He shook his better half and told her it was high time to get up. From the adjoining room came the variant breathing of sleeping children.

Andy got the fire going in the kitchen stove and went into the back yard to see what kind of weather the day might bring. He gazed up into the gray morning. A strong wind was swaying the slender vertical branches of a Eucalyptus tree in the back of the yard. Its plumes whirled gracefully through the morning's half-light and became a dark bouquet. Then the wind relented and they floated out into gyrating clusters. Out toward the San Francisco Bay, the beacon on the airport punched its rotating red light beams through the soupy morning as if it were a giant doing arm exercises. Down on the flats, the town sprawled toward the winding shores of the bay. Indolently, the fog came drifting up toward the highlands and laid the plumes of the Eucalyptus upon a cushion of dripping grayness. But toward the north, the hills still stood etched in sharp relief. Their outline rose and fell like the sharp-drawn curve on a graph. On the crest of one grew a single row of cypresses. They stood there in the gray dawning day, stiff and black like the cropped mane on a horse's neck. Then the fog wrapped hills and trees in its dank gauze.

But in the nerve centers of Andy Bromberger's stout and honest body, the early manifestations of Nature's varying moods stirred no other response than that the fog likely would keep rain away. And, Christ, it had rained plenty! Three days in last period to make up—it was about time for a little decent weather. Well, anyway, today the ghost would walk, today was payday, mused Andy as he turned his steps to the kitchen for his morning's flapjacks and coffee.

Minnie was beating the batter under the watchful and hungry eyes of the four Bromberger biological distillations. They were all girls—Betty Marie, Patricia, Jane and Lou. If placed in a row, according to age, they would have appeared like figures in a chart purporting to show the steady increase in the country's population. For they had come into the Bromberger household with the clock-like regularity of one year intervals. Their faces bore the pallid imprint of too little milk, fruit and vegetables. They were watching Ma making hot cakes—and hot cakes tasted good—with syrup—could they please have some with Daddy? Minnie said to shut up and not to bother—Daddy had to get to work.

Andy scraped his feet on the back stoop. He came in, bringing with him the dampness of the morning's fog. It mingled with the smell of unwashed bodies, steaming hot cakes and the faint recollections of last night's supper. He said it wasn't going to rain and for Betty Marie to get herself and her sisters dressed.

Minnie poured him a cup of muddy soffee and placed four hot cakes before him. She stretched her arms above her head and yawned—she wouldn't have minded another forty winks. Her four offsprings had left her a still buxom woman. Unpaid grocery bills, worries over gas and light turned off at intervals when Andy's fifty-five per month simply refused to be stretched any further, four kids to keep in grub, shoes and dresses—these little side excursions from Prosperity's main line had dug a network of wrinkles around her eyes. But her mouth still looked as if it could readily smile if given a little inducement. Her throat was still full and handsome.

Andy chewed hurriedly—his mind on boss and job. Unpaid rent and grocery bills, gas and light turned off now and again, four kids to send through life, had long ago made Andy oblivious to the white throat he had once kissed, to the mouth that no longer smiled.

He got up from the table and told Minn that if his check came today, to bring it down on the project so he could get it cashed. Betty Marie said could they please have meat for supper, Daddy? Yes, dammit, he would plunge for once and bring home some round steak.

Day

W. P. A. Project No. 9342 C stretched its yawning maw toward the harbor. Brakish water gurgled and churned in its depth as a pump made heroic but vain attempts at keeping it dry. Planks holding its gelatinous walls reared in a broken line above the ground. In some dim future this embryonic canyon would change its present hydrous status into that of a full-fledged and respectable storm sewer, and thus become a civic improvement of no mean importance.

Andy Bromberger stuck his feet into icy boots and laughed his best-natured chuckle at his boss' perennial inquiry as to the old lady's aphrodisical treatment of him this morning—ha, ha! He selected a shovel with care. He hefted it in his horny grip with the connoiseur's knowing judgment. If a guy was to do a decent day's work, he needed a number two that'd handle right—and no mistake. The whimsical push blew his cop's whistle with all the authority that such an instrument implies and the gang began slowly to drift across the sand flat to the shores and chasm of the ditch whence lay the day's labor. But in Andy Bromberger's rubber-shod steps, there lodged no reluctance.

Hank Mullins, top-mucker for Andy, was in no special hurry to start his duties toward society. He lighted his pipe and smoked reflectively as he went his measured steps across the sand. Eight hours were a long stretch when one had to keep his nose to the grindstone, and Hank had a desire to live to be a healthy old man. As he neared the ditch, he judged that his partner must have gone into action already. For up into the air there flew with automatic regularity shovelfuls of dirt, the size and speed of which Hank knew could belong to no other muck-stick than the one swung by Andy. As he came up, a miniature mountain awaited him. He yelled a greeting of, "Take it easy, Steamshovel!" down at Andy in the nether world and then set to work at a calm and steady stiff's pace to clear the muck away from the bank. Now and again there rose to his ears the sound of gummy suction, and he knew that Andy was moving his rubber-encased shanks. Down the line, muck was heaved from the ditch as if a legion of invisible dachshunds were rutting for badgers. As the ditch sunk deeper and deeper into the rotten subsoil, the water-logged shoring groaned under the increased pressure of moving earth. On the bank, the boss strode with a stride eloquently bespeaking that he full well realized the importance of his weighty responsibilities.

Noon came. The push cast a last reassuring glance at his Hamilton and blew his whistle. All production activity came to a standstill. Andy hoisted himself out of the ditch and slushed across to a pile of lumber where Hank was chewing his sandwiches in calm solitude.

Hank looked at his partner in pitying disgust and asked him if he could eat an extra sandwich. Then he wanted to know when t' hell Andy intended to slow down a bit—if not, he'd better get himself another mucker—Hank wasn't gonna put a hump on his back for him nor anybody else—not by a damsite. Andy mumbled something about a decent day's work and told Hank that they ortta be thankful for this relief work and not to shirk. Hank blew up:

"There ye go again—yuh and yer relief! I'd like to know, once and for all, how in t' hell a working stiff can receive relief?" And he swept a hand in a wide gesture toward the city's smoking factory and warehouse districts. "Relief! you poor empty-headed sap! D' ye see them factories and warehouses, eh? D' ye see them houses and buildings up town there? Throw yer lamps on that old S. P. drag coughing along over there. Well, it was thick-skulled baboons like yuh and me that put it there—that threw down the damn track it's running on. Take a gape at the bridge—it was the likes of yuh and me that heaved that across the Bay—Yeah, we even made the crummy rubber boots ye got on yer stinking feet!—Relief my eye! We made everything. And now that they are throwing us a few lousy pennies so that we won't croak in the gutters and stink 'em out of house and home, now we orta go down on our prayer bones and hang a halo around the bald domes of the politicians, eh? Relief—yuh and mugs like ya make me puke."

Well, Hank could agitate all he wanted to—Andy wasn't gonna take no chances on getting a 403.

A lone figure was struggling across the sandy waste. Andy looked up and recognized his old lady. Minnie came up and said Hello to the two men. Hank said Hello and how was the kids? Oh, pretty well, thanks, they were all in school today. She handed Andy his check and said not to forget the meat for supper. Andy said okay and put the check in his shirt pocket and pinned it shut with a sweat-rusty safety pin. Then the gaffer blew his whistle, so it was time to hit the ball again.

How it happened, no one knew. It was three o'clock and the safety guy had just had a look at the shoring and thought it okay. He was on his way to the office when suddenly earth, water and planks churned in a deafening racket and made a stretch of the ditch into a mass of splintered planks and heaving mud. For a moment all became still as death. Then wild orders rent the air up and down the caved section and men began to dig frantically.

Hank had yelled at Andy that for Christ's sake to jump. But his feet were too deep in muck and slime to make a quick move. Earth and timbers crushed down upon him and bones splintered through his flesh.

Four o'clock, they found him. With ropes they dragged him up onto dry ground. The reporters were told that it was a most remarkable incident that only one man was caught—the two others working with Bromberger had been sent to unload lumber. The accident was most regretable, but in no way due to negligence on the part of those in charge. Yes, Andy Bromberger had at all times proven himself a mose reliable and willing workman. His record was clear.

Night

The town sprawled toward the winding shores of the Bay. Here and there lights began to puncture the early darkness of winter. On a marble slab in the morgue, the remains of Andy Bromberger lay stiff and cold. The corpse had been slushed off with a hose to remove mud and blood. In a file in the office lay neatly labeled the pipe Andy had once smoked, an empty pocket book and two pulpy pieces of paper—one appearing to have been his W. P. A. identification card, the other a check drawn upon the Treasury of the United States.

In the family shack, Minnie Bromberger sat dry-eyed, fever and sorrow splitting her brain. Four kids were incomprehensively asking questions. Fear was written on their hunger-marred faces.

In Woo Sang's market, round steak, that night, was quoted at twenty-six cents.

THE END.

World War to Create Markets

BY

I.W.W. DELEGATE 46-S-8

Will Capitalism Take the Chance? Can It Afford Not to Take It?

For thirty years the capitalists down in Brazil have been getting rid of their surplus coffee by dumping it into the sea or using it for fuel in railroad engines instead of coal. In later years as much as 75 per cent of the total crop has been disposed of in this manner. This was a simple method of cutting down the supply when shrinking foreign markets failed to absorb the wealth in coffee annually produced by labor. The system has worked with fair satisfaction to the capitalists of Brazil and other South American countries for years.

The workers have been kept busy for long hours at starvation wages. Expression of discontent among them is chilled by the fact that three-fourths of their labor was plain waste, because, as anti-labor propaganda never fails to point out, there is no market anywhere for the greater portion of the product of their labor. They are told that the absentee land owners would be justified in letting the whole coffee business go by the board and that it is only consideration for the workers that impells them to stay in business in spite of the yearly "losses."

Of course the politicians and other agencies of capitalism do their part explaining to the workers the necessity of government subsidies to the large land owners to prevent the country from going entirely to the dogs.

It is a comparatively simple matter to get rid of surplus agricultural produce, in Brazil or elsewhere. Most of these products are perishable and the destruction takes care of itself from year to year.

Industrial Surplus

In a highly industrialized country the problem of getting rid of the "surplus" is somewhat more complicated. It is well and good for the politicians to play around with the so-called farm problem and order a few pigs and cows to be slaughtered; but to attempt to get rid of millions of tons of already mined and refined minerals, such as iron, copper, or coal; and manufactured products such as automobiles and other heavy machinery in the same manner as they do with coffee in Brazil, is out of the question.

As expedient as the wholesale distribution of manufactured goods might seem, the capitalists with all their institutions to protect them, would hardly dare to lay themselves as open to censure as that. The Boston Tea Party was successful all right but, after all, that was only tea—and foreign tea at that. So better schemes to get rid of he surplus that clogs up the profit system have to be devised.

The inevitable depressions ease the pressure and furnish temporary relief to the system. The accumulated surplus is worn down while factories are partially idle and workers go hungry. But depressions do not solve the problem of what to do with the surplus goods produced even when industry runs on a restricted schedule, as now and for some years part; neither do foreign markets or the development of new industries solve it. It is estimated that the productive capacity of modern workers is 100 times that of the workers of 100 years ago. Given an opportunity to exercise this ability to produce without restriction for even a few weeks and the channels of commerce are clogged up with goods that cannot be disposed of at a profit.

Although an army of unemployed workers is an integral part of the capitalist mode of production, that army tends to become so large in our time that it presents a danger to the system. It may get out of control and what would happen if it did is hard to tell. At any rate the capitalists sense the possibility and fear it.

Looking at the problem in one way, there is no surplus and never has been. The workers could consume the wealth they have produced; they could make use of the machinery and factories their labor has created to turn out products of which millions are in need. That wouldn't suit the capitalists at all for the very foundation of capitalist rule depends on the workers being kept on a "hand to mouth" existence. If the workers were allowed to get more than what their daily needs demand they might get the notion to keep everything they produce and that, of course, would be very unpleasant for the parasite capitalists.

So the capitalists turn to other methods of flushing the channels of commerce.

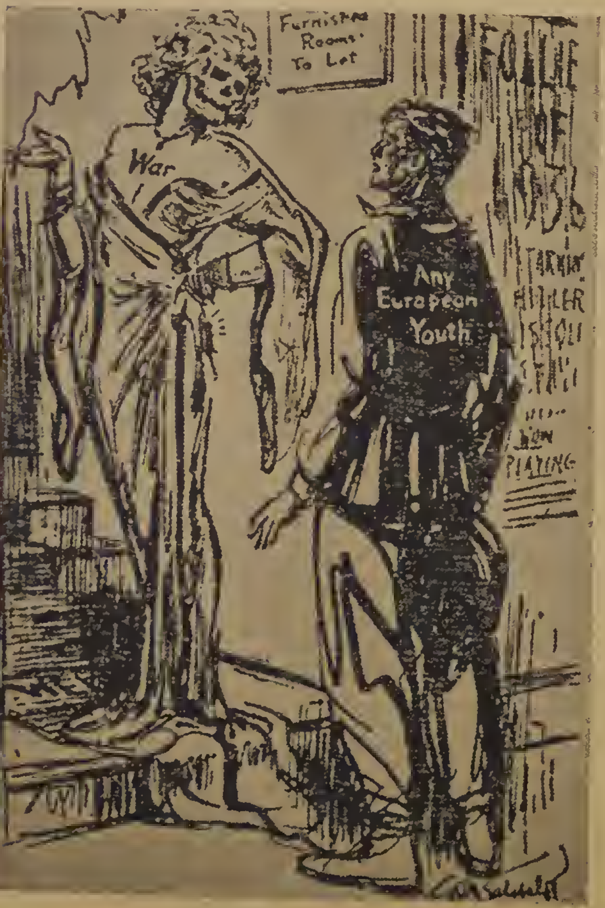
Dictators are being financed and from the brass check press and radio we learn that armament races are underway among the major nations throughout the world. Millions for defense.

So far so good. The rearming or defense program takes care of a lot of surplus labor and its products and it may usher in another period of semi-prosperity. But once again there is the problem of too much production, and battleships and cannon do not rot away like onions and potatoes. There is no alternative—war must be declared.

Danger in War

But wars are getting dangerous to the ruling class. It used to be that "generals died in bed" but during the last World War things got out of control in Russia and the old ruling class there was unceremoniously ejected. To the capitalists that was exceedingly bad business. So wars must be promoted on a smaller scale and further away from home to serve the purpose of destruction as long as they can.

One of the ruling class lackeys got the signal to conquer Ethiopia. Not much to start with, but a sort of trial balloon; and it went over satisfactorily. A counter-revolution was started in Spain where the radicals are far too aggressive to please the capitalist powers. Both sides are getting arms but from different countries. For the sake of capitalist business that war must be prolonged as much as possible.



She promised his dad a good time too

Another war between Japan and China. China for years has been the world's largest importer of war materials. Forty per cent of it was manufactured in, and bought from Japan.

During the last World War the cost per soldier killed was $25,000 in materials. Now it costs more. In other words, for every surplus worker gotten rid of, they also get rid of more than $25,000 woth of surplus commodities.

Yet even the World War, as long and as destructive as it was, did not for long hold off the need for dumping grounds for surplus products. Neither will the present "little" wars, nor will the new re-armament programs make more than a dent in the immense pile of wealth already produced, nor will they cause the factories to operate at anything like their capacity.

The Next Step

Our "60 families" are conferring with their counterparts in other countries over the question: "Can we risk another World War?" Slyly the propaganda is beginning to spread. Our ships are being sunk in the Far East; our sailors are being sniped at on the coast of Spain; and our dear Ambassador has been slapped in the face by the Japs. And we are asked not to wear any more silk stockings because they come from Japan.

This all serves as preliminary for the more flagrant war propaganda to follow. We will be told how one country is unjustly invading another and we will be told of atrocities. Of course some of "our" foreign investments will be in the danger zone—and we will be expected to defend them.

But the war mongers realize that starting a world war might not be quite safe. The capitalist system is between the devil and the deep blue sea. It must have a world war (nothing less will do) to destroy surplus slaves as well as surplus goods. Will they risk another war?

It does not matter what they do. The end of the capitalist system, as forecast by Karl Marx, is not in the remote future. The seeds of destruction are developed in capitalism to an extent that the old plant is forever doomed.

Labor must be on the alert as never before to what is going on throughout the world. Labor must organize to speed the day when the last remnants of capitalism shall have been stamped out forever. An orderly society will not spring up by itself with the downfall of capitalist society. The workers must organize to run industry for themselves.

The time is short. The message of industrial unionism must be carried to every worker everywhere. Every class conscious worker must be enlisted in this final struggle.

Only labor organized in the Industrial Workers of the World will be able to prevent another World War.

"Streamlined Justice" . . .

By JOHN LIND

(St. Paul, Jan. 22.—A speedy removal to Chicago, a quick trial, and death in the electric chair for the kidnap-slayer of Charles S. Ross was the program marked out, Saturday, for Peter Anders, the one-time lumberjack who hoped to execute the perfect crime.—A News Item.)

According to J. Edgar Hoover, the chief of the F. B. I. (G-men), this case was number 112 to be solved out of a total of 114 kidnap cases. At least it is the latest and one of the most sensational, in that Anders not only murdered the kidnaped, but also his partner in crime, James Atwood Gray.

The murderer is John Henry Seadlund, of Ironton, Minn., a mining town on the Cuyuna iron range. Seadlung, alias Peter-Anders, is the son of Swedish working class parents. He grew up and went to school in Ironton. Upon finishing school, he tried to get work. Failing in this he spent two years at home "hopelessly" out of funds.

A young man, equipped with an average American education, in the richest country in the world, but hopelessly out of funds and unable to get work. Healthy and willing to try, but not given an opportunity. There we have the setting for a fling at crime.

One of the Lost Generation

J. Edgar Hoover is said to be responsible for the statement that Seadlund met with and carried food to the hideout of, at least one member of John Dillinger's gang. There he must have been told "how crime pays." Habitually out of work and funds, robbed of the honest enjoyment of life he had been led to expect was his heritage, this young man saw criminals, seemingly secure from the law, living and enjoying life, plentifully supplied with funds, and seeing that, he followed their example.

J. Edgar Hoover called Seadlund "stolid and nonchalant," a man who showed no remorse, a "killer with a brutal nature," "a man of many moods," whose criminal activities extended over wide sections of the nation. "Anger and peace charge through him intermittently," said Hoover.

By the time you read this, Seadlund, alias Anders, will have been tried and maybe electrocuted for his many crimes, which range from auto theft to bank hold-ups and murder. This one man, who individually rebelled against the system, must suffer the same kind of defeat as so many others before him. One is as naught against the many.

Seadlund was "shy and unassuming" as a schoolboy, but turned into a "brutal killer." Why? Was it because of his nature? Not insofar as his early life would prove. But, just the same, many would-be reformers of criminals will try to explain that he had a "criminal trait" hidden away within him. Where? Why, somewhere within his brain.

Yes, of course. Somewhere within the brain warped by his earlier training that fixed the idea that he was living "in the richest and best country in the world," that all he had to do was to work diligently and save all he earned. But, when the time had come for him to go to work, he found that there was no work to do. Truly, Seadlund is a good example of the "lost generation" which matured into men and women during the depression, the generation that so many reformers have liked to write and talk about.

Cause and Cost

Recently J. Edgar Hoover wrote a series of articles on crime for our edification. In one article especially, entitled "The Costs of Crime" he tells us that "crime costs the average citizen more each year than he pays in taxes to the municipal, county, state and federal governments." "It has been estimated that the annual monetary cost of crime in the United States is fifteen billions of dollars."

The crime army of the country, he tells us, "includes more than 700,000 boys and girls of less than voting age, who, at the very threshold of life, were cut off from worthy careers."

What of the 700,000 mothers who risked their lives to bring these 700,000 boys and girls into the world?" asks Hoover.

As usual in such cases, the big worry seems to be the cost of crime, not the cause of it. The second big worry is the punishment of crime, not the prevention of it.

Class conscious workers worry about neither the cost nor the punishment. They know the cause and by getting rid of it they expect to prevent crime.

Therefore the case of John Henry Seadlund, alias Peter Anders, the son of a Swedish father, most likely originally named Sjödlund, serves but as one more addition to the thousands of illustrations we can use to prove our contention that the capitalistic system, based upon production for profit, is the cause of crimes such as John Henry Seadlund is charged with, a series of crimes in which the motivation was the acquisition of the means or the wherewithal by which he, John Henry Seadlund, could live well.

The Winnipeg Free Press captioned one of its news items about this case "Streamlined Justice." We hope to be forgiven the "crime" committed in using that headline for this article. It fits the times and so it also suits our purpose.

The Free Press, of course, by using that headline sought to convey to us that Seadlund will be getting his just desserts, a quick trial, and death in the electric chair, and that that will be "Streamlined Justice."

Our claim is different.

Not that we can sympathize with Seadlund. With the proper atmosphere and upbringing by class conscious parents he may have become a good social rebel. He may have properly learned that no individual can ever become so strong that he can singly buck the system and get by with it. He may have learned that only through co-operation with others also dissatisfied with the system could he have been able to do something to better his lot individually and at the same time better the lot of others collectively. He did not learn this, so, foolishly he tried to fight back individually and for his failure must now pay the price the system demands. Maybe the realization of this made him "stolid and nonchalant." No, we cannot sympathize with Seadlund—nor with his parents—and, anyway, sympathy wouldn't help them one little bit.

It is our contention that Hoover cannot, nor can anyone else, nor can the system in its entirety, stop such crimes as Seadlund's by arresting the criminal after the crime is committed. We contend that there is only one sure way of stopping 700,000 boys and girls from engaging in a life of "crime." That way is to take away the reason for crime and guarantee them a worry-free future.

We claim that the incentive to crime is a desire to better one's lot individually, to seek to secure and live a better life, with more luxuries at one's command than the average person is capable of securing through "honest" labor. We claim that this "desire" is fostered and abetted by the pulpit, the movies, the press, and school and the politicans who so stoutly defend each individual's right to "individual initiative" even at the expense of, and at high cost to, the "public."

We claim that crime is usually resorted to only after the person has exhausted "honest" means, or after he has, by a system of elimination, proven to himself that under the circumstances over which he has no control, he is doomed to a life of poverty "in the richest land in the world." As he is taught to expect something better and knows that that something better is not unattainable, is it any wonder he prefers to go after it the only way left open?

A Criminal System

We contend that there is plenty of work in this world, and in this country especially. We contend further, that there are ways of arranging the work to assure each and everyone a just share of it as well as the product. We also contend that, under the present private ownership of the natural sources of wealth as well as the means of production and transportation, it is impossible to make this just division of labor and its products.

We therefore warn you supporters of this system, you believers in the inherent and inherited "brutishness" of all "criminals," that we are preparing real justice for the whole human race; that we are preparing—by educating otherwise future criminals—the way for a united effort on the part of all of us to mete "streamlined justice" to a system that has outlived its usefulness because it cannot guarantee a majority of its most useful members an honest living without recourse on the part of many of them to "crime."

Our "streamlined justice" will not be meted out to the individual victim of an unjust system; it will not even be meted out to the supporters of that unjust system (unless we call sentencing them to their share of labor for the rest of their "able" lives "streamlined justice").

But, it will be meted out to the system itself, which will be sentenced to a timely death—in glaring contrast to the untimely death of 27-year-old John Henry Seadlund and the sentencing of 700,000 boys and girls to unworthy careers.

Yes, you hypocritical hounders and persecutors of those who are outlawed by your own rotten and decadent system, our day of "streamlined justice" is near. Prepare to help us build it from the raw material left from the old—or perish in a useless effort to stop the wheels of progress.

Birth of a Song Hit

A Bit of History Dug up at Work Peoples College

There has been some doubt whether the radio favorite of recent years that may become the national anthem of our depression period, "Hellelujah! I'm a bum!" is the product of the I.W.W. A report of developments in Spokane early in 1908, before the I.W.W. little red song book was first issued, by J. H. Walsh, in the Industrial Union Buletin of April 4, 1908, gives the story. Since the entire report conveys an interesting story, we reproduce it in full:

"Spokane, Wash.—The membership of the Mixed Local in this city have pushed the agitational work, and hung on with that tenacity that is necessary to accomplish the desired result of industrial organization. They are now located in a new head-

Rank-and-File Rule

WHAT IT IS, AND WHAT IT ISN'T

By FRED THOMPSON

We working people want to raise our wages, cut our hours, make our jobs safer and less injurious to our health and less unpleasant places in which to earn our living. If we realize what an injury the capitalist system does to us, we want also to get rid of it. We can not do these things by ourselves. We can do them together. That's why we form unions. Our unions are labor unions only when they do what we want them to do. A body of workers is not a union unless it is controlled by its members. That is reason No. 1 why the I.W.W. insists upon "rank-and-file" organization.

This phrase "rank-and-file" has come to be used in such strange ways of late that it has picked up some strange meanings. For that reason it is time that the I.W.W., as the foremost exponent and practioner of rank-and-file unionism, explained just what rank-and-file means, and what it doesn't mean.

The strange uses of the expression "rank-and-file" to which we refer are made most often by the communists and other addicts of the "leadership principle." Now the "leadership principle"—the idea that we should pick and follow leaders, and seek a cure for our troubles by changing leaders—is the direct opposite of the rank-and-file idea. It is indeed curious that those who advocate this "der Fuehrer" plan of organization should ever demand "rank-and-file control." How does it happen?

The object of these various political cults of "follow-the-leader" is to obtain more followers for their various leaders. (And since every time there is a new leader there are new cults, this results in a rather bewildering situation. Since their purpose is not to organize a working class to do something for itself, but to make sure that the leaders of one cult are followed rather than the leaders of another, they seek their following chiefly in already organized groups of workers. Sometimes they try to secure such a following by currying favor with the officials of these unions. That was and is the pet policy of the Socialists. The Communist sects vary this policy with that of "boring from within" to grab the official positions.

When a group of self-appointed saviours try to grab the official positions in a union, they must resort to the favorite tricks of the unsuccessful politician—the one who is out of office. They must charge the elected officials with "betraying their mandates," "not living up to their promises," "ignoring the wishes of the rank and file." They must promise that if they are elected, the "rank-and-file" will rule through them. As a result we have the strange spectacle of "rank-and-file" committees waiting instructions from some leader before they can decide upon their next step!

To get into the saddle, these would-be leaders must convince their potential victims that they are now being ridden, but that with them in the saddle, hey will no longer be ridden. It will not serve their purpose to urge that those who are being ridden should get rid of rider, saddle and all. They must urge that only the riders be changed. Their consequent political manipulations in the unions leave the impression that "rank-and-file" means disruption, misrepresentation, henpecking of the officialdom—anything and everything except the use of a union by its own members to give effect to their own wishes.

In the I. W. W.

In the I.W.W. control by the rank-and-file is implicit in our constitution, our structure, our financial arrangements, and our traditional procedure. Yet we have no rank-and-file committees, and rarely de we see any member in our ranks appealing to, or even mentioning, the rank-and-file. Just as the best evidence of a good liver is the lack of any occasion to take note of it, so is the best evidence of rank-and-file control the absence of any mention of it. We find use for the term chiefly in describing the inadequacies of other unions.

How is such complete rank-and-file control accomplished?

In the first place, there is no division of our ranks into officialdom and rank-and-file. There is no officialdom. We have officers, some voluntary, and some on the payroll, some devoting full time to the work of the I.W.W., some devoting only their spare time after regular working hours. None of them are officers for many years. The various terms of office vary from three months to a year, and in no case can a member serve more than three successive terms. Thus our members are elected into and out of office. If they stayed in office for life, as they do in many unions, they would no doubt be "sobered by the responsibilities of office, an dsubordinate their revolutionary urge to the necessity of balancing the budget." But they don't stay, and during this term of office, they look at the problems of organization in much the same way that the rest of the members do. Conversely, so many of our members who are not holding an official position at any one time, have held such positions, that the viewpoint of these members is based largely upon a realization of the problems that confront the officers of a union. Thus there is a natural harmony and uniformity of views throughout the I.W.W.

The powers of these I.W.W. officers are very limited. They can not call strikes, nor can they stop them. Consequently they can not "sell out." If they are on pay, they have no votes in any membership meeting; and no official, whether on pay or not, has a vote in the Industrial Union or General Conventions. This is in marked contrast to the practice of most other unions. Their work is set out for them by the various conventions or other deliberative bodies of the membership; and should any unforeseen circumstance develop requiring any abrupt change of plan or policy, a referendum must be taken on it. At any time they can be recalled by referendum.

Not a Federation

The structure of the I..WW. provides for the utmost cohesiveness with the utmost freedom or autonomy of its component parts to attend to local or specific problems as the definite circumstances may require. It is not a federation of industrial unions, but a One Big Union of the working class. All its members are directly members of the I.W.W. They meet as members of industrial unions, according to the sort of work they do; and there is a free automatic transfer from one industrial union to another. A good portion of the work of the I.W.W. is accomplished by general membership meetings, District Conferences of all members in a district, Industrial District Councils, and other structures that bring members of various industrial unions together. All this results in cohesiveness and solidarity without the imposition of a powerful central authority.

Consequently there is no sacrifice of cohesiveness in preserving a usual degree of autonomy for the component parts of the I.W.W. Job branches decide their own policies for organizing the job or for keeping it organized, or for improving it. Industrial Union branches decide their local organization policies, elect their own officers, decide upon their own ways and means. Industrial Unions do likewise. These bodies are limited only by this: all must act in conformity with the General Constitution and the by-laws of their industrial Unions, and the decisions of their conventions.

The financial arrangements of the I.W.W. are a further guarantee of rank-and-file control. Control over a union's treasury often means control over the union. Industrial Union branches have their treasuries; Industrial Unions have theirs; the General Organization has its own. Of the dues collected from the members a portion set by by-laws of each industrial union stays in the local Industrial Union branch, another portion goes to the Main Office of the Industrial Union. From this a certain portion set by the constitution goes to the General Office, and the rest remains as an organizing fund to be expended by the General Organization Committee of that Industrial Union. If strikes or organizing campaigns break a union treasury, the General Office may be called upon for assistance, or the other Industrial Unions may be asked—but they can not be compelled to contribute their funds. In such emergencies the I.W.W. finds that its treasury is still "in the workers' pockets." And the closer this treasury is to the workers' pockets, the more considerate must union officials will be of the wishes of these custodians of the treasury.

But the most effective guarantee of rank-and-file rule in the I.W.W. is not in its constitution, structure, or financial arrangements, but in the viewpoints that have become traditional in our ranks. The I.W.W. members look upon rank-and-file not merely as a means for making sure that the union is run according to their wishes, but even more as a means for getting things done. The diffusion of responsibility in a rank-and-file organization begets initiative and releases energy. Even more important in getting results, it has things done by those who know what they want done, what obstacles are in the road of doing them, and consequently how they must be done. It may be possible to steer a boat on the open sea by remote control, but it won't work for riding a log down stream.

It is rank-and-file control that has enabled the I.W.W. with relatively so few members to accomplish such great results as it has in American industry. It is rank-and-file control that has kept it from being steered up blind alleys by the various fads and foibles that have beset the alleged intelligentzia of the labor movement. It is rank-and file control that has so developed organizational capacity throughout the ranks of our organization, that not only have most of our members proven competent organizers, but that somehow our ex-members have furnished a good part of the organizing force for other unions. It is this same development of individual capacity that has made the I.W.W. indestructible in the face of the most ruthless efforts to extirpate it; and it is to this development of individual capacity, and to the organized self-reliance that is back of it, that the I.W.W. looks as assurance that it can fend for itself no matter what suppression of civil liberties, no matter what despotism, and state intervention in unionism may grow out of "der Feurher principle."

It is little wonder that the I.W.W. places great emphasis on this idea of rank-and-file, looks for it in the unions that lack it, completely rejects the leader idea that would leave no room for it, and wishes the genuine article "rank-and-file rule" not to be confused with the ludicrous imitations that have been offered by the much-to-be-watched, self-appointed saviours of the American workingclass.

quarters, and since my arrival here three weeks ago, we have taken in something like 125 members, paid off all the back indebtedness to headquarters, and also organized a branch of the Servians of some 35 members. The boys here are charging 50 cents initiation; but the times are not as strenuous as they are on the coast, and it can be collected much easier than it could at places like Tacoma, Seattle, or Portland.

"There are so many hundred idle men in this country that many around the headquarters have little to do but study the question, compose poetry and word up songs for old tunes. It might be of interest to some to know about the program that has been followed out in this city for a few weeks and which has its effect. Among the I.W.W. membership there are a few good singers as well as jawsmiths, and their genius has been expressed in the following composition, rendered at street meetings as well as in the hall:

HALLELUJAH! I'M A BUM!

(Air: Revive Us Again.)

Oh, why don't you work
As other man do?
How in hell can I work
When there's no work to do?

CHORUS

Hallelujah! I'm a bum!
Hallelujah! Bum again!
Hallelujah! Give us a handout
To revive us again.

Oh, why don't you save
All the money you earn?
If I did not eat
I'd have money to burn.
—Chorus.

Oh, I like my boss;
He's a good friend of mine.
That's why I am freezing
Out in the breadline.
—Chorus.

I can't buy a job
For I ain't got the dough;
So I ride in a box car
And am a hobo.
—Chorus.

Oh, whenever I get
All the money I earn,
The boss will be broke
And to work he must turn.
—Chorus.

"This may not be as scientifically revolutionary as some would like, but it certainly has its psychological effect upon the poor wage slave that inhabits the proletarian part of the city, and has the Starvation Army dope poured into his ears about five times a week. A jawsmith is not in it with this truthful sarcasm handed out by a quartet, when the new words are set to an old familiar tune, and every utterance portrays the actual truth of the living conditions of the proletarians who form the audience."

It was only a few months later that the "Industrial Union Singing Club," more commonly referred to as the "Overalls Brigade," was coming across the country to the Fourth Convention of the I.W.W., singing "Conditions, they are bad," to the tune of "Red Wing," "I'm a Bum," and other songs that by that time had been compiled in the first of the little red song books "to fan the flames of discontent."

CAPITAL AND LABOR IN ITALY

By V. I. K.

UNDER THE AXE OF FASCISM. By Gaetano Salvemini. New York: The Viking Press, 1936. 402 pages.

Rearing its head at the present time more menacingly than ever before is fascism—capitalist dictatorship in its most violent and brutal form. As even the casual newspaper reader knows, fascism originated in Italy, where its advent is identified with the so-called "march on Rome" over fifteen years ago. Since that time it has taken root in other countries as well.

What does fascism hold in store for the working class? What is the life of the worker like under such a dictatorship? What are the economic and social consequences?

These are questions of the utmost importance, more so now than ever before. To seek an answer to these and many other questions of a similar nature requires a study of conditions under a dictatorial rule of this type. Fortunately, there have been published in very recent years works which present in a somewhat detailed manner the story of Fascist rule. One such volume is "Under the Axe of Fascism," written by Gaetano Salvemini, formerly professor of history at the University of Florence and now a lecturer at Harvard.

This study does not aim to describe the whole fabric of economic and social life under fascism; only one phase of it—"the relations between capital and labor." It is an absorbing account based upon facts and figures, practically all from Fascist sources. This is what makes "Under the Axe of Fascism" so much more convincing as an indictment of this twentieth-century prototype of dictatorship.

How It Started

Starting out with a mention of the beginnings of the Fascist movement, Professor Salvemini tells us briefly about some of the methods used by the blackshirts to attain their ends: the violent attacks on the unions in the latter part of 1920; the raiding of labor halls and other meeting places of the workers; the assassination of active unionists, and so forth and so on. The Fascist bands, provided with weapons, could in most cases rely upon police protection; in innumerable instances, the "protectors of the state" actively assisted them. While all this was going on, so-called "economic syndicates"—Fascist unions—were being formed.

Where did these Fascist-controlled organizations receive their finances? Who paid the officials for their nefarious activities? Who supplied the arms and ammunition with which to terrorize the population and thus make it possible for the followers of Mussolini to wrest power? "It is scarcely too much to attribute," says Salvemini, "the larger portion of their income to subsidies from industrialists, large landowners, merchants, bankers and others who welcomed the violent destruction of the unions and co-operative societies." (Page 5.)

End of Unions

The ascendancy of the Fascists was the signal for large-scale concerted attacks upon workers' organizations. Union halls were taken over by the blackshirts, opposition (at least in the open) was gradually stifled, co-operatives were wrecked, and the imprisonment of the most active and fearless anti-Fascists started in earnest. Lampedusa and Lipari were now receiving their first victims of the Fascist regime. Even at that it took some years before the unions were entirely destroyed.

And what has all this meant to the Italian working class?

In a brief book review such as this, it is, of course, impossible to detail even all the interesting material presented in this work, because Salvemini, in indicating the true nature of Fascist rule, marshals, in chapter after chapter, an imposing array of facts. However, it is in order to single out some of the chapters, such as those dealing with the labor court, agreements of labor, labor controversies, and so forth.

The law forbids strikes in any way, shape or manner, the penalty ranging according to the circumstances under which labor conflicts are called. The defenders of the Fascist dictatorship counter this with the statement that lockouts are also forbidden. What are the true facts? The author points this out very clearly: "But since the workers cannot strike, the employers have no need of recourse to the lockout. If an employer declares that he can no longer maintain the existing volume of employment in his concern, the stoppage of work is then not a 'lockout,' but a 'closing down' induced by a 'justified motive'."

The Labor Court

And yet there have been strikes, 8,000 workers being found guilty of such a crime in the second half of 1926 alone. These facts are, it is obvious, not included in the Fascist propaganda for domestic and foreign consumption, for they would not square up with the statements purporting to show how the relations of labor and capital have been finally solved without either party resorting to labor conflict.

What about the Labor Court? Surely the worker has a right to appeal to it! Perhaps there is no occasion to strike when you have "impartial" courts such as this.

Well, the Labor Court, in the first place having no members who are representing the workers, unless the officials of the Fascist unions may be called such, knows that even though the decision is against the worker he has no way of fighting it for the very simple reason that real unions are taboo as well as strikes. Perhaps the record of the court can be no better illustrated than in the following sentence on page 210:

"There does not exist to this date a single case in which the Labor Court has increased workers' wages."

Dr. Salvemini debunks much of the propaganda emanating not only from Italy but also from those individuals who are praising the rule of Il Duce and its "achievements." The standard of living, never high in Italy, has been dropping continually under Fascism; the housing standards are deplorable, to say the least; there is child labor, although it is supposed to be legally forbidden; the working conditions are horrible; the hours of labor are usually much longer than even the Fascist regulations proscribe; the life of the rural populace is anything but enviable; in brief, the general degradation of the Italian people is self-evident.

One may well take issue with some of the conclusions drawn by the author, but certainly there is no disputing the fact that he has presented a true picture of life as it is lived by the workers under the "blessings" of a capitalist dictatorship.

Salvemini ends his well-documented study with this illuminating observation:

"Impartiality"

"For the time being one may gladly admit that Fascism has solved the problem of the relations between capital and labor by suppressing the laissez-faire of labor. To forbid strikes, to outlaw autonomous unions and create nation-wide 'company unions'—this is such a brilliant solution of the problem, that one wonders why it is not adopted in every country. It has the powerful logic of that commandment which, according to Anatole France, would forbid both rich and poor to steal bread or to sleep in the open air. But is this really a solution Italian big business men would of course answer in the affirmative. He who would think with his own brain, and not with that of the big business men, has more than one reason for affirming that the Fascist experiment indicates how the problem must not be solved, not only out of an elementary respect for human dignity, but because it is no solution at all."

As a historian and scholar, Salvemini offers no program to combat fascism, for his purpose is only to indicate the immediate consequences of capitalist dictatorship in this newer form.

And, in conclusion, this reviewer can only say that this volume should be classified under the heading of "required reading."

Preamble of the Industrial Workers of the World

The working class and the employing class have nothing in common. There can be no peace so long as hunger and want are found among millions of working people and the few, who make up the employing class, have all the good things of life.

Between these two classes a struggle must go on until the workers of the world organize as a class, take possession of the earth and the machinery of production, and abolish the wage system.

We find that the centering of the management of industries into fewer and fewer hands makes the trade unions unable to cope with the ever growing power of the employing class. The trade unions foster a state of affairs which allows one set of workers to be pitted against another set of workers in the same industry, thereby helping defeat one another in wage wars. Moreover, the trade unions aid the employing class to mislead the workers into the belief that the working class have interests in common with their employers.

These conditions can be changed and the interest of the working class upheld only by an organization formed in such a way that all its members in any one industry, or in all industries if necessary, cease work whenever a strike or lockout is on in any department thereof, thus making an injury to one an injury to all.

Instead of the conservative motto, "A fair day's wage for a fair day's work," we must inscribe on our banner the revolutionary watchword, "Abolition of the wage system."

It is the historic mission of the working class to do away with capitalism. The army of production must be organized, not only for the every-day struggle with capitalists, but also to carry on production when capitalism shall have been overthrown. By organizing industrially we are forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old.

Mr. Stockholder Will Be Looking for A Job When the World's Workers Organize Right!

There is no question about it, under capitalist management the world has been slipping steadily backward. It's up to the working class to take hold now, before things get worse. Further progress in civilization depends upon that.

Continuation of the present management of industry under the direction and for the benefit of private owners spells the end even of such progress as the human race has made beyond the age of chattel slavery.

Signed I.W.W.
I.W.W.

P.S. Get Goin'!

It's time to call a halt. Is there any question as to who is going to bring about the change? Surely it will not be the work of those who profit by the present system. Improvement to them means merely a readjustment of the existing order to make it last longer. Even at its best, when they claimed it was in perfect working order, their system has been a terrible burden on the shoulders of the working class. They will never again be able to do so well as they did in the past, so-called normal times. What's the use of letting them tinker some more at the expense of the big majority of the population?

The time is here right now when the working class should take hold of the machinery of production and operate it for the benefit of all. Not until nobody makes a PROFIT from industry will everyone be able to make a LIVING out of it.

EDUCATION

It's a pity that one generation of workers cannot profit fully from the class struggle experiences of the one that preceded it. If lessons learned in past conflicts with the master class could be passed on to all those workers who now have the will and energy to fight for better things, our decadent capitalist system wouldn't have a ghost of a chance and the industrial commonwealth would blossom out in beautiful reality almost over night.

As it is by the time the seasoned, militant worker on the job is purged of illusions and has learned how to distinguish the genuine from the sham, the real from the phony, his influence over his fellow workers together with his own driving power has gone; and then another generation takes up the task and starts out almost from the beginning. This process of "class forgetfulness" is promoted greatly by occasional periods of prosperity, especially by those brought on by wars in which the militancy of labor is largely burned out by the heat of a frenzied nationalism.

Formal workers' education, such as is given in Work Peoples College and in union classes conducted in various parts of the country, does much to bridge the gap between the past and the present and thus, in a measure, makes available to the worker-student of today the valuable lessons in tactics, organization structure, and union theory learned in the struggles of the past. It does more than that. It brings to the student the living, present-day struggles so that he can compare and criticize, with the object of applying the knowledge gained to the problems on his own job. In addition to all this it enables him to acquire or develop ability to carry the message of effective organization to his fellow workers.

The labor movement of America needs more schools such as Work Peoples College where workers learn how to become better fighters in the class war.

REMINISCENCES OF SPAIN

By

RAYMOND GALSTAD

Children play at war in Barcelona

It is midafternoon. We are in a huddle reading a bulletin that has just been posted on the wall. It contains a list of the names of men who are to leave for Paris this evening. Discharges and repatriation papers are in the office ready for distribution. Some read the bulletin and dash down the corridor to the office. Those unable to run just shuffle. There's a brightness in their eyes as though they just gulped a bracing drink. Satisfied smiles stretch across their sun-parched faces. Monosylables of joy snag in their throats. They're the lucky ones. They're going home.

I'm new here. Just arrived from the hospital a few minutes ago. My name is not up yet. I might just as well get used to it here for a while. I think a tour of inspection of my new headquarters is in order, so I take a gander at the dormitory. My nose sniffs the smell of freshly laundered sheets strongly bleached. The odors are clean and medicinal like the hospital, or maybe my memory of the hospital is playing tricks with me.

Uniformed men sprawl across the beds taking "siestas' with their eyes wide open and their lips moving in conversation that sends up a hum of French, Spanish and English. Over in a corner a few Frenchmen are making melody with the "Waiting Song," a tune composed by a wounded British veteran of the International Brigade while he waited at Albacete for his discharge papers. The soldiers make up their own words, as soldiers will, when inspiration moves them.

I introduce myself to a group and we start rubbing our memories together, making warm conversation. The Front is still the favorite bone to chew on. We mentally place our bets on the outcome of the next battle. One intelligent face says the best defense is an attack, and nodding heads approve, and that puts the favorite bone back in the cupboard of memory until we become intellectually hungry for the Front again. We just sit and regard each other silently for a while with vacant wool-gathering eyes. It's not an embarrassing silence. It's just as if we intuitively agreed to dream for a few moments. I call them to attention with a question, and they all start talking at once. I gather there are a bunch of Americans and Canadians waiting here, but they're out doing the town right now, from what I'm told. I thank them for the information and take my leave of them.

I meet another American, and we walk into the messroom together. I put the bum on him for some tobacco. He says he ain't got none. Says he's been here four days and the Commissars ain't putting out, though he hears there's a whole warehouse bulking with Luckies. He's been down on the waterfront all day trying to mooch some butts from the English sailors, but he didn't have much luck. Wishes to hell his papers were O.K.'d so he could leave for the French border tonight. Even French smokes would beat nothing.

We bump into a Canuck who's been around a lot, and knows Barcelona to a "T." We learn from him that English smokes can be had from a bootlegger uptown. The stuff is priced, though, at one hundred pesetas a pound, about two dollars in American coin, according to him, and my friend's chin drops like the '29 stock market. That's a lot of money for a buck private, earning seven pesetas a day, to have on him all at one time, we agree. But I was paid off this morning, and I'm still holding forty-seven pesetas, so I suggest we hold a conference on the matter. We decide to ask three others to chip in, and go off to round up the unsuspecting donors.

It isn't hard to persuade the other three to chip in. They want to inhale some smoke as badly as we do, so we collect the necessary money, and detail the Canuck to sally forth to the tobacconist's, and make arrangements to meet him in the park across the road from the barracks.

It doesn't take him long to carry out his mission. We see him coming back with a small tinfoil package with the evening light glinting off it, like sun-starts off a mirror. He's walking a great deal more leisurely than when he left us to go after the weed. A cigarette is dangling listlessly from a corner of his lips. We run up to him and relieve him of the burden, and nervously begin to fashion cigarettes with our fingers.

We stroll back across the road to the park, and our group grows to eleven members. They're attracted by the smell of burning tobacco. The park itself comes under discussion. One young soldier remarks that it's the finest and largest park in Spain. He says he likes the zoo and the museum, and the statues, but best of all he likes the palm trees, and the lime trees, and the orange trees. They give good shade in the day-time, and he likes shade, he says. Another soldier interrupts him and says he talks too much; that he should give others a chance. The youthful one makes excuses for his monopolizing the conversation. He says the doctors told him he would lose his voice any time now as a result of a shrapnel wound in his throat, and he's determined to hear his voice as much as he can as long as he can.

The mention of his wound invites the others to start talking of their disabilities, like a bevy of old ladies discussing their operations and their miscarriages. The names of the battlefields, Belchite, Guadlamaga, Bilboa, Saragossa, Cordoba and Madrid seem like a checkerboard of blood, becoming more gloriously gory as they talk about how they lost a leg, an arm, an eye, a hand, or acquired a scar as a precious souvenir of battle. The lad whose voice will go haywire notes pointedly that we didn't get any medals, but he's glad about it, somehow because nobody will mistake him for a Commissar with all medals and no scars. We laugh a little at that.

An American West Coast seaman feels like rehashing the story of the part he filled in the Guadamalga offensive. He says it was a tough scrap. The Loyalists went up against the German troops and they had machine guns 'til hell wouldn't have 'em. How the Loyalists took their objective, Christ only knows! The boys were dropping all around him like ripe apples in a gale. He lost his buddy; saw him fall right in front of him, but he kept going. They got within throwing distance of the fascists and let loose with hand grenades. That's what got 'em. When you get close enough to toss the grenades, the fascists either come out of their trenches and meet you face to face, or they retreat. They hate like hell to be in the dug-outs when the grenades start pouring in. They don't want to be in the trenches when you're ready to jump 'em, either. Not when you got that cold piece of steel, two feet long, sticking on the end of your rifle. That's scary stuff, and plenty hard to take. And when a guy's on top, he's got all the breaks in the world, they know that. Just one good thrust, and you know there's one fascist scab that ain't gonna win the war for Franco . . .

He keeps talking about the strategies of combat in his tangey voice and the rest of us listen to the familiar details as if they were being carried out before our eyes. With his one arm he churns the air with emphatic gestures, his fist opening and closing like the maw of a sea anemone.

Speaking of battle tactics, a Britisher has something to say about the fight at the Cordoba front. His voice is clear and his language faultless, and he isn't selling his H's short like an English Cockney. All his listeners seem enlisted for action as they lean toward him to learn that the front was very quiet for several weeks, with no excitement at all, and no signs of war about. Then the Rebels came over the top with their right arms in salute, and singing the Internationale. It looked like they were surrendering. But they went into action and dished out hell. It was a furious hand to hand battle. But they were driven back to their trenches. Three days later they come over again with women on the lead. They used the girls as shields. The Loyalists held their fire and were nearly wiped out. Only fifty men returned from the skirmish, and everyone of them wounded. The English Brigade lost over four hundred that day.

The listeners agree it was a moral victory, and take some comfort in it, even though they regret the loss of Cordoba.

The Canuck was a chauffeur in the ambulance corps. He says his job wasn't a snap, either, what with administering first aid before loading the wounded into the ambulance, and driving over the rough roads full of shell holes, unloading at the base hospital, and driving back again . . . all the while providing a swell target for fascist bombers. He says it's no fun changing tires out in the battle areas with only a revolver strapped to your belt, and the wounded moaning in the bus, and a plane swooping overhead pouring lead into the ground around your feet. He says that a revolver is about as useful as a bow and arrow against a tank in such situations, and he rolls up his sleeve to display a groove of purple scars running from his wrist to his shoulder, just to prove the point.

An Aragon farmer says farewell as he joins the Loyalist forces

We pass the tobacco around again, and the six of us who have a vested interest in the weed, walk away from the group, each one of us thinking we're paying too high a price for chinning with our fellow veterans. The Canuck lets them know what we're thinking, and they smile. One says he'd swap a story any time for a cigarette.

We walk into a nearby bar and order some drinks, and sit there while the town grows dark, waxing discursive again, but not about ourselves. The Asturian miners and their courageous fight in Santander, with only dynamite and mining tools as weapons, strikes us as an admirable display of guts. We tie up the story with miner's struggles everywhere, and try to prove our theory that miners are a brave lot because they toil under dangerous conditions where death stalks close at hand, and they get used to being brave without knowing how brave they are, and their work develops in them a reckless fatalistic spirit that makes them formidable fighters in battle. We conjured up the battles of the Molly Maguires, Ludlow, Paint Creek, Cripple Creek, Messaba Range, the Rocky Mountain Fuel Company strike in Colorado in the United States; the sit-downs of the French miners, and we feel satisfied that our theory about the miners' militancy is adequately supported by history. Time passes. The yawning hour approaches, and we vote to go back to barracks and to bed.

Shafts of morning sun pierce the barracks windows, and pry open the eyes of sleepy veterans. Some turn their faces into the pillows or pull the covers over their heads to ignore the rude intrusion of the sunlight. Others sit up; rub their eyes; pucker their lips to prime up saliva for their dry tongues, and make wry faces. A few who piled into the sheets late last night, hold their heads and emit Ohhh!s of brain-ache. Hairy legs, and wrinkled nightgowns change into militarily dressed vertebrates that a woman might look at without horror.

At breakfast the Canuck and I are talking to each other again, formulating our plans for the day. A lazy walking tour of the town seems agreeable to both of us, and we gulp down the food in haste to be off. The steward hollers at us to haul in the dishes, and we're full of blundering apologies, but he doesn't stop scowling at us through his shaggy brows. I can feel his stare itching my back as I stroll with the Canuck out into the street.

We walk awhile in silence, both feeling a sense of shame for forgetting to carry our dishes to the kitchen. We feel like kids caught with jam on their fingers. Disrupting the spirit and practice of cooperation is weighing heavily upon our consciences. With no high command running things at the waiting barracks, everything is left to the soldiers' initiative and rank and file judgment; and in running counter to that judgment, however slightly, we're feeling we betrayed the wishes of our fellow-soldiers. The Canuck looks at me, and we snap out of our conscience-stricken coma. He says we'll carry the dishes back and forth tomorrow just to make it up to the steward, and we laugh, forgeting all about it.

The buzz of industry whirrs in our ears as we pass through the factory district on to Rambla street, the main thoroughfare, where we board a street car. We're used to the idea of riding street cars without paying any fare. Very reasonable people, these transportation workers. The Canuck tells me that before the war there were more people employd counting the money taken in by the street car and bus conductors than there were actually operating the vehicles of transportation. They just decided to put the cashiers to doing useful work by abolishing the price system in the transportation industry. The fare now is to look like a fighter, a worker, or a child. In other industries where the C.N.T.-F.A.I. have control, he is telling me, a modified wage-system is still the economic vogue, and will be for some time if the workers desire greater productive capacity. If they wish to build greater industries, they must necessarily pile up surpluses. The thing that's amazing about all this, in spite of the fact that workers still receive wages, is that they democratically decide what their wages shall be; the profit-seeking owning class is out of the picture; and the aggregation of lands and machinery are socially owned and controlled. And he is saying that if that ain't something to fight for, he'll eat his shirt; and a very unpalatable shirt it is that a soldier wears.

We step off the car and walk down to the quays. French and British gun-boats are tied up to the docks. We start talking to a few British sailors who want to know more about the war, and we invite them to come down to the beach with us for a swim.

The sand sparkles like Xmas-card snow, and the blue waves lap the shores as gently as a cat stroking its fur with its tongue. Night-time workers in trunks, and children naked, are swimming in the water and playing on the beach. We slip behind a crag and undress, and wade into the water with our shorts. The sailors best us in the swimming. They josh us a bit for our splashing like sidepaddlers, and offer to teach us the crawl and the sidestroke. But we're hopeless amphibians, the Canuck and I. They think we're okeh, for being revolutionists, though.

The Canuck starts indoctrinating the British navy with the C.N.T. philosophy, and they don't find it so bad, this class war "business." One gob confesses he joined the navy to escape the slums. Says he was willing to die for British imperialist capitalism; do anything, just so he didn't have to live out his span of life in London's Lower East End. He sees the sense of the class struggle plainly enough. The workers have got to organize and lose their chains and their slums, too. Says when he's through with his hitch in the navy he'd like to climb into the trenches and help these Loyalists. But he'll be scrubbing decks for six more years, and the Canuck says he hopes the workers own the world by then . . .

(An epitome of strategies)

By ELI HILL

In early nineteenth century America combinations of workers to raise wages or to better working conditions were held to be criminal conspiracies in restraint of trade. Though the conspiracy laws temporarily put a quietus on Labor's action, economic necessity, the imperious need of living, and the prospect of hunger forced the workingclass to fight with the weapons of strikes, picketing, and primary boycotts.

The Sherman Anti-Trust Act, passed in 1890, was thought to apply to business monopolies, but soon proved to be a legal effort to curb the aims of organized labor. It became the excuse of the masterclass for the issuance of sweeping injunctions against strikes and boycotts.

The Danbury Hatters case in 1903, and the Buck's Stove and Range case in 1907, are among the most outstanding evidences of capitalistic legal violence toward workers. To be sure, the injunction was used in numerous other instances such as the "Debs Rebellion" in 1894, the Southwest railway strike in 1886, and in the strike of the Engineers against the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad in 1888, but with the passage of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, the writ of injunction took on the proportions of Capital's Big Bertha constantly aiming and firing upon fighting Labor.

The National Association of Manufacturers, organized in 1895, became another organized menace to workers. The N.A.M. was dedicated to a program of recruiting industrial spies, influencing legislation, making corrupt politicians more corrupt, herding scabs in times of industrial warfare, purchasing labor leaders and agent provocateurs.

The National Civic Federation founded in 1901, grew out of the Civic Federation of Chicago that had been active during the Pullman strike of 1894, and provided the American workers with still another menace, not so frank, perhaps, in its wishes to destroy organized labor's militancy, but all the more menacing for that. It was, in short, an attempt to dull the edge of the class struggle, through mediation, and other subtle forms of class-collaboration designed to obstruct strikes. The N.C.F. was the unlegal fore-runner of the legal boards set up under the provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act "to arbitrate labor disputes."

The National Labor Relation Boards created under the Wagner Act does not seem so far to have acted inimically to organized labor. The boards have confined themselves to deciding which union has the majority of members in each plant or on each job, and in giving the majority the dubious N.L.R.B. blessings to go forth and bargain collectively. Too, they have been effective in restoring jobs in some cases to workers fired for union activity. The I.W.W. has routed the C.I.O. and the A.F.L. in such elections in the Wobbly controlled shops in Cleveland.

The danger of the N.L.R.B. lies in the effect it has upon those who look to it, not only to settle elections between unions, but to give them deliverance from economic bondage. (The American Federation of Labor, the Committee for Industrial Organization and the Communist Party are ballyhooing the Wagner Act as "Labor's Magna Charta." Of course the Magna Charta was not so hot, either, but it will take educated Wobblies on the job to explain away these myths, else the workers fall prey to such demagogic nonsense.)

With much court and prison experience behind it, the rebellious workingclass has learned that it is small consolation to win its legal battles and lose its strikes, and has devised many tricks and stunts to smash injunctions, befuddle the bosses, and confound the police.

The display of spontaneous enthusiasm for striking is contagious. Workers will drop their work, catch the strike spirit, and refuse to return to work. In Justus Ebert's "Trial of A New Society," we read of just such an instance:

"In Lawrence, Massachusetts, on January 12, 1912, something extraordinary happened in the big mills there. About 9 A.M. on that date, the employes of one of the departments of the Everett mill, swept through its long floors, wildly excited, carrying an American flag which they waved amid shouts of 'Strike! Strike!! Strike!! From room to room they rushed, an enraged, indignant mass. Arming themselves with the picker sticks used in the mills, they went from loom to loom, persuading and driving away operatives; and stopping looms; tearing weaves, and smashing machines, where repeated attempts were made to run them despite their entreaties, which seldom failed of instant response. As they swept on, their numbers grew, and with them grew the contagion, the uproar and tumult.

"Out of the Everett mill they rushed, these hundreds of peaceful workers, now aroused, passionate and tense. On the street, outside the mill gates, they were met by excited crowds that were congregated there. All of them coalesced into one big mass, and as such, moved over the Union Street bridge on to the Wood, Washington and Ayer Mill, where the same scenes were enacted once more. Men, women and children—Italians, Poles, Syrians—all races, all creeds, already aroused to action before the coming of the crowd outside (some of whom rushed the gates and entered), ran through the thousands of feet of floor space, shouting 'Strike! Strike!! Strike!!! All out! Strike! Strike!! Strike!!!' sweeping everything before them, and rendering operation in many departments so impossible as to cause a complete shut-down."

From "Twenty-Five Years of Industrial Unionism," a famous I.W.W. pamphlet, we learn that in Gray's Harbor, Wash., in 1912, a strike broke out for higher wages in the sawmills. The Lytel Mill was surrounded by a stockade twelve feet high surmounted by barbed wire and the guards were doubled at the gate. The wage-slaves who were scabbing on the inside were to be kept immunized from the influence of the strikers from without. But one hundred and fifty Wobblies went over the top, cut the barbed wires, pulled the work-whistle, mingled with the startled sawmill workers, and swept triumphantly out of the gate past the astounded guards.

The I.W.W. strike at the Brush Clearing Camps at the Lake Cle Elum Dam in Washington in May of 1931, received very little publicity in the brass check, and not a great deal in the official press of the I.W.W. But with the termination of the strike, the active participants of the strike drew up a bulletin outlining the strategies employed and the results obtained.

John Holt writes in the bulletin: "At the first meeting in the strikers' camp a permanent relief committee was elected, the chairman of which had to report daily to the strike committe. By May 8th everything was runing smoothly with about fifty-five men in the strike camp and about twenty families being cared for. By this time (the fourth day of the strike—E. H.) the local business men began to see that this was an organized strike and not a feeble protest to the Mayor or any publicity stunt. Finance became easy to get. Even local organizations asked for interviews that they might be able to help such a worthy cause. Should the strike have continued long into the summer it is very doubtful if any strikers would have gone hungry in this district. The camp steward made out a daily list of the necessities, always in co-operation with the relief committee. One of the strikers had a Dodge delivery truck which was used to good advantage. Streamer banners carrying signs reading "Strikers' Relief Supply Car" were made to line the sides. It was intended to make frequent trips through Yakima Valley with this car but the snappy culmination of the strike made such preparation unnecessary." (The strike ended May 12th. —E. H.)

The regular picket crews worked at a systematic three hour shift through day and night. Pickets were placed on the highway near the job and also in Cle Elum, the main line railroad town. Freight trains and the towns of Roslyn and Ronald were also picketed. The pickets used handbills and especially in town carried big banners. On the highway they used red lanterns at night. In order to make sure that the job remained closed down, they surprised the camps with a well organized, quick and unexpected raid at 6 o'clock in the morning on the fourth day of the strike. Local people had furnished them six autos besides the truck. Much to their satisfaction they found only three scabs. These were loaded into the truck and hauled to the picket camp and through the towns for display before the citizens. This action went over big with the natives. The news passed up and down the valley that they were determined to win and scabs stayed away thereafter.

The significant fact in this strike is that only thirteen members of the I.W.W. arranged the details for the strike, agitated on the job sufficiently to entice a militant minority to take action, and conducted the speaking and publicity. The results of the strike were: "Forty cents an hour (an eighty cent increase in wages per day); five cents reduction of daily board; no discrimination; thirty minutes of company time per day to walk to work. Strikers voted unanimously to join I. U. 310 of the I.W.W. Two hundred lined up."

In April, 1936, near Pierce, Idaho, the United Artist Pictures came to the Potlatch Forest, Inc. (Weyerhauser) to use the forest scenery for the background of the movie "Come and Get It." The forty-five extras that were to be hired were offered three dollars a day for a ten hour day. The men were I.W.W.'s, so they refused to work for less than four dollars a day, and would work no longer than eight hours. The Potlatch Forests, Inc., refused to comply with the Wobbly demands, and the men bade au revoir to the job. But, because of the pressing need for the forest-working extras felt by the United Artists, the Weyerhauser company had to comply with the demands, and the men returned to take a fling at movie-acting.

A strike that affected five thousand miles of railroad was called in 1886 by the Knights of Labor. These railroads that were struck were situated in Missouri, Kansas, Arkansas, Indian Territory, and Nebraska. In Commons' "History of Labor in the United States," Selig Perlman says: "The strikers did not content themselves with mere picketing, but actually took possession of the railroad property and by a systematic 'killing' of engines; that is, removing some indispensable part, effectively stopped all freight traffic." Taking souvenirs, indispensable to the operation of the job, has been a favorite trick, and one that has precluded scabbery in many instances, since the scabs could not function without the strikers' souvenirs.

The problems of handling the scab-police is difficult at times. An admirable solution to this problem in one case at least is given in Coleman's "Life of Debs." During the railway strike of 1894, a bold engineer jumped down an embankment of the Ilinois Central Railroad Yards to land behind a startled constable. Waving a piece of paper (only a laundry bill) he yelled to the constable, "I'm from the office! I have orders to spike all the switches in the yards. We hear the strikers are going to derail the trains. Come on, give me a hand!" He led the constable to the tool box where they took out a maul and a bucket of spikes which the constable had to carry from one end of the yards to the other, spiking every switch under the stern direction of the engineer. It took two days to undo this work of one night.

Scabs of the garden variety are frightened in some instances by good healthy booing. In the Lawrence strike the law prohibited the pickets standing around the mills. The strikers obeyed the letter of the law, and made it look ridiculous by making an endless moving picket line around each mill. They marched with printed bands around their arms with the words "DON'T BE A SCAB!" very much in evidence, and kept up a continuous booing that sent shivers down the spines of any would-be scabs. (This is the first instance in history of a circular moving picket line.—E.H.)

During the strikes on the construction jobs of the Great Northern and Canadian Northern in British Columbia in 1912, and during similar strikes on the Great Northern in Washington in 1922, it was necessary to picket the employment offices from Los Angeles to Winnipeg and from Seattle to Chicago in order to keep scabs from hiring out. In such strikes scabs were given transportation to work by yielding their baggage to the railroad concerns until their fare was paid for with work. The I.W.W. often adopted the tactic of shipping out its members in these consignments of scabs, often making up most of the shipment. They would quit the train en route and leave the railroad in possession of cheap suitcases packed with gunny sacks and bricks. In the British Columbia strike of 1913, it was sometimes found necessary to send in members to "scab on the job" in order to bring out the rest of the camp with them.

The sit-down strike, originated by the I.W.W. in the General Electric at Schenectady, New York, in 1906, has proved an effective weapon in the class struggle since. Too much faith in the efficacy of the method has led to working-class disillusionment in many cases, however, notably the Douglas Aircraft strike in Santa Monica, California, in February, 1937, where the strike committee made no preparation for carrying on the strike in the event the strikers were evicted by police force from the plant. Because of lack of organization and perspective, the strike proved to be a dud that cost the workers their jobs, the blacklist, the yellow dog contract, long-drawn court trials and heavy sentences for a few. The Hershey strike, the Yale Towne strike and others are proof that the sit-down method does not guarantee success every time. This is not to detract from the merits of the sit-down as a tactic, rather it is a warning against blind faith in it.

The I.W.W. in Detroit employed the sit-down tactic to good effect in the Hudson Motor Car Company from 1932 to 1934. "Sit Down and Watch Your Wages Go Up," was the message that rolled down the conveyor lines on stickers attached to pieces of work. It became a byword in conversation among workers, and a thrill in practice. The steady practice of the sit-down philosophy netted wage increases that brought the metal finishers' wages from seventy-five cents an hour to a dollar and a quarter an hour—in depression times.

Job action reached a fine point in the lumber strike of 1917 when the strike committee, seeing that its strike funds were running low, decided to go back to work with the strikers and continue the strike there. They would work only eight hours a day and then blow their own whistle to stop work. Each crew of workers repeated the stunt until the fuming bosses granted the eight-hour day.

In the elevator strike of March, 1936, in New York City, scabs had the worst of it. The strikers, with the aid of the tenants in the struck buildings kept up a constant ringing of the elevator bells. When the scab would appear with the elevator, he was promptly jerked off the job. With the elevators delayed in that fashion, the tenants registered their protests with the management, and refused to pay rent. In the face of this the landlords acceded to the strikers' demands.

At Kelsey Hayes Wheel Corporation in Detroit, according to the reports of an Industrial Worker correspondent, the workers "devised the mass thirst strike for eliminating speed-up, an ingenious device for driving the bosses insane. During the summer hot spells, the workers were found absenting themselves from the fast-moving points of production, motivated by a common impulse to drink at the same time.

"When the bosses, infuriated, were told that nothing could slake the thirst of the slaves so effectively as a slowed down line and an increase in pay, they were forced to capitulate to the logic of this 'mass insanity'.

"During the cold weather the 'headache strike' proved the style. A whole department would apply to First Aid for aspirins, leaving the line racing behind them. 'Skip' strikes and machine breakdowns were engineered with the native efficiency of a wage-slave in rebellion. With each success came the sense of increased power and the desire to employ the power frequently and unexpectadly to the chagrin of the befuddled masters."

In Germany, where all striking is forbidden under the Nazi rule, the workers in the department stores used an evasive tactic. They painted inscriptions of the strike on balloons and gave them to children. The children went into the deparment stores with the balloons and unwittingly acted as pickets. When the police attempted to take the balloons from the children, the frightened youngsters released their holds on the strings and let the spheres float to the ceiling, out of reach of the police. Following this incident the sale of balloons was forbidden in Germany.

In the McKee's Rock strike of 1909, the strikers used a very effective counter-attack against the violence of the Pennsylvania Cossacks. The "Unknown Committee," after a striker had been killed, sent a notice to the Cossacks, "For every striker's life that you take, a trooper's life will be taken." A riot was started at O'Donovan bridge by Deputy Sheriff Exler; four strikers were killed so the "Unknown Committee" took the lives of three Cossacks and called it quits, for it was already clear that this amount of discipline had checked the violence of the cowardly police.

In Upton Sinclair's "Flivver King" there is a passage that yields a provocative suggestion to labor unions.

"If an organizer had failed to report himself to the union office at his regular intervals, the rest of the members would naturally assume that he had been arrested. The first thing that was done was to phone all the relatives and friends of the organizer to keep calling up the police station to find out if they had him locked up. By continuously calling them, the lines were kept so busy that police business was greatly hampered. If a couple of hours of this would not bring about the desired results, they would call the administration building of the Ford River Rouge plant. Someone would call up this office and ask for the missing man. If there was no satisfactory answer, he would tell them that their phone would be out of order until he was released. Following this, the caller would put a piece of match stick under the lever supporting the telephone receiver. This kept the receiver from coming all the way down; and since the calling station controls the one called, the Ford Company's line would be "busy" until the telephone company sent a man to remedy the trouble. Meantime, the caller had moved on to the next pay station to repeat the performance. It cost only five cents a call, and with several men on the job, all the trunk lines into the Ford administration building would soon be reporting "busy." High-salaried executives trying to get some large city to conclude million dollar contracts, would have to hop into their cars and drive somewhere else to place the calls."

After the Northwest lumber strike of 1917, the employers tried to blacklist those that had been active union men. They set up an employment agency in the Inland Empire (Eastern Washington and Idaho) through which these men would be blacklisted. The lumberjacks found a remedy for this. When hiring out from these employment offices, they gave the names of Murphy or Swanson. If the man was Irish, or resembled Irish, he would give his name as Murphy. If he did not resemble Irish, he gave his name as Swanson. It was not long when the employment agents' records were full of Murphys and Swansons. Their attempt at blacklisting through this route was fruitless.

Finis

The workers of the world continue to be clever in devising schemes of attack and counter-attack in the class struggle. These evidences of keen intelligence bode well for the workers. Conspicuous for their lack of ingenuity along these lines are "Labor's Leaders." To be sure, they are given to devising means to obstruct the success of Labor's own strategies. The best strategy yet devised for workers who have leadership trouble is to join the I.W.W.

Work Peoples

In the school gym—the boys keep in shape with handball, boxing, and other sports.

Many people have asked what Work Peoples College is, and some have been misinformed as to its purpose. In this article I will attempt to explain why this institution was established and to describe the subjects taught at this school for the working class.

Work Peoples College was established by wage workers, for the wage workers, and is managed by wage workers. In this school workers are educated in subjects which concern the working class and which they should know something about. The people who teach these subjects are themselves wage workers who have been in the I.W.W. and the labor movement for a period of years.

First of all we should know what subjects are taught at this school for the working class The three main subjects are: Marxian Economics, Labor History, and Industrial Unionism. Then also, Public Speaking, Sociology, Journalism, Organization Methods, Conduct of Meetings, English, Arithmetic and Finnish are taken by students. And those who are very, very, ambitious, attend the class which is known as the Tutorial Class.

Caught in the act of inhaling porkchops—it took two large tables to accommodate the gang this year. The kitchen staff is 100 per cent organized in I. U. 640.

In the Economics class, students learn just how they are exploited by the Capitalist Class. They learn that the value of a product is really the amount of labor embodied in that product. Also they learn that, although some may say we receive as much wages as is due us, this is not so; we receive only a small portion of what we produce for all that we may claim that all we produce is ours and ours alone. The product which we produce and for which we do not receive payment, goes to the capitalist who exploits us. This production from which the capitalists benefit is known as the surplus, and it is for this surplus that we of the labor movement are fighting. And so, I could go on naming different theories and straight facts which prove that we of the working class are exploited at the point of production and that the Capitalist Class live on the fruits of our labor. All this is learned in the Economics Class.

The Labor History class is the class in which the students learn how and under what conditions the first labor unions were formed and also of the political efforts of labor and their failures. We are informed as to when and where the first strikes were pulled off and why they were or were not successful. Something is learned about those labor unions which were once in existence such as the Molly Maguires, the Knights of Labor, etc.; and something is learned about those labor unions still in existence such as the I.W.W., the A. F. L., the CIO, and others

The class which deals with the I.W.W., its formation, principles, and activities, is the class in Industrial Unionism. Here the students learn what kind of an organization the I.W.W. really is, and the reasons for joining it.

Next we have the Public Speaking Class. Here the students learn the basic principles of public speaking and how to put their thoughts across to other people. The students get up and speak on various subjects, usually dealing with the present day system or the information obtained in the other classes.

The Sociology Class studies the social institutions and the social forces of the present day, such as: the state, religion, language, the moral code, the family, etc. We learn how these institutions originated and how the capitalist class uses them to take advantage of the working class.

In the Journalism Class, just as in the Public Speaking Class, students learn how to convey their thoughts to others. They learn the basic principles of writing articles for labor papers.

The Organization Methods Class and the Conduct of Meetings Class teach the students how to become organizers for the I.W.W. and how to conduct meetings with the proper parliamentary procedure.

Arithmetic, English, and Finnish Classes are held to give the students the necessary information about these subjects, so that they will not be handicapped in their other subjects and will be able to impart the knowledge they do have, to others.

The Tutorial Class is a training class for those who are interested in becoming teachers at such schools as Work Peoples College.

Besides having the classes I have mentioned, the W.P.C. holds Open Forums every Friday afternoon. In these forums the students themselves give the lectures, participate in the debates, the symposiums, and the discussions. Interesting and very educational subjects are discussed. Some of the subjects students have discussed at these forums are: "Is Industrial Democracy a Possibility?"; "Can Women be Revolutionary?"; "Can the Workers Manage Industries?"; and others. These forums are beneficial to the students for two reasons: they learn things they had not known of or thought about before, and they train themselves to speak before audiences.

All in all, Work Peoples College is the place for the workers to become educated, to become class conscious, and to learn about the only organization for them, the I.W.W.

ROOSEVELT WANTS $1,300,000,000 FOR NAVY BUILDING PROGRAM — JAPAN SAYS SHE WANTS PEACE—OFFERS TO STAY OUT OF YANGTZE BASIN IN RETURN FOR UNDISPUTED POSSESSION OF FIVE NORTHERN PROVINCES—MUSSOLINI AND HITLER WANT MORE BABIES FOR BIGGER AND BETTER WARS—UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN INDIGNANT OVER REFUSAL OF JAPAN TO DISCLOSE NAVAL PROGRAM.

Such are the headlines that stare us in the face. As Photohistory says: "War is Here!"

To top it off, people accuse the Chinese and Japs and Fascist mercenaries of savagery. Well, that's where they're wrong. There has never been an instance of wholesale killing or war among savage peoples. In a society where everything was shared in common it was impossible to find any reason for going to war. The savages were free to appropriate the gifts of nature without hindrance from anyone. There was no need for navies or armies of policemen. The Eskimos are about the best instance of savages left. Civilization has not yet changed their long established ways. They have no word for war, and they never scold or swear. The women are on an equal footing with the men, social grades are unknown, and all property is held in common. When a seal, a bear, or some other good thing is to be had, the whole tribe helps to consume it. They have no form of organized government, and no armed forces. If a man's wife dies, other men of his tribe raise no objection if their wives console the poor widower, and so a good time is had by all. Now, how in the devil can anyone compare the hordes of our modern mass murder mechanism with these savages?

War is so much here that nobody bothers to declare it. Neither in Spain, nor Ethiopia, nor China did anyone come out with any such open declaration as "Dear Hi Lee Sell Asee, I, Benito Mussolini, special mouthpiece for the ruling class of Italy, now hereby in the name of Christ and civilization declare war upon you, your people, and your country, so help you!" No; they just went over and started fighting and killing people, and left the country in ruins. Right now, should you become the victim of civilization, you would most likely find the dead Ethiopians, Chinamen, Japs, Moors, Italians, Germans and Spaniards holding a conference with St. Peter and all admitting that they got to heaven just as fast, and maybe faster, than they would have, had they been killed in a regularly declared war.

But why all this fighting? Some say it is for new markets; some, that it is for the defense of old ones. But look at the casualties of the world war:

12 million killed in battle.
20 million wounded
10 million homeless
23 million dead from disease and famine.

How can all these dead, wounded and homeless furnish an increased market? Dead people don't buy. So that reason must be dropped. The only market it creates is that of destruction—destruction of the necessaries of life, destruction of the means of destruction, destruction of human cannon-fodder. So today the leaders of mankind advocate the production of more cannon fodder. At a recent conference in Washington, D. C., on "Better Care for Babies and Mothers," James Roosevelt gave the official New Deal slant:

> "The best national defense we can have are proper children growing up under proper care."

New York City's supposedly fiery and progressive Mayor La Guardia said:

> "Take the patriotic approach. The nation has an interest in every expectant mother because her child may be a boy. Even if it isn't, it at least is the potential mother of future boys."

While such policies are being advocated, it might be a good thing to practice a little birth control, eh?

Another reason given for war is to get colonies, to provide room for this forced increase in the population. Italy has subjugated Ethiopia; but as yet Mussolini has not sent his excess population over there, even though he still does advocate more babies. In fact, there are more Italians, it is said, within two miles of Cherry Street, New York City, than in all the Italian colonies combined.

In the last world war the colonies went to such countries as Great Britain, France, the United States and other countries that had no need for colonies. If Japan proceeds to conquer China, we can expect to see these same great powers demand their cut. But it is rather perplexing what they will get out of it, for without war, they already exploit its resources and its labor power. Wars change the boundary lines and put one flag instead of another over the mines and factories; but property rights—especially of corporations—are usually respected. It is cheaper to buy than to take by war.

It's rather perplexing to find a good reason why war is here. The fact is that it is here; and instead of writing more about it, it would be better to do something about it. Toward the end of the last world war, the working class did start doing something about it, and that's probably why the damn thing ended. Revolution swept Russia. In Austria the workers got rid of the Hapsburgs. In Germany they sent the Hohenzollerns flying. In Hungary there was a liberal democracy, then the Bolshevik regime of Bela Kun which lasted four months before the allied armed forces crushed it and re-established the rule of the land-owners. It has all ended in fascism, but still while it lasted it provided many a nightmare for the plunderbund that thrives on war. The threat of revolution remains the most effective deterrent to war, even though the erstwhile revolutionists are resurrecting Woodrow Wilson's battle cry of "Make the World Safe for Democracy."

What are we, the working people who constitute the majority of people the world over, going to do about it? Are we going to furnish the barons of industry with more cannon fodder for the next great war? Are we meekly to become puppets flung at each other's throat? Are we going to travel thousands of miles to kill other working men with whom we have no quarrel? I say we should declare war—but it should be war on the capitalist system—and the slogan should be that of Karl Marx:

"Workers of the world, unite! You have nothing to lose but your chains. You have a world to gain."

REVOLT OF THE BROTHERHOOD

By Covington Hall

In 1907 the lumber workers from one end of the South to the other walked out of the mills and woods, went home and sat down. It was a mass spontaneous movement caused by a steep cut in wages with a lengthening of hours by the lumber companies. The wages were already low and the hours unbearably long, but, as the workers had no organization, the lumber barons expected no resistance to their ruthless action. So, when the workers walked out, the barons were taken by surprise. The mass demonstration was something hitherto unheard of in the South. Fearing, seemingly, to terrorize the workers back onto the jobs, the barons began a campaign of soft-soaping. They told the desperate workers, "The times are so hard we are not making any money at all; but, if you will return to work, we will restore the old wages and hours just as soon as business improves." The barons did neither. They simply lied, as usual. But the uneducated workers, trusting them, went back to work.

Before the walkout ended, however, the A.F. of L. rushed into several large lumber towns and "organized" them into Federal Labor Unions, none of these "unions" having any connection with each other. Further, the usual A.F. of L. policies were applied to the situation, as a result of which nothing was accomplished for the workers and the Federal unions soon disbanded.

In only one town, Lake Charles, La., did the workers put up anything like a real fight. Here there were at the time, about 90 Socialists and IWW's. All took an active part in the resistance to the cuts in wages and lengthening of hours. All knew something about labor organization and revolutionary theories. Being activists, they formed a militant nucleus around which the masses mobilized and fought. As a result, the Lake Charles workers held the 10-hour day but lost about 25 cents a day on their wages, the wages of unskilled labor then being about $2.00 per day. The news of this partial victory spread and, of course, tended to make the outraged workers still more restless.

Uncle Pat

Then in 1908 Pat O'Neal—"Uncle Pat," all of us affectionately called him—a veteran leader of the Arkansas Coal Miners and member of the Western Federation of Miners, came to Leesville, La., which is in the heart of the Louisiana-Texas lumber country, and launched a weekly paper, "The Toilers." In this paper, Uncle Pat supported the Socialist party and called on the lumber workers to organize in the IWW. He also spoke in the surrounding territory. As a result of his agitation two or three IWW Unions were organized. One of these had as a member Arthur Lee Emerson, who afterwards, with Jay Smith and others, organized the Brotherhood of Timber Workers in 1910. But before the Brotherhood was organized the IWW Unions started by Uncle Pat had faded away, seemingly.

The dissatisfaction and the spirit awakened, however, still remained, and when the Brotherhood sprang up, it spread like a prairie fire through Louisiana and parts of Texas. In its first year more than 30,000 members were initiated and again the barons were taken by surprise. But this time they used no soft-soap. A bitter struggle immediately began which lasted for three long years before the Brotherhood, which in 1912 had affiliated with the IWW as the Southern District of the Forest and Lumber Workers I.U., was crushed by the united power of the Lumber Trust, the Santa Fe Railroad and the States of Louisiana and Texas.

In the course of the revolt the workers were, in 1911, locked out for seven months, fifty of the largest mills closing down. This lockout ended in July. During its continuance whole families were reduced to three meals a day of cornbread and molasses. The barons were sure they had taught the workers a "good lesson," but by that time the workers had learned more and more of the IWW, the barons aiding in this by denouncing them from the beginning as "IWW atheists." All this accomplished for the barons, however, was to make the workers want to hear more about the IWW an organization the barons seemed to dread so and the more they learned of it the more determined they were to join. They sent fraternal delegates to the General Convention in 1911 and affiliated in April, 1912.

Barons War Against I.W.W.

I am running a little ahead of my story, though. So, back to the 1911 lockout. Instead of being effectively tamed by the terrible experience, as the barons hoped, the workers came back still fighting, still demanding an increase in wages and shorter hours and, in addition, the cutting out of the many grafts worked on them, plus a demand for control of doctor, hospital and insurance fees.

Gradually wages were advanced and hours shortened until the IWW had forced wages of unskilled up to $2.50 for a 9-hour day, wages to be paid in United States currency instead of in "commissary money."

But in achieving these and other reforms, the Union in the Southern District had to keep up a relentless fight, so that its membership was gradually worn down and lost. Between 5,000 and 7,000 of its most militant members, white and colored, were blacklisted out of the lumber country. In spite of all this the union men fought on, trying to rebuild the Forest and Lumber Workers Industrial Union.

Terror was turned loose on the devoted band of militants still in the field. Civil war practically reigned over all central and western Louisiana and parts of east Texas. Everybody was armed. The barons flooded the country with gunmen recruited by the infamous Burns Detective Agency. The lives of all officers of the union, of its active members and of known sympathizers were daily in peril, not only from Burns gunmen but from vigilante organizations made up of hostile merchants, preachers and other townsmen who styled themselves "Good Citizens' Leagues." These "Leagues" committed many outrages against union men. It was these forces that finally brought on the battle between the Forest and Lumber Workers and Union Farmers on our side and those of the Lumber Trust at the little sawmill town of Grabo, La., on July 7, 1912. This battle is known in Louisiana as the "Grabo Riot."

We Go to Carson

About three weeks before it was fought, I was billed to speak in Carson, La., a lumber town owned by the "Four C's" Coal and Lumber Co. of Missouri. Only 12 men showed up to make the march to Carson, all expecting trouble that day. Emerson was not present on this trip, but Ed Lehman—"Old Brave," we all nicknamed him —his right-hand man in organizing, was with us and in charge. To reach Carson we had to pass through the Long-Bell town of Bon Ami ("Good Friend"!), three miles south of DeRidder, where we had mobolized our platoon.

About halfway to Bon Ami, we were met by Deputy Sheriff Kelly of the Long-Bell Lumber Co. He wanted to know, "Are you all the IWW's?" We informed him that we were. Next he asked, "Who is the speaker?" "I am," I said. Next he wished to know" if you are going to speak in Bon Ami?" We told him, "No." "Oh," he laughed, "so you are going to pass us up." We told him a meeting had not been advertised in Bon Ami, but in Carson, but that if they wished a meeting we would be glad to come and stage one for them. With that he turned his buggy and drove rapidly toward Bon Ami.

When we reached the outskirts of the town, all the company's "commissary soldiers," as the Jacks styled them, were drawn up on the baseball ground awaiting us. They took our pictures and as we proceeded, they fell in behind and around us beating tincans and shields together, beating on small circular saws and yelling at the top of their voices. In a dump cart behind the carryall in which Lehman, myself and other of the boys were leading our parade, they had a tremendous circular saw rigged up that men in the cart were pounding with bolts about two feet long. It was "a regular pandemonium," only worse. This infernal noise kept up until we reached the Grabo road, where we met the strikers from there. We then felt easier, for now our numbers about equalled theirs.

Between Bon Ami and Carson there was then a strip of woods about a mile wide. While passing through it, a sudden silence fell over all. The yelling and beating of saws and tincans ceased. We could not understand. Neither could Deputy Sheriff Kelly and Woods Foreman Martin of the Long-Bell Co., who were leading the opposing parade. Both got out of their autos two or three times and looked back to see what had happened.

We did not know until after the row was over. The famous "Leather Breeches" Smith, who was out in the woods evading a warrant for his arrest on a charge of "intimidating" scabs at Grabo, had suddenly stepped out of the forest, gotten into one of our wagons facing the dump cart carrying the big saw and promptly ordered everybody to shut up and cease the racket. "It makes me nervous," he said," and I don't want to kill any of you scabs today, much as I'd like to." They all shut up, Smith having the reputation of, not only being a "desperate man," but "crazy" to boot.

Smith hopped out of the wagon on the edge of the woods, telling the Lumber Trust crowd: "Don't you tap a saw or let out a yell until you get to Carson. If you do, I'll hear of it and I'll slip up some night and shoot you in your bed." With that he disappeared. They neither tapped nor yelled until we entered Carson, more than a mile away.

"Long Live the Brotherhood"

When we arrived in Carson about 150 farmers were there to back us up and also about 150 more of the barons' men. Our crowds were now about equal in numbers and practically all armed.

When I rose to speak I couldn't hear myself think, much less talk. Lehman and I decided to turn the speaking into a "Hurrah parade," marching with all our crowd in wagons and on foot up one street and down another, all of us yelling as loud as we could: "Long live the Brotherhood! Long live the Brotherhood!" All over Carson and Bon Ami we did this, ripping their crews all to pieces.

I was ashamed of my race that day. Both at Carson and Bon Ami the mill owners had been ordered to remain in their houses with doors closed and blinds drawn, not to come out under penalty of discharge and blacklist and not to sell or to give us so much as a glass of water. This order the "freeborn Anglo-Sexons" obeyed, all except one, who was promptly discharged.

But at Carson, they had to force the Negroes back into their houses at the points of guns and while I was attempting to speak a Mexican woods crew of about 40 men passed back of us through the woods. As soon as we saw them we jerked off our hats and waving them, yelled: "Long live the Brotherhood!" Every Mexican's big Stetson came off and as far as we could hear them, came back the cry: "Vivas la Brudderhoud! Vivas la Brudderhoud!" Then, in Bon Ami, about 30 Italians were gathered on the porch of the last house we passed. As our carryall passed it, all of us waved our hats to them, crying: "Long live the Brotherhood!" And as far as we could hear, came the answering cry: "Vive le Brudderhoud! Vive! Vive le Brudderhoud!" On that battle cry ended our march to Carson.

The "Grabo Riot"

Shortly after our "tin-canning," Wm. D. Haywood came into Louisiana on a lecture tour. He was then in the Socialist party and traveling under the auspices of the famous magazine, The International Review," of which the beloved little rebel Mary E. Marcy was editor. Haywood spoke at several points in the lumber country for the Brotherhood. Big audiences greeted him at DeRidder, Lake Charles and Merryville, all then Union strongholds, especially the last.

Just prior to Haywood's meeting in DeRidder. the Socialist party had arranged a meeting at Carson for George Creel, who was covering the South as a star reporter for The National Ripsaw, published at St. Louis and edited by Frank and Kate Richards O'Hare, Phil Wagner and Henry M. Tichenor, the great poet-agnostic. Emerson was asked to announce this meeting. Before Haywood spoke, he did so, calling it in such a manner that, should anything happen and Creel not show up, Emerson would be compelled to take his place.

Well, the "something" happened. A hotel keeper at whose joint Creel was stopping attempted to assassinate him. In his effort to escape (he was fired at twice) Creel fell off a porch and badly injured himself. Emerson had to substitute for him.

The day of the meeting came, but instead of the 12 men who met with Lehman in DeRidder about three weeks before, around 800 men, women and children showed up to take part in the march. (Emerson could always bring out more than any of the rest of us, being then "a natural born" leader of men. There was no trouble along the line of march to Carson and, there, nothing ontoward occurred except that they were also "tincanned" and prevented from being heard.

On the march back to DeRidder, which was one of the union's sub-headquarters, however, runners who had been sent ahead to spy out the land, came back and told Emerson that gunmen were laying in wait in the strip of woods, previously referred to, to "shoot up" his wagon when it appeared. To avoid trouble, Emerson ordered the marchers to swing off and enter DeRidder via the Grabo road. About 400 of the 800 followed him, the rest keeping on straight to DeRidder.

When the parade reached Grabo they halted to rest and eat lunch. After eating they decided to "hold a speaking." "Doc" Havens opened the meeting and was not interrupted, but when Emerson rose and began to talk it was only a few minutes when guns began to glaze from the office, commissary and other points on the grounds. When Emerson saw that the gunmen were going to fire, he raised his hand and cried: "No! No! Don't shoot!" But they did, firing at Emerson, determined to kill him even if they had to kill three young girls standing beside him in the wagon. One of these girls, Doris LeBlue, made one of our star witnesses in the trial. She was only 17, but bore herself so well that she made a tremendous impression on the jury.

Seeing that the fight was at last on, our boys left the wagons. At one time, according to Lehman and others, the Wobblies were being fired on from four different directions by foes much better armed than were our men. The lumber trust rushed its allied gunthugs from all the surrounding towns. But in spite of being outnumbered by better armed foes, the Wobblies held their ground and finally charged the office of the Grabo Lumber Company, driving the gunmen pellmell before them.

That ended the battle and enabled the union men to retreat to DeRidder unmolested. Once there, Emerson made a talk to the workers and advised them to go home and wait developments, refusing to lead a crowd of around 1,000 men who had gathered, demanding that he lead them in an attack on the offending lumber trust towns. This crowd milled around for some time, began a march on Bon Ami, Carson and Longville, but being without a leader, finally disbanded.

Haywood and I had gone to New Orleans. On the night of the evening of the riot he was speaking in the Odd Fellows Hall for the Socialist party. He had gotten about half way through his speech when reporters called me and told me a "terrible riot had taken place at Grabo; 15 or 16 men have been killed and an unknown number wounded."

I walked up to the stage and gave Bill the news. He quietly announced it to the audience and went on with his talk as if nothing but the expected had happened. Later on in the night, in his hotel room, he was, however, very nervous and disturbed.

As for myself, I all but collapsed, for there lay dead at Grabo two of our finest boys, Decatur Hall and Uriah Martin, the last being only 20 years old and one I loved from the jump. Good old Joe Ferro was mortally wounded, taken to Lake Charles, placed in a hospital; then when he showed signs of improvement, taken to the infamous jail to die in agony. So we lost three dead and there were many wounded, among them Louis Brown, who had been shot with a copper-jacketed bullet, a ball which poisons a wound. How many the lumber trust lost, no one ever knew, though it is certain they had more dead men than the Burns gunman Vincent, whose body they left on the battlefield in order to enable their grand jury to charge the unionists with "conspiracy to murder."

Wholesale Arrests

Starting the day following the battle, the sheriffs began rounding up the union men and their sympathizers they had long been " laying to get." As a result of this roundup, 58 lumber workers and allied working farmers were arrested and jailed. Then came the indictment. Sixty-four were indicted, but four escaped arrest, among them the famous "Leather Breeches" Smith, who was murdered later on during the trial by the notorious "deputy sheriff" gunman, Del Charlan at Merryville.

Indicted for "conspiracy to murder," with prohibitive bonds demanded for their release on bail, our boys had to lay in the foul Lake Charles jail date of the battle, July 7th, 1912, to about October 1st, when the trial began.

Their arrest, the heavy bonds demanded, and the all through the broiling Louisiana summer, from the outrageous treatment they received in prison shook the State of Louisiana from center to circumference. For weeks after Grabo the lumber country was on the verge of insurrection. No one know when a match would be thrown in "the powder magazine" and explode it. The union men worked hard to prevent this. Lehman always afterwards swore this was one of our greatest mistakes, saying, "only something like that could civilize the Lumber Barons, and we worked our fool heads off to stop it. Hell!" I'm inclined now to agree with him. So are many others. But it is too late now, for the forests are gone and the barons safe in the cities with their loot.

The Trial

Having no data with me, I must depend solely on memory, hence I cannot give any except a few exact dates. The trial, however, opened about October 1st, 1912, Judge John S. Overton presiding, but with the Burns Detectives practically running the court, directing the prosecution, or "persecution," as the Jacks insisted on calling it.

The first act of the Court was to separate Emerson, Lehman and seven others from the 58 under indictment and send them to trial as "ringleaders" of the revolt. As the 58 had been indicted under one indictment and, as under Louisiana law, only the Defense could ask for a separation, this act of Judge Overton was a flagrant violation of the legal rights of all the indicted men. Our lawyers strenuously protested the violation, but Judge Overton was adamant, saying that with the number of "peremptory challenges of jurors for cause possessed under the law by the Defense and State that a jury could not be impaneled in all Louisiana to try the 58 all in one group."

To this Judge Hunter, our leading lawyer, said: "May it please your honor, we are not responsible for the mistakes of the Prosecution." Overton admitted this and that he was violating the law, but, nonetheless ordered the nine to trial, refusing even to grant a delay of two weeks which the Defense asked to take his ruling to the Supreme Court of the State. All our lawyers could then do was to proceed with the case as best they could before a hostile Court.

That Judge Overton was hostile was shown throughout the long trial, which lasted a little over a month. Time after time he came to the assistance of the Prosecution when our lawyers had them beaten to a frazzle. One instance that showed Overton's gross partiality was when the notorious Kinney, local manager of the Burns Agency, entered the Court, took a seat at the Prosecution table with a list of all prospective jurors in Calcasieu parish, then the largest county in the United States, ready to help pick the trial jury.

Kinney was not a lawyer and, so, had no right at the table. Nonetheless, it took three long days of hot arguing before the Defense attorneys were able to force Overton to order Kinney from among the prosecutors. The man, Overton, who did his best to send our boys to the pen or the gallows then is the same Overton who is now United States Senator for Louisiana. Running for this office in 1932, he campaigned the State weeping over "the sufferings of the poor people of Louisiana," sufferings he and his kind are entirely responsible for.

The trial got under way and, throughout the month, sensation after sensation occurred. As the trial went against them the Lumber Trust and the Burns crowd went wild. They threatened the lives of all of us, going so far in this as to threaten even Judge Hunter, our leading counsel, one of the most popular lawyers in the State. They arrested C. L. Filigno, E. F. Doree and Clarence Edwards, then our ablest organizers still in the field and jailed them under a charge of "intimidating witneses," an offense the Burnsmen alone had been guilty of, but no Burnsmen were ever jailed.

They were especially after Edwards who had been greatly instrumental in gathering evidence for the Defense. Edwards' work here was truly remarkable, for, though he had never done any detective work, he put it all over Burns. The discomfited Burns agents, to excuse themselves with the Lumber Barons, got up the story that we had "hired the American Detective Agency and had 100 sleuths in the field." It was a great compliment to Fellow-worker Edwards, and he deserved it fully.

Solidarity Wins

What really won the trial for us was the magnificent solidarity shown by the entire labor movement of Louisiana and the surrounding states. For once we forgot that we were IWW's, AFL's, Railway Brotherhoods and Farmer Unionists. The entire Movement lined up behind the nine endangered men in a solid and unbreakable wall of labor, a wall that the enemy tried time after time to breach, but in vain.

General Organizer George Speed of the IWW commented on this wonderful solidarity time after time.

Repeatedly the barons sent emmissaries among the unionists whispering what the IWW "intended to do to the AFL, the Railway Brotherhoods and Farmers," which was to destroy them. But all they got was this answer: "This is no mere IWW fight. It is Class War and, by God, we know it!"

Then, in the last weeks of the trial, they sent out whisperers to discourage the unionists by urging the futility of hoping to clear the accused. "They (the nine on trial) are going to hang," they said. "We be damned if they do," emphatically answered the workers. "Well, they are sure going to the penitentiary," asserted the Burnsmen. "We be damned if they are," came back the workers. "Well, they are going to be convicted. You can't prevent that." "Maybe so," said the workers. "You can convict them. You can do anything in your rotten courts. But they are not going to hang and they are not going to the penitentiary."

"What do you mean?" asked the buffaloed Burnsmen and Barons. "Well, if you want to know," said the workers, "we mean just this: the minute we get the news of their conviction over the wires we are marching on Lake Charles with our guns and rifles, burning sawmills and lumber yards as we come. And that ain't all. God Almighty will see more Burns Detectives, Gunmen Deputies and Sawmill Managers and Lumber Barons hanging to pine trees an' telegraph poles than he ever saw in one place before in all His life. That's what we mean. Go ahead and convict them."

As this came up from the rank and file of all the unions and not down from their officers; and as the whole State was again facing insurrection, the message from the ranks up had a tremendous effect on the enemy. In the last two or three weeks of the trial they made no visible effort to convict the boys. Militant solidarity freed them, as it will yet free the Working Class.

The jury retired at last to consider its verdict. They left the courtroom about 4 or 5 o'clock in the afternoon. It was about an hour later when their verdict was given out. It was unanimous for acquittal, the jurors telling us that we need not have put a single witness on for the Defense after the Burns detectives had testified for the Prosecution; that their first, or trial ballot, had been unanimous for acquittal. Eight of the twelve jurors fraternized with us at the great meeting called in the Carpenter's Hall that night to celebrate the victory. All the unions were there. All of us had forgotten we ever belonged to anything else than the working class.

All during the trial, good old Charlie Cline was a tower of strength to the Defense and a right bower to me in publicity work.

BUTTE

By MONTANA SLIM

The “Anaconda” crushes a victim

It was in the spring of 1925. Copper mines were operating at their greatest capacity. Newcomers were pouring into Butte. Mike Finnegan, a rugged individualist from the old sod, was one of them.

He arrived in town about noon. On his face was a look of surprise and disappointment as he looked over the town from the railroad station. The town was dirty and disorderly, with old and unpainted shacks of different sizes cluttered all over.

With a suitcase in each hand he made his way up Wyoming Street and soon arrived on Broadway. He walked into a cheap hotel to get a room. There he left his suitcases and inquired about getting work in the mines. The hotel clerk told him he would have to go to the Butte Mutual Labor Bureau on Copper Street to apply for a rustling card.

At the rustling card office he met the manager, George W. Lentz. “Are you a miner?” was the first question.

“Are you an I.W.W., and do you believe in the principles of the I.W.W.?”

Finnegan said: “No, I am not.”

“Give this man a card,” said Lentz to one of his assistants.

After he had answered a few questions about his age, weight, beneficiary, etc., he was given a rustling card which read:

“This is to certify that Mr. Michael Finnegan is hereby recommended for employment by the Butte Mutual Labor Bureau.” Nine o'clock the following morning, with a rustling card in his pocket, he went to the Tramway mine to rustle for a job. About one hundred and forty men were standing in line when he got there.

For three hours he stood in the line before the foreman came to hire the men he wanted. The line moved on slowly with the foreman hiring a man from here and there, mostly picking out the men that he knew. About an hour later Mike was at the front of the line. He asked the foreman, “any show for a miner.”

“Give me your card,” said the foreman. He looked very closely at the card and when he saw that it was a new card he said, “Where have you worked in the mines?”

“In Miami, Arizona,” was the answer.

“Go sign up at the timekeeper's office right away, and come out at six o'clock tonight,” said the foreman.

That afternoon he went to the boarding houses in town and rustled up a place to eat and sleep. Around four-thirty, he ate his supper and started to the mine. There he got a locker for himself and then he went to see the assistant foreman. The assistant foreman was a big and husky two hundred pound man and he looked like a horse when he was leaning against the gallows frame.

On the Job

With a loud voice he said to the Irishman, “Go down to thirty-one hundred into O five stope.”

The Iristman waited at the shaft until the station tender yelled, "Thirty-one hundred." He stepped into the cage and went down over three thousand feet into the "richest hill in the world."

On thirty-one hundred the cage came to a stop. Mike got off the cage and went to fill up his water sack and at the same time inquired about O five stope. The miners told him to ask the "jigger boss" about it. He went over to the jigger boss and said "Where is O five stope?"

The jigger boss said, "Come on I'll take you up there." They started along the main line and Mike began to feel kind of warm. Mike told the jigger boss, "Jesus, but it's not down here."

"This isn't anything yet," said the jigger boss, "but wait till you get your working place and you'll know what heat is."

They walked along the hot drift for about fifteen minutes before they got to their destination. When they finally got there, the first thing Mike did was to pour sweat out of his boots.

"You'll find the powder house and the toilet car along that drift," said the jigger boss, pointing with his hand toward another drift going off at an angle from the one that they were in.

Mike peeled off pretty near all of his clothes except his under shirt and overalls. Then he started the climb of seven floors to the stope. The manway was so hot that Mike almost suffocated before he got into the stope. When he finally got there he sat in front of the fan bag to cool off and get his wind back. (A fan bag is a rubberized tubing used to blow cold air into the stopes).

He sat in the stope for awhile and was pretty well cooled off when his partner came in. Mike went up to the stranger and introduced himself. They talked for a while about themselves and Mike found out that his partner was Slavonian. He was a husky little chap for his size, probably weighed around one hundred forty pounds and he was about five feet six inches tall.

The usual custom in the mines is that one man drills one day and the other man drills the next day, so these two men decided that Mike would drill today and the Slavonian would muck. The Slav gave a few instructions to his new partner: "The 'widow maker' is out there and you can get some oil from the station."

"What is a widow maker?" Mike asked in his surprise.

"I guess you haven't worked on this hill before," said the Slavonian. He explained that the widow maker was a rotator buzzy used to drill holes in the stopes and it made lots of widows.

Mike started the long journey to the station again to get some oil. He was cursing in the heat. "How in the hell can that little runt stand this heat?" He made the trip to the station and his clothes were all soaking wet when he got back to the stope. He was somewhat amazed at the little Slav, because he wouldn't even stop to get his wind but just kept on mucking in that terrible heat.

After considerable swearing and sweating and after breaking a few bits and steel, Mike got a couple holes in the ore. Just as he was trying to pry out steel that had stuck in the hole, the shifter happened to come into the stope.

"What the hell kind of a miner are you when you stick a steel in ground like this?" he bellowed.

"I can't help it if they stick. This machine is that worn out that it won't give enough water."

"Well if you don't get that round in and blast you can go up and drag 'er," said the shift boss as he left the place.

Mike got pretty busy when he heard this and he kept pounding away with his widow maker. The Slav was a little wiser for he didn't work quite so hard. At noon the mucker had the muck all cleaned out even though he wasn't in so much of a hurry as Mike. Mike had twelve holes drilled when the Slav hollered to him, "Lunch time, Mike!"

They climbed down to the sill to eat their lunch. They rustled a few dry laggings and ate their lunch and then they laid down to take their afternoon nap.

The men woke up as they heard the motor crew came to pull the chutes about a half an hour later. Back into the stope they climbed for three more hours of hard work. At the end of the shift they had the holes drilled, loaded, and one set of timber was standing. At four o'clock sharp they spit the holes and started for the station. On their way to the station they met the shifter.

"Did you get that round in?" he asked.

"Yep—we did," answered Mike.

At the station the men were shivering from the cold because their clothes were all wet. They had to wait for about a half an hour before the cage came to hoist them to the surface. Once again on surface after a hard day's work, the men dragged their weary bodies to the dryhouse to take a shower and change into their dry clothes.

After a good hot supper Mike went straight to his room and slept like a log until the alarm clock began its "sweet chimes." He dreaded the idea of going into that hole again but he thought it would be the only thing he could do under the circumstances.

With his appetite pleased with hotcakes he started the one mile walk to the mine. In the dryhouse he began to feel disgusted again as he took his diggers from the locker and they were stiff from the sweat. The other miners gave him some good advice on how to keep them from getting that way. They said, "Wash them good every night and they will be a lot better to put on in the morning."

In the lamp house the shifter said, "Get the muck out and put in two sets of timber and a fourth steel round."

"Blowing In"

For several days the men kept on working this way. On a Tuesday the measure man came to measure the place. He cheated a quite a bit when he measured it but just the same the men had twelve hundred feet for breaking, eleven hundred and fifty for mucking and eight hundred feet for timbering.

That evening the two miners looked at the "Ouija board" to see what they had made on their contract. Contract A 84 showed seven dollars and seventy-four cents. When Mike saw this he said, "By golly it pays to work hard for that much money."

The following Friday was pay day. Mike went to the pay office with his pay slip and got his check. He wandered along Park street wondering where he should cash his check. At the swinging doors of the Crown he stopped and decided that he would cash his check here.

"Care to have a drink," said the bartender.

"Well maybe it wouldn't hurt me," said Mike as he strolled over to the crowded bar. He took a drink and then he noticed his partner at the bar and yelled, "Hey you! Come over and have a drink with me, Pete."

"Sure, said Pete as he came staggering toward Mike.

They stood at the bar until the wee hours of the morning taking a drink every now and then, and then they would try their luck on the tables only to lose a few dollars of their hard earned money at every attempt to win a little.

It was three o'clock when Mike left the saloon for the "Rose Garden" to see the "girls." He finally got to the "garden," and there he started talking kind of loud. After a few minutes of yelling in the "garden" a cop came along and picked up Mike and brought him to the station.

"Ten days," said the judge at the hearing on the following morning.

Mike served his ten days and vowed that he would never again get drunk. On a Monday morning Mike got out of the can and he went straight to the mine office to see if his time was still good. But the timekeeper said, "She's in."

Feeling kind of downhearted as he heard this, Mike began to stroll toward the card office. The big shot at the card office said, "What was wrong with the place when you quit so soon?"

"The place was good but I started drinking and the shifter turned my time in," said Mike bowing his head in shame.

"Well that's O. K. Here is your card, go and rustle yourself another job."

For several weeks Mike kept this up. He worked for about a week or until the next pay day and then he would drink for a while again. Finally one morning when he went after his rustling card, he was called into the "Kangaroo court."

Outside of the courtroom he had to wait while they kangarooed another victim. Mike was sitting close to the door and he happened to hear every word that was said during the trial in the courtroom.

"Why did you quit your last job?" demanded the manager.

"It was too damn hot and the shifter was a helluva guy," said the miner.

"Why did you quit all your other jobs?"

"Because every one of those places was so damn rotten that a man couldn't work in them," was the answer.

"You are a member of the IWW aren't you?" demanded the big shot.

"I have been for the last twelve years," said the Wobbly.

"Well get this straight; you don't have to come here for your card anymore. This company doesn't want any of you damn IWW's around. You're blacklisted! Get out!" yelled the manager.

Mike began to get kind of shaky when they called out his name but just the same he went in the courtroom. "You quit your job four times this month, didn't you?" was the first question he was asked.

"Yes," answered Mike in an unsteady voice.

"Why did you quit so often? Are you one of those IWW's that aren't satisfied with their places, too?" said the manager.

Slave's Reward

"I got drunk every pay day and the shifter would always turn my time in," answered Mike.

"Well you're all right. Here's your card. Next case," yelled the big shot. Mike went out feeling that he was damned lucky not to be a Wobbly.

The years slowly passed and Mike kept on working in the mines and going on his benders every week-end. Once in a while he would hurt himself and that would make him stay sober for a while. He began losing weight pretty fast and his face kept on getting paler as the years went by.

It was eleven years after he had come to Butte that he went to the hospital for a thorough examination. "You have the miner's consumption," said the doctor, "and I would advise you that you take it very easy the rest of your life."

Mike was sitting in an easy chair in his room with his life slowly ebbing away. He was thinking about things, chewing the cud of his memory. The day he went to the Kangaroo Court flashed before him. He remembered how the Wobbly had been blacklisted, and how lucky he had felt that he wasn't one of them. He coughed for all that the doctor had told him not to. "Damn it," he asked himself, "Who was it that was lucky that day—the fellow that got blacklisted or the fellow who didn't?"

THE STORY OF THE SANDHOG

By Harry Monkkonen

A tall, rawboned shift boss stood leaning over the railing around the mouth of the shaft, waiting for the cage to come up. When it was hauled level, the first mud-dripping miner stepped on the ground, inhaled some fresh air, and announced enthusiastically: "Did we ever make the footage!"

"How many feet this shift, Jack?"

"Plenty. Enough to beat every miner from here to the coast," proudly boasted the sandhog, wiping the sweat off his face and coughing violently.

"Wait till my crew gets down there. Watch their smoke!" replied the foreman, and sauntered over to the dryhouse.

This was my first sight of a tunnel job. I looked at the sandhogs and wondered how life was deep underground. Now, I had a chance to see, for tonight was to be my first time down the sewer. I went over to the dryhouse to get my slicker.

"All set? Well, get goin', you sewer-rats!" The gawd-all-mighty foreman was speaking.

Thirty miners came trooping out of the dryhouse, grim smiles on their lips. They wore overalls. Their legs were encased in long hip-boots that made a thudding sound as they walked towards the shaft. Their heads were helmeted with red metal hats gleaming in the spotlight that shone from the roof of the compressor house.

The men were of all races. Most of them were short and squarely built. Their teeth flashed out of the gloom of their faces as they laughed and kidded each other.

I was in the second cage. "I forgot to say good-bye to Ma," laughed one, a stout, powerful man with a merry dark face and little eyes. Another man smiled and proudly stuck out his hairy chest, "Footage—or bust!"

In a few moments the cage stopped; we had reached the bottom of the tunnel. Here the crew separated. Some went towards the east lock and others to the west lock, for the tunnel was being mined in two directions. I was to go to the east lock. The cage creaked up and down like an old oaken bucket until all the men were hauled down. We paused for a short time while the lock tender decompressed the air lock. The air chamber was fifteen feet high, fifteen feet wide, and eighteen feet long. Whew! That lock tender was decompressing the air lock in a hurry—the doctor said twenty seconds flat, when it should have taken from three to five minutes.

"Hi gang!" he greeted us.

We piled into the air lock and closed the door.

"Everyone ready?" The tender's hoarse voice cracked, and with a quick jerk he released the air, his eyes intently watching each sandhog. And too, every sandhog was watching every other, waiting to see if his companion was fortunate enough to get through the lock. Some of the men held their noses and blew to keep their ears open while others stood there calmly and swallowed frequently. I remembered how terrified I was when the air was released.

"Better watch yerself, kid" a man close to me said. "Ef yer ears clog, maka squawk."

"Why?" I asked, blowing my nose several times.

"Vell, ya ain't goin' to get through that vay. Ef dey plug up, dey hurt."

One man next to me seemed to have that trouble. "Fer God's sake, turn the damn thing off!" he yelled.

The lock tender shut off the air valve. All eyes were focused upon the man. He held his nose and blew; he swallowed and gave a few short, violent kicks. No use. He was stuck. He shook his head at the tender who turned his valve to decrease the pressure. Some one yelled: "Git the 'ell out of here, you jelly-fish! Cream puff!" When the tank was completely decompressed again, the man walked out. A doctor was waiting for him outside to take him up to the surface and give him immediate treatment.

The door was closed again. The tender proceeded to release the air. This time all were fortunate in getting through.

On the average it took from two to three minutes to be completely compressed, if no trouble arose among the men. But due to the dampness in the lock when the men are decompressed many catch colds which cause some trouble. If a sandhog had even the slightest headcold the company forbade him to enter the air lock. The air pressure in the tunnel was approximately twelve pounds. When the pressure in the lock equaled the pressure in the tunnel, the door leading into the tunnel automatically opened.

When we reached the heading, the night crews evinced the joy of relief that their shift was at end. They greeted us, laid down their tools, and began hustling back to the lock.

"Let's try like hell to beat the other crew's record," bellowed the shift boss.

It was pitiful to see how those scissorbills reacted to the bosses' propaganda and how they strove for greater footage than that of the crew that preceded them.

Hitting the Highball

The Walter W. Magee Construction Company had the contract, and theirs was a "highball" system. We went on shift for eight hours. There were three shifts in this tunnel. The morning shift started at 8:00 A. M., and came off at 4:00 P. M.; the night at 4:00 and off at 12:00 P. M. The shift I was on, the "graveyard shift," started at 12:00 and knocked off when the morning shift came on at 8:00. Every two weeks we changed shifts and there had to be a re-learning of all our appetites and physiological functions.

My working partner called me to come up to the heading. He was huge and strong, with great tattooed fists and arms. His bull neck supported a hard, weather-beaten face. His mass of hair was white and wild as spray. He said he was a German.

"You'll neffer make the record mit all dat standin' 'round," he told me.

It was all hustle and bustle in the heading. It was a continual round of "highball." After the miners were finished running the hammers, the muckers came in and bedlam was let loose. Everyone was running around like mad, looking out for greater production. The bosses did not have to say a word; the slaves were out for a record. All grabbed their tools, compressed air power drills, jackhammers, jacks, and shovels and began work in earnest. The miners slaved hard to break the record for the number of "plates" put on in one shift; the muckers wrenched their backs to get out more cars of muck than the previous shift.

After I had been working two weeks, the company put on a contest to see how many plates each miner could put on per shift. A month later they put the bonus system in effect. To get the bonus the workers had to mine more footage than the amount set by the company. They cared nothing about killing themselves—they were out for a bonus. They were unable to see that speed-up competition between shifts was just another way of gouging profits from their hides. They fell over each other trying to be the first done. They cared not a damn about their health. Despite the fact that there was only twelve pounds of compressed air on this job, the effects on the workers were disastrous. That seemed not to bother the slaves any, for they continued to work after they had contracted the "bends," or even after their ears had clogged. Pain meant nothing to them but the bonus did!

After a man had put eight hours in this badly ventilated tunnel (hot air was all one breathed) he felt as if he had just come through a wringer. In the tunnel there was invariably a lot of dust that the sand-hog "ate." The company preferred the dry-hammer method. Every movement of the hammer, every explosion (if there were any) stirred up sand rock, and made more dust. Even the cars that ran up and down carrying muck and sand rock on very narrow tracks stirred up dust in their passage. The mucker, shovelling sand into the cars, raised clouds of dust. All this was in a confined space, and practically choked the workers.

After Shift

After the shift was over we entered the lock again and were decompressed. We shuffled out of the lock, our faces black as sinister masks, our bodies dripping sweat, and stooped in weary curves. We went to the wash-house and washed off the dirt and mud. They had a bulletin board with a chart depicting the progress made each day in the tunnels. I could see some of the apes run over to see what the other shifts had done and a look of consternation came over their faces when they saw that they did not have as many feet as the others.

Many times I had come off shift at 8:00 A. M. with a raging headache, my ears ringing, and spots dancing before my eyes. When I arrived home, my trouble started. When I sat down to breakfast (and how I love to eat) my appetite was not there. When I drank my coffee it was like sipping turpentine. The ham and eggs tasted like roots garnished with sand.

Bonus or Death?

Two months later while on shift duty, a man next to me began to cough very violently and keeled over. An emergency call was sent to the doctor. The man was taken into the lock, revived, and then decompressed and brought to the surface. No one knew what was the trouble with him. After the shift was put in, I sauntered over to the doctor's office to inquire about the man who had fainted.

"Doc, what was the matter with Joe?" I asked.

"I don't quite know as yet, Harry. He might have silicosis."

"What's that?"

"All underground workers have silicosis or miner's consumption to some degree. That is not true tuberculosis, though the symptoms are similar. It is merely an accumulation in the lung tissue of quantities of fine sand particles which have sliced through the walls of the air passages. Silicosis paves the way for, and invariably induces, true tuberculosis, sooner or later, unless the man quits his job."

"Well, can't anything be done to prevent the sand particles from entering the lungs?"

"Yes, to some extent. Some companies, Butler Brothers for instance, provide the workers with respirators. But even these are insufficient to keep the fine dust out."

I talked with the doctor for some time. I learned some other facts regarding tunnel construction work. Men, particularly in the heading, worked in cramped positions and in very bad light. Miners' nyastagmus, a disease of the eyes, and also a trembling of the face and hands, was prevalent.

This is the life of the sandhog. The hoosiers are more than willing to meet any sort of catastrophy. They are eager to enter the tunnel and to slave for their masters. Few sandhogs have a social outlook. They are all out to beat their fellow workers and get more bonus for themselves.

What should be done?

A powerful union could easily force higher wages from the companies, and also force installation of dust-laying devices and better ventilation in the tunnels. If the miners made a powerful union of the General Construction Workers Industrial Union 310 of the IWW they could do much. High wages (miners got $10.95 and muckers got $7.70, but living was expensive), and abolition of contract work, would wipe out many of the evils the tunnel workers suffer.

They need a fight. At present, their first need is sound organization. The union which exists among the miners, muckers and other sewer workers does not afford even the protection of its name to as much as five per cent of the workers. No wonder—it is the American Federation of Labor. This organization has been organizing the sewer workers in the St. Paul-Minneapolis unit. Despite their success in some instances in raising wages and shortening the hours, it has clearly proven that it has not the power to protect and preserve those wages. Is it any wonder? It is not a rank and file organization.

Here is an instance to prove that this union is not a real labor union, but an organization controlled by the bosses and the union officials. On one job in St. Paul the workers went out on strike for higher wages. In the height of the strike, when workers had shown that they had the power to win, the AF of L officials secretly signed an agreement with the contractors, settling at the company's wage scale. The union's officialdom ordered the workers to go back to work. When labor's solidarity was at its peak, it was knifed in the back by AF of L scabbery.

They need direct action. These workers can be organized into the One Big Union of the IWW. Right now they are divided by craft pride or skill. These divisions, the speed-up competitions and antagonism toward nationalities, cannot be kept alive forever. A little energetic agitating—and who knows?

A PRAYER TO LUCIFER

By Covami

God of Light Bearers, known of old,
God of the Rebels, free and bold,
Sound forth thy trumpet! Let us hear
Its silver notes ring far and clear!

In this stricken, slave-cursed world,
Let now thy thunderbolts be hurled;
In freedom's name, for truth and right,
God of my fathers, hurl the light!

Send out once more thy clarion call,
"Life to the brave! Death to the thrall!"
God of the Rebels, lead thine own,—
Behold the Bond Lord on thy throne!

Breathe on them thy mighty breath;
To mutiny stir the doomed to death;
To revolution or their graves,
God of my fathers, call his slaves!

From liberty's unconquered halls,
From out their grand and rugged walls,
In freedom's name, for truth and right,
God of the Rebels, hurl the light!

REVOLUTION WITH MUSIC

By BILL NIEMI

Every work of art, everything of beauty created by man expresses revolt, even though it be unconsciously, against the ugliness and injustice of his social system.

"All art is propaganda. It is universally and inescapably propaganda; sometimes unconsciously, but often deliberately, propaganda."—Upton Sinclair.

The Standard Dictionary defines propaganda, "Effort directed systematically toward the gaining of support for an opinion or course of action." Therefore, isn't all art prapaganda? Certainly it is the aim of every artist to have his fellow men approve of, and support the opinion, course of action, or idea he tries to portray, in whatever manner he interprets it, be it through music, painting, poetry, or writing.

In the field of music we have had very efficient propagandists in the persons of Beethoven, Bach, Mozart, Wagner, Verdi, and many others. They were artists who saw injustice but were not, in many cases, free to fight against it by means other than music.

Perhaps the most famous of all music centers is Vienna. In the beginning of the nineteenth century it was a "Vienna of discreet conversations, of toned down pleasures, and grey rococco palaces in which there always seemed to be dwelling a mystery," says Richard Specht in his "Beethoven, As He Lived."

It was Emperor Franz's Vienna. Franz was a tyrant who made Vienna into the gloomiest police state in the world. The spy and the informer prospered, and the narrow-minded censorships suppressed all who dared come out with the truth. The police censorship always "knew best," and drastically punished those who ventured a word against the existing order of government. Painters and writers either prostituted their art or lived in solitude, or perhaps mildly satisfied their feelings by limitedly burlesquing some of the less important events of the day. There were some who turned to music and used that as a safety valve for the inner feelings and emotions they weren't free to express otherwise, for with music they were able to express everything they felt. Deep mysteries were transferred to the staffs of music paper, as were the satires and mimicries of the king's court and the political merry-go-round. Through this outlet they tried to arouse the people to demand the rights and pleasures they were entitled to but did not enjoy.

To this terrific political pressure Specht attributes Vienna's fame as a musical center. Counter-pressure against the deadening authorities led to the encouragement of music. It obviously could not be that all painters, writers, and artists that were not musicians turned to music, but those who were able to, found freedom of expression in music—and music as a whole was thus encouraged.

Those that could, heard in the works of Bach and Mozart the suppressed truth, and "had anybody at that time had the eyes to look on Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in this way, and to realize its whole revolutionary power, its vehement call to fight for liberty and humanity, and its challenging cry of victory—he would the very next day have suffered arrest or exile."

Richard Wagner was openly a revolutionist. Wagner first tried pushing reform measures to right the wrong, but he soon recognized its obvious impossibility, and to him there seemed to be nothing left but revolution. In his book "Opera and Drama" Wagner says, "I do not consider true art possible until politics cease to exist," and he chose revolution as the course to make politics cease. However, he did not limit himself merely to his genius in writing basically revolutionary music. He became an active revolutionist and a member of secret societies. Before one of these societies Wagner delivered a fiery address which was printed as a newspaper "extra." "In it he demanded, besides general suffrage, nothing less than the complete abolishment of the aristocracy as well as of the standing army." (Finck: "Wagner and His Works"). He also took part in street fights and only by flight escaped a long prison sentence.

Needless to say, Wagner's work suffered greatly during his time. The immortal "Tannhauser" was not performed in Paris until twelve years after the time it was first offered. In Berlin, "Tannhauser" was refused for being "too epic." For "Lohengrin" he had to wait forty-two years.

Preparations were being made to show 'Rienzi" for the King of Prussia's birthday, and when Wagner arrived to superintend rehearsals he was greeted in a lukewarm manner. The local press then began to make personal attacks and injurious insinuations. "Rienzi" was foredoomed. Certain political catchwords such as "liberty," 'fraternity," and the like were censored by the management and finally the opera was postponed until a more suitable time—when the court did not attend. The opera made a tremendous hit with the miscellaneous people composing the large audience, but the popularity lasted only for the day, for no one influential enough to make the performance a 'success" was present. Even the "General-Musikdirector" thought it fit to leave town just for this occasion.

Often when his works (which he had to publish himself, assisted financially by a close friend) were sent to producers they were mailed back without even being opened. On some occasions hirelings were spread throughout the audience during a Wagner opera to hoot and ridicule the performers and the opera.

And thus was his art received—art coming from the pen of a revolutionist.

When Verdi's "Rigoletto" was about to be put on, the police ordered certain phrases in the libretto to be changed and they said that the performance could not go on unless the king in the opera was changed into some other character. The King was made into a duke of a petty town and the undesired phrases were left out; the opera turned out to be a big hit.

Orsini attempted his bombing of Napoleon and wife when the rehearsals were under way on Verdi's "Gustavo III." Verdi received orders again from the police. This time he was told to adapt his music to entirely different words. At first, when he refused, a revolution nearly broke out in Naples. People were parading the streets and gathering under Verdi's window shouting "Viva Verdi!" (Italians take opera as much to heart as Americans take baseball). Finally he was persuaded to rewrite the libretto, and he rechristened it "Masked Ball." As a result this turned out to be one of his greatest successes.

These few instances summarized here serve to give some idea of the part the great masters of music have played in trying to rouse the masses into fighting injustice. Surely their work was nothing but propaganda, and undoubtedly other composers of that period tried to pervert the truth by glorifying and immortalizing the rulers so that the people would look upon them with awe. Ironically enough, the works of Beethoven and Wagner reached the class of people against whom these artists produced their propaganda more than the class they sought to arouse. People of the latter class sacrificed a great deal when they climbed into the "garlic gallery" to enjoy the more profound work of artists. Because of economic conditions, their work could not possibly reach the great masses as did the songs composed to divert the minds of the people from the truth, songs written to stir the emotions of the people and make hem cry for battle, songs justifying conquest and wars where millions were killed, but out of which only a few, not "over there," profited by.

"It was Napoleon who said that if he could write a country's songs he would not care who wrote its laws."

Still, artists like Beethoven and Wagner worked under tremendous pressure, and if they did not succeed in overthrowing their oppressors, they at least produced unsurpassed works of art in the attempts.

They also, with music, tried to "Fan The Flames Of Discontent."

Mary Marcy on the CIO

The late Mary Marcy, one of the foremost of American economists, must have had visions of the CIO in her early days, for in the Industrial Union Bulletin of November 16, 1907, she has a little poem, entitled "OUR LEADER."

There was a College Graduate
Who had a Noble Brow;
We thought that he knew Everything,
Was It!
It!
It!

He said that if he hadn't come
To teach the workers HOW
We never should have progressed
A little BIT!
Bit!
Bit!

He volunteered to LEAD us
And he handed him the job.
He wanted so to Help
The Cause ALONG!
Along!
Long!

And he wrote a little booklet
And sold it to the Mob,
And showed us where "the Plutocrats
Were Wrong!"
Wrong!
Wrong!

And so our Leader pondered
With proud and thoughtful mien
Devising ways and thinking out
A PLAN!
Plan!
Plan!

No lines were writ so closely
That he couldn't read BETWEEN
As a really, truly, GENIUS Always CAN!
Can!
Can!

One day he went a-walking
In his absent-minded way,
A-thinking of a speech he had
In VIEW!
View!
View!

On a lonely railroad crossing
'Twas a passing freight, they say
That cut his Massive Cerebellum Right in TWO!
Two!
Two!

I thought the sun would darken
And daylight turn to Night
And I didn't hope for Pay Day
Any More,
More!
More!

But we found we didn't need him
To Sit and Boss the Fight,
And our Wages were nine-fifty
As Before,
Fore!
Fore!

The Wheels kept on revolving
And the Factory Whistle blew,
And our Stomachs forced us ever
In the Game!
Game!
Game!

The sun is really shining,
And it's quite a comfort too,
With the Struggle going onward
Just the Same!
Same!
Same!

THE NEXT HUNDRED YEARS

By C. C. FURNAS

Reynal and Hitchcock—$3.00

"The Next Hundred Years" by C. C. Furnas is not only an interesting story on science's work in the past, and its "unfinished business," but an achievement in literary humor as well. Furnas is a professor of chemical engineering at the Sheffield Scientific School, Yale University. He is an experienced technician, and one possessed of a social outlook. He sees the advantages as well as the disadvantages of a machine civilization, and is much concerned, in the way professors sometimes get concerned, with what man will do with his leisure in a new society.

"The replacement of men by machines has only begun. I am all for the machine, and I am certain that eventually it will reach its fullest possible development, that the mountainous social problems will be solved and that the world will be an infinitely more satisfactory place in which to live because of it. We are a long way from that now and are progressing with disgusting slowness. We have never learned to synchronize the purpose of our lives with the purpose of the machines. The purpose of the machines, if they have any, is to do more things and to do them more quickly than would be possible without them, but they are merely used to make more money or as weapons to beat the other fellow. The problem is one of adjustment. It is one of the Things Undone; one of the Big Things to do," writes Furnas.

And in writing of eugenics, he notes pointedly, "competent investigators estimate that it takes at least 30 generations to establish a true-breeding strain of definite characteristics in anything as complicated as animals. If we go back 30 generations we are looking into the Crusades. Were Peter the Hermit, Walter the Penniless, Somebody the Shirtless, who were the acknowledged leaders of that time, competent to predict the type of men needed in the twentieth century? Perhaps they would have done better than chance has done, but I have a feeling that if they had had eugenic authority we would now have more Billy Sundays in our midst than we could absorb."

Furnas may not be as daring as Veblen in his conclusions but he has the edge on Veblen for humor. But Furnas' work is full of revolutionary implications, make no mistake about that. He has been the champion of the two-hour working day or the twelve hour week for several years now, and advances some sound arguments for its possible realization, even though he laughs while he argues.—Trochet.

PROLETARIAN JOURNEY

By FRED E. BEAL

Hillman-Curl—$2.50

Far too many books there are extolling Russian Five Year Plans that get completed in three years, and it is refreshing to come upon a tome that fearlessly informs us that all is not rosy in Russia. "Proletarian Journey" is just such a refreshingly informative book. It is the autobiography of Fred E. Beal, erstwhile Communist, who first came into prominence in the labor movement as a publicity writer during the Sacco-Vanzetti trial. In the spring of 1929 Beal was thrust more prominently into view by his activity in the textile strike that took place in the little mill town of Gastonia in North Carolina.

Beal and six others were arrested, tried and sentenced for the death of Police Chief Aderholt who died in his attempt to rout pickets from their tent colony. The decision of the court was appealed on the grounds that the seven convicted were sentenced to serve from seventeen to twenty years not because of the crime it was alleged they committed, but because of the radical reputations they were said to bear.

While out on bond pending decision on the appeal, Beal and his colleagues skipped off to Russia where they thought their radical reputations would place them in good stead.

After four years in Russia, Beal returned to the United States to write criticisms he couldn't utter in Stalinland where free speech and open forums are as scarce as baby teeth in the oral cavity of an octogenarian. His writing brought threats from the Communist Party of America, a body whom he feared more than the police who were sniffing his trail.

"Proletarian Journey" is a good cathartic for those radicals who still suffer from mental indigestion caused by a monotonous diet of Leninist-Stalinist-Trotskyist theory regarding the "dictatorship of the proletariat." It will rob them of their illusion that the state will "wither away" once it comes under the domination of such a dictatorship. It will show them plainly enough that Stalin's regime belongs unequivocally in the category of other totalitarian dictatorships that are not disguised with socialistic labels.

It is not difficult to understand why workers who have wrought a revolution in a technologically backward country must sacrifice their desires for a higher standard of living in order to lay aside surpluses needed to create greater productive capacity, but what is dificult to appreciate is that in a country arrogating to itself the labels of socialism, the workers have so little to say about what they shall produce and how they shall live, even after they have achieved an industrial productive capacity that rivals the world. Social control of the means to produce is a farce in Russia, if it is not a lie.

Such studies of Russia as "Proletarian Journey," however subjective, offer a warning to American workers that the road to economic freedom is not through the treacherous and soggy cowpaths of the "dictatorship of the proletariat," but along the broad highways of rank and file industrial unionism.—Trochet.

THE GANDY DANCERS

By GRAHAM ROBINSON

Two ragged individuals walked into an employment shark's office. Outside banners announced that good jobs could be had if you had the cash. Groups of idle men were standing on the sidewalk talking about how bad conditions were.

"Yes, sir, would you boys like to ship out on an extra gang?" asked a heavy-set man behind the counter. "It's a steady job and the fare is free."

The two men each planked down a silver dollar at the request of the shark, and without any further questions signed their names in a book. They were each handed a ticket and told to be at the depot at 7 o'clock that evening.

"I just got to get a job of some kind, Slim," said Joe as he tightened up his belt another notch. "I can't keep the wrinkles out of my stomach on coffee an'."

When they arrived at the depot they found a motley array of men loaded down with packsacks, bedrolls, and bags. They were herded into a passenger coach and were soon off on their journey.

Early in the morning the train came to a halt, and the conductor hollered "All out!" They were met by a bullcook who had directed them over to the camp which consisted of a string of boxcars with doors and windows. After running around and waking up all the men in camp, they finally found the empty bunks and were soon asleep.

They were awakened in a few hours by the clanging of iron, and everybody got up for breakfast. Soon a large bunch of men were lining up in front of the dining cars. When the gong rang there was a scramble to get in at the chuck. The men were grabbing right and left and hollering at the flunkies for more chuck. Nothing was left for those who came in late to eat. The flunkies were nearly running their legs off to satisfy the hungry men.

After breakfast the foreman blew a whistle and all the men climbed on the speeder. After a ride of a few miles they arrived at the place for work. Immediately there was a rush to grab the smallest shovels.

During the morning the new men were so anxious to be at work again that they did not notice the boss continually looking down their necks and telling them to hurry up. He was probably thinking of the bonus he would get for doing the most work.

When the day's work was over the men spent their evening loafing around the bunk cars. Two gandies were talking:

"Well I guess that fellow that slept in the top bunk had his stake made. He left for town this morning. Shorty, the fellow that slept underneath him blew his top on the job this afternoon and walked in from the job."

"Well Joe, this outfit is sure haywire."

"I'll say it is. They get you on the job half an hour early, and bring you home half an hour late, so that they will be sure that you do a good day's work."

"This rotten chuck has put my stomach on the bum. The hotcakes are like sweatpads, and the beef is like shoeleather. To make milk they put one can of milk into five gallons of water."

"Well Slim, you can't expect much from jungle cooks who have to cook in a kitchen that looks more like a blacksmith's shop."

"Say, Joe, do you know that the company takes about half of our paycheck. This bunk car is too crowded, and the blankets are all lousy and ragged. Is it any wonder that these guys blow their money in for booze when they go to town?"

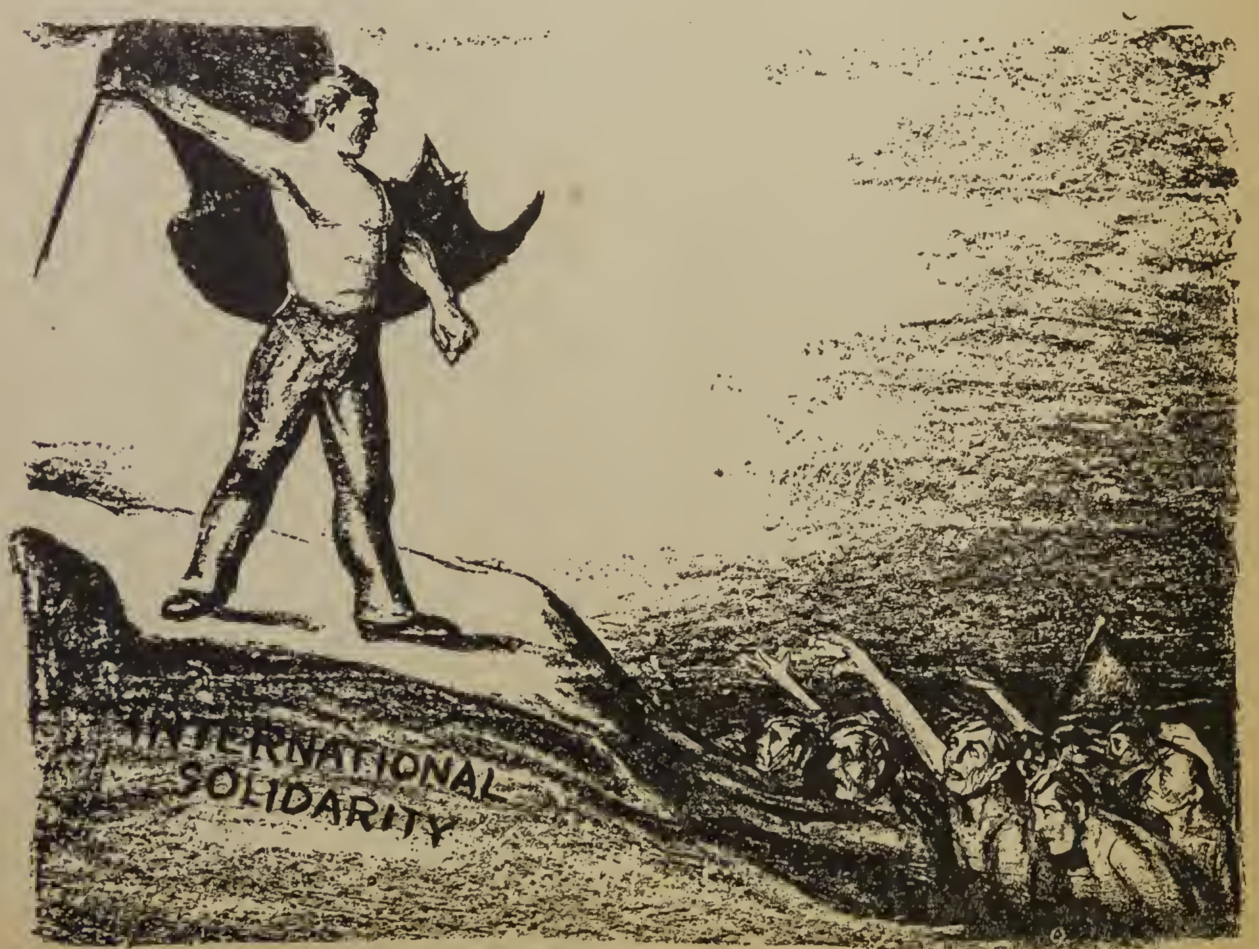
"Well Slim, I know this outfit is haywire, but I'm only going to stay here for a few days, just long enough to make a ten dollar bill. I guess it will take me nine days to make that. Then I'll go to town and get a good job. I wouldn't be out here, only I blew my last stake in with the bartender and the Chinaman, and I forgot to buy myself some new clothes."

"Yes, that's why this outfit is no good. You fellows come out here and complain about the conditions to the man next to you but when the boss comes around you keep quiet. Then you quit and say that you are never going to come back to one of these gandy outfits again. Quitting a job does not make it any better. The only thing to do is to stick to the job and organize."

"Well, Slim, some of those I.W.W.'s were around here last week, and they tried to organize the men, but I told them that they were not strong enough, and that they couldn't organize these hoosiers. But they got my sympathy, and if they get strong enough, I think I'll join them."

"Well, Joe, I think the only thing to do is to join now, don't you think so?"

"You had better blow out the light and let's hit the hay, we got a hard day's work ahead of us tomorrow."



Preamble of the Industrial Workers of the World

The working class and the employing class have nothing in common. There can be no peace so long as hunger and want are found among millions of working people and the few, who make up the employing class, have all the good things of life.

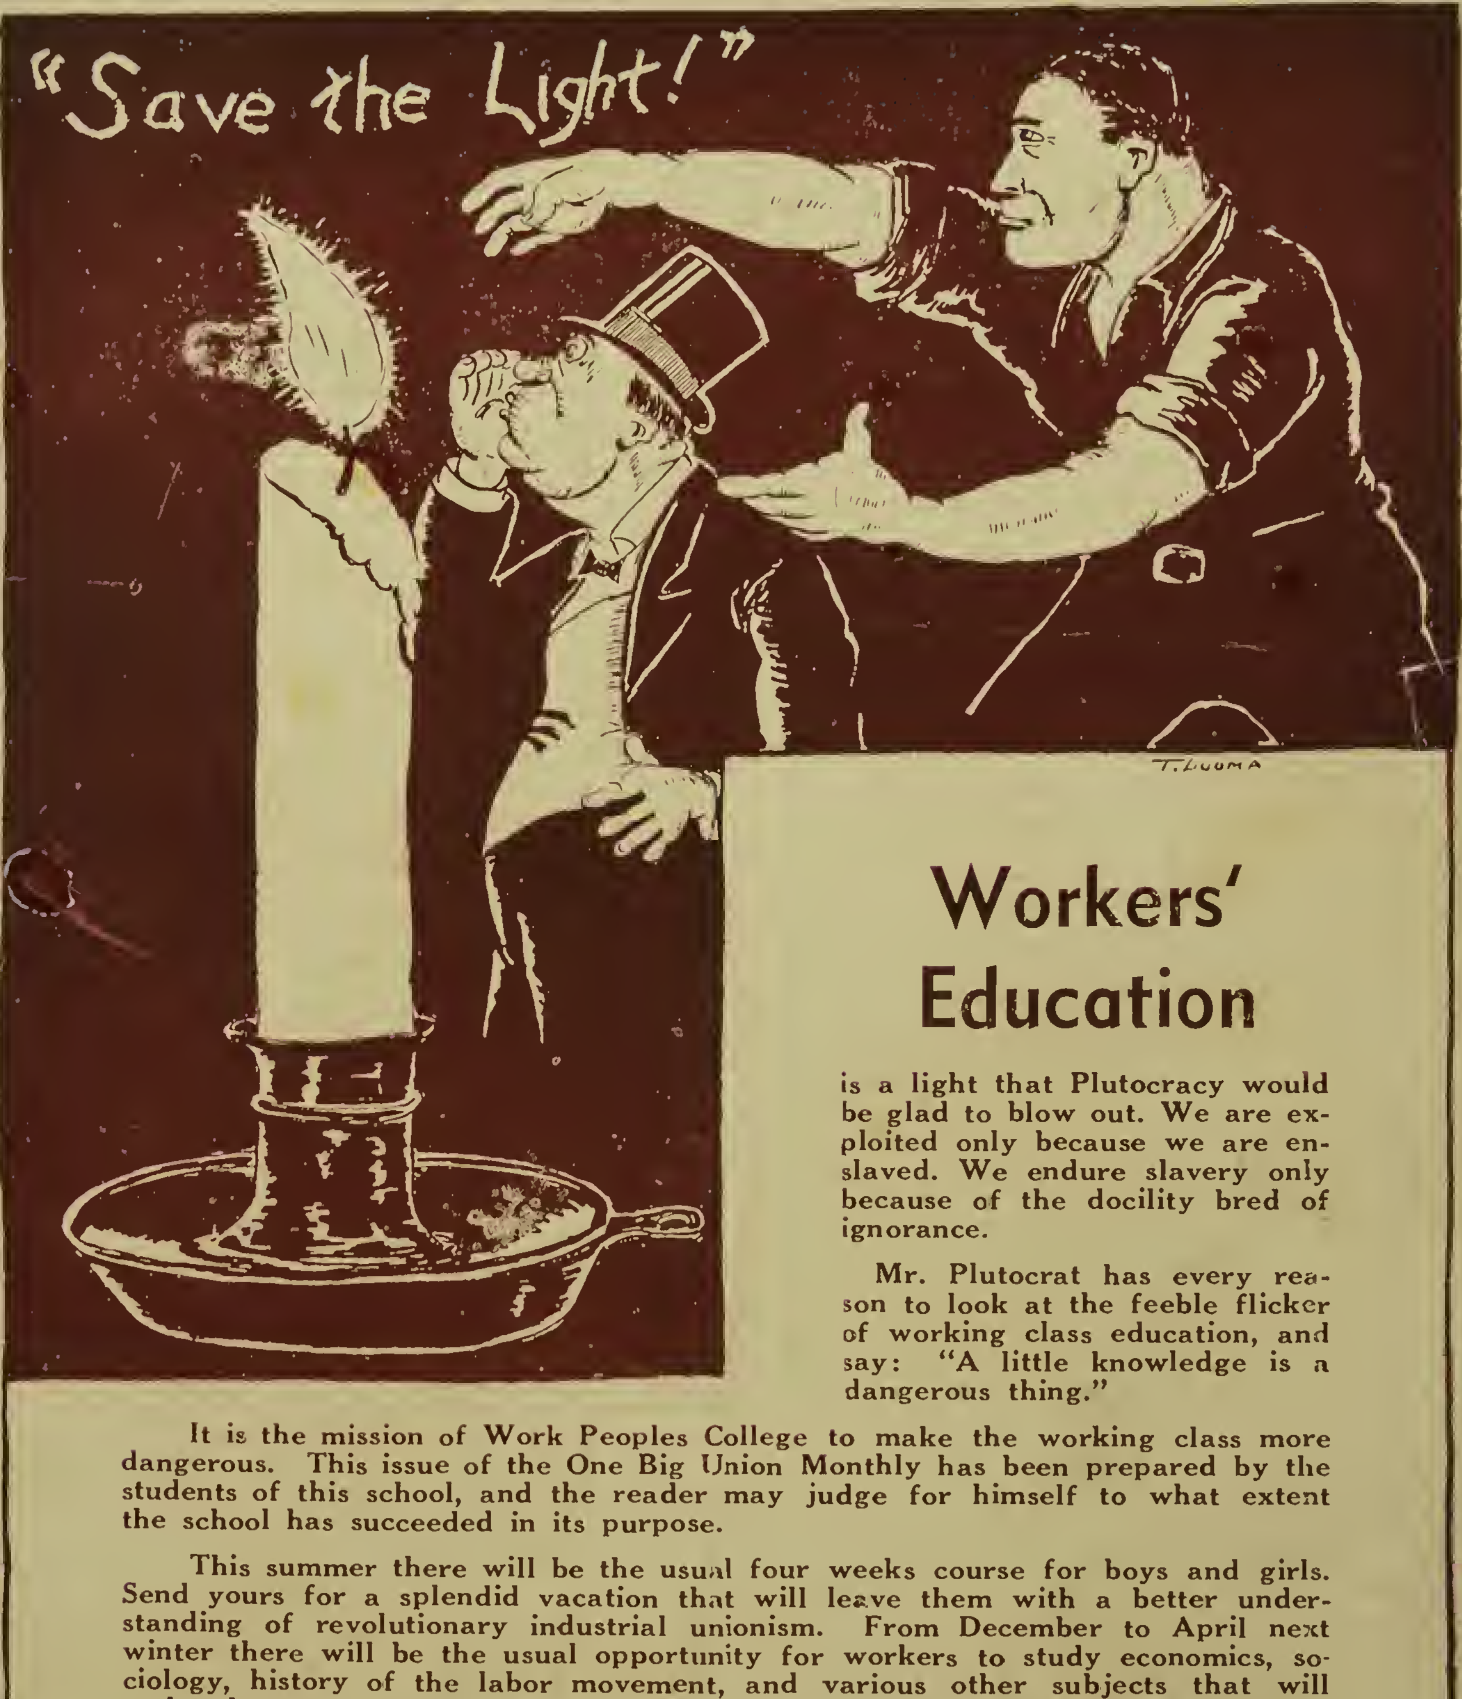
Between these two classes a struggle must go on until the workers of the world organize as a class, take possession of the earth and the machinery of production, and abolish the wage system.

We find that the centering of the management of industries into fewer and fewer hands makes the trade unions unable to cope with the ever growing power of the employing class. The trade unions foster a state of affairs which allows one set of workers to be pitted against another set of workers in the same industry, thereby helping defeat one another in wage wars. Moreover, the trade unions aid the employing class to mislead the workers into the belief that the working class have interests in common with their employers.

These conditions can be changed and the interest of the working class upheld only by an organization formed in such a way that all its members in any one industry, or in all industries if necessary, cease work whenever a strike or lockout is on in any department thereof, thus making an injury to one an injury to all.

Instead of the conservative motto, "A fair day's wage for a fair day's work," we must inscribe on our banner the revolutionary watchword, "Abolition of the wage system."

It is the historic mission of the working class to do away with capitalism. The army of production must be organized, not only for the every-day struggle with capitalists, but also to carry on production when capitalism shall have been overthrown. By organizing industrially we are forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old.



Workers' Education

is a light that Plutocracy would be glad to blow out. We are exploited only because we are enslaved. We endure slavery only because of the docility bred of ignorance.

Mr. Plutocrat has every reason to look at the feeble flicker of working class education, and say: "A little knowledge is a dangerous thing."

It is the mission of Work Peoples College to make the working class more dangerous. This issue of the One Big Union Monthly has been prepared by the students of this school, and the reader may judge for himself to what extent the school has succeeded in its purpose.

This summer there will be the usual four weeks course for boys and girls. Send yours for a splendid vacation that will leave them with a better understanding of revolutionary industrial unionism. From December to April next winter there will be the usual opportunity for workers to study economics, sociology, history of the labor movement, and various other subjects that will make them more useful in spreading the light of working class education. Terms will probably be $30 per month for room, board and tuition. Write for further information to Box 39, Morgan Park Station, Duluth, Minn.

Preamble of the Industrial Workers of the World

The working class and the employing class have nothing in common. There can be no peace so long as hunger and want are found among millions of working people and the few, who make up the employing class, have all the good things of life.

Between these two classes a struggle must go on until the workers of the world organize as a class, take possession of the earth and the machinery of production, and abolish the wage system.

We find that the centering of the management of industries into fewer and fewer hands makes the trade unions unable to cope with the ever growing power of the employing class. The trade unions foster a state of affairs which allows one set of workers to be pitted against another set of workers in the same industry, thereby helping defeat one another in wage wars. Moreover, the trade unions aid the employing class to mislead the workers into the belief that the working class have interests in common with their employers.

These conditions can be changed and the interest of the working class upheld only by an organization formed in such a way that all its members in any one industry, or in all industries if necessary, cease work whenever a strike or lockout is on in any department thereof, thus making an injury to one an injury to all.

Instead of the conservative motto, "A fair day's wage for a fair day's work," we must inscribe on our banner the revolutionary watchword, "Abolition of the wage system."

It is the historic mission of the working class to do away with capitalism. The army of production must be organized, not only for the every-day struggle with capitalists, but also to carry on production when capitalism shall have been overthrown. By organizing industrially we are forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old.

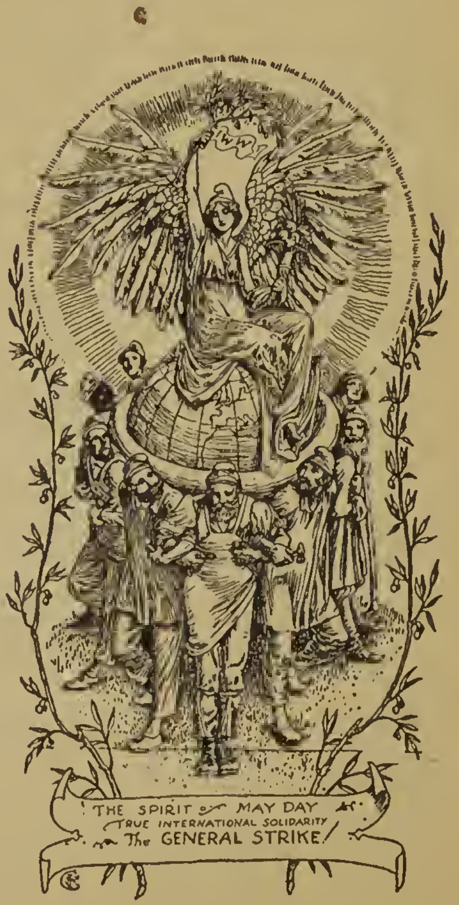
STRIKES



Can there be labor victories without strikes? The very idea is preposterous. A tool or weapon must demonstrate its effectiveness in use, a medicine must show its curative properties in practice—and so must organized labor furnish proof of its ability and will to enforce its demands in action.

Organized labor is powerful only if it is organized for action, that is to say, for striking. A show of force or a threat to strike is valid only if backed up by a record proving readiness and ability to strike. That record must be kept fresh and up-to-date.

In making demands labor announces the terms under which it desires to carry on production, in striking it proves its will to fight, and that is the only thing that can give weight to the demands. In a strike labor decrees—its will becomes the industry-governing law, in proportion to its its strength. The strike is a challenge thrown at the employer affected and, indirectly, at the whole employing class.

Labor victories, however, in ordinary strikes can be only partial and temporary. New industrial processes and speed-up tend soon to nullify the gains made even in the best of strike settlements. And so battle must follow battle until the war (class war) is finally ended with the complete defeat of the capitalist class through a GENERAL STRIKE of labor against the capitalist sytem.

The theory of the revolutionary general strike for the overthrow of capitalism is not a contradiction of or a radical departure from ordinary militant labor policies; it is, rather, the development of these to their logical conclusion.

In the ordinary strike labor demands that certain abuses are to be removed before the wheels of a plant or an industry turn. In the revolutionary general strike the demand will be for the rooting out of the cause of all abuses in all industries: private ownership, production for profit, the wage system.

It is indeed fanciful to think that all industries can be stopped for more than a matter of hours. Labor will continue to feed itself even in the throes of a gigantic strike but it can and will go back to work on terms set by itself. What power is there to prevent?

STRAWS IN THE WIND

By GEFION

The earth sunk into sleep. Under the trestle a lone fire blazes, its serpentine tongues licking at the night's blackness. A woman kneels over a skillet. She is heaping it with corn meal mush. On an upturned can, a man sits paring potatoes. Two boys and a baby sleep under a layer of ragged quilts. The cold night condenses their breaths into white vapours. They hang for a moment against the wall of blackness. Then the wind mingles them with the night. A mangy mongrel whines in the firelight and crawls with pleading eyes toward the frying pan. On the fringe of the darkness, the wind flaps the torn top of an ancient touring car.

The earth sleeps. But between its banks, the swollen river hurls its muddy waters pugnaciously against the trestle's creosoted timbers. Now and then the fire crackles and puffs a spray of glittering sparks up into the black night. And in the night's stillness, the woman says:

"Lem, ain't yo got them 'taters peeled yet?"

The man is silent. He spits a brown jet into the fire and wipes his chin. Then he folds his knife against his pantsleg and stumbles through the darkness to the river and washes the potatoes. He comes back and he says to the woman:

"Thar, put 'em on."

She empties the skillet into a pot and from a can she digs a lump of fat. It lies for a moment in the hot pan like a fragment of geological strata—mixed layers of ashen bacon drippings, pale mutton tallow and the yellowness of beef suet. But soon the fire makes it a sizzling lake in the skillet. The woman cuts the potatoes into the fat. She sits turning and waiting. Then she says to the man:

"Call the young'ns."

He pulls the quilts off the children and shakes them. He says:

"Get up—vittels is on."

The boys get to their bare feet. They have slept in their clothes. They rub their sleep-glued eyes with rickets-deformed fists. To their nostrils comes the smell of frying potatoes. They scramble across to the fire. The woman goes to the quilts. She wraps one of them around the baby. Then she opens her waist and gives it her breasts. The man empties the surplus fat from the potatoes into the corn meal. He tastes it. Then he says to the woman:

"Mira, ain't yo got no salt?"

She says:

"Yo know thar ain't none."

They eat in silence—greedily. Then the boys crawl between the quilts again. The woman changes the baby's diapers. Its bottom is red with inflamation. She cleans it with wet rags. The baby whimpers and struggles in her lap. The man scrapes his pockets and drops into his upturned mouth a mixture of tobacco leavings and lint. He chews reflectively, sitting before the fire. Then he says to the woman:

"Yo all better turn in."

She goes to the car and brings out an armful of sacks and quilts. Then she and her baby sleep. The man sits by the dying fire and chews. He scratches his chin and chews. After long, he empties his mouth into the blackening embers and lies down beside his woman.

The earth sleeps. The snoring of sleeping humans mingles with the swishing of whirling waters. Out in the black night, a coyote howls.

Lem's woman walks the town. It is early morning. In the front of stores, clerks are sweeping the sidewalks, saying, "Morning, ma'am," to early comers. A dog lifts a leg against a lamp post. It spies a cat crossing the street and hurls itself challenging down the sidewalk. In the front of Frank's Big Market, a truck is unloading vegetables.

Lem's woman is walking the town. She is looking for a day's washing or maybe a job of spring cleaning. She gets no day's washing—"Thanks, we have a regular woman coming in." And as for a job of cleaning—well, one simply doesn't want an ill-clad slattern prowling all through one's home—"No, thanks!"

But Lem's woman walks the town. She pleads here—three young'ns, ma'am, and the old man simply can't find nothin' to do. Sorry, my good woman—can't help it—try relief. Well, the old man is supposed to go there today. All right, they will help. And Lem's woman walks the town. She is sent here and yon. She stops in front of Schmerle's Butcher Shop—them thar pork shanks with a mess of mustard greens would do the young'ns good. Well, one has to keep going. And she moves on.

The sun passes the meridian and the shadows lengthen. Lem's woman turns her steps toward the trestle. She walks through shantytown. Here no one looks with suspicion at her faded, patched cotton dress. Poor folk see plenty such. She walks toward the trestle. Two men sit on the stoop in front of a shack. They have a jug of red wine. One says to Lem's woman:

"What's your hurry, tuts?"

She says:

"None of your damn business."

The other man says:

"Won'tcha have a drink?"

Lem's woman hesitates. Her legs are shaking. She thinks. Then she says:

"Don't mind if I do."

The man says:

"Atta girl—come right in, sister."

And Lem's woman enters the shack with the two.

The sun is sinking behind the hills back of the town. Over the spring-green fields lie black shadows. Lem's woman walks toward the trestle. She is light-headed and the wine has left a queer feeling in her belly. In her hand, she carries a bag. She stops and pats her hair into shape. She straightens her dress. She thinks of Lem. She thinks: "He can't say I didn't try."

The fire burns under the trestle. Lem is by the river trying to catch a mess of fish. The water is high and muddy. They don't bite until late summer. Lem sees his woman. He sees the bag. He goes to the fire and throws on more wood. The boys are making a fort in the sand behind the car. The dog watches them with drowsy eyes. On the quilts, the baby cries.

Lem says:

"Any luck?"

The woman says:

"Thar ain't no jobs."

She hushes the baby and gives it suck. Lem opens the bag and finds two cans of hominy and a half-filled bottle of ketchup. He thinks. He takes the skillet and drops in a lump of fat. Then he empties the cans into the grease. When the hominy is hot, he pours the ketchup over it and stirs. The hominy turns to carmine beads.

The woman comes to the fire. She calls the young ones and they sit down to eat. Lem smells the wine on his woman's breath. He squints at her. Then he says:

"Yo been boozin'. Where did yo get them vittels?"

She says:

"I ain't been boozin'—a woman give me them cans and ketchup and she give me a glass of wine."

She chews in sullen silence. Then she says:

"It ain't none of your business, nohow—yo're eatin', ain't you?"

They chew in silence. Then the woman says:

"Did yo go and see them relief folks?"

Lem says yes.

"What did they say?"

"They sed we ain't in the state long enough."

The earth sleeps. The snoring of sleeping humans mingles with the swishing of whirling waters. In the black night, the baby whimpers against the woman's empty breasts.

BANKER'S ISLAND

A dramatization of the I.W.W. leaflet, "An Instructive Fable," prepared by Work Peoples College Drama Department

PERSONS:

Vandergilt	The banker
Murphy	The cook
Swenson	The lumberjack
Burton	Hunter's guide

SCENES:

I. The island the morning after the shipwreck.
II. The island six months later.
III. The other side of the island.

SCENE I

Semi-tropical island. Trees, rocks, drift wood. A few rushes in floor cracks back of footlights.

MURPHY, asleep center front stage.

SWENSON, asleep at right of him snoring.
Large pot with ladle handle, a small tool chest, axe, saw, and a few bundles of clothes lie back of them.

MURPHY (waking up and stretching) Faith! I'm still alive. (to Swenson) You're not dead either. You're snoring. Wake up, you Swede.

SWENSON: Ugh! What a night! Yust us three here? Everybody else from the big boat drowned?

MURPHY: (thinking deeply) No, there was that English hunter fellow in the life boat with us . . . We tried to keep close enough to the other boats to hear them—but it seemed that they were to one side of us, and then to the other—and soon we couldn't hear them at all.

SWENSON: But where's the hunter?

MURPHY: It's beyond me to remember if he was here when we hit shore. I was that tired of rowing and rowing that I just crawled out and lay me down to sleep.

SWENSON: He's here. He got us here. It war so black we couldn't see each other, but he war sure he could smell fresh water and trees and animals, so we yust followed his nose and got here. We threw you and your kettles out, and then we helped the banker . . .

MURPHY. Who is that fellow anyway?

SWENSON: Don't you read the Sunday papers, or are you illegitimate? He's John Pierpont Vandergilt the Third—richest man in the world. He war so exhausted yust like he had rowed all the way instead of sitting still. We took him out of the boat as though he war a big baby, and he came to yust enuf to ask about his little box . . . (turns to right) here comes that hunter fellow now.

BURTON (enters from right from among trees, with four small fish on a stick, a gun under his arm, eating a banana) You seem to be recovering. Had breakfast yet?

VANDERGILT: (waking, still in daze) Who said breakfast?

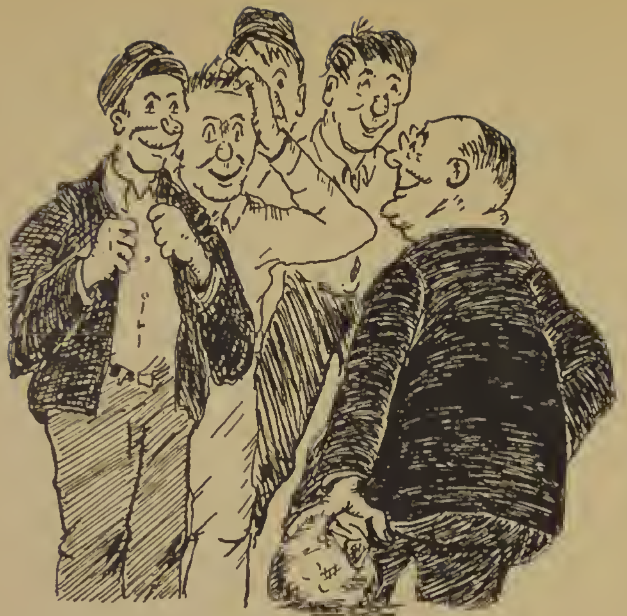
MURPHY: It's bananas and fish on the menu, sir.

BURTON: We're lucky. Good water. Good fishing. Plenty of fruit. There must be game here.

VANDERGILT: Those fish aren't cooked, are they?

MURPHY: They don't grow cooked; but I can cook them for you, sir.

VANDERGILT: Didn't you bring any more bananas?



"I will pay you ten dollars a day."

BURTON: You can get them fresh and sun-ripened if you climb the trees for them.

VANDERGILT: I'm not in the habit of serving myself.

SWENSON: Is it yust us four alive?

BURTON: I climbed a tree on the hill. This is an island. There is not another island in sight for all that it is such a clear day. There isn't a ship on the sea, or a sign of any survivor save ourselves.

SWENSON: And here I war on my way back to America again, yust to get myself a yob . . . and here I am shipwrecked on an island with my tool chest and my cross cut saw. I war going to bring my girl over. What will she say now?

MURPHY: Me too. I heard they paid cooks five dollars a day in America . . . think of it . . . over a pound a day . . . and here I'm stranded on this island, God alone knows how far from America and five dollars a day.

BURTON: I've guided big game hunters on every continent on the globe—killing game for them while they drank their whiskey and soda and played bridge. Then they boasted of their trophies afterward. I was on my way to America, for it's really better guiding around those summer resorts. The blooming natives aren't so dark, and there's shower bawths anyway. Well, cheerio, I can shoot a bit for myself here, and we can be thankful we have a cook and a carpenter.

VANDERGILT: Now, my good men, don't worry about this employment situation. We Vandergilts have always been noted for our public spirit. You have your pots, you have your tools and saw, and you have your gun and what-not—but I have even something more valuable. This chest is filled with pieces of gold . . . enough for us all to live on for a long time. You men work for me, and I will pay you what you hoped to get in America. No, to show you what a good sport I am, I will even pay you ten dollars a day.

SWENSON: (doing a Kalispell hop) Whoopee! Yust tank of it. Ten dollars a day!

MURPHY: Ain't the good Lord with us? Good jobs even before we get to America!

SWENSON: Yust tank how much we can save!

——CURTAIN——

SCENE II.

ABOUT NOON, SIX MONTHS LATER

At rear left a portion of cabin for banker shows. He is lying in a grass hammock busy figuring in a notebook. Murphy is busy at a fire place near it. A crude table is in center back of stage. Portion of a crude hut front right of stage shows. Swenson is on a stump dozing beside it. (To avoid long wait between scenes these needs can be covered by trees for a smaller setting for first scene; actors can have sunburnt paint on all but their faces in first act, and can tear clothes worn then to indicate condition in second scene, thus requiring moving of a few trees and painting of faces only for change.)

BURTON (enters from lower right of stage as curtain rises—to Swenson) Not a sign of a ship again today. I begin to wonder if it's worth while looking. You know it gets tiresome for me now that we have nothing to do. How long is it since we really did any work?

SWENSON: It took yust about a month to get our houses built, and we've been here a bit over six months now. It's what Murphy calls the life of Riley.

BURTON: Eat and sleep, and sleep and eat—even so I'm half starved after walking around this island this morning.

SWENSON: And yust sleeping here, I get hungry too. Oh, Mr. Murphy, is your dinner cooked?

MURPHY: Just to the dot, all ready to dish.

VANDERGILT: (getting up from hammock and coming center stage) Gentlemen: I have an announcement to make that concerns us all very seriously. I have been doing some figuring and I find I must tell Murphy to put just two plates on the table today.

SWENSON: Yust two plates?

BURTON: Why?

VANDERGILT: In a manner it's a depression, or recession . . . but we must keep our heads so as not to be hit by a panic.

BURTON: At least it really does sound quite civilized.

VANDERGILT: I have been figuring your accounts with me. Since we finished the work, and I had to lay you off, I have had to charge you for your board, and now your accounts are closed. You have no more money in the bank. There is nothing with which to pay your board. It hurts me worse than it does you, but I am obliged to tell Murphy to put just two plates on the table today, one for me and one for him.

SWENSON: Didn't we yust kill a buffalo the other day? We have fish. We found roots to make a sort of flour, and we have lots of that. We found honey. Why can't we eat?

VANDERGILT: That's the trouble. We have buffalo enough, and there is no reason for killing more animals. We have enough buildings. You surely don't want to see the place all cluttered up. You don't want a lot of stinking carcasses around, do you?

SWENSON: No—but why can't we eat?

VANDERGILT: Surely you don't want to eat the bread of a pauper? You surely have some pride, some sense of independence. You have no money left with which to pay your board. No one can hire you except me, and I can't find anything for you to do. There's no choice before us . . . Come, Murphy, set the table, for I'm exhausted thinking out this problem. And, please, Swenson, do not disturb me while I'm dining.

(Vandergilt sits at table. Murphy serves him from pot. Burton and Swenson saunter back and forth in front of stage.)

BURTON: If you were civilized, Swenson, you would understand it.

SWENSON: But we haff to eat. What will we do?

BURTON: There are millions of civilized people wondering about the same thing. You've read about their hunger riots and their unemployed demonstrations.

SWENSON: Yes, those communists and IWW's and radicals—that reminds me—once when I was in America before and I had a job in a lumber camp in Minnesota—

BURTON: I was up there with some game hunters in that Arrowhead country once. It was a fine country; but I ran into one of those lumber camps. It was a terrible place. It was positively full of lice. It stank of old socks and urine. and I really don't know what. Are all the camps like that?

SWENSON: They're all pretty much alike. That's yust what those IWW's I was going to tell you about, kicked about too. They showed us pictures of the kind of camps they had won out west—fine clean houses, good beds, fresh linen, and breakfast, dinner and supper fit for a king. They wanted me to yoin them, but I war going back to the old country, and they wanted a revolution, and I war not in favor of anything like that.

BURTON: No, it really isn't at all respectable.

SWENSON: But what I war thinking about, war how those IWW's used to talk and talk and talk about what made hard times, and say that if we would all yoin in One Big Union, we could yust take over everything and run it for ourselves. It sounded crazy to me . . . but . . . sitting here . . . and wishing I war eating my dinner . . .

BURTON: You surely wouldn't think of doing anything violent to Mr. Vandergilt, would you —like taking his dinner, or his house that you built, or that little box of gold?

SWENSON: No, I don't want the gold . . . but, say . . . do you know . . . maybe there isn't any gold in that box. Nobody ever saw the inside of it. Maybe it's all a fake, and we've been gypped, and have a right to eat!

(Running over to Vandergilt): Say, that box, you paid us everything out of it . . .

VANDERGILT: Yes, but don't bother me.

SWENSON: And yet, you never opened it.

VANDERGILT: No, I never opened it. I just kept your account, and acted as your banker. Don't bother me.

SWENSON: How do I know that there IS any gold in that box?

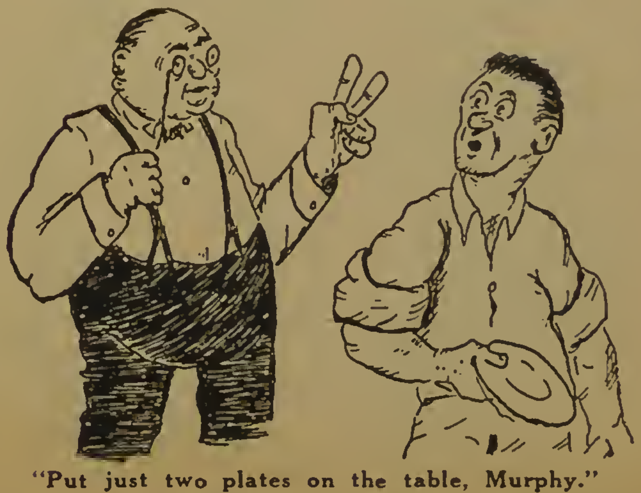
VANDERGILT: I'm surprised that you distrust me. It really wouldn't make any difference in our accounts whether there was any gold there or not. (Getting up, getting box, opening it.) You can see for yourself, it is full of gold.

SWENSON: I'm sorry. I yust wanted to make sure. (Returns to Burton who is amused.)

BURTON: So, now you're satisfied that everything is fair and square.

SWENSON: Yes, there really is gold in that box.

BURTON: You were talking about some idea that you had from those IWW's in a lumber camp in Minnesota.



"Put just two plates on the table, Murphy."

SWENSON: Oh those people. They said that with One Big Union we working people could use the natural resources, and carry on production for ourselves, and have no hard times.

BURTON: Just step out on this island say, and catch some fish, and hunt some game, and build us a cabin . . .

SWENSON: That's right, we CAN do that here . . . but neither of us can cook worth a damn.

BURTON: Murphy doesn't seem so well pleased with the present arrangement. Look at him.

SWENSON: Mr. Murphy, we two were going to start a union, a sort of One Big Union yust like I heard about in Minnesota, and then we yust go out and catch some fish, and hunt some game, and build a house, and not bother with the banker. Will you yoin us?

MURPHY: Sure thing, my lad. It's been breaking my heart, feeding Mr. Vandergilt this noon, and not giving ye a bite to eat too. It choked me so I couldn't eat—you can see my dinner still a-sitting there. I'm with you, boys. They told me in Dublin that Americans figure there's just two kinds of Irish—the good ones that come over and join unions, and the no-good ones that come over and join the police force. Count on me.

BURTON (to Vandergilt): You see, Mr. Vandergilt, we three have formed a union, and we've decided to discontinue operations. Swenson and I have nothing coming, but you should pay Murphy $1800 for 180 days at $10 a day, in gold out of your little box.

VANDERGILT: This is terrible. It's an outrage . . . It's a general strike.

BURTON: This is no outrage. We are very temperate men. We could throw you into the sea to feed the fishes, but we're taking nothing that is yours. We shall leave you the cabin we built, although we paid you for the privilege of building it with our own labor. We shall head for the other side of the island. Pay Murphy off. We're packing.

—— CURTAIN ——

SCENE III

The other side of the island. — Cabin at right rear. —Murphy by it cleaning smoke off a kettle.— Swenson and Burton playing creckers down center.

BURTON: That's one more game for this side of the house. You had better practice up for a while. (Gets up.)

SWENSON: Yust think when I go home and tell them that I war playing checkers with solid pieces of gold, they won't believe me. No, not even when I tell them that Mr. Murphy didn't know what to do with the gold pieces he got for cooking for Mr. Vandergilt, and covered some of them with clay and baked them to make checkers for us to play with.

MURPHY: Sort of ritzy, huh?

SWENSON: I wonder how Mr. Vandergilt makes out. He's been over there alone for ten days now.

BURTON: Did he worry so much how we would make out?

MURPHY: But he's a helpless sort of creature—he can't even climb a tree to get a banana. I sometimes think the rich people don't raise themselves right.

BURTON: He may be up against it rather soon. Each day after I climb the lookout and see that there's still no ship, I drop over to the old homestead without his knowing it to see how he's doing.

MURPHY— And how was the world's richest man progressin'?

BURTON: Yesterday morning he was fighting with the flies over the last of the buffalo that we killed before we left. He must have grown tired of that, for he tried to eat a starfish, but he hadn't sense enough to get it out of the shell first. It was really very amusing.

SWENSON: Yiminy yesus! Who's coming over there?

MURPHY: It's a man, for it looks terrible and has rags on it.

BURTON: I do believe, it is he.

SWENSON: You mean it's him?

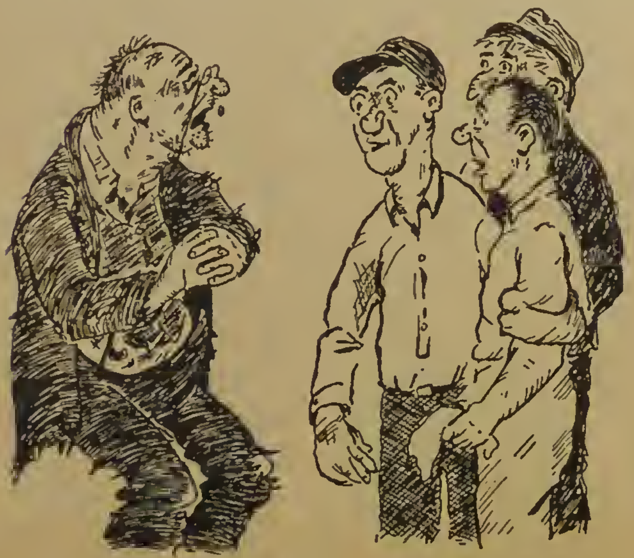
BURTON: Yes, I'm really sure it is he.

SWENSON: And yumping Yehosephat! He's too weak to walk! I'm going to help him. (Exit left.)

(Burton and Murphy edge to left side of stage.)

MURPHY: The poor old man!

BURTON: And if only we were civilized enough, he'd have us all starving to death; but since



"You can have a job washing dishes."

we're only partly civilized, I suppose we can save him.

(Swenson comes back, leading Vandergilt, tottering and about ready to fall down.)

VANDERGILT (between puffs): Good-day, gentlemen . . . I've . . been having . . a terrible time . . You've got to . . come back . . I won't hold anything against you . . I'll raise your wages . . . double them — anything you say, but you fellows just have to come back . . . and work for me!

SWENSON: Yumpin' yiminy! Yust think of that! $20 a day!

BURTON: You know, we three men formed a union, so we'll have to have a union meeting to decide anything about that. So you just sit here while we decide.

MURPHY: And have a bite of something to eat while we're deliberatin' (gives him dish of stew and some fruit which he eats greedily).

SWENSON: Twenty a day is a lot of money.

BURTON: On $10 a day we worked ourselves into a mess in six months. On $20 a day it might take longer, but remember we have our houses built. Aren't we having a jollier time of it this way?

MURPHY: And what would we do with our money?

SWENSON: But Yesus Christ! You can't let the richest man on earth starve to death.

BURTON: No, it wouldn't be considered proper.

MURPHY: I suppose it might hurt his feelings, but I'm having too damned much work cleaning the soot off those pots, and cleaning these dishes. Couldn't we hire him as a dishwasher to work for his board?

BURTON: That is an idea (going to Vandergilt). We've decided that it is too risky to work for you for any money.

VANDERGILT: I was afraid of that.

BURTON: But we have a counter-proposition. We suggest that you work for us.

VANDERGILT: I never worked in my life.

BURTON: And we can't pay you, so we suggest that you take a job as dishwasher for us, working for your board.

VANDERGILT: Oh, oh, oh!

BURTON: If you don't, of course you can starve to death.

VANDERGILT: This is terrible (licking rest of plate with his tongue)—I mean this stew is excellent. But this situation, John Pierpont Vandergilt the Third washing dishes for his board . . . . Yes, yes, or I'll starve.

—— CURTAIN ——

As curtain falls, Burton steps out front of curtain and addresses audience directly:

We have had a reason for putting on this little play. Millions of us today are in the same situation as Murphy, Swenson and I on that day when Vandergilt told Murphy to put just two plates on the table.

We got out of it because we built One Big Union of the three of us. Swenson and Murphy could not have succeeded without the help of my humble self to catch their game. Murphy and I would have been up against it to build such a good cabin as Swenson knew how to build. If Murphy had not been with us we might well have died of indigestion from our own cooking, and of course we could not have brought Mr. Vandergilt down so well from his high estate.

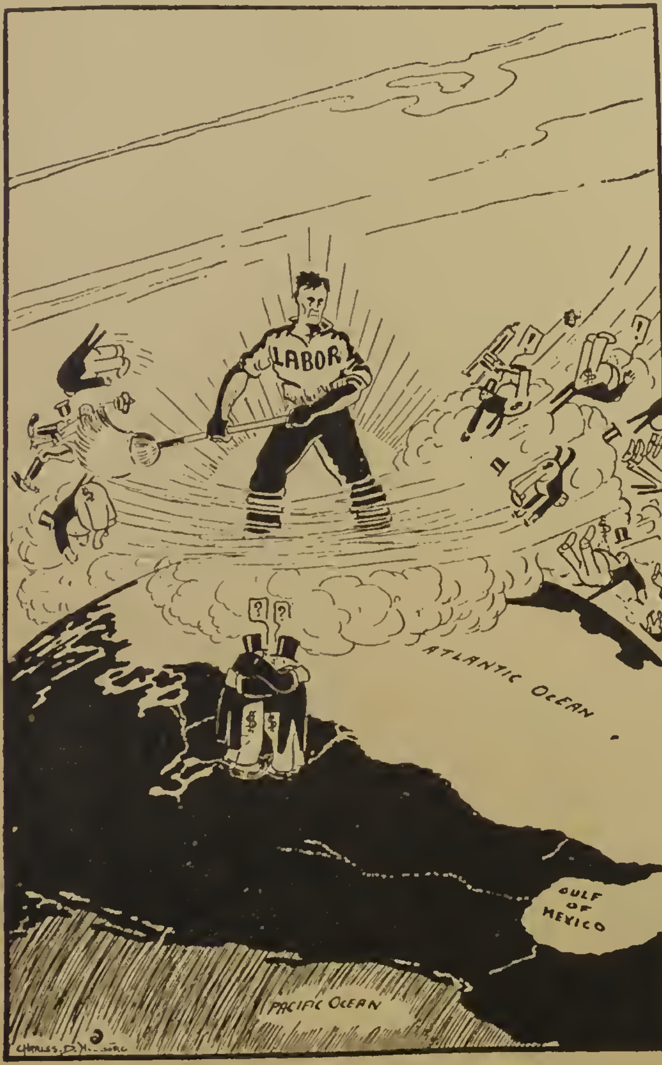
It took One Big Union of all of us. It will take One Big Union for you as well.

We went to the other side of the island. For you there is no other side of the island. But with One Big Union of all of you, you will not need to leave the industries that you have built. You need only to take them over, run them for your own use, and have security and abundance for all.—Thank you!

CAPITALISM MUST GO

An indictment of the present order prepared jointly by one of the classes at Work Peoples College

Capitalism has masqueraded as a benevolent and progressive force, alleging that it has encouraged and stimulated the arts, the sciences, and their application to production; that it has furthered education and the development of mankind in an atmosphere of stimulative competition and freedom; that it has made full use of the resources of nature and the abilities and past achievements of man; that it has turned even individual vice into a source of general well-being; that it has yielded us a wonderful array of products for the most part undreamed of a century ago, and has offered them at such a price that even the poorest may enjoy them; and that it tends to do these good acts because it automatically arranged everything so that it shall be to the self-interest of each that they be done.



Nothing will set the world right but a general house cleaning by organized labor but labor must organize AGAINST the capitalist parasites as in the Industrial Workers of the World, not WITH them as in political parties.

We charge that capitalism is a racket, and the source of countless rackets and crimes; that it wastes our resources, our equipment, our manpower; that it perverts the technical sciences to destructive purposes, and falsifies the social sciences to condone its countless crimes; that it makes of man a physical and moral weakling, a victim of avoidable diseases and a puppet jerked about by the strings of want and worry and fear; that it breeds hate, and prejudice, and war; that it deprives us of the security and abundance, the freedom and joy of living that could be ours were we but to rid ourselves of this incubus that so hypocritically masquerades as a system of automatic harmony, efficiency, and benefit to man.

We charge that capitalism is in itself a colossal racket. It is based on the exploitation of wage labor, a condition made possible only by the expropriation of the earth and the products of previous generations so as to make it impossible for any of the mass of mankind to earn a living except on condition that they produce something for nothing for a parasite class. By this scheme of things all the benefits of our improvements in the useful arts flow to this proprietary parasite class. These conspirators forbid any production to be undertaken unless they can levy their tribute from it. In this way they nullify the improvements in the industrial process; for the rational purpose of these improvements is to turn out an abundance at low cost, but the racketeers of capitalism can levy their tribute only by maintaining scarcity so as to sell at a profit.

Because of this racket the mass of mankind have no claim to life other than the saleability of their lives to the conspirators who have expropriated the resources and equipment for production. But this saleability depends upon the opportunity to collect tribute; and this in turn requires that means of production, resources, and man-power shall not be used fully.

Accordingly we charge that capitalism wastes our resources, our equipment and our man-power. It is not only that the conspirators force these factors of production to lie idle in the face of wide-spread want; their irrational and periodic exploitation of these factors wastes our forests and our mineral resources and turns our fertile plains to waste-land. Our productive equipment is deteriorated; mines are flooded; the men who can turn earth and stone into the glories of architecture, who can girdle the globe with copper cables, who can harness Niagara to light our homes, these it converts into gaunt derelicts of humanity, jobless, ragged, half-starved, homeless, hopeless and purposeless.

We charge that this supreme racket, the capitalist system, is the source of countless rackets and crimes. Since the sole concern of the conspirators in production is the saleability of the product at a profit, dishonesty in production and deception in merchandising become the established rules. Poor clothing, poor buildings, poor foods, goods that will not serve the purpose for which the victims of the conspiracy buy them, goods that will not last and thus block future sales, goods that will actually injure the unsuspecting victim who expects to benefit from them, are the results of its application of science to the ordinary industrial processes.

The consequent standards of get and grab, of customary dishonesty, of avoiding labor, combine to engender kidnaping and hold-ups, burglary and bank robberies, until man after his conquest of nature fears only two things: his fellow man and the microscopic germs with which our irrational way of living surrounds us. The system starts the younger generation off with traditional deceptions at their mothers' apron strings, follows this up with a training in the public schools that aims at making a living without soiling one's hands, gives the graduate a few years of unemployment in which to practice the game of grab and exploitation and dishonesty as best he can in his crude and individualistic way, furnishes a few pointers in its "reform" schools, movie shows and "best sellers," and provides a post-graduate course in its increasing but still overcrowded penitentiaries.

Misapplied Science

We charge that capitalism perverts our technical sciences to destructive purposes and falsifies the social sciences to condone its countless crimes. The skill of the metallurgist is turned to devise new means of slaughter. The chemist is commanded to desist from his labors to benefit mankind and told to devise new explosives for burying our wives and children in the ruins of our blasted cities, or to invent new and more terrible gases with which to cow the proletariat into subjection or to make the mass mutual slaughter of the working class in modern war the more ghastly. The bacteriologist is forced away from his work to free us from plague and pestilence and commandeered to perfect ways and means for infecting the drinking water of cities with diphtheria, infesting the cattle with anthrax, or for turning our cities into giant charnel houses with the bubonic plague.

Its academic science, which but thirty or forty years ago was the beacon light of liberation, is today the bulwark of capitalist ideology at bay. Its physical scientists blab of theology. Its social sciences are passionate pleas for the dictatorship of capitalism and its social institutions. Its economic sciences are the pimps of big business and finance. Its historical sciences are the servants of nationalism. Its biological sciences cling to outworn formulas and use them to defend militarism and the elimination of the so-called unfit, that is, of those who cannot fit themselves into the niches which this system of slavery and exploitation provides for them. Its philosophy blatantly formulates the instrumentalism of capitalist civilization and does not blush to offer to "save the children of fortune from the uprising of the poor."

Perverted Arts

As with its conscripted academic sciences, so too, with its arts. Its architecture is a chaos of hovel and skyscraper—a skeleton of steel draped with concrete and glass to encase countless stenographers as they induce hysteria or neurasthenia pounding out needless correspondence about a useless and needless business enterprise whose sole function is to sabotage actual industry. The false front has become the symbol of Main Street; the attempted prettiness of store front and middle class home protrudes from the general squalor like some adolescent ragamuffin bedecked in a cast-off evening gown torn and bespattered with mud. Its pictorial art glorifies cigarettes and shoddy. The general cacophony of life under capitalism has generated jazz, and given birth to new hits daily whose departure within a week furnishes a relief even to the devotees of this distortion of rhythm, timbre, pitch and concord of sound. In order that there may be repeated sales, nothing produced by capitalism should be enduring. Whether it be ladies' stockings, song hits, million dollar movies, or what, it must be something that no one will want to see next week—and so it is. The increased literacy and the teeming presses that might have produced a great age of rationality, a new peak climbed by the intelligence of man, have resulted in the blessedly non-enduring products that stand witness against the system on every newsstand. The radio that might have been the most diligent servant of the true, the good and the beautiful, is forced to cry the wares of the conspirators and between the occasional glimpses of the lost beauty of pre-capitalist civilizations with which it furnishes an excuse for its being, to sing their praises; even these occasional glimpses into the beauty that might be, tend to be drowned out by the sports hysteria that has now replaced religion as the opium of the people. The very play and amusement of life have been turned from the healthful process of people amusing themselves to the dangerous process of being amused in mass; they dance, they sing, they wrestle, they play ball, they enjoy the thrills of life sitting down. Their amusement has ceased to be the enjoyment of reality and become an escape from it. And insofar as they do amuse themselves it is with rituals of chance that seem to have been devised to give irrational hope to the willing slaves of the system, or escape from the futility in which a leisure class renders its leisure and culture impotent. No art good enough to endure can be born of a system that finds durability unvendable; no search for the beautiful can be made by a culture based on the passive amusement of the mass; no art can serve truth when its function is the escape from reality. And there can be no inspiration from art to carry us forward when its notion of the beautiful is dug from the graveyard of the past and its motive for being done is to praise those who would strangle a progressive art. Thus whatever has been offered as progress in art in capitalism has been a distortion more insolent than its most blatant advertising.

Moral Decay

We charge that capitalism makes of man a physical and moral weakling. Poverty where there could be abundance; exploitation that lacks even the extenuation of accumulating necessary equipment—these iniquities are possible only because of the even greater iniquity that mankind has been enslaved. That men slaughter each other en masse is bad; that they do so as puppets moved about by an international murder trust far removed from the battle is much worse. The crowning crime of capitalism is that it has made of mankind a mass of scarcely vertebrate puppets so demoralized that they endure their own slavery without revolt and pave the road to fascism and social decay with the good intention of easing the lot of their children by fawning before the destroyers of the human race.

This demoralization has been accomplished by spiritually isolating each individual, so that his individual feebleness must cope with a vast world-wide conspiracy against him; so that his hope of escape from the mesh in which he is caught is that of individual escape. Though sprung of a stock to whom solidarity is normal, he has been made competitive and thus his sole source of security has been taken away and his morale, which was based upon solidarity, has been destroyed. An infernally cunning system of individual rewards and punishments has been devised to condition him to this servility. As an individual he is punished for the economic follies and the outright crimes of society; and the rewards held out to him are for so placing himself that the growth of a community may give him an unearned increment or that he may corner some market, or in some way make the creative capacity of society pay him tribute for breaking his solidarity with his fellows and committing some injury or nuisance to society. He is taught that it is shameful to be so unenterprising as not to exploit and betray his fellows. An "uneasy payment plan" furnishes him some temporary hold of the enjoyment of life that is just at the margin of his subsistence; and the fear that he will not complete his payments makes him hesitate over any act of self-defense. The continuous fear of unemployment, the continuous hopes of a better job, lash and prod the wage slave of today into a moral degradation compared with which the serf and slave were sublime examples of manliness. Production for sale at a profit, organized on a mass scale, completes this demoralization by isolation. He makes but the fragment of a thing. That his work is part of a world-wide social labor process is hidden from him. He knows nothing of what is to be done with the thing he makes and he cares less. He has lost the neighborly concern for the life and use of his product that led the earlier craftsmen to lay the economic foundation for our modern technology. On the job his instinct of workmanship is frustrated. Off the job he swings between the fear that his productive ability will prove unsaleable and the hopes of unproductive acquisition. Such rationality as is bred of his industrial techniques is sacrificed to the worship of chance, the mythology of which has been woven into his boyhood dreams, his manhood hopes, his fictional escapes from reality and his routine pastimes. Deliberate propaganda need add only a few finishing touches to make of the creature that has weighed the planets and linked oceans to serve his transportation, into the gibbering, irrational, prejudice-ridden imbecile who places dictators over himself to damn his race to reversion and barbarism.

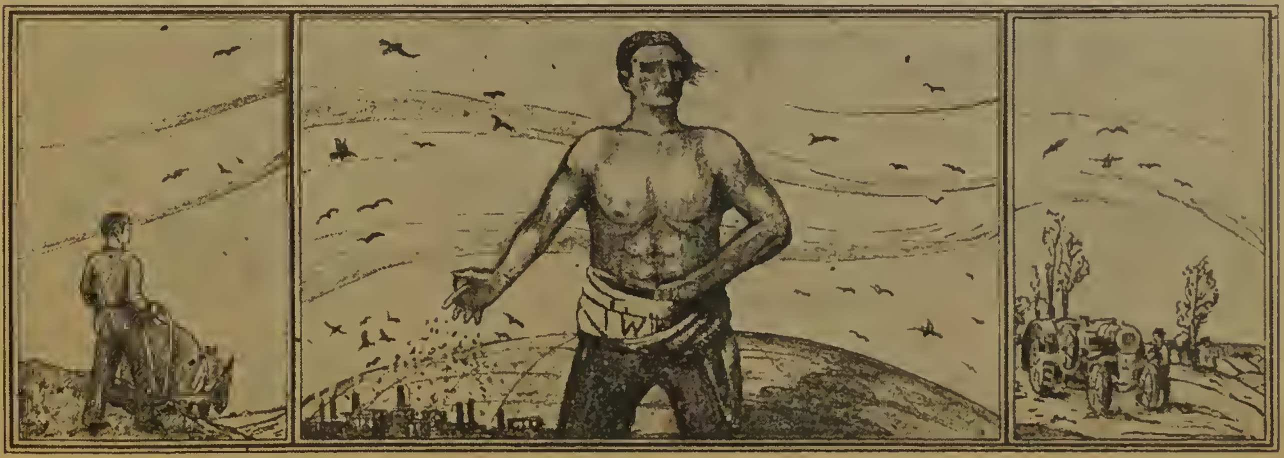
Medical progress is as thoroughly nullified by the capitalist system as is technological progress. Work could be a means of physical development; but mass production as carried on for profit means monotony, overstrain, fatigue, accidents, deaths, industrial diseases. It is technically possible to cope with the noise and vibration of fast moving machinery, with dust and gas fumes, with the poisonous substances used in industry—but it is not profitable and, therefore, unbusinesslike. Child labor in industry, poor food, poor clothing, poor housing, all serve to handicap us from the start. Accidents outside of industry are largely the result of the capitalist system. People drive poor cars not out of perversity, but out of poverty. Speed craze is born of the speed-up of intensified industry. Traffic is congested by the planlessness of transportation and lack of city planning and the use of individual transport where a public transport service, run for use, would be more economical and more convenient. Most accidents in the home result from doing things haphazardly there that a saner social order would do more systematically in industry. Diseases develop unchecked because people can not afford doctors. Contagion surrounds most of us because of the needless squalor born of needless poverty. The very nature of contagion makes disease a social problem rather than an individual one; but a profit system that depends upon the breaking up of solidarity for its perpetuation can not apply the results of modern science to the health of mankind. Capitalism forbids normal home life to millions of its wage slaves; it extends the concept of saleability even to sex, and mankind is scourged with venereal diseases as a consequence. Fear, worry, penny-pinching, poverty, all nullify the advances that science has made possible in the health of mankind.

We charge that the resources of science, technique, and production that should be used to make mankind healthy are used instead for the culminating insanity of large scale capitalist war. Capitalism breeds war. It is a system of production for the market and war is the one market that is never glutted. From no enterprise is such profit to be derived as from the mutual slaughter of millions of the puppet-class. The abolition of this colossal racket, capitalism, would remove every occasion for this colossal insanity, war.

Capitalism Must Go

We charge that capitalism deprives us of the good life that could be ours. We all have hopes and desires for a nice home, the average comforts of life, security, peace and the other good things of life. With our modern machinery and our capacity to produce, we all could enjoy a better and a fuller life. But this will be possible only when the profit motive and wage slavery are abolished and the cooperative commonwealth established in the place of capitalism. Then we will have a higher standard of living. We will be able to enjoy the fuller life; we will be able to enjoy nature, music, literature and the other fine arts. We will have better medical and hospital care, for the work of doctors will be available to all, as it will be directed toward prevention. We will have a better system of education; all children will have the chance to develop physically and mentally, in a social atmosphere free from the taints of bigotry and prejudice, hatred, envy and competition. The diffusion of knowledge and the increased possibility to use technology to save labor rather than to save wages, will stimulate invention and research. New standards of life will replace the insanity, cruelty and irrationality proffered as morality today, and mankind will be able to act humanly once more in a world that is the brotherhood of man. But these things cannot be until capitalism, guilty of every crime that can be conceived, has been abolished by a working class that organizes to resist the conspiracy of capital against it, that establishes its strength by practicing solidarity in this world of individualism, and from its mighty strength brings into being the abundance, the security, the solidarity of the world that is to be.



GOETTERDAEMMERUNG

By John Hunter

Said the Mouse: "If ever there was a set of four-flushers, it's the human race! And they have the crust to call themselves the Lords of Creation."

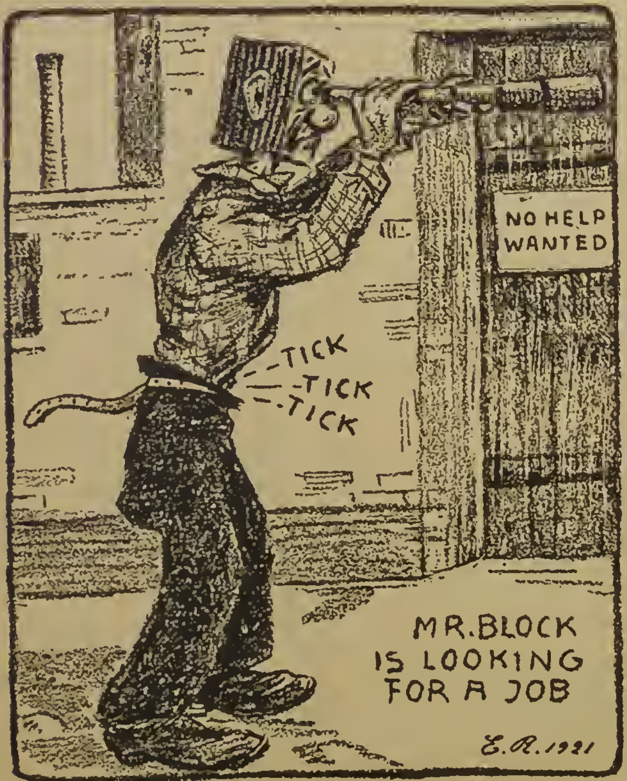
"Sit down," said Mrs. Mouse. "You are all worked up over your trip to town. You'll get a fever. I told you, you shouldn't have gone."

"But the things I've seen—yes, the things I've seen . . ." He piped and squeaked so shrilly about it that soon he had an audience of all the mice in the haystack.

"You want to know what it is that I have on my chest? It's this, my neighbors: We can inherit the earth and the fullness thereof. We can overcome the supremacy of Man."

"Nonsense." said his wife. "They have traps and cats and clubs, and they make walls that we can't gnaw. They are making it worse and worse for us with every sack of cement."

"But they are nothing," said the Mouse, "compared with the traps that they set for each other. That is what I am counting on—they are going to destroy themselves. You don't know how foolish they are. You thought these country folk were foolish enough when they burnt up the perfectly good wheat we could have eaten—"



The lordly master, Man, as represented by Mr. Block. If he doesn't soon do better than he has in the past he may as well turn the world over to the mice and other lower animals, who probably saw it first anyway.

"Now that wasn't foolish at all," said an old lady mouse. "If they had let us eat it, they knew we would become just that much more numerous and audacious. If you had only had a chance to chew up that book by Malthus that my great-grandfather ate, you would know something."

"But they treat each other the same way," said the Mouse. "Believe it or not, but these Lords of Creation could have plenty to eat, but they destroy it and go hungry for fear that they might grow too numerous and audacious. And these Lords of Creation could all have homes with concrete walls where no mouse could ever enter, but they live in hovels—and all for the same reason. They could be well, but they are sick, and for the same reason. Why, most of them have teeth that can hardly gnaw a piece of toast. And even with all their wretchedness they're so afraid of becoming too numerous that the buy things in the drug stores to make sure that they don't have children."

"They're getting ready for the biggest war that ever was . . ."

"More extras for us to chew," interrupted one fat old mouse.

"More ships for us to travel in," said another.

"More corpses for us to chew," said still another.

"If the carrion crows don't eat them first," broke in a fourth.

"We won't even have to travel," said the Mouse. "They are going to rain death down on the cities with shell and poison gas, and we can nibble to our hearts' content."

"It will kill you too then," said Nervous Nellie, the skinniest mouse in the haystack. "You will eat, and get thirsty, and drink water and die, just like my grandfather did when he helped bring over the bubonic plague."

"But we won't all die," exuberated the Mouse, "and we mice will never be foolish enough to start killing ourselves off like people do, so we shall inherit the earth. Come, Minnie," he said to his Frau, "let us retire into the haystack awhile, for our race must expand and take over the earth from these crazy Lords of Creation."

TWO POEMS

By Covington Hall

For Instance

There was once a strange old doctrine that two and two made four,
That nothing unto nothing added ever made it more;
But we live to learn, my brothers, and the things that once we knew—
Or thought we did—for certain are no longer fixed and sure.

For instance: our granddads thought the more they raised the more they had;
The sight of fatted herds and fertile fields made all hearts glad;
The countryside was full of cheer, the houses rang with song;
The farer was a welcome guest the feasting crowd among.

But since those days of innocence the world has wiser grown,
And statesmen have discovered things that never erst were known;
Where granddad held that plenty was "a blessing from on high,"
We know today abundance means a famine time is nigh.

This last, indeed, may sound insane, but this remember, friend,
That progress is a hard thing for a sage
to comprehend;
That great economists have found that ten times two makes one,
And the causes of our panics are the cyclones on the sun.

L'Envoi

Our granddads were not Liberals: they called a spade a spade,
And harbored the delusion that by labor
all was made;
But then our granddads never had a brain-trust
them to guide,
To tell them what to plant and when, or how to skin a hide;
And so they went in ignorance, our granddads,
to their doom,
But never was, "Here Lies a State Slave," writ on any tomb.

The Wisdom of Onc' Pierre

He soliloquizes on the Highpriests of the State, Church, Craft and Chamber, and agrees with the Prophets.

"The Hierarchs," said Onc' Pierre, "are traitors to the truth,
Are saboteurs of liberty, are bondagers
of youth;
Where'er their tribe is vested with the royal right to rule,
The toiler feeds the usurer, the genius serves the fool;
In Russia as America, in Mecca as in Rome,
'Tis the people's wealth that glitters on their gilded temple dome.

"Over all the seas and continents their poisons daily spread,
They graft upon the living and they prey
upon the dead;
While kneeling at the altars of the Christus
they have slain,
They conspire with praetorians their evil
ends to gain;
They fill the world with broken hearts,
with murdered minds and souls,
And salve their guilty consciences with charities and doles.

"Thru all the bitter ages they have plotted,
schemed and planned
To servilize the nations and the common wealth command;
For centuries on centuries they've spread the creed of hate
Their power-lust to satisfy, their greed to satiate;
They were, and will forever be, the profiteers of strife,
The mortal foes of liberty, the enemies of life.

"But no night lasts forever, is, of history,
the sum—
The Hierarchs shall vanquished be—the Golden Age shall come!
It shall come in all the glory that the prophets have foretold,
With peace and bread for every one, and no one asking gold.

What Is Americanism?

By IDA RICHARDS

"So you've come to me for advice, have you?" said the Old Politician to the Young Politician. "You want to know how to succeed in politics, do you?" The Young Politician inclined his head.

"I do," he replied. "Will you tell me?"

The Old Politician was silent for a moment.

"Times change," he said at last, "and I dare say there are new issues now in politics that there weren't in the good old days. The technic is somewhat different, too. However, the basic principles remain the same and after all, the issues don't really matter; it's what you say about them that counts, and I can tell you what to say about them. Very well, I'll advise you. First of all, if you're running for office in these days, you must run as a hundred-per-cent American candidate."

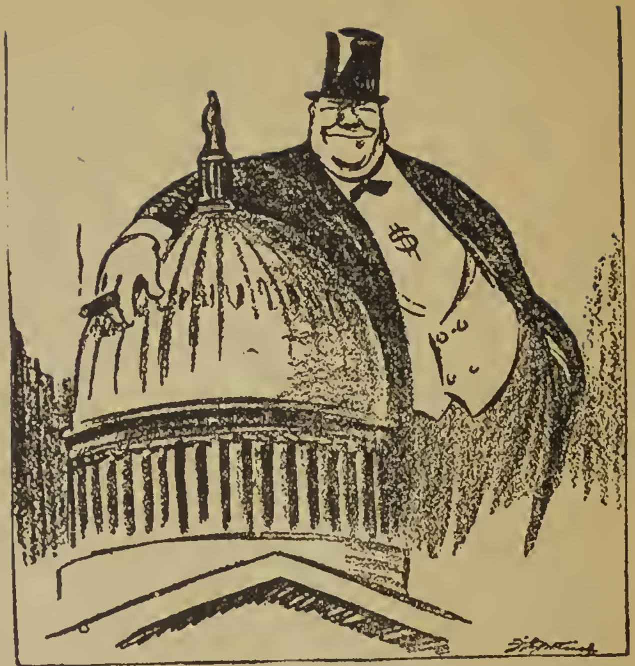
The Young Politician's eyes clouded with perplexity.

"What is Americanism?" he asked, "and how does one figure it on percentage basis?"

The Old Politician brought down his fist on the table with a crash.

"You aspire to political office, and ask a question like that!" he exclaimed in a voice of wrath. "Never question what hundred-per-cent Americanism is, even to yourself. If you do, somebody else will question too, nothing could be more fatal. Don't try to define it; assert it. Say, you're hundred percent, and your opponent isn't. Intimate that if George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, and Abraham Lincoln went over your opponent with a slide rule and an adding-machine, they couldn't make him add up to more than ninety-nine percent. If he's out for a seven-cent fare or a new set of municipal waterworks, tell the people that such things are un-American. Say that he's dodging the issue, and the issue is Americanism." He paused. "If you were my opponent, and asked what Americanism is, I'd double you up. 'Think of it, my fellow-citizens. He doesn't even know what Americanism is. Is that the kind of man to hold office in the country of Washington and Lincoln?' "

The Young Politician looked round uneasily to make sure that they were indeed alone, for the Old Politician was almost shouting.



"Please," said the Young Politician, "not so loud! I won't ask that question again. I see your point. What else do you advise?"

"You must learn," continued the Old Politician, "to be a good denouncer."

"A good what?"

"Denouncer. Keep your eyes open for objects of popular disapproval, and when you've got hold of the people, denounce them. At present I should advise you to denounce the high cost of living, the profiteers, and the Bolshevists. Next year, of course, the list may be quite different, but for the present those three are the objects of denunciation."

"What bothers me," suggested the Young Politician in a hesitating voice, "is that it may be rather hard to drag those things into the campaign. Suppose, for example, I'm pledged to broaden the Main Street of the city upon my election to the city council. Won't it be rather hard to tie Main Street and the Bolshevists together?"

The Old Politician looked upon the troubled face of the Young Politician with disgust.

"You're a great politician, you are," he said wearily. "Tie them together? Don't be so ridiculously logical." He rose to his feet, and as he did so, he smote the table once more with his fist. "Gen-tle-men," he cried hoarsely, surveying an imaginary audience with his glittering eye, "there is a movement on foot in this country, this very state, nay, this very city, to undermine our Congress, to topple over the Constitution, to put a bomb under our President! Confronted by such a menace to our President and our democratic institutions, what, gentlemen, shall be our answer? Let us broaden Main Street, as Washington would have broadened it, as Lincoln would have broadened it, and let us put down the red flag wherever it shows its head."

"Its mast," corrected the Young Politician, visibly moved.

"Thank you for those courageous, those hundred-per-cent words. I shall try to strike that note. But there is something else I want to ask. Suppose I am elected. What shall I do while I hold office in order that I may become ultimately eligible for still higher office?"

"In that case," replied the Old Man, who by this time had subsided into his chair, "you must not merely denounce the high cost of living, the profiteers and the Bolshevists, you must campaign against them."

"But suppose I am commissioner of roads or an attorney-general," inquired the Young Politician. "In that case nearly all such things lie outside my province. How can I campaign against them?"

"My dear young man," said the Old Politician with a weary smile, "don't bother about your province, as you call it. Your job will undoubtedly be uninteresting and the public won't know anything about it or care anything about it, and the test of your success will be your ability to conduct campaigns which have nothing to do with your job, and therefore stand some chance of interesting the public. There is no reason why even an attorney-general shouldn't campaign against anything, provided he handles his campaign right.

"The principal thing to bear in mind is that you must begin your campaign noisily and end it so quietly that the sound of the ending is drowned in the noise of the next campaign's beginning. That will put you on the front page again. Then when the conference meets, address them, tell them they've got to make conditions better, simply got to. Then after you have the conference well started, step out. Don't stay with them; they may begin asking you constructive questions. Step clear of the thing, and start a new campaign.

"I can't over-emphasize the fact that when the conference is well started you must help the public to forget about it, and stir up interest in something new. Flay the profiteers. Rap the Bolshevists while you're deciding what your next campaign shall be. Don't let the people's minds run back to the high cost of living, or they'll be likely to notice that it hasn't gone down. Refer constantly to the success of your own campaigns, and keep the public mind moving."

The Young Politician was visibly impressed, but apparently a doubt still lingered in his mind.

"There's one thing I'm afraid I don't understand," he said at last. "All this denouncing and rapping and probing—isn't it likely to look rather destructive? Will people want to vote for a man whose pleasantest mood is one of indignation?"

"My dear young man," replied the Old Politician, "I fear that you misunderstand me. A politician must be always pleasant to the people who are about him, and denounce only persons who are not present.

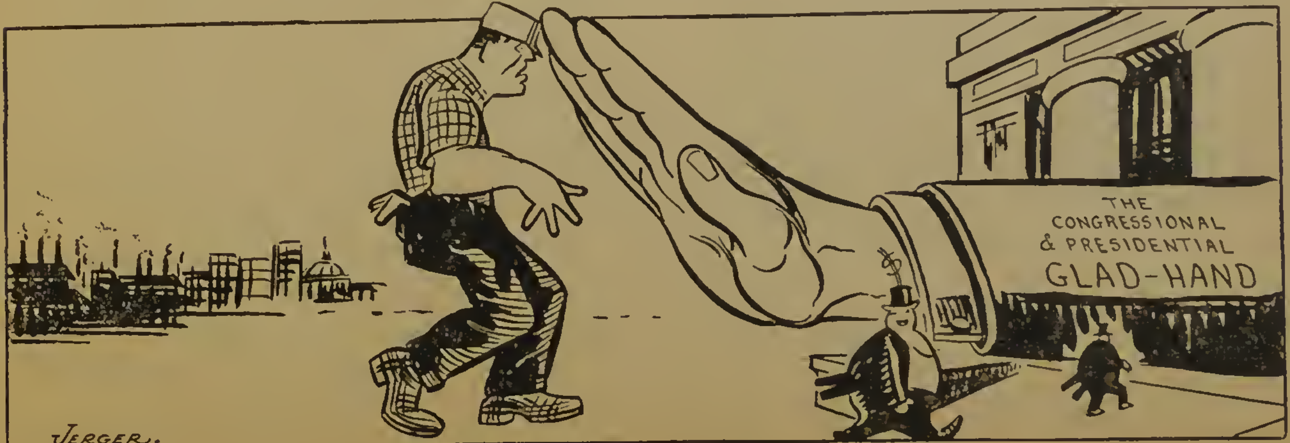
"Finally, give them a little patriotic rapture. Tell them this is a new age we're in. Picture to them how the capitalist and the workingman walk hand in hand with their eyes on the flag. Make the great heart of America throb for them. Unpleasant? Why, if you top off with a heart-throb, you can make the most denunciatory speech delightful for one and all."

The Young Politician rose. "I see," he said. "Thank you. Have you any other advice?"

"Merely one or two minor hints," said the Old Politician. "If the photographers want to take your picture, teaching your baby to walk, let them do it; the public loves the home life of its leaders. Always be affable to the reporters, but never state your views explicitly, or you may find them embarrassing at some later date. Stick to generalities. I think that's all."

"Thank you again," said the Young Politician, putting out his hand. "You are very good. You are—" an idea seemed to seize his mind, and his bearing perceptibly altered—"you, sir, are a good American. I'm delighted to have had an evening with a man who is absolutely one-hundred-percent Patriotic American to the core."

"Good night," said the Old Politician. "You're getting it very nicely. I think you'll do very well."



THE LOST INTERNATIONAL

By JOSEPH WAGNER

Discussion and even mention of the once famous Third (Bolshevik) International with headquarters in Moscow, has been diminishing in late years until at the present time hardly anybody is aware of its existence any more. Yet in former years one could hardly pick up a paper or a magazine whether radical, conservative or reactionary, that would not devote much space to that International. These writeups would be expressing love or hatred, respect or contempt, hope or fear, according to the social, philosophical or political inclination of the respective publications or writers. For Russia then loomed large and ominous to the rest of the world and the repeated assurances given to the world by the rulers of Russia that the Communist International was a distinct and separate institution from the Russian government would not fool anybody, neither the diplomats and politicians nor the common people all over the world. Both friends and foes of the Russian regime felt that the Comintern and the Russian government were but the two arms of the same body.

But now the excitement seems to be all over. It appears that the present rulers of Russia no longer need the Comintern in their business, hence the silence about it. But the title of this article is not referring to the Comintern, but to the Red Trade Union International, an appendage of the Comintern, that seems to have vanished entirely without leaving a trace behind. And, since the International we want to discuss was an offshoot of the Communist International, we will briefly touch on the highspots of the latter.

Heir to the Second International

Originally the Communist International was created to replace the then bankrupt Second (Socialist and Labor) International, that was at that time thoroughly discredited with the world's working class on account of the treacherous conduct during the World War of its affiliates, the Socialist parties and the "free" trade unions of the warring countries.

For half a century preceding the outbreak of the war, the workers had been assured that the international solidarity engendered by the Socialist parties in all countries could and would prevent an international war, only to see themselves driven into the shambles with the blessings of the leaders of that same Socialist movement. The end of the war found the Socialist parties and their allied trade unions broken to pieces and the workers disgusted with them.

So that when at that time the Bolshevik wing of the Russia Social Democracy, that had led a successful revolution in Russia, took the initiative to organize a new revolutionary proletarian International, the response was far and wide and enthusiastic. Workers' organizations all over the world signified willingness to join with the valiant Russian workers. Not only Socialists, but even anarcho-syndicalist organizations everywhere passed resolutions endorsing the new International and pledging full solidarity with it.

Little of the actual facts were known, beyond that a revolution was carried out, that the master class was dispossessed, and that the workers had been emancipated from wage slavery. It was considered natural that the true-blue revolutionists who carried the revolution to a successful issue in one of the largest countries of the world should be entrusted with the leading role in that International.

Attack on the Labor Movement

But these Bolshevik leaders were at the time confronted with another gigantic task: the reconstruction of organized social and economic life of a vast country in ruin and in chaos, in the midst of foreign and civil wars. The method chosen by them (or that was forced on them) for attaining their aim was the dictatorship (they called it the "proletarian dictatorship"). Strong arm methods were used exclusively. One had to obey the dictates from above or be unceremoniously bumped off.

We are not here discussing whether they could or could not have used different methods to attain the same objects. At any rate, in the desperate situation they were confronted with, they made use of any and all means to maintain what they attained and to forge ahead with their plans.

They needed the effective aid of the working class of other countries to whom they sent frequent appeals. The leaders of the old Social Democracies were not too friendly with the Bolsheviks and the regime they were establishing in Russia, and were fighting against the spread of Bolshevism in their respective countries. The Russian rulers thereupon made use of the newly formed International to break up and liquidate the Socialist parties and their "free" trade unions (as well as any other labor organization that would not take dictation from Moscow), to take over the membership of the disrupted organizations and form sections of the Communist International with them.

They introduced the same ruthless dictatorial methods into the Comintern as the ones they were ruling Russia with. Democracy was abolished not only within Russia, but also in all the Communistic organizations in other lands. Emissaries with full power were sent from Moscow to supervise and to boss the work of breaking up of workers' political and economic organizations.

These emissaries would unseat officials regularly elected by the membership of the Communist sections and fill their places with appointees. Valuable and capable members and even whole organizations were expelled from the Communist fold by these emissaries. As Russia did not have a surplus of capable organizers, it would entrust such agencies to all kinds of shady characters and imposters, who often turned out to have been secret service men of the various bourgeois governments.

Nothing of any value to Russia was accomplished by these ruinous tactics, but the labor movements of all countries were in the long run systematically and almost completely ruined. Now, the present ruler apparently has found out that it is wasted money and energy, and the Comintern is being kept in the background.

Red Trade Union International

But to come back to the vanished Red Trade Union International. As stated above, when the Third International was launched, very little of actual facts was known of Russia outside its boundaries, and the workers all over the world greeted the Moscow International with joy and pledged solidarity with it. But as soon as a little of the truth became known, the best elements of the working class became cooler towards it. The militant proletariat did not relish being bossed in its unions by politicians and impostors of all kinds.

The powerful syndicalist movement of several countries of Europe and of Spanish America would not even hear of affiliation with political parties or a political International. Besides, the structure of labor unions did not fit in with the "21 points" laid down by the Moscow International. So a movement got started to create a revolutionary labor union International.

In 1921 the I.W.W. and the European syndicalists arranged for an international conference to launch such an International of revolutionary labor unions. The conference actually met in Berlin that year with an I. W. W. delegate participating, but action was postponed, because in the meantime, the politicians in Moscow got wise to the situation and themselves sent a call for a World Congress to meet in Moscow, May 1, 1921, to organize a Red International of Labor Unions.

Delegates to the Berlin Conference decided then that in order to avoid rivalry in the field, it would be best to wait until the Moscow Congress had acted. The Berlin delegates decided to take part in the Moscow Congress and act as a bloc together with other syndicalist delegates and fight for complete autonomy of the Labor Union International from the political one.

The Moscow Congress took place, not in May as called, but in July, 1921, and there the Red Trade Union International was founded. But in spite of the fight put up by the I.W.W. and the syndicalist delegates, the Red Trade Union International was to be a subordinate of the political International. Some of the syndicalist delegates met later in Germany and founded the I.W.M.A. The I.W.W. did not affiliate with either of them.

Losing Favor

At the beginning the new International had quite a large following. The entire membership of the trade unions of Russia belonged as a matter of course; they had no choice in the matter. Almost the entire trade union membership of Czecho-Slovakia went into it at first, but in a few years they all left the Moscow and went over to the Amsterdam International.

In France a bare majority favored the Moscow outfit and a split with grave consequences resulted. Until last year, when unity of the unions was restored, there were two rival Confederations of Labor, one bossed by the Communist party and affiliated with the R.T.U.I., and the other, dubbed "reformistic," affiliated with Amsterdam. In Germany, they claimed three million adherents out of a total union membership of 12 million.

On orders from Moscow, these followers had to follow a very much zig-zagged course, at times building dual unions, at other times boring from within the "reformistic" unions, and at still other times doing both at the same time. On account of that their membership could not be approximated and they claimed more than they were entitled to. In England and the United States they hardly had anything, a fact that never stopped them from claiming large membership.

For a while regular Congresses of the International were held in Moscow, at about the same time with the Communist International. Elaborate reports were printed in all languages showing the great progress the R.T.U.I. was making. The industrial proletariat of countries of Central Africa you never heard of, were represented there by some Moscow politician.

Moscow Statistics

The AFL never lacked representation there either. Some adventurer who probably never possessed even an AFL membership card, would there represent millions of "revolutionary minorities" of different parts of the AFL. Statistics would show that the R.T.U.I. was growing by leaps and bounds and that soon every proletarian from one end of the earth to the other would be enrolled

But, as a matter of fact, the membership was at its peak when the R.T.U.I. was founded. Ever since that time it diminished. All the great oratory and resolutions of the Congresses were but cheap comedy. One could never understand whom they intended to fool. However, the Russian membership was real, and so for many years the farce was kept up, in order to have something for a future horse trade with the International Federation of Trade Unions (Amsterdam).

Thus Moscow gave up to Amsterdam its French membership for a consideration. It needed Jouhaux's (the leader of the French GCT) support in its diplomatic deals with the French government. And very likely the entire International was buried for some such political considerations. For the great Red Trade Union International is no more.

Last year the General Confederation of Russian Trade Unions applied for admission into the International Federation of Trade Unions (Amsterdam International), completely ignoring the past or present existence of the R.T.U.I. Can there be a better proof than that for the death and disappearance of the once famous International? And when will the Communist International be put to rest? The following appeared in the French syndicalist paper "Le Combat Syndicaliste":

"Three members of the Bureau of the International Federation of Trade Unions: Jouhaux, vice president, Schevenels, general secretary, and Stoltz, assistant secretary, went to Moscow, in order to negotiate with Chvernik, Moscatow and Nicolalva, secretaries of the All-Russian Central Council of Trade Unions, the affiliation of that organization with the I.F.T.U. It should be noted first of all, that there is no question at all of negotiations or of an accord with the Red Trade Union International.

"For that matter, Jouhaux points this out in his press statement, published in 'Le Peuple' of Dec. 3, 1937, in the following terms:

"There was no question of International unity, in the sense of an understanding with the Red Trade Union International.

"In ether words the R.T.U.I is finished and the Russians are themselves accepting this dissolution, as matter of fact.

"The same as in France—and all over for that matter—the Russians are now destroying, as far as their foreign policies demand, the institutions that their external necessities brought into being in former times.

"After very cleverly having themselves admitted into the concert of powers, into that inglorious League of Nations, where they played the nice boys, after having accepted the English plan for Spanish non-intervention, of control and blockade, the rulers of Russia made away with the Red Trade Union International, the last obstacle to good international neighborliness.

"Let's not forget that the German-Italian-Japanese anti-Communist pact has not been concluded against the Soviet government, but against the Comintern.

"Let's also keep in mind that the Russo-German and the Russo-Italian treaties have never been denounced by either Germany or Italy.

"We should also keep in mind that Fascist Italy has for long boasted of having been the first great power to recognize Soviet Russia; let us remember that it was Russia that furnished to Italy the gas and oil necessary for the war in Abyssinia, and that at this very moment it is the Russian gas and oil that enables the Japanese to crush China, the supposed ally of the USSR.

"Like the disappearance of the Red Trade Union International, that of the Communist International is sure to come. That will permit Russia in the very near future to come to an understanding—as it should between totalitarian regimes—with Fascist Italy and Germany.

"Once this great treason is accomplished, there will be nothing to hinder a Holy Alliance of all governments against all peoples. The unity of capitalisms, whether State or private, will be realized against the workers of all countries. That is the lot that is being prepared for us all by all the governments of the world, that of Stalin included.

"And then what is the exact meaning of the Moscow understanding that treats the affiliation of the Russian Labor Federation as a mere formality?

"Why has Jouhaux felt the need of stating: 'All I can say is that this accord does not contain any secret clauses, and that there are no secret documents!'?

"What does that mean? What is he afraid that they may deduce?

"If it is nothing, the precaution taken by Jouhaux is futile and mischievous. If there is something behind it, why does he say that there is nothing? Everyone among us, and outside us, will be asking these questions. And many people will suspect, with or without reason, that Jouhaux and his pals have not gone to Moscow to merely discuss the affiliation of the Russian unions to the I.F.T.U. and that this affiliation has something to do with the Franco-Russian politics that ensues from the pact concluded between the two countries. We think that that is the truth and we do not believe that it could be otherwise.

"We strongly believe that the affiliation of the Russian unions to the I.F.T.U. marks a new turn in the Russian policies, and that the disappearance of the Communist International will mark the decisive turning.

"Whether there are any secret clauses or not, or secret documents, it is absolutely certain that the Moscow accord will have an important repercussion on the foreign and especially on the internal politics of the two countries, particularly on that of the French 'Popular Front.'

"It is as yet too early to prognosticate, but that will be possible in a very short while. The General Confederation of Labor is the backbone of the Popular Front, and Jouhaux is one of the consular personages of the Republic. That is sufficient to indicate to us that the Moscow accord will have important repercussions in France. For the moment let's record this accord and Jouhaux' statement."

After a good deal of agitation the application of the Russian unions for affiliation with the I.F.T.U. was rejected. So now the Russian trade unions are not affiliated with any international body.

Like so many prominent Bolshevik leaders, who disappeared, who were killed and buried without the formality of public trial and without having had the chance to confess to unearthly and impossible crimes, the Moscow International is dead and was buried without any public notice.

Workers Are Staked Out Cattle

By Mortimer Downing

Whether savage or gentle, humanity is subject to production. Commodities are the sill and the structure of society. Human life would cease if labor refused its tribute. This truth is everywhere recognized.

But when wage workers are driven to desperation their only convincing argument is to cease labor until their demands are allowed. This is one of the contradictions of capitalism. Why?

Mass production has come. What is mass production? It is a scheme by which a favored few organize for exploitation of wage workers. Within a competitive society nothing else seems possible. Its objective is not the supply of social utilities but the gathering of profit. Profits to the few and "the public be damned," as was well put by the elder Vanderbilt.

But production is the first factor in that endless chain of Production, Distribution, Acquisition, Consumption. This scheme of things can not be changed although it can be raped by greed.

Take a look at a modern Public Utility. First, experts in greed meet. They analyze the situation and estimate the mass need of humanity. They figure out the cost of necessary machinery. They have a sure thing. But they are not satisfied.

Secondly, they plan a bond issue to cover every dollar they put into the enterprise. Interest is high. Every dollar is protected by a mortgage on the plant. But this is not enough.

Thirdly, they issue stock for every dollar, so that they take a double toll on every cent of investment. Is this the last step? No.

When profits are high, as they usually are in the marketing of publicly useful commodities, they withhold part of the profit and issue it in the form of stock dividends, and these pile up sometimes eight or ten times the original volume of the stock.

Now the graft of profit taking is complete. When wage workers strike the robbers show their books to the court calling all these stocks and bonds fixed charges and raise the cry of "Rises in wages force rises in prices." How about this scheme to pick the public pockets, while they grind their workers to the very bone?

Meantime, the wage workers, forced by starvation, eke out a bare subsistence and the public pays through the nose.

Workers, wake up. You and you alone can right this wrong. It is economic theft that faces you. You can not right it by a Congress that is sensitive to the stock market.

Why, in the rich pasture of civilization, stand chained to a peg which automatically fixes the limit of your feeding? Why be contented cows? As things are you seem to be more than satisfied when your owners throw you a hunk of rock salt to lick. You wage workers, and you alone, must organize to root out these evils. You have the power of the one complete monopoly—the sale of labor power. By joining One Big Union, legislating in your union halls, you can take this graft out of the hands of the Sixty Families, but you must keep the power and the ownership in your union halls and remember forever what you have suffered through the centuries of chattel slavery and capitalism.

A World of Shams

By A. B. COBBS

"Every modern institution hides a sham."—Marx.

A fellow worker challenges the truth of the above statement. He demands proof. When Marx wrote that sentence some 75 years ago, he took it for granted that even then all wide-awake people could see the fraud behind every organized body. But today one has only to listen to the spokesmen for the various groups to get the low-down on the whole works.

They admit even their own failure. The church, the school and the government in turn plead not only their impotence but their sins. A man that so much as reads the daily papers and still doesn't know that the whole world ought to be scrapped and rebuilt is asleep or a mental wreck—a total loss and no insurance.

Take any organized society, the Church of Rome, the Government of the United States, the Salvation Army or the Communist party, read what they pretend to do and compare it with what they actually do. Not one of them deserves the least particle of respect, at every turn they show signs of cowardice, imbecility and rapid decay. Whenever a problem needs to be solved, no matter how important or how simple, each group in turn will pass the matter up to the others and all together try to blame the public.

A remark by another social student, Lewis Morgan, fortells their doom: "Every institution that attains permanence will be found linked with a perpetual want." Our present day groups fulfill no needs, are fraudulent, parasitic and all of them must be reformed or die. Human desires are everlasting and to serve them we must have organs that further our ends instead of those that, when we ask for bread, hand out stones. Humanity will suffer greater calamities than ever before unless and until institutions are built to care for our needs instead of merely to hoodwink the people while they are being exploited. The population is in advance of its leaders; this situation cannot last.

In the Old World, the gangs that have ruled and robbed for centuries have now fallen so low that even the reactionaries are deserting them. The British Government, that so recently acted as sales-manager for the idea of "Making the World Safe for Democracy," has now come out to do everything possible to stop the upsurge of democracy in Spain. Its interference in Russia made democracy difficult and a dictatorship all but inevitable. The Roman Hierarchy, dedicated to the Prince of Peace, sanctified the gas that poisoned the Abyssinians, blessed the dynamiting and burning of women and children in Spain, the most Catholic country in Europe. The totalitarian states, pernicious, parasitic, fatal to all that is good in human nature, have at least one thing to their credit; they have torn away the mask of hypocrisy that heretofore has veiled the villainies of these others.

When the Constitution for these United tSates was drafted, many voices were raised against it as an instrument designed by the rich to oppress the poor. Since its adoption whenever questions arose relative to the importance of human rights as against property rights, the rights of property and the sacredness of contracts have almost invariably been held by the court to be supreme. Those phrases in the Preamble about Liberty, Justice, Freedom and the General Welfare are not law but sarcasm. As a result, in this land that has more natural resources and a more versatile population than any other country of equal size in the world, we find a third of the people lacking the barest necessities and another third threatened with the same fate.

The present Administration, in order to keep this lower portion of the public from getting too boisterous, and perhaps as a reserve of cannon-fodder, has endeavored to feed them at the general trough. But tories now as always, stand in their own light. They stand by the letter of the Constitution and is support of propery rights. Let the down-and-out live on the Preamble and its empty abstractions.

ORGANIZED CLASS-CONSCIOUS WORKERS
PARASITIC CAPITALIST CLASS
THE EARTH

The Feeble Strength of One

By
The Gadfly

"YOU CAN GET SAFELY ONLY WHAT YOU'VE GOT THE ORGANIZED STRENGTH TO TAKE!"

The green park bench quaked beneath the soapboxer as he shifted his weight from the flats of his feet to his toes and rocked back to his heels, socking a chapped fist into the air with an emphasis that seemed to clinch the argument for all his listeners—all but Pug-nose, who came to the park for his first time, and he did not come to hear a spouting radical, either. He came because he was miserable, just like the other denizens of the "public" park. But he was a man with a purpose, an ulterior one, to be sure, and he would not be swayed from it just because a Red orator looking like he had not a pot to spit in happened to jar him with a punch of logic.

The speaker zig-zagged through his night-time audience with a shoddy cap in his hands to catch a few reluctantly falling pennies and nickels. That cap served him well, especially during his oratorial matinees when the office crowds stopped to hear his radical humor. A few sparrows, not satisfied with their nests, eyed that cap covetously, and frequently embarked on imperialistic campaigns, dropping their splattering projectiles on the lid when the orator dozed beneath a tree. Else, how explain those splotches of encrusted avian whitewash? His passing of the ancient chapeau was the cue for some of his ungrateful listeners to break up into pre-occupied cliques that became pettily argumentative. Pug-nose spat up a phlegmy wad in a gesture of disgust, muttered "Nuts!" in a muffled tone and dragged his legs out of the park.

The grotesque silence of a residential section street corner at two in the morning. The clerk in the open-all-night drug store seems to respect the stillness, for, though he is asleep, propped uncomfortably on a stool behind the counter, he does not snore. The two lights in the window, a great green vessel on the left, a similar red one on the right, glow like altar lamps. Only the nervous pacing shuffles of a man on the sidewalk outrage the brooding solemnity.

This blasphemer, Pug-nose Riley, was formerly a prizefighter of expanding repute. But a long, sweeping upper-cut originating some place in the neighborhood of his adversary's right hip stopped him. The blow passed across his map in what might be termed a north-westerly direction, shattering the cartilage of his nose and plowing the ruins deep through the tips of his olfactory nerves. When the bandages were removed some weeks later, it developed that his sense of smell was obliterated. His nose was stranded ludicrously and irreparably beneath his right eye. He was informed that further participation in pugilism would certainly necessitate complete amputation.

However, fighting was Pug's only livelihood. "I can't quit the racket," he told the doctor. "I gotta eat, ain't I?"

The doctor shrugged. He was not concerned with the economic welfare of his patients. But in the corridor he met Nola, Pug's girl, a brassy peroxide blonde, an ex-gold digger who could not realize that the mine had petered out. He explained the situation to her. She marched into Pug's room with a determined expression; ten minutes later she emerged with a satisfied expression. Pug would fight no more.

It was exactly the moment when Pug's resources were quite exhausted, on the way home from the movie where he had sunk his last fifty cents on the tickets, that Nola discovered the 49.50 bracelet. She hinted for it, asked for it, demanded it, and finally published an ultimatum that henceforth for Pug the bracelet would be the sole key to her apartment. Furthermore, when the next evening he arrived without the bracelet, she made good her threat through the speaking-tube. Another time Pug might have gone to the service entrance and muscled his way in. But this time, having had nothing since doughnuts and coffee in the morning, his morale was down. He slunk away.

As many a capitalist hesitates to realize, it is an extremely simple matter to convince a man with an empty belly, who is not used to an empty belly, that something ought to be done about it. As a further incentive, he found himself unable to dispel his infatuation for Nola. Accordingly, he took the only course open to a man in his position: he repaired to the open-all-night drug store, desperately intent upon a stick-up.

Yet he hesitated, for Pug possessed a most virulent hoosier conscience, past dealings with which had taught him always to gain its consent before committing any misdemeanor. Stimulated by the cathedral impressiveness of the place, his conscience was working over-time that night. It required numerous and powerful arguments before it would let him proceed. Thumbing his memory, he moved back and forth before the show-window, his distorted face illuminated now by the green vessel, now by the red one. His memory gave him admirable support. It showed him the images of numerous acquaintances, all of whom were crooks but all of whom were swell guys. Grudgingly his conscience allowed itself to be appeased. Hand in pocket, Pug entered the store.

The proprietor woke automatically as Pug crossed the threshold.

"Mornin'," he said. "What'll you have?"

With all the haste of a rank amateur, Pug displayed his gun.

"All de bucks in de box, buddy, and make it snappy."

The druggist slouched unconcernedly to the cash register at the end of the counter and sprung it. But before the bell would cease singing, he jerked a small automatic from the cash drawer and fired twice. Both shots missed. Pug, dropping his gun, which was empty anyhow, dragged the druggist around the end of the counter. They struggled in the center viciously at close quarters. The druggist anchored to a four-foot, slant-front case of cameras, perfume and fountain-pens. It toppled against them. It carried them to the floor. It smashed. Again the gun in the druggist's hand exploded, its report muffled by the two strained bodies which sandwiched it. The druggist relaxed, groaned. Pug got to his feet and shook himself, cleaned the cash register and ran out.

He moved abstractedly, viewing himself objectively, as one drunk or dreaming. He hailed a taxi. The coin bore oppressively upon his thighs as he climbed in.

In his room, still dazed, he swallowed a double dose of sleeping powder and fell into bed.

Next morning when he awoke his consciousness did not immediately resume the thread of his existence. He put his left hand on the tap to turn on the hot water. He touched the switch of the light with his right. There came a jolt in his forearm like a cracked funnybone, like the blow of a sledge-hammer, like (thought Pug) the juice in the electric chair. The shock brought him to himself and at once the commonplace sounds about him assumed an undreamed of significance.

"Murderer!" rumbled the street-car. "Murderer!" yapped an autohorn. "Murderer!" ticked the clock. "Murderer! Murder! Murderer gets the chair!" yelled a newsboy. Pug rushed to pull down the window. The pulleys screamed, "Murderer!" He turned on the tap in the basin. "Murderer!" hissed the water, and "Murderer!" sneered the drain. Many were the mouths of his conscience. He cupped his hands over his ears, and in the surflike roar which the action produced he heard it again: "Murderer!" He began to shave. The razor was dull, his beard tough. Every bristle as it was mowed down cracked and stung, and, crackling, seemed to Pug to add its tiny voice to the rasping chorus of "Murderer!" flowing from the edge of the blade.

Feverishly, he counted his haul. The very clink of the coins accused him, but he forced himself to count. "Ninety-three-sixty," he announced defiantly. "Murderer!" his conscience insistently reminded him. "Ninety-three-sixty," he repeated, thinking of enough food to eat and enough cigarettes to smoke, visioning Nola's light yellow hair, her passively inviting grey-green eyes, her sensual mouth, her voluptuously curvate body. Pug was a gourmand: The pleasure of the senses formed no small part of his life's philosophy. The picture of pleasure which Pug imagined was too much for even such a well-developed organ as his conscience. It subsided.

Putting up a front of synthetic buoyancy, he passed down into the street and headed toward the U-Like-It Lunch. Before he had traveled a block, an awareness of something extraordinary and malevolent in the attitude of the crowd pervaded him. Something so malevolent, in fact, that he fairly traveled at a dog-trot in his haste to attain the welcome of Acropulous, the proprietor of the lunchroom.

As he opened the screen door, the amicably gruff voice of McCarthy, the promoter, an old friend of Pug's, called to him. "Hiyah, Pug!"

He felt relieved. "Oke," he said, and seated himself on a stool next to McCarthy. He looked out the window to see if people were watching him. Satisfied, he turned to McCarthy. "How's da chili?" he asked.

But McCarthy did not reply. He was perched on the far edge of the stool, his nose wrinkled in an expression of disgust.

"Wot's up?" demanded Pug.

Without answering, McCarthy went out the door, leaving his chili uneaten. Acropulous entered from the kitchen just in time to see McCarthy leave. In amazement he walked down the way behind the counter to a position in front of Pug, and stood peering out the door.

"Guess your chili ain't so good," Pug jested.

Slowly Acropulous turned his eyes upon him. His leathery features contorted into a sneer. "It's not da cheelee," he murmured significantly. Then abruptly, "Whadya want, huh?"

Pug managed to stammer: "Ham and eggs." He did not like ham and eggs. It was simply the first thing that occurred to him.

"Holy chee," thought Pug while he waited for his breakfast, "What's de matter wid everybody?"

"Murderer!" suggested his conscience.

"No," he gasped almost aloud. "Jeez, no!" Surreptitiously he inspected his clothes. "Coupla powder marks on my vest. But nobody wot wasn't lookin' fer it would notice dem." An unworded memory of something he had read in a Sunday newspaper supplement about a sixth sense sprayed through his rabbit-punched brain. "Gawd! I wonder if dere's sumpthin' in dat stuff. Can dey tell I done it?" Something tickled the back of his left hand. He looked. So violently were his tortured nerves shaking his right hand which held a salt-shaker that the salt was sprinkling from the cap. "Baloney!" he reassured himself, and banged the shaker down on the counter. Nevertheless, when it came time for him to go out upon the street and face the crowd a cold sweat soaked him.

Even the jeweler, in Pug's sphere the model of courtliness and suavity, treated him with deliberate contempt when he was buying the bracelet.

In the vestibule of Nola's apartment, he fumbled at the bell.

"Yes?" "It's me—Pug. Got somethin' fer ya."

The release on the door buzzed ecstatically, triumphantly. Pug took the stairs three at a time. In the presence of the reward for his extra-legal efforts, all his torments vanished. Her door was open. In pink dishabille, she awaited him.

"Oh, Pug!" she chortled, as he approached her holding at arms' length the bracelet, like a priest placing a sacrifice upon the altar of Baal. "Oh, Pug, I didn't mean for you to get me this." She threw her arms around his neck.

Then something happened. She backed away, and Pug saw in her eyes the embodiment of the attitude of McCarthy, of Acropulous, of the jeweler, of every passerby in the street.

"Why, hon—" he stammered.

Disdain changed to hatred on her face. "You—you—Get out," she screamed, "and don't you never come around here again!" She looked at the bracelet undecidedly for a moment. Then she tore it off and threw it in his face. "And you can take that to yer moll!" She slammed the door.

As he bent over to pick up the bracelet, apartment occupants all down the line stuck out their heads. He was rather hurt than surprised; it was beginning to seem natural, if inexplicable, that people should know him for a murderer. He trudged down the hall between the two cordons of gossipy faces, his head bent. Behind him budded a vicious twittering.

Pug wandered over to Harry's, stung and taunted at every dragging step by the faces of the crowd. He saturated himself with Harry's bad liquor, paid with his recently acquired money, and staggered to the down-town park. Harry seemed glad to have him leave.

As he advanced along the curvilinear paths, people shied from him, and after he had passed, many stood and looked after him scornfully, or giggled maliciously. "Know I'm a murderer, don't-cha?" he mumbled hiccoughingly over and over again, twisting clumsily in his stride to look back at them. "But ya can't prove nuthin', can ya? Ha ha! Nozir, ya can't prove nuthin'."

A policeman accosted him. "Think you better come along with me and sober up."

The desk-sergeant sniffed when Pug was brought in. He looked piercingly at him, and treated himself to a prolonged belly-laugh. "Begorra," he guffawed, "Oi've seen many a prize-fighter awaltzin' in the ring, but, to be sure, ye're the loveliest oi've yit had the pleasure of witnessin'!"

That night Pug enjoyed unusual privacy in his corner of the bull pen. In his drunken sleep he couldn't hear what the inmates were saying of him.

The following morning at eight o'clock they called him out to take him before the sergeant again. As he and his escort entered the room, the street door opened to admit a square built cop with a surly face. He headed for the desk. He reached it before Pug's party.

As Pug came up the sergeant was saying, "'Tis sweet ye're smellin' this foin mornin', Detective Levinsky."

Neither of them noticed Pug. Levinsky replied, "Nerts! It's that damned drug store murder. Gawd, what a mess! The old guy was buried under cameras and fountain pens, and layin' in a puddle of perfume. Got some on my boots, I guess."

Pug squirmed. "Murderer!" said his conscience.

His movement attracted the attention of the sergeant. "Guess you can go, Pug," he laughed. "Certain it is we don't want ye about here."

Pug turned hastily. But Levinsky shoved himself off from the desk upon which he had been leaning, and grabbed Pug by the shoulder. "Oh, no, you're not going. Not by a damned sight. You just wait a minute."

Several weeks later Pug stood upon the trap, waiting to be hanged. A guard knelt in front of him tying his feet. Another bent behind him tying his arms. The hangman fumbled under his left ear beneath the hood adjusting the knot. The priest—serving the state faithfully—stood to his right whispering nervously, —"Grand that this payment which this poor sinner is about to make may be sufficient, O Lord, and—" There was a twisting beneath the hood as Pug turned his head toward the priest. "I heard a guy lekchurin' in da park once 'bout organizin' with your class before ya try to take somethin'. He said it waz safer dat way. He wuzn't so dumb like I thot. Yeah, and Father, I waz just thinkin' 'bout dat time I wuz waiting fer my grub in de lunch-room." The priest, who was new to the job, was horrified. The hangman, accustomed to such things, merely grunted sorrowfully at discovering that Pug's ear was no longer above the knot. He rotated the noose to get it there. "Ya know, I was thinkin' den maybe it was da sixth sense wot wuz givin' me away. But jeez, I was part right. It sure wuz a sense—de sense of smell. Dat perfume in de case wot upset on me. Funny . . ." The hangman stepped back. Guards and priest followed suit. "Jeez, no wonder people wuz treatin' me like dey done. Dey musta thot I was a—"

There was a great banging of steel plates.

Off in the park dozed the philosopher spread out on newspapers beneath a tree. He was dreaming of a world without double hernias, without capitalists, without city halls, without jails. In his sleep he pulled his cap over his face, and just in time. The sparrow took good aim.

The Growth of Fascism in Russia

By
CHAS. J. MILLER

It is a far cry from John Reed and the revolutionary conspiracy in the sand dunes of Lake Michigan, with the World Revolution just around the corner; and now, 20 years later Commissar Hathaway of the Communist Party talking on "What Does Democracy Mean?" before the American Town Meeting of the Air, advocating the getting together of all people believing in Democracy, in a People's Front against Fascism.

No wonder the audience chuckled. No doubt some of them felt like holding their noses.

The Communists have mellowed with age like limburger, and like garlic, they are a small bunch, but, O Boy! whatever they are you can tell by the smell.

But how is it, that after 20 years, instead of learning by their mistakes and becoming a part of the revolutionary movement, they have degenerated to the point where they are more like Fascists than the Fascists themselves?

As they get their inspirations and instructions from Soviet Russia, it is there that we will find the key to the puzzle.

The history of the Russian Empire is the history of the dark ages. Starting in the ninth century, we find one thousand years later a great part of the Empire still in the cultural stage of Barbarism. And at the time of the Revolution only a small part of the Empire, in those sections that had dealings with other nations, had capitalistic civilization developed.

Retarded Development

At the time of the World War, Russia as a nation was a hundred years behind the nations of Europe in its economic, political and social development. The Russian Empire, the largest continuous area nation in the world, was at the same time one of the most backward nations.

This is the background of the present social development of Soviet Russia. It is also the basis of the psychological background of the leaders and the people. It is from this background of Czarism that Lenin, the selfless heroic realist, tried the impossible task of jumping from Feudalism to Industrial Democracy in one long continuous revolutionary jump. It was also the training ground of Trotsky, the egotist, fighter and organizer, and the foxy barbarian politician, Stalin.

The development of modern capitalism in Russia got its real start after the 1905 revolution. It did not pass through the slow growth of other countries, but entered into large scale concentrated capitalistic industry. These industries were chiefly engaged in export trade and were centered where they could deal in foreign trade.

In August, 1914, when Russia entered the war, you had these two extremes. On the one hand about nine-tenths of the people engaged in backward undeveloped peasant production, and the other one-tenth of the people worked in capitalistic industry production. About twenty per cent of the capital invested was from foreign countries.

The capitalists enthusiastically supported Czarism in the entry into the war, with its prospects of expanding and big war profits. But as the corrupt and inefficient Czarist bureaucracy bungled the management of the war, instead of a profitable victory, defeat stared the capitalists in the face. They became critical and demanded an ever more aggressive war against Germany.

With the support of foreign capitalistic interests and foreign government agents and the new younger group of officers, who had replaced the defeated Czar Guards, the capitalists plotted to replace Czar Nicholas with a "strong" Grand Duke, who would carry out the aggressive capitalistic policy.

But when the time came for replacing the Czar, another group took a hand and overthrew the Czar. It was the revolutionary direct action of the workers of Petrograd, strikes, demonstrations and food riots that shattered the tottering Czarism to ruin.

Direct Action

The finish of Czarism came when the workers ignored the Duma with its political trickery and betrayals and with the slogan of "Peace, Land and Liberty" turned to mass direct action.

This was the first phase of the revolution, March 8 to 15, 1917, which ended Czarism.

The capitalists in Russia were a minority group, and had developed under the Czarist bureaucracy.

With the destruction of Czarism, the capitalist class had no organization to replace it. They were left without any effective means to enforce their orders and they had no time now to organize.

They, with the help of the Socialists, who also did not have any organization to replace Czarism, tried to revive the remains of the Duma in a provisional "national" government of the usual "democratic" capitalistic type. This was on March 13, 1917.

At first the capitalist group controlled the provisional government, but because they lacked the organization and ability to deliver the goods, they drifted along with words instead of action and matters grew steadily worse.

In the meantime a new government had come upon the scene. On March 14, there was formed in Petrograd a Council of Workers and Soldiers. This council was a makeshift united front political organization to carry on the revolutionary work and propaganda. These groups were represented in the council: the Social Revolutionaries, a middle class peasant organization; the Mensheviks, right Socialists; and the Bolsheviks, left Socialists.

From this beginning the organizing of Soviets of peasants, workers and soldiers spread rapidly.

No sooner were they formed, than the struggle between the political groups for control of the Soviets was on. Things were moving fast. While the Social Revolutionaries and Mensheviks who controlled the Soviets were busy in the Provisional Government trying to capture control there, the Bolsheviks, a small determined group of the intelligentsia, past masters in the art of underground organization, were planting their men in key positions, undermining the opposition in the Soviets.

The failure of the Bolsheviks' attempt to overthrow the government in May was followed by the government control going to the right Socialists under laborite Kerensky. The Kerensky government acted just as all socialistic governments have acted when once in power.

Then came the second attempt to overthrow the government (July), with the vicious action by the Kerensky government to crush the demonstration with force.

With this treacherous counter-revolutionary action by Kerensky against the masses, the power of the Bolsheviks grew rapidly, and the agitation for "All Power to the Soviet" was bearing fruit.

The climax came when the All-Russian Soviet refused to call an All-Russian Congress of Soviets. The Bolsheviks, who now controlled the Petrograd Soviets, went over their heads and sent out a call for a Congress.

At this time the Bolsheviks started another insurrection to overthrow the government.

On November 6, Kerensky, realizing the end was near, attempted to suppress the Bolsheviks, but failed.

The next day, November 7, the Bolsheviks seized and dispersed the Parliament and swept the government out of existence.

The Soviets

When the All-Russian Congress of Soviets convened at the Smolny Institute, it was confronted with the accomplished fact. The Bolsheviks, with a left group of Social Revolutionaries representing the peasants who accepted the Bolsheviks' program, dominated the Congress.

The Congress decreed that the Soviets should be constituted as the Government of Russia.

They elected Lenin as President of the Council of People's Commissars and Trotsky as the Commissar of Foreign Affairs. The Dictatorship of the Proletariat was in the saddle!

On December 20, 1917, the Tcheka was organized and the Red Terror was let loose. At the time Lenin said: "No dictatorship of the proletariat is to be thought of without terror and violence."

All factories, mines, forests, railroads were seized and turned over to the workers, industrial production was placed under the control of the government. All property was socialized.

Trotsky organized the Red Army and there was fighting on all fronts, but after two years the last of the enemies came to terms and the Red Terror had put down the inside enemies, so by the end of 1920 the civil war came to an end.

During these years, 1918 to 1921, the militant Communism was in effect. By decree universal forced labor was applied to industry and agriculture. This was the real attempt to apply Socialism.

The war and revolution disrupted and destroyed a great part of the necessary industrial equipment. Vital sections, such as railroads, were disorganized and run down.

The Soviet, being a makeshift political machine, was now used as a means of running industry. The result was great confusion, the workers running the industries to satisfy their own needs, without any coordinating plans and no provisions for replacing, rebuilding, or the building of new industries. There was no surplus value.

Then came the two great droughts of 1921-1922, the peasant uprising and general discontent.

It was at this time that Lenin introduced the New Economic Policy.

Retreat

The New Economic Policy was a retreat to State Capitalism. Under the State Planning Commission (Gosplan) the state bank was restored and the nation was put under a capitalist money basis. Restricted freedom of trade was granted the peasants. Socialized production was replaced by state control, industry was put under control of trusts, foreign concessions were granted.

The New Economic Policy marked the end of the Communist experiment and the birth of Fascism.

This N.E.P. was the rock that split the ranks of the Communist Party.

It marks the highest point ever reached on the march of Communism.

It was also the greatest demonstration of the fatal mistake in the Marxian theory of revolution as propounded by the political Socialists the world over, that the workers can, through a political machine, usher in a new economic society without first building the necessary economic control over the processes of production and distribution.

The greatest force in society is the control over the means of life. Labor is the creator of the means of life. When Labor controls this process through its economic organization, organized for this purpose, organized from the bottom up through a revolutionary industrial union, then and not until then, will the industrial revolution be successful.

Let us digress at this point to investigate this vital point further.

The history of the Bolsheviks during those ten months was a wonderful display of ability and persistency in the face of overwhelming odds.

This group of "intelligentsia" with Lenin, their leader, used their knowledge of history, especially the French revolutionary period and the Marxian revolutionary theories, "laws" and lessons, as a guide to their actions right up to the seizure of power.

Going through the mass of articles on problems, aims, lessons, tasks, appeals and resolutions dealing with various phases of the progressing revolution, you can follow the sure hand of Lenin, even when in hiding, guiding the group, working out practical programs of action in accordance with the immediate problems, step by step, always working toward the goal.

The application of Marxism to the Russian revolution was fitting. Marx and Engels lived in a time when Europe had passed through a somewhat similar economic and political period.

In the French Revolutions (1789 to 1871) the workers wiped out one form of property rights, Feudalism, and saved France for the bourgeoisie with its constitutional, parliamentary, republican government.

The Bolsheviks proposed not to stop with the overthrow of the Czarist Feudalism and the capitalistic parliamentary government, but to organize a new society through the new revolutionary "apparatus," the Soviet.

With the Bolshevik-engineered overthrow of the Kerensky government and the seizure of control of the All-Russian Soviet Congress the Dictatorship of the Bolsheviks by way of the Soviet was accomplished.

When Marx formulated his maxims on revolution, he too, thought that Europe was entering an epoch of world revolution by the workers to overthrow capitalism and set up Socialism.

But in spite of the facts that the world revolution did not materialize, that capitalism was really in its infancy, that the first modern trust wasn't formed until after Marx's death, the political Socialists from that time to this have used his theoretical writings as a peg on which to hang their hats.

One of these that the Bolsheviks used is: "The proletariat cannot simply lay hold of the ready-made machinery of the bourgeois state and use it for its own purpose."

Not a Workers' Machine

This is a truth as far as it goes, but it does not follow that the Soviet is a machine that can be used by the workers for the workers' purpose. The Soviets were mass organizations and were later turned into a political machine and used by the politicians to create the dictatorship of the small group of intelligentsia.

Another peg used by the Bolsheviks was from Marx's Criticism of the Gotha Program: "Between the capitalist and the Communist system of society lies the period of the revolutionary transformation of the one into the other. This corresponds to a political transition period, whose state can be nothing else than the revolutionary dictatorship of the proletariat."

This, too, is true as far as it goes. But just look what a monster has been created from this plain statement.

The Bolsheviks, now the dictators, used the above to justify their action as follows: "The theory of Marx is the practice of the proletarian revolution in Russia. The dictatorship of the proletariat ruthlessly annihilated the rights and ideology of the old regime, and relentlessly crushes all counter-revolutionary movements."

We know that this "crushing all counter-revolutionary movements" meant the liquidating of any one daring to oppose the dictators.

The political Socialists of all countries have perverted these Marxian writings to justify their refusal to organize revolutionary industrial unions in preparation for the taking over of industry.

Society is a growth. The revolution is the labor pains of the birth of a new society. But the form of the new society is determined by the control of the economic organization formed in the old.

Ever since the days of Marx the Socialists have been steering the workers up the blind alley of capturing political power. And like Kerensky, when they got into power they had the bear by the tail, but couldn't do anything since they had no roots in industry.

Not only Russia, but France, Germany, Hungary, Austria, Italy, Great Britain have traveled this blind alley. Briand, Clemenceau, Scheidemann, MacDonald, Pilsudski, Mussolini, Kerensky, Stalin are some of the leaders that have led the workers into the bog of politics. There have been no exceptions.

The N.E.P. industrial success story has been told many times. There was rapid increase in industrial production. Then in 1928 the five-year plan was put into operation. This was followed by a second five-year plan which is now near completion. And never in the world's history has there been anything so gigantic, stupendous, colossal, as we say in America.

Extracting Surplus

Never in the world's history has there been so much surplus wealth extracted from the hide of one generation of workers. It is a fitting monument to the greatest slave system ever devised, and that under a so-called Communist dictatorship.

The introduction of the N.E.P. aroused a great storm of protest within the Communist Party. It was only the great dictatorial power wielded by Lenin that put it over.

This was the last important act of Lenin, who suffered a stroke in May, 1922, and never fully recovered, dying January, 1924.

During his inability, Kaminev, Zinoviev and Stalin carried on.

With Lenin's death, the fight for control came to the surface. Stalin outmaneuvered Trotsky, who was the logical candidate for the office.

With Stalin's ascent to dictatorship, he inherited the dictatorial power and prestige built up around Lenin and a weapon in the form of the capitalistic N.E.P. that Lenin had sponsored. Stalin now proceeded to repeat the process in the Communist Party that the Bolsheviks had previously carried out in the Soviets when they got control and wiped out all opposition.

The opposition to the N.E.P., that started out as a controversy that in any democratic organization would have been a simple, wholesome difference of opinion as to the methods of reaching the goal, was driven by tyranny to become treason. The responsibility for this treason rests with the tyrant. Tyranny is the cause, treason the result.

Dictator Can Do No Wrong

While Trotsky was busy organizing the opposition and charging Stalin with deliberately creating a new bourgeoisie, the Nep-men, foxy Stalin was busy building political fences and traps.

These activities of Trotsky that were counter-revolutionary plots, betrayals and frame-ups, these same acts by dictator Stalin were perfectly legal acts against the counter-revolutionist. You see, a dictator can do no wrong.

And so, steadily, as Stalin overwhelmingly defeated the opposition at every turn, these men of high intelligence, many with courageous revolutionary records and comrades of Lenin, were driven to further and ever further extremes to try to save the situation. After each defeat, a fresh opposition was started.

It was then an easy matter for Stalin with the control of the propaganda machinery to arouse the masses against all opposition. The record of the steps by which Trotsky was eliminated is an example of how the opposition was driven to defeat.

1924—Stalin gets job as Dictator.

1925—Trotsky is fired as War Commissar.

1926—Trotsky forms opposition bloc.

1927—Expelled from Communist Party.

1929—Tried for rebellion against the government and exiled to Turkey.

1932—Trotsky's citizenship cancelled.

Today, Trotsky, an exile, is a sick man, burning up with hate.

In the Fifteenth Congress of the Communist Party all leaders of the opposition were expelled. There was no longer any question of the absolute dictatorship of Stalin.

Another severe Communist Party crisis developed in 1936. Sherwood Eddy in his latest book, "Europe Today," estimates those loyal to Stalin as follows: "Some 99% of the youth and Red Army, 90% of the party and of industrial labor, about 80% of the collective farmers and about 60% of the intellectuals, professors and engineers who have not been dismissed or arrested on suspicion.

"But with equal emphasis I must maintain there is a grave party crisis of which the broad masses are not aware. There are strains, tensions and fear among party members and officials almost everywhere, and especially in Moscow.

"Never were so many party and government officials, factory managers and heads of departments dismissed, removed or attacked in the press.

"For every one who is Trotskyist or counter-revolutionary guilty of sabotage, a hundred are accused and a thousand suspected. Some hundreds have been shot during recent months and many thousands are in prison or in exile or have disappeared."

The "purgings" of the party, which have been almost continuous, have recently become much more drastic, reducing the membership of the party by one-third. There is a hysterical fear and suspicion which take the form of a witch-hunting campaign to root out all traces or even suspicion of "Trotskyism" and counter-revolution. This has affected industry with decreased production, which creates more suspicion and more political purging. Production, instead of increasing, is decreasing. This is Soviet Russia today.

Sovietism—Fascism

It is commonly held that Fascist Italy and Soviet Russia are the opposite poles of Dictatorship, Italy being the negative, trying to save a dying order, while Russia is the positive, building a new order. The new order of Russia is the most advanced Fascism. Fascism is the Italian form of Sovietism or vice versa.

Sovietism—Fascism—is the strict control, supervision and direction of the industrial, political and social structure of a nation, under a Corporate State, a Dictatorship.

A Corporate State is an institutional device for regimenting and controlling the agencies of national production.

The Fascist Party and the Communist Party are not political parties—they are an organ of the "State."

Mussolini and Stalin are the heads of the State and control the "parties."

Both parties are closed organzations, confined to a restricted selected membership. They are political machines. Out of a Russian population of 165,000,000 the Communist Party membership in 1934 was 1,872,488 or a little over one percent, while out of an Italian population of 42,000,000 the Fascist Party membership was 2,500,000 or six percent.

Both parties have a monopoly of supply of leadership. Both use identical governing mechanisms and political tactics and rigid discipline.

The "intelligentsia" in Russia and Italy lead the movement as a short cut to power. Both Dictators are ruthless, cruel, inhuman barbarians and depend on terrorism to stay in power. Both claim to "rule for the workers," suppress civil liberties; all are slaves of the State.

In Italy the workers are "silent partners" in industry. They are organized in workers' syndicates, similar to our C.I.O., and the employers are organized in their Confederations similar to our Manufacturers' Associations. These two parallel organizations are united in a higher organization, which is the Corporation. They are national in scope.

There are six of these Corporations,—1. Industry, 2. Agriculture, 3. Commerce, 4. Land Transport, 5. Sea and Air Transport and 6. Banking.

These are united in the National Council of Corporations which is composed of 52 Mussolini-picked men and 13 representatives of the Corporations.

The employers' Confederations are responsible to the State for the operation of their particular industry. The Syndicates are responsible to the State for the "Social Duty" of the workers to labor.

Labor courts are established; the State being the third party, maintaining strict supervision over terms and settling controversies.

Wages are paid "as best suited to the needs of the employes and the undertaking."

The collective Labor Contracts (Labor Bondage) are the real heart of the Corporate State program.

The Industrial Unions of Russia, instead of being the controlling force of economic life, are nothing more than the Fascist Labor Syndicate. You have the same conciliation and arbitration set-up, with the three-way makeup of the workers, the managers and the neutral third party, the State, i. e., Council of People's Commissars, which is also the Board of Directors of Industry and Agriculture.

You can imagine the brand of justice handed down to the workers from such an arbitration board, when the Commissars are the neutral party! The managers who may be shot if they do not carry out orders from the Commissars, and the representatives of the Union, which is controlled in every department by the Communist Party.

A Geographic Difference

The real difference between Soviet Russia and Fascist Italy is not in the "State," but is directly based on the difference in the economic geography of these two nations.

Soviet Russia is four times as big as the rest of Europe combined, or twice the size of the United States, or one-sixth of the inhabited world.

And what is even more essential, it has the raw materials basis of a complete economy. Russia has colossal stores of ore, fuel, lumber, water power, raw materials for the chemical industry, etc. With its vast resources it is self-sufficient—a "Have" nation.

While Italy, the very opposite, is a small nation. Including Sicily, Sardinia and other islands, it has a total of 110,684 square miles, about the size of the single state of Nevada.

Italy lacks in practically all necessary raw materials, minerals, etc., essential for a complete economy—a "Have-not" nation.

This is the real reason why Mussolini does not take over full possession of Italy's economy. He must have international financial, commercial and trade dealings; he cannot withdraw from world trade. This is the reason why Mussolini is in Ethiopia, in Spain, and has linked up with the other "Have-not" nations to make war on the "Have" nations for these materials. Mussolini's cry of "Communism" is simply a blind, just as is Stalin's cry of "Fascism." Stalin has got many things that Mussolini wants.

In order for Mussolini to carry on, he has to divide his power at least nominally with the King, Pope, corporate interests and international trade and finance.

Basically, Soviet Russia is not only not Communistic, it is more Fascist than is Fascist Italy. In Soviet Russia the State not only controls, it owns and controls.

Experience

There is no magic formula by which the workers can prepare to take over and run industry. They learn by doing. There is no other way.

Have you noticed that in all Communist propaganda, when they touch on the union movement in Russia, they always speak in glowing terms of the wonderful headquarters, efficiency classes, social work, everything from day nurseries to the two weeks vacation with pay; but did you ever hear one of them tell how the workers, through their union, are taking over the management of industry, replacing the tight grip that the bureaucratic dictatorship has fastened on industry and the workers?

At first the control was to be temporary, until the resistance of the enemy was broken. Years went by, the enemy without and within was defeated. The revolutionary fire has died down, the mold is set and instead of the promised gradual shifting of power from the Communist Party to the workers in industry, there has been a steady reactionary tightening of the grip of Fascism.

In 1918 Lenin said, "Russia is constructing the industrial State, preparing the conditions for a final abolition of the State, and the instituting of Engels' 'administration of things'."

Russia, after 20 years, has still to take the first step toward the workers' control of industry. Instead of Lenin's "the State withering away," it has become more tyrannical.

This is the real test of the sincerity of the dictatorship in Russia, and it has greatly embarrassed Stalin.

They realize the danger of this betrayal and are now trying to cover up their nakedness by taking another page from French history. It was Napoleon III that established a totalitarian state veiled by a form of parliamentarian government with its universal suffrage controlled by agents of the Emperor.

The new Soviet Government is composed of two chambers; the Council of the Union is elected from all citizens, while the Council of Nationalities embodies the federal principle with representatives from republics as the American Senate represents states. But they wouldn't even take a chance with this. Before the first election they had a wholesale liquidation of all opposition inside and outside of the Party all over Russia. Those elected were guaranteed 100 percent.

The new Constitution guarantees "Freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of assemblies, freedom of street processions and demonstrations . . . . these are at the disposal of the toilers . . . ."

Opposition Will Grow

With no political parties tolerated except the Communist Party which is really a State apparatus, the above is the Czarist and Communist idea of "liberty." For loyal Stalinites only.

In the Politburo, which is the inner ring which controls the Party, Kaganovich, Varoskeov, and Yezhov are the most powerful leaders around Stalin. Yezhov, who is in charge of the liquidating, has had a rapid rise to power. He is forty years old and, like Stalin, ruthless and is directly responsible for the fear and terror in Russia now.

They are driving on with ruthless disregard for the workers to the goal of complete Fascism.

Stalin's version of Communism is, "from each according to his ability, to each according to his labor," at so much an hour.

With State controlled propaganda for the masses, they have evolved a new religion, the new "opiate of the people." In the place of Jesus and the cross they now have Lenin and the tomb. Where formerly Marx, Lenin and Trotsky were to be seen on display everywhere, today it is Lenin and Stalin.

No stranger things have ever been done in the name of Jesus than are now being done in Soviet Russia in the name of the great revolutionist, Lenin. Out of twelve disciples, Jesus had but one Judas, but according to Stalin, Lenin had all Judases except one.

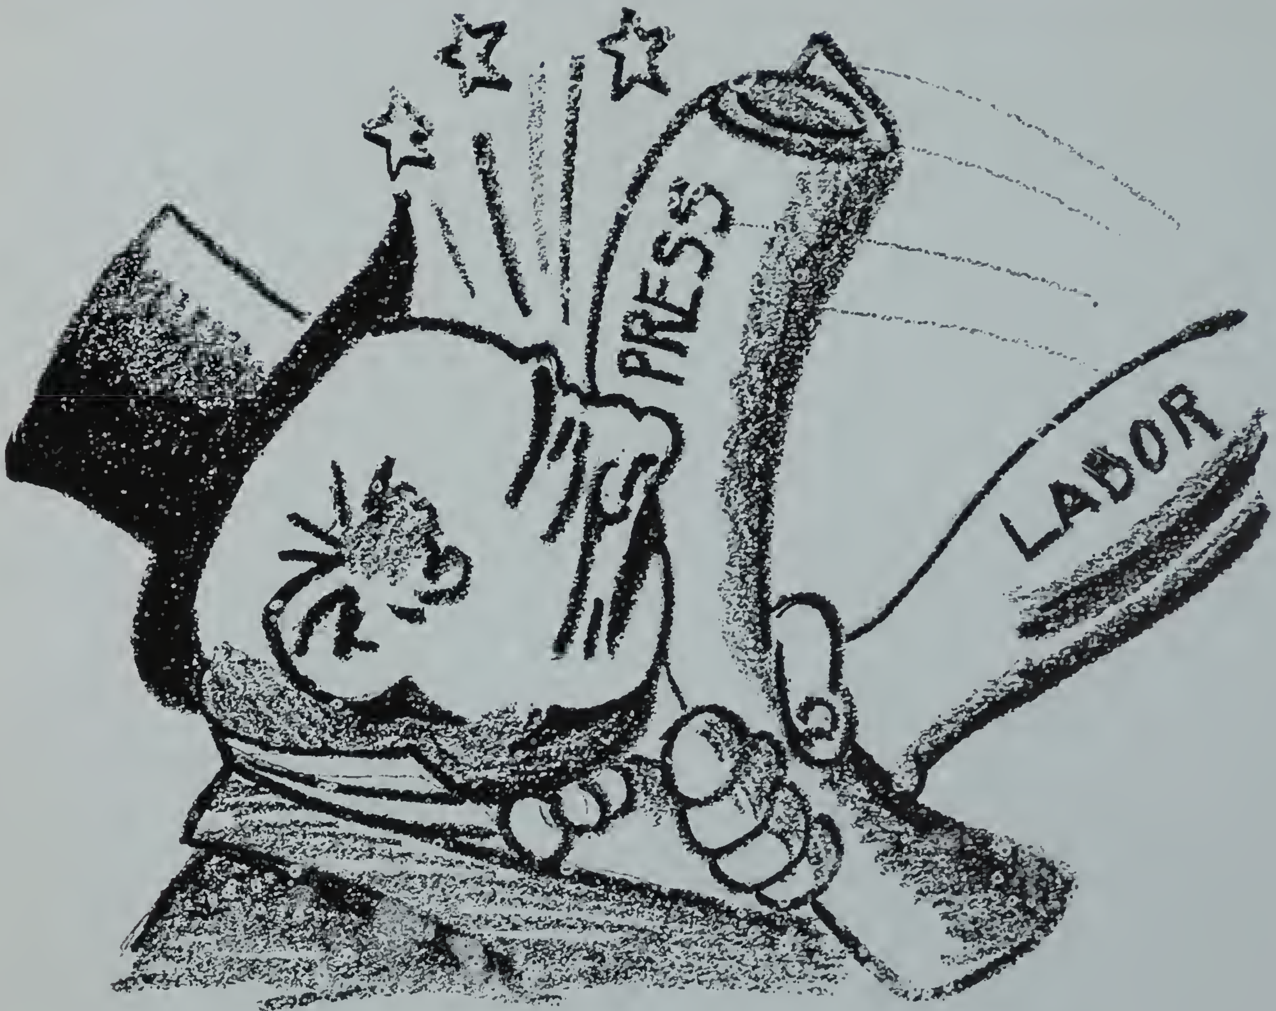
The new industrial environment in Russia will produce a new Russian who will not be satisfied to be treated like a cow, fed, milked, and when the time comes, be slaughtered, all for the Fascist State.

Already a serious food crisis (1932-33) brought about by sabotage forced the Dictator to let up. Again production is dropping.

In the mass of 24,769,000 wage workers the opposition, no matter what they label it, will continue to grow. The real danger to the dictatorship is in the necessary education that must be carried on. That, too, is the hope of the future.

The opposition to the new Fascism is growing and spreading in spite of terror. Fascism will meet its defeat from forces within.

This is the story of the growth of Fascism in Soviet Russia. It is also the explanation of the actions of the would-be Commissars in other countries.



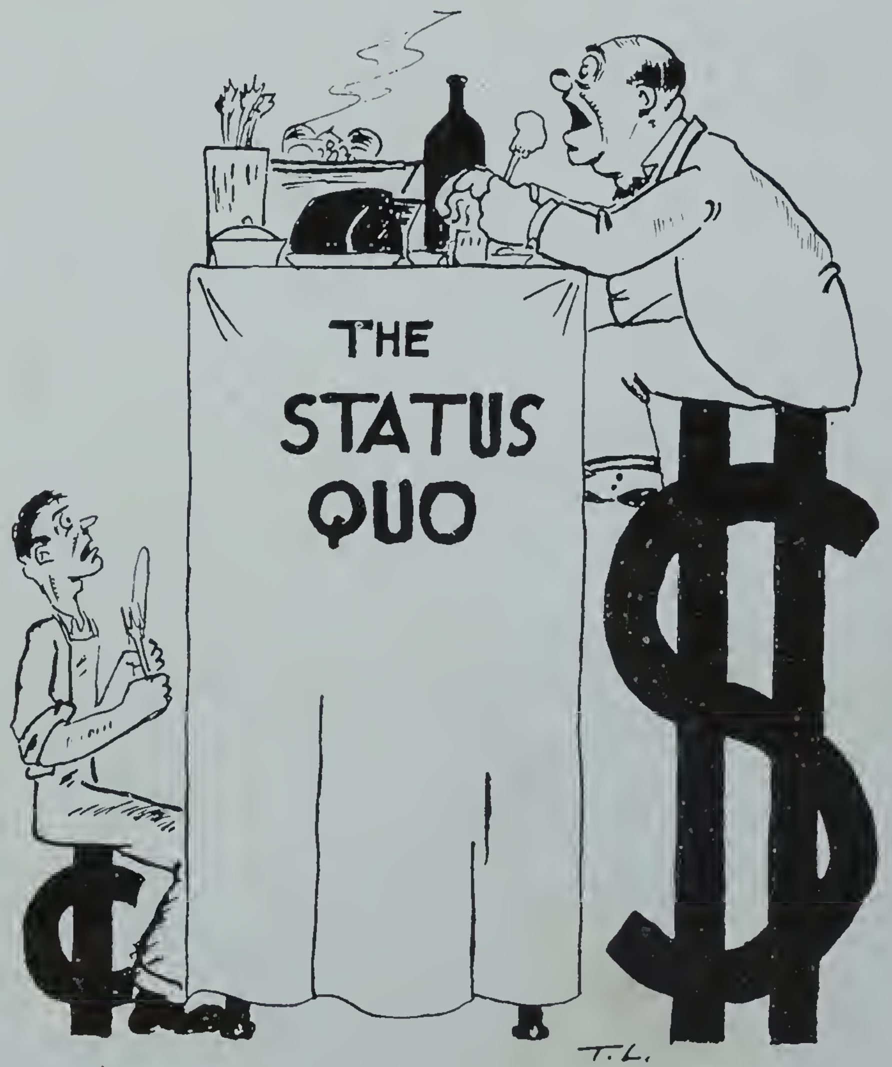
The I. W. W. Shows the Way

In Italy the compromising policies of political radicals were burried in a landslide of capitalist dictatorship. The same thing happend in Germany, Austria and in several other countries. Today the same calamity threatens in Spain, France and England. Every remaining democratic country is in danger.

It is the business of the labor press of this country to point out the danger ahead and the way to avoid it. The I. W. W. press does this, has been doing it for years. Our contemporaries almost without exception, and we say this regretfully, are following the road of compromise and collaboration—the road that in other countries has led working class movements to defeat.

To support working class rights, to build working class power, we must have, among other things, a strong labor press—and that, in this country, means the press of the I. W. W. Let's take a fresh start and with renewed vigor put it over the top! Let's make fuller use of it in furthering our drives for rank and file revolutionary industrial unionism, the only sure cure for the economic ills from which we suffer.

DOLLARS AND CENTS



When Mr. Cents gets organized in the Industrial Workers of the World he will knock the props out from under Mr. Dollars and the Status Quo into a cocked hat. After all it is Cents who produces the food, cooks it, and sets the table. He ought to play a bigger part when it comes to eating.

Preamble of the Industrial Workers of the World

The working class and the employing class have nothing in common. There can be no peace so long as hunger and want are found among millions of working people and the few, who make up the employing class, have all the good things of life.

Between these two classes a struggle must go on until the workers of the world organize as a class, take possession of the earth and the machinery of production, and abolish the wage system.

We find that the centering of the management of industries into fewer and fewer hands makes the trade unions unable to cope with the ever growing power of the employing class. The trade unions foster a state of affairs which allows one set of workers to be pitted against another set of workers in the same industry, thereby helping defeat one another in wage wars. Moreover, the trade unions aid the employing class to mislead the workers into the belief that the working class have interests in common with their employers.

These conditions can be changed and the interest of the working class upheld only by an organization formed in such a way that all its members in any one industry, or in all industries if necessary, cease work whenever a strike or lockout is on in any department thereof, thus making an injury to one an injury to all.

Instead of the conservative motto, "A fair day's wage for a fair day's work," we must inscribe on our banner the revolutionary watchword, "Abolition of the wage system."

It is the historic mission of the working class to do away with capitalism. The army of production must be organized, not only for the every-day struggle with capitalists, but also to carry on production when capitalism shall have been overthrown. By organizing industrially we are forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old.

ON THE RIGHT TRACK

The I.W.W., in its Preamble, as well as in other literature, has constantly pointed out during these past 33 years that real, enduring social and economic power can be obtained only through the control of industries, for those who control the industries also control society and all its functions.

Today there are fewer people who question this proposition than there were in the early days of our organization's existence. The growing concentration of wealth in the hands of fewer and fewer people and their corresponding increase of power has become too obvious to admit of an intelligent opposition argument.

On the other hand, most workers (the workers are the only people that count as far as we are concerned) still cling tenaciously to the notion that the control of industries from which power is derived must be based on private ownership and that the only way to get a redistribution of power is to go back to the conditions of by-gone days when ownership of the means of production was more widely distributed among individuals.

Of all the changes the future may hold such a reversion to a past condition is the most unlikely. Every development points in the opposite direction. For society as a whole there would be no practical advantage in having the meat packing industry, for instance, under a thousand managements instead of under three. There certainly would be no gain for the workers in such a change. A wider distribution of wealth will not help wage slaves who are not included among the beneficiaries. Workers employed by an unlimited number of little employers can be just as poor as when employed by a few big ones.

The only forward steps labor can take lead toward control of industry by a working class organized in one big union. Can labor build such an organization? Having built such an organization, can labor prevent its being taken over by the labor lieutenants of the capitalist class and perverted by them to an instrument of oppression?

Labor can do both. Moreover, labor will continue to strive, unconsciously in part, for that goal until capitalism has been overcome; for until then there will be no end to the struggle of labor for more of the better things of life.

Industries have been controlled by private individuals, by corporations and to some extent by municipal, state, and national governments. What's wrong with industries being controlled by a union of the workers who operate these industries? There's nothing wrong with that proposition except that bondholders, stockholders, politicians, and other parasitic elements don't like it.

But, after all, it is the workers and their welfare that counts and the I.W.W. calls upon these to unite in one mighty union so that they may make full use of their economic power for the further advancement of civilization.

The only thing that delays the fulfillment of this program is the sidetracking of working class discontent into sterile activities and compromises. If you are an I.W.W. you are on the right track. Tell others about it.

Victory for Spain

CNT-FAI BULLETIN

A message to the proletarian and anti-fascist world from the union men and women of Spain.

Republican and proletarian Spain has reorganized its strength. All sectors which have fought from the beginning of the war to achieve peace and victory are now represented in the new national union government. Those who were never dismayed in the fight to secure victory and a return to legality and prosperity in Spanish territory have joined forces in strength and harmony through a government whose fundamental objective is to win the war.

We know what this means for the proletariat of Europe and of the whole world, for the democratic countries which will be the future victims of totalitarian governments and for civilization itself. Contrary to the expectations of Franco and his fellow traitors, who on July 19th, 1936, rose in arms against the constituted authority, representative of the popular will as manifested at the polls on the 16th of February; contrary to the calculations of the reactionary generals who tried to trample on the Republic, longing for the times of the classic "pronunciamientos"; in face of the shameless attacks of the Italo-German High Commands who are directing elements in this war, we the Spanish people, guided by our faith in our right to be masters of our own destinies, have united, forgetting all our political differences, and through our united war government stand ready to fight and die in this struggle for independence and freedom.

The anti-fascist Spanish people have united as never before, and have made a pact for action through their two powerful Syndical Organizations.

We have forgotten what separates us and take into consideration only that which must unite us, and this is a great deal in face of our common enemy, bloody fascism, oppressor and adversary of progress and culture.

We are disposed to fight and win, not only because of our convictions and national interest, but because we feel sure of the repercussion which the war will have in the whole world, and we offer our uniting example to the proletarian and anti-fascist world so that they may adopt it without hesitation.

Who will dare to maintain discrepancies deriving from political or other creeds while the cannon thunders and the machine gun is directed against the proletariat, the anti-fascist world? The unity of the anti-fascist powers must take place quickly in all the corners of the world. Not a single anti-fascist should remain disunited. Not a single worker should be against his fellow-worker. The hour is critical, the enemy powerful and the battle extremely hard. We are obliged for these reasons to gather up all our strength in a solid bloc of anti-fascist unity to put up the unbreakable barrier of liberty, progress and well-being in front of the oppression and degrading slavery of fascism.

Where are the passengers?

Proletarians Awake!

It would be unpardonable that while Spain sheds its blood in defense of the rights that are sacred for all free men of noble and high thinking, that while we fight in order that peace may be free from the weight of Prussian heels and the Florentine dagger of the "blackshirts," the proletariat of Europe and of the world and the great democracies who are able to prevent it by their energetic and quick action, should observe a platonic and passive attitude in the name of rights and principles destroyed by the mercenary air force at the service of Franco, by the bombardments of open cities and the massacre of peaceful citizens, women and children.

It is high time to oppose the criminal fascist power with energy and action. Spain, we proclaim, will not follow the path of either Abyssinia or Austria. The repulsive boot of fascism will not succeed in crushing us, and if we are not crushed, neither Czechoslovakia nor any other of the small Balkan states will be enslaved, not even France itself, which is threatened more effectively every day. Or is it that France has not become aware of the fact that Germany is fortifying intensely along the Pyrenees with modern and powerful cannon to weaken even the famous "Maginot line"? Or is it perhaps that she does not know of the intention of Italy on the Mediterranean to cut all communication between France and her African possessions and protectorates? Or is it that both France and England are awaiting more promises such as those which were ridiculed by the bully "Duce" in Stressa and Nyon?

The cowardice of the democracies is leading the world to an abyss, to the abyss of a horrible war that will end civilization. The democracies, the anti-fascist peoples, and, finally, the proletariat, can still prevent such a cataclysm.

"ARMS FOR THE SPANISH REPUBLIC!" "OPEN FRONTIERS FOR THE SPANISH GOVERNMENT!" "ANNULMENT OF THE SINISTER POLICIES OF NON-INTERVENTION, WHICH IS INTERNATIONAL INTERVENTION ON BEHALF OF THE FASCIST INVADERS!"

The proletariat, the anti-fascist people, should turn into a popular clamor those demands for action and help for Republican Spain, and the democracies should proceed to enforce them.

Action—Not Pledges—Needed

This is not time for pledges and excuses. Action is what counts. The spark of Sarajevo has been collectively reproduced in Spain. The baseless amalgam of calumnies raised around our cause by both the home and the invading fascists, must be taken as such by all who have visited us and have shared with us a part of the struggle. In loyal Spain exists none of the extremes about which the traitors of Burgos and Salamanca have made so much fuss. The authority of republican order is absolute and it is upheld by all, absolutely all, of the representative authorities of the country.

Determined to conquer our rights and not to be crushed in the holocaust of our fascist aggressors, we will fight until the end, with the conviction that victory will be ours after all. Our decision is made. Our fall would mean the failure of all the possibilities of the proletariat of the world to crush fascism, and for the democratic powers the last opportunity to preserve peace. We are, and will be, a people who valiantly wave the flag of its liberties, rights and justice.

Proletariat, liberal and democratic peoples of the world! Our call for peace and happiness is your call! Our defense is the defense of your homes and families! He who does not understand our struggle deserves to be crushed by fascism in its advance that destroys towns, wipes out the culture of the people, destroys freedom and paints the world red with blood of innocent victims. Join with us, comrades of the world, in our demand: Arms and aeroplanes for Spain! Open the frontiers to the Republican Government! Away with the policies of Non-intervention!

JUDAS WAS A PIKER

By A. B. Cobbs

Another "strange circularity" is showing up in the educational system and raising little dust storms in various parts of the country. Some leaders claim that as only about five per cent of the students will ever go to a university, the school should pay more attention to mechanical and vocational training. Other equally prominent educators, with equally reliable statistics, show that not more than five per cent of the students will ever be able to get jobs if they do have vocational training. It is truly astonishing how square headed educators turn out so many insoluble (for them) circularities.

Until recently, long drill in authoritarian methods was found sufficient to keep the population docile and trusting. But, says a great philosopher, "Principles have no force unless people are well fed." The training of years vanishes when a man discovers that the ideas and institutions he has been taught to venerate are all of them phoney: that they are not helps but hindrances to human progress; that they protect a selfish few against the needs of many.

The scientific method of thinking should be introduced in the early years of schooling: it should be studied as a science and practiced as an art. Every educator worthy of the name must know this. But he also knows that he had better say nothing about it. Otherwise he will be an ex-educator, former professor, a red or an agent of Moscow to be hounded around the country like a criminal. So all of them keep quiet and help perpetuate the illusion.

But the end of this hypocrisy is at hand. The old ideas and institutions are seen to be unstable and incompetent to solve the problems forced upon us by the monopoly of resources, and the application of science to the various industries. The totalitarian states that were erected to protect ancient rights, ideas and institutions, turn into ravenous wolves, eating up the property and laughing at its owners, insulting the Church, and turning schools into military academies.

In the face of new and world-wide calamities our American educators have no program for saving their own institutions, much less for helping humanity. A few, no doubt, are praying in secret, others are preparing to become drill sergeants for some future dictator. As for productive thinking in such an emergency, they are as helpless as the students they turn out. They are a product as well as a source of ignorance, prejudice and stupidity. One thing they will save out of the wreck, they will be respectable and reactionary if they starve. A group of animal trainers would have more initiative and far more "guts."

Our educators take sides and write long articles about the relative importance of vocational training and general culture courses for some ten per cent of the students. So far they have expressed no concern for the other ninety: if they ever think of them at all it is likely to hope they starve quietly. Judas Iscariot was a piker.

UNSKILLED WORKERS DOOMED?

By Covington Hall

It would seem that the unskilled workers are doomed, that is they are if that profound commentator on economic and political questions and human affairs in general, Heywood Broun, is correct. And he must be, for, while Heywood is selfconfessedly not a member of the Communist party, he is a Stalinist. And who ever heard of a Stalinist who didn't have the Almighty backed off the map when it came to omniscience in regard to the ordering of the affairs, not only of this miserable planet, but of the Universe?

But that is too well known to talk about and, besides, is not what I wish to have my say-so on. What stirred me to attempt to shoot Heywood's works was this: Commenting on Gov. Phil LaFollette's recent calling the Progressives again to Armageddon, Broun quotes, "in part," that part of the platform adopted by the Progressives which reads:

"We flatly oppose every form of coddling or spoon-feeding the American people, whether it be those on relief, whether it be farmers or workers, whether it be business or industry. No government on earth can successfully manage, regulate and direct the numerous details that make for healthy families or successful business . . . Whatever it may cost—so help us God—we shall use the power of these United States to restore to every American the opportunity to help himself. After that, he can sink or swim."

Then Broun "shoots the works" with this:

"The keynote speech of Little Phil is sloppy in its composition and vague in thought. Accordingly, it is probably unfair to point out certain grim implications of his words no matter how logical those implications may seem. For instance, it is a fact beyond debate that in every nation there are many who are incapable of making any useful contribution whatsoever to the economic well-being of the country. There are always the sick and aged and maimed, but in addition we are accumulating many millions of unskilled workers whose services simply are not needed under a machine age and a capitalist system. I hardly think that the Governor of Wisconsin actually means that nothing should be furnished for their needs and that they should be rewarded only on the basis on their contribution."

(See New Republic, 5-12-38.)

Stalinist Ramblings

Agreeing for the sake of the argument that "the keynote speech of Little Phil is sloppy in composition and vague in thought," (although in both respects I cannot see where it "has anything on" the crap the Stalinists are shooting these days) it still strikes me that Heywood attempts to read an unfair meaning into the plank quoted; for the whole sense of it is that no nation can prosper in which millions of grownup men and women are willing to be "spoon-fed" by any government whatsoever, and that whether it masquerades as the "New Deal" or the "Proletarian Dictatorship." In saying this, I make no defense of the Progressive platform: for, if that is all they have to offer in this hour of crisis, they may as well strike their tents and quit the field.

Armageddon is no place for those who propose to use popguns on an enemy armed with poison gas, airplanes, tanks and heavy artillery and which has shown its intention in Spain and elsewhere to use them ruthlessly and without mercy. That much is certain. But when the Great Columnist goes on to say, "It is a fact beyond debate that in every nation there are many who are incapable of making any useful contribution whatsoever to the economic well-being of the country," and lists along with the "sick and aged and maimed," "unskilled workers whose services simply are not needed under a machine age and capitalist system"; and closes this unfactual assertion regarding the social uselessness of the unskilled by charging by innuendo Gov. La Follette with not caring whether or not the disemployed should be aided in their need,—well, then, it strikes me that Heywood is simply trying to make a political point or else is trying to head off a split-off from the "Popular Front."

Probably it is both, for certainly there is not an iota of truth in his innuendo that Gov. LaFollette just doesn't care a damn whether the disemployed starve or not: for the record of the LaFollette brothers, whatever else may be said of them, is all against Broun's assertion. Not even Roosevelt has made a more desperate effort to "spoon-feed" the disemployed and disinherited than have Bob and Phil LaFollette; and I say this who have never agreed with the policy of "spoon-feeding," but have ever demanded that "We shall use the power of these United States to restore to every American the opportunity to help himself."

If I have opposed the "New Deal," as I have from the beginning, it was simply because not a single one of its proposals tended in any way whatsoever to "restore" this lost right of "equal rights and opportunities to all." And I still oppose it and criticize the aid rendered it by the Progressives, and for the same reason. But, enough of that.

The Unneeded Unskillful

Let's talk about the "accumulating unskilled workers whose services are simply not needed under a machine age and capitalist system," a little.

In the first place: What is an "unskilled worker"? "Under a machine age," there is no such thing, only varying degrees of skill. For instance: Heywood Broun may be a very skillful manipulator of words, and is. But take Heywood Broun's typewriter away from him (and more than one member of the "intelligentsia" has lost his typewriter since October, 1929) and, instead, give him a shovel and a job on a railroad construction crew. Who will then be the "unskilled worker," Heywood Broun, or Bill Jones the Gandy Dancer? Verily, verily, I say unto you that Bill would put it all over Heywood in that case.

Further, "under a machine age," Bill Jones is, in my humble opinion, of far more service to society than, say, Heywood Broun and Harry Bridges, who, attending a conference of CIO "leaders" last year gagged at but finally swallowed whole Phil Murray's proposal that all "contracts must be rigidly adhered to," though it involved one "industrial" union scabbing on another. I know quite a few humble and "useless unskilled workers" who would see themselves in hell before agreeing to organized scabbery.

That, however, is beside the question, I suppose. So, what is an "unskilled worker"? Not only do I say there is no such thing, but so does Sir Money Chiozza and others who have had anything to do with superintending labor on the job.

It was during the World War that Chiozza discovered this truth. He was in charge of labor on the London wharves. Labor-power was then scarce and, says Chiozza, "we decided that the men working in the warehouses handling different goods, being nothing but unskilled workers, could be shifted here and there as we pleased; but, within a few weeks, the wharves of London were so congested with freight that a blockade was threatened." So, in their desperation, the skilled workers in charge of operations sifted out the crews, sending the men composing them back to their old jobs and, in less than "no time," the congestion was ended and everything again "running like goose grease."

This led Sir Money Chiozza in a book he wrote shortly after the war ended, to say: "There is no such thing as unskilled labor." And there is not, for, as George Bernard Shaw, dealing with the same subject, says: "When it comes to music, then I am the expert; but when it comes to an automobile, then the chauffeur is the expert." And that's the true truth—"under the machine age," especially.

Skilled Today; Unskilled Tomorrow

Furthermore, the skilled worker of today is often the unskilled worker of tomorrow, as many craftsmen have learned too late and at terrible cost to themselves and families. Ever since the machine age began this has been going on. Techological unemployment is not a phenomenon only of our times. It began to plague mankind when the hour in which the first "labor-saving" machine was put into use and has grown steadily worse from the day steam first turned an engine. It is not the machine, but the private ownership thereof, that causes unemployment and dole-ful misery to millions of men, women and children. If Broun is not aware of this, I advise him to read a small pamphlet titled: "Unemployment and the Machine." He can get it from the General Offices of the I.W.W., 2422 N. Halsted St., Chicago, for only 5 cents, or one nickel.

Lastly, I note that Broun qualifies "under a machine age" with "and a capitalist system"; but since the Stalinists today are moving heaven, hell and earth to maintain the status quo here as in Eurasia, his qualification, if it is one, has more the smell of bait thrown out to catch that part of the working class that is at heart and by instinct drawn to revolutionary industrial unionism, the only kind of unionism that is today worth a continental to these who must sell the labor-power of their hands and brains in order to live.

That is my hunch of what is back of Broun's qualification, as it is my hunch that back of Phil LaFollette's "sloppy composition" is the motive to keep the "Great Liberal" in the White House from double crossing the LaFollettes, as he double crossed Upton Sinclair, Bill Lemke and Senator Cutting of New Mexico.

Finally, I'll give Heywood this tip free gratis: The Stalinists are not fooling the thinking workers of this country as they once did. Neither is the "New Deal." And the hour is not far distant when the "Great Labor State's men" of the C.I.O. will quit trying to save capitalism or will be bumped off the map along with it.

Farm Workers And Farm Jobs

By CARD NO. 372561

Child beet field worker

Agricultural districts have been regarded by the employers of labor as the reservoir from which labor for city industries, lumbering, construction work, and mining is drawn when needed; and as havens to which such labor should return when slack time or depression knocks the props out from under business prosperity. "There's always room for another pair of feet under some farmer's table," is an assumption that even today is considered by some to be an appropriate answer to jobless workers' pleas for the price of a meal in cities not too far removed from farming sections.

There is work in the country, lots of it. At this season of the year, north, south, east and west, industrious farmers and their hired hands are working early and late planting, cultivating, and otherwise attending the crops upon which the nation depends for its food. But also, in the country towns and along highways there are hundreds of thousands of workers who have no jobs and no tables under which to put their feet. There are men in the "jungles" and whole families in tourist camps waiting now—as they have been waiting since last fall—for something to open up.

No doubt, as the season advances, many of them will be absorbed for short periods in the rush of cultivation and harvesting—a few days of hard labor now and then to interrupt the hungry wandering and waiting which has come to be the normal, regular state of existence for these people. A recent survey places their number at not less than 2,000,000.

These are the wanderers, the "surplus army of production" ready to jump in and fill any available job, whether it be a week's work at corn cultivating or a two-hour job cleaning up somebody's back yard for a meal. They are recruited forcibly into this sort of existence by pressure of the utmost necessity. Hardly one out of a thousand but would prefer reasonably steady work and the poorest sort of home to even the best that may be had on the "road."

It doesn't make much difference where they come from; all of them belong to the ever-growing class of dispossessed producers whom a ruthless capitalism has condemned to the misery of slow starvation. Some of them are new recruits who have but recently been kicked out of what is somewhat fancifully known as the "independent life of the farmer." Among these are dried-out and blown-out farmers from the arid districts and ex-farmers (share croppers and renters), forcibly evicted by landowners who are discarding the old "bull-tongue and heel-sweep" method of cultivation with the gas tractor method, which automatically sets out one-third or more of the workers needed for farm work.

Others are old-timers who long ago entered the labor stream that flows from country to city and then back to the country again when city industry (or other non-farming work) becomes slack.

The important question is not where they come from; it is, rather, where are they going?

A glance at conditions as they exist now even in places where a considerable amount of agricultural work is obtainable indicates that merely to get a job is not a satisfactory answer to the migratory worker's problem because the job he can or may get will not provide him with the barest minimum required for civilized existence. We take a glance at what a settled farm worker gets for his labor.

Consider the Beet Worker

Not all agricultural workers are migratory, of course, the majority of them are more or less settled in communities in or near which they do most of their slaving for the master class. Conditions of life and employment vary for them in different sections of the country but they are all alike in this: poverty is their common lot.

Among the beet growing states Colorado ranks first. California and Michigan are next in importance. The nature of the work in beet fields and the need for a large amount of hand labor for brief periods at different intervals during the entire season have made it necessary for even small growers of sugar beets to hire extra labor to do the hard work required in the fields. Hand labor is used first for thinning the young plants that come up very thickly from seed planted in rows, then for hoeing and weeding the plants after thinning, and finally for pulling and topping at the harvest time. Hoeing and weeding are done once or several times during the growing season. The thinning must be done before the plants become too large or crowded. Topping is concentrated into a few weeks in order that the beets may remain in the ground as long as possible and yet be harvested before they are frozen.

Beet laborers are drawn in large part from Spanish-speaking people, either American or Mexican born. Another important racial group is that of Russian-German extraction. In better years it has been rare for other Americans to contract hand work in the beet fields because of the low wages paid for the work, most of which is done in a stooping position and is very fatiguing. However, when jobs are scarce, and this is now a chronic condition, few workers of any nationality or previous condition of prosperity draw the line on this or any other sort of "stooping" job, not even potato picking which probably ranks as the most fatiguing of all agricultural work.

Contract Labor

Though floating labor is employed in the beet fields the outstanding characteristic of the sugar beet industry, in the farming end, is contract labor. Labor is usually hired on a seasonal contract basis.

The contract specifies the acreage on which the hand work is to be performed, the manner in which the work shall be done, whether housing is to be provided, and the rate of wages per acre which is to be paid the laborers. It also usually specifies the time of payment, conditions under

After a hard day's work in the beet field. This is home at its best for the beet field worker. At least there is food on the table which store credit is to be obtained while waiting for wages, and the amount to be withheld until the harvest is over.

The labor contract is made between the farm owner or grower and the worker but the sugar companies are involved in determining labor conditions and wages. Sugar companies recruit the workers in most cases. How they do it was well stated by a witness in the sugar hearings before a House of Representatives sub-committee. He said:

"The way it worked was that the Great Western Sugar company (biggest beet sugar concern) boys, or their agents, would go to the relief offices several weeks before the beet season began and go over the lists to see what beet worker families were on them. The relief officials would be requested to throw those families off the rolls so that, as Mr. Mahony puts it, they would be good and hungry when the sugar boys came around wanting to sign them up on a labor contract."

The Whole Family Works

According to labor surveys made in 1920 the majority of even the eight and nine-year-old children in the beet workers' families went into the fields to add their share to the family income. They went there to work, not to play, and they were kept at it often over nine hours a day.

Since 1920 conditions in this respect are supposed to have improved. In 1935, while the Jones-Costigan Act was in force, the number of children under 14 in beet fields was reported to have decreased about 62 per cent.

But despite the prohibition of law, the Children's Bureau found, in the latter part of 1935, that in the beet workers' families interviewed, 9 per cent of the 12 and 13 year olds and 91 per cent of the 14 and 15 year olds had worked in the fields. "Half of the children of 14 and 15 years of age were reported by their parents to be working usually 10 or more hours a day . . . Among the children workers under 14 . . . a fifth were usually working 12 or more hours a day, and only a ninth . . . had usual working hours of less than six a day." Children's Bureau report.)

This was in 1935. Next year was worse, as bad as it ever had been, and there is no improvement to this day.

The apathetic submissiveness of parents toward this ruthless robbery of children—it might well be termed the murder of childhood—is a reflection of the despair which makes every consideration secondary to the urgent need of just keeping alive. How big sugar men profess to look at the question of child labor is expressed by one of their representatives, B. F. Falzgraf, chairman of the Labor Committee of the Mountain States Beet Growers Association, who told the House Committee on Agriculture the "greatest crime society has imposed upon youth is taking away from the boys and girls the privilege of earning a little spending money." Their real reason for favoring child labor is another matter.

According to capitalist wage philosophy if the head of the family alone works he must earn enough to feed his dependents, if he is joined by his wife at the point of production the two together need still be paid only enough to feed the family, and when the whole family, including the infants, marches off to work, there is even then, in the opinion of the bosses, no reason why the total family wage should be higher.

What the Beet Workers Get

A study of Weld county, Colorado, beet workers' income revealed that for every 100 families 30 earned less than $200 for beet work, 25 earned more than $200 but less than $400, 20 earned $400 but less than $600, and 22 earned more than $600. Since variations in family earnings are due largely to differences in the size of families it is necessary to get an approximation of individual earnings in order to comprehend conditions thoroughly.

Figures furnished by the same study (made by WPA workers) show the total income of Weld county beet workers, from all sources including relief, amounts to $78 per year per person. Excluding relief, earnings averaged $47. A Children's Bureau study revealed the amount of cash income per family member, excluding relief, was $75 or less for half of the families reporting. This was in 1935. During the winter just past destitution was, if possible, even worse than three years ago.

The very low standard of living of these workers is apparent in the overcrowding of their small houses which are sometimes not even weather proof, in their meager diet and in their frequent lack of proper clothing. According to the standard of the Bureau of Home Economics of the U. S. Department of Agriculture the cost of food for an adequate diet was $110 for each member of the family in 1935.

Organization

So much for the beet workers. Their poverty stricken condition is repeated, with variations, in every agricultural district where seasonal work is of a nature that permits the employment of men, women, and children. Most notorious among these are the fruit and hops, cotton, and vegetable producing districts.

In the wheat and corn belt only men, as a rule, find employment in the busy season. At such times the migratory slaves are still welcome in spite of changes in production methods which have greatly reduced the labor power required in cultivation and harvesting. Tens of thousands of men still rush into the wheat producing states to "make the harvest." They are lucky if, after a season's work, they can leave the Dakotas in the fall of the year with clothing on their backs suited to the weather in that bleak section of the country, to say nothing of a few dollars for their season's work.

An outstanding difficulty that the seasonal worker in the grain belt has to face is that it is seldom indeed that he can settle down to stay in the neighborhood of the place where he finds brief periods of employment. His job, in fact, travels and he is compelled to move along with it. Whether he wants to move or not he must, for his welcome ends just as soon as his job.

The chances of improving conditions for the casual, migratory workers through organization are good. Most of the work they are called upon to do cannot be postponed. Demands for increased wages that result in strikes have to be taken seriously by employers. If the workers have not won in many of these contests lately it is because organization among them has been pitifully inadequate or of the wrong kind.

C.I.O. and A. F. of L. organizers are not at home in the temporary "jungle" homes of migrating workers. They prefer to make "deals" with employers' associations and politicians, deals which leave the workers holding the bag and the organizers with a dues-collecting franchise.

Permanent "locals" are impossible in most sections where the migratory does his work. He must carry his union with him wherever he goes and together with his fellow workers set it in operation as soon as he lands on a job.

Agricultural Workers Industrial Union No. 110 of the I.W.W. has worked out a technique for handling the peculiar difficulties that confront the migratory worker bent on maintaining an efficient union. This organization has in the past had notable success in improving general working conditions and raising wages wherever its members have carried on intensive campaigns.

Its failure to make greater headway, especially in the past few years, is due to a great extent to its very efficiency as a fighting weapon for the workers. This efficiency has served to stir up an enormous amount of the most bitter opposition from the employers. These are often willing to deal with other unions merely in order to forestall growth of the I.W.W. which they know from experience cannot be induced to compromise workers' interests for the sake of employer-worker harmony or for any other consideration.

The changing of production methods and the vast influx of new workers looking for jobs have also contributed to bringing about a temporary halting in the forward march of this organization.

There have, however, been no changes either in the organization or outside of it that lend color to the idea that the I.W.W. is not competent to organize the agricultural workers. Many keen observers are of the opinion that the day is not distant when new nation-wide drives and new "thousand-mile picket lines" will infuse the homeless and now almost helpless agricultural workers, both migratory and stationary, with the spirit to resist the almost unbelievably bad conditions under which they are now compelled to produce the food that others consume.

THE GOVERNMENT OF TOMORROW

By Art Hopkins

The will to power has been a powerful factor in the history of mankind. There have always existed men who have spoken to their electorate: "Give me the power and I will change things." And the masses of people have fallen for this philosophy. The last innovation of power politics, where the control of a people is placed in the hands of an individual, is the rise of fascism throughout the world.

Fascism is a resultant of many conditions, but it also is the result of a people becoming so thoroughly disgusted with individual initiative and the utter lack of confidence in the masses of people that it gives itself over to a "more fit" egotist.

In the world turmoil, where chaos and disorder play an important part, where politics has become the favorite game of ruling men (it never administers the needs of the people), the willingness of the masses to place their destinies in the hands of individuals becomes paramount.

The granting of power to any individual has always had a degrading effect. Political power has never been interested in the welfare of the people. For once a person descends into the abyss of politics his interest lies in the holding of that power.

History is filled with countless records of individuals who, in their desire to help humanity rise from its utter lack of security and freedom, have entered the field of political activity and have, as soon as they are elected to office, forgotten their promises of yestereve—their desire to institute a freer, a more wholesome world.

Consequence of Power

These people are not bad, nor wicked, nor scoundrels; their actions are but the consequences of the very nature of political power that degrades and demoralizes the individual.

A Chinese sage, Lao-tse, once wrote:

"Experience teaches that none can guide the community;
The community is collaboration of forces;
As such, thought shows it cannot be led
By the strength of one man.
To order it is to set it in disorder;
To fix it is to unsettle it.
For the conduct of the individual changes:
Here goes forward, there draws back;
Here shows warmth, there reveals cold;
Here exerts strength, there weakness;
Here stirs passion, there brings peace.
And so:
The perfected one shuns the desire for power,
shuns the lure of power,
shuns the glamour of power."

But, you object, in this complex world in which we live, power plays an important part. If you will not delegate political power to individuals, how will society be run?

Your questions are to the point. Who is to have the power?

Our original premise is that no man is more fit than the individual to govern himself. From here we continue.

Political representation, as we know it today, is not true representation of the masses of people, particularly that vast class of wage workers. Political representation cannot represent the interest of the majority of the people. For there are many diverse interests in a certain territorial division. Here may live a lawyer, next to an accountant, next to a doctor, next to a clothing worker, next to a real estate agent, next to a steel worker, next to a mechanic! No one man can realistically represent all these interests.

Union Is the Representative Body

But the labor union of the steel worker, the union of the clothing worker, the union of the mechanic, the health workers' union,—these can effectively represent the interests of these various and diverse trades and professions. If there is to be a representative body, that body is to be the representatives of the various unions, coordinated in an administrative body, with a functional One Big Union of all the workers.

Most important in the reorganization of society and the delegation of power is that no official of any union shall be elected for a life term of office; he must, after a certain length of time return to the industry from which he came, and no official is to receive a larger salary than the highest paid worker in the trade from which he comes.

Such a plan was tried out in Loyalist Spain during the early days of the fascist revolt. In fact the Spanish labor unions have been so organized that there is no bureaucracy in them.

There are no sell-outs by Spanish labor officials, as we know them in American labor history.

The power of the future will not be concentrated in individual hands seeking political satisfaction, but will be concentrated in the hands of the workers, through their labor unions.

Power of the future will be economic power. The functional unit in society will be the labor union and its purpose will not be the governing of men, but the administering of industries.

FELLOW WORKERS, HEAR ME!

By Covington Hall

Shall we the challenge made decline,
Forever bow before these swine
Who hold not e'en the truth divine;
Who justice burke and labor scorn,
And science as a whore adorn?
Who claim all rights and yet deny
All duties? Who crucify
Earth's noblest, and acclaim
The basest in their "Halls of Fame"?
Whose governments lay waste the Earth,
And starve our children from their birth?
Whose insane Congresses declare
That plenty is a curse and snare;
That scarcity and famine are,
Together with the woe of war,
The only way men can save
The Nations from a common grave?
Who Jefferson and Lincoln spurn
Who hold democracy a creed,
An ideal sprung from "putrid" seed?
Who Christus hang and Judas crown,
And Freedom in pollution drown?
Who worship Gold, who Truth defame,
And make us serve them to our shame?

Answer!

Shall we, the Race, the Mighty Mass,
Forever bow unto this class;
Forever fear the puny fist
Of Banker, Landlord, Capitalist?
Forever fight, forever vote to keep their hands upon our throat?
Forever to them serviles be,
Rightless, homeless, and unfree?
Selling our bodies, brains and souls
For their circuses and doles?
"Forbid it, O Almighty God!"
Call thy people out of Nod!
Let it once more defiant ring,
The song that Freedom's children sing
When New Worlds are about to be:
"Give us death or liberty!"
Onward! Upward! Waken! Rise!
In One Great Union organize!—
Take our comrades from their cells!—
Cleanse the good Earth of their hells!—
Up, ye men of shop and soil!
Up, ye Militants of Toil!
"Rise like Lions after slumber
In unvanquishable number!—
Shake your chains to Earth like dew
Which in sleep had fallen on you—
Ye are many—they are few."

JOBITES

—JANE STREET

How lousy the world is with them!—
Mean-souled people who think
They work to live
While in reality
They live to work!

They know nothing about living—
They do nothing remotely prejudicial to their jobs.
They don't love work—
They know nothing of the joy of creation.
Their minds are on their money,
And the money goes for food—
Un-epicurean food
That makes for brawn
That makes for jobs.

How they hurry on their jobs!
Not with the thrill of getting somewhere
Or having something,
But like speeding electrons
In unchangeable orbits.

How they scurry, off their jobs,
Knifing blindly at eath other,
For fear some other work pattern
Might be made by different vacancies.

All the deep purple of hidden murder
In the soul of man
For possession, for love· for power—
Leaks out in degenerate gray streaks
From the jealous eyes of jobites
Fearing for their jobs.

—Oh, life is nothing
Unless something is worth
More than life!

The Growth of Fascism In America

By
CHAS. J. MILLER

Communist demonstrations at New York wharves to keep out fascists, Socialists looking for fascism, watch with apprehension the antics of some Republican politicians in Washington for fear they may get control and bring fascism to our country; liberals and brain-trusters in Washington work feverishly on the New Deal to save the Democracy from fascism—and all of them, Communists, Socialists, and liberals cannot see that fascism is right here, growing day by day.

You see, all of them are political minded, they think and reason only in political terms. Politics is always nationalistic. Even economic or industrial problems are reasoned out in national terms: protect our industries from foreign competition, protect our high standard of living, protect our interests in China, find foreign markets for our surplus goods so our workers will have jobs. To them the class struggle is but a phrase to explain things that they themselves do not understand.

If you reason out your problems in terms of "our nation," "our government," "our congress," "our supreme court," "our laws," "democratic nations and fascist nations," etc. you will necessarily come to the conclusion that Mussolini made Italy a fascist nation and Hitler made Germany a Nazi nation and, therefore, if fascism ever comes in United States some one will have to bring it in or make it.

Nobody made fascism. Fascism is a growth. Just as man was not made, but evolved from a simpler form of life; just as society evolved from a simple relationship of sex and the economic relationship imposed in getting food, clothing, and shelter to the complex society of today, so fascism has evolved from the economic relationship of man producing something useful for exchange.

Basically, fascism is a growth, present in every capitalist nation. Every so-called democratic nation has this development of fascism, according to the extent of the development of its capitalistic system. Italy and Germany are fascist nations, but they are different from democratic nations only in degree and not in kind.

What is fascism? Fascism is a Corporate State. A Corporate State is the pooling or combination of corporations under the control of one head, the State.

In different countries the social superstructure varies according to the geographic, political and historical differences, but the base is the same. Capitalism is in various stages of development in different countries and consequently there are different political governments, but all are based on the profit system, the exploitation of the wage worker for the benefit of the controlling class.

In this connection be it noted that no matter what political structure the different nations have the symptoms of economic ills are all nearly identical, showing the international character of economics.

Let us now examine briefly the evolution of the present economic system, capitalism.

The Economic Basis.

The economic history of the United States gives a fine example of the development of capitalism because the birth of the nation and the birth of capitalism were almost synchronous. The Revolutionary War started the United States as a nation and a series of inventions started the nation off on the industrial revolution and capitalism. Second, it had no long previous history or older social orders to confuse the issue, it started from scratch.

We can give only the high spots of this history. But on these high spots rests the entire social history of this country.

The economic life of the colonies was primarily agricultural, nine-tenths of the people living directly by agriculture. Industry was carried on by the household. The factory system was unknown. Then came a series of inventions:

Fly shuttle	1739
Spinning jenny	1769
Steam engine	1769
Power loom	1785

At about the same time the War of Independence (1776) and later the War of 1812 released the Colonies from the control and checks placed upon the development of the new industries by the British Crown.

In 1791, the first U. S. Bank was established.

The necessity of better transportation and communication resulted in the invention of the steam boat (1817), railroads (1830), telegraph (1843).

Here you have the basis of economic history of a hundred years in a hundred words, the greatest period in the history of society. The inventive genius of man applied to nature gave conception to a new society. Accumulated capital, raw materials, and plenty of labor applied to these new inventions ushered in the capitalist system.

The development of the factory system was rapid. First they erected cotton and woolen spinning mills producing thread. Then weaving factories. Next, they combined the spinning and weaving in a mill.

The development of the factory system gave tremendous momentum to all branches of agriculture, commerce, and industry. Here is just one item: Consumption of cotton, 1820, 10,000,000 lbs.; 1860, 500,000,000 lbs.

With new inventions in other industries, they too, were on their way.

Another result of the industrial revolution—the cotton gin and chattel slavery brought into being an economic power, the Cotton Kingdom of the south; bringing on the conflicting economic interests of two systems of slavery ending in a Civil War, with the new wage slave system victorious.

As late as 1850 the bulk of general manufacturing was carried on by family or individual proprietors. In the span of fifty years the factory was universal.

Starting out as an agricultural nation, by 1900 the United States was rated the first manufacturing nation in the world. The invested capital grew from $1,011,000,000 in 1859 to $44,688,000,000 in 1919.

Now we come to the fundamental question: What is the form of the basic economic organization by which the capitalist class, a minority class in society, controlled this capitalist system?

The Political State

Starting with household production and individual proprietor, then partnership, then companies, then, after the start of the industrial revolution, they combined into larger units with bitter competition among them—stock companies, pools, trusts, corporation (U. S. Steel and Standard Oil, first trusts in the world, about 1890), and then holding corporations.

With this grew the New Imperialism, spreading capitalist civilization to the far corners of the world.

The results of this Industrial Revolution in the U. S. have been vividly summed up in a recent speech by Secretary of the Interior, Harold L. Ickes, over a national hook-up. We can quote but a few excerpts here; he said in part:

"America stands at the crossroads, with men of wealth eager to push the country along the road to fascism . . .

"About one-half of the wealth of the country is in corporate form, and over one-half of it is under the domination of 200 corporations, which in turn are controlled by what Ferdinand Lundberg in his recent book referred to as America's 60 families.

"The fact is that under a democratic form of government we have fostered and permitted to grow up economic autocracies which are stronger than government."

Here you have the brief outline of the economic history of the United States. And the evolution of the controlling capitalist organization which made this possible is:

First you have household or individual proprietors; next these combine into partnership or company; then they combine into stock companies or pools; they then form trusts and corporations.

The next logical step is the combining of the corporations into the corporate or fascist state.

But now you may ask, if the corporations combine under a corporate state what becomes of the political state?

Read your history. The function of the political state has been to protect the rights of private property, to be the wet-nurse to the growing capitalist system.

The capitalist system has developed to the point where it needs the cloak of a political state to protect it. Corporations are now strong enough to make their own laws and enforce them direct without the help or hindrance of a clumsy, slow-moving, behind-time, wornout, ox-cart political state. The further development of the corporations in a corporate state spells social degeneracy and is anti-social. They can develop further only at the expense of society.

The molders of public opinion are working overtime to keep the workers political minded. Every organization that we know of, with the exception of the I.W.W. fosters the notion that politics is the principal weapon of labor.

Elect honest politicians and "pass a law" are the remedies heard on every side. It seems to be the general conception that the government is of, for, and by, the people and the function of the relief and other federal agencies are the automatic result of "passing a law."

But let us look behind the scenery of the political act put on in Washington for public consumption. There we find a new species of gigantic control octopus, a mighty infant with unlimited arms reaching into every state, every city, town, village in the United States.

This octopus was not created by the people, they had no say in the matter. It is being evolved to save the economic "Royalist" of the United States.

The Corporate State

After plundering the nation of the natural resources, causing floods and dirt storms, laying waste to great sections of the country and mercilessly exploiting the workers, these rugged individuals are now using their government to save them from the results of their own past acts.

In the years before the war it was common to refer to Wall Street as the Invisible Government. It was there that the important decisions pertaining to the industrial life of the nation were made. And it was there that the policy of the government originated. Wall Street was the real power.

With the United States' entry into the World War the government took over control of production. And Wall Street moved down to Washington. This was America's first test of planned economy on a national scale.

After the end of the war to unscramble the industries back to the old rugged individual basis was impossible.

The great increase in efficiency, mass production and over-built and over-capitalized machinery of production; with a sudden loss of greatly diminished market for agricultural and manufactured products, came the beginning of the end of the rugged individuals, as such.

From 1914 to 1928 at least eighteen new federal agencies, bureaus, commissions, boards and corporations were set up. The economic setup was on the road to government control.

Under President Hoover this trend rapidly increased. He spent vast sums to keep up the prices of wheat and cotton and on public works, in trying to inflate credit by buying and selling government securities in the open market, and on unemployment relief on a federal basis.

He organized the Reconstruction Finance Corporation which poured billions of dollars into the tottering financial structure of banks, railroads, insurance companies.

With the coming of President Roosevelt and the Bank Holidays this trend became a landslide with the federal agencies and corporations multiplying so fast that there is now a duplication of alphabetical abbreviations and they may have to adopt a numeral system like that used for auto registration to keep track of them.

There are seventeen government corporations covering many fields of activities and some fifty controlling, planning and advisory bodies.

The oldest and largest of the corporations is the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, a carry-over from the Hoover administration. In three years it spent or allotted nearly nine billion dollars. Three and one-half billion dollars went out to bankers and over two billion more to farmers, the greater part of this going to the bankers, indirectly. Then there were the unemployment allotments, railroads, mortgage companies, home owners' loans, etc. This is the largest financial corporation known.

Then there is the Agriculture Adjustment Administration which is in the process of controlling some six million farms which have failed at self-sustenance.

Next, you have the building up of industrial controlling machinery to take the place of the unconstitutional National Recovery Administration which was formulated by the United States Chamber of Commerce in conjunction with the Manufacturers' Associations.

The Wagner Act and the government inspired C.I.O. are moves in this direction. The N.R.A. is being revived as the Supreme Court is now considered safe. There is also a proposed system of control of corporations by federal licensing.

Then there are the W.P.A., F.E.R.A. and C.C.C. and other agencies to care for the surplus slaves and the Social Security Act to have the slaves finance their own unemployment and old age. Every slave now has a number.

Another type of activity is the Tennessee Valley Authority, an experiment in government development.

And this Federal Government that is daily increasing its control over the economic activities of the nation, is the largest owner of securities in the world, its holdings totaling $16,955,000,000.

We have shown how the Industrial Revolution, with the concentration of wealth and power through the large corporation has brought us to the threshold of fascism.

And further, we have shown that government agencies, not elected or controlled by the "people" are being organized to take over the control of the economic life of the nation.

Secretary Ickes of the Democrat administration warns us against the Republican "Big Business" fascist.

Fascist Program

And the new head of the Republican brain-trusters, Dr. Glenn Frank, chairman of the Republican national policy committee warns us against the "fascist program of the New Deal."

They are both right, no matter whether the government be Republican or Democrat, the program will be fascist. "The economic royalists of America are stronger than government." The government is but a Charlie McCarthy to "big business."

You need only to read the reports coming from Washington to realize the collaboration between the economic royalist and the government. Here is a sample:

Washington, D. C.—Edsel Ford, president of the Ford Motor Co., William S. Knudsen, president of the General Motors Corporation; K. T. Keller, president, and B. E. Hutchinson, vice-president of the Chrysler Corporation; and Alvan Macauley, president of the Packard Motor Car Co. and president of the Automobile Manufacturers Association were the manufacturers invited to a conference. Also the heads of affiliated finance companies.

Governor Murphy of Michigan was an overnight White House guest.

At another conference John L. Lewis, chairman of the C.I.O. (fascist labor corporation) sat at the same table with Thomas W. Lamont, J. P. Morgan partner, Owen D. Young of the General Electric Co. to consider plans for attacking the recession.

This group of conferences were to clear up many false impressions, mostly political; farm curtailment, business price regulation, attitude toward holding companies, anti-trust action, are some of the questions discussed.

This was on Jan. 21, 1938. The following day, Jan. 22, the papers reported as follows:

U. S. Steel plans $80,000,000 plant project for 1938. The U. S. Steel Corporation intends to spend this sum on plant modernization before Sept. 1, 1938. Roosevelt's Naval program expected to startle world. May ask for 90 new warships costing ultimately between 700 million and one billion dollars, and will call for a 20 per cent increase in all categories of American combat ships, including three more battle ships.

There is but one more step necessary to establish fascism here and that is a serious national crisis, which is brewing now, to give an excuse to close the show and send the politicians home as per Hitler and Mussolini.

The Alternative

What is the solution of this trend to fascism? Politically there is none. This is an economic problem. Fascism is the logical next step in the evolution of capitalism. But there is an economic solution. The Industrial Workers of the World is the only organization in the United States that has the answer. The I.W.W. is the answer.

In our examination of the evolution of capitalism from household production to corporation mass production we found that an industrial revolutin had taken place in production.

The most important fundamental result of this industrial revolution was the dividing of society into two opposing economic classes.

With the introduction of the factory system the workers were drawn from their homes into the factories. It separated society into two classes, capitalist and workers, those who own and those who work.

With the further development of production there evolved the corporation where the owners are completely divorced from any useful connection with industry. It degraded the capitalist class to a life of living without working, a parasitic class; and degraded the workers to industrial slavery.

The remedy for this condition is to bring about the relationship of the people to that prevailing before the industrial revolution, i. e., the owner and the worker in one person.

But not individually. It is now on a higher plane. You now have social production. You must have social ownership. Not one man, one industry, but all workers, all industries.

> "It is the historic mission of the working class to do away with capitalism. The army of production must be organized, not only for the every-day struggle with the capitalists, but also to carry on production when capitalism shall have been overthrown. By organizing industrially we are forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old."

INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATION

By George Speed

(Reprinted by Request)

An editorial from the Industrial Worker of June 26, 1926, by the late George Speed.

Millions of workers have accepted the teachings of those whose interest it is to keep them dosed with mental chloroform in order that they may be used by the nickel snatching profiteers.

We have been taught that there is no class struggle; that the interests of labor and capital were identical; that we have equality before the law; that we all have equal opportunities in this land of the free and the home of the brave, and a thousand other pet phrases to gull the gullible. And the AFL, with years of experience behind it, still accepts this doctrine, virtually accepting capitalism as a finality, with the slogan of "a fair day's work for a fair day's pay."

The writer would ask what is a fair day's work and a fair day's pay, and how and who is to determine it? Labor being the creator of all wealth recognized the right of the employer to a portion of the wealth the worker creates. We would like to know how this wealth can be divided equally and each receive his due portion? Is there any possibility of adjusting a problem of this kind so peace may reign between the exploited and the exploiter? And if capital and labor are brothers as we are told, having common interests, why bosses' organizations and labor organizations—and the conflict ever going on between the two forces? Is this not evidence of a class struggle—a war between capital and labor?

What Is Americanism?

What is capital but unpaid wages; that portion of wealth used for the production of more wealth, the surplus over and above what we as workers receive in wages? All this above a bare living we give to an idle class for the right to exist and not to live.

And to you One Hundred Percenter, if you are an American, tell me what you mean by Americanism. Does it mean to accept everything without question from our afore-mentioned teachers? Is it not true that in every capitalist governed country, you will find the same system of exploitation, only different by one degree, that you as a wage slave are dependent upon another for the right to live, that your boss determines the price he will pay for your labor power and that you must accept his dictum or go hungry? Can't you realize that you are in economic bondage? Have you ever heard of a slave class as a law making body? Is it not true that in every civilized country, the ruling class has always been the property owning class and the worker the subject class? Is it not true that political power is but a reflex of economic power, and that those who hold it shape the political policy of the nation and that the workers can have political power only in proportion as they can demonstrate economic power?

The capitalist, by controlling the industries and resources of a nation necessarily hold in the palm of their hands our welfare and our lives. They know the value of organization, they are class conscious and ever act in accord with their class interests. When you look squarely into this subject, can you conceive of any crime and lie they will not resort to keep you, the workers, in subjection? Yes, my brother worker, you are looked upon as a mere commodity to be bought and sold in the labor market like any other commodity, in competition with your fellow worker. You are a cheap commodity, often paying for the privilege of being bought. Why? Because you are unorganized and dependent upon some saviour to save you. You neglect to study your class interests so that you may learn to act as a class. You are the many; they are the few; yet they rule us with an iron hand through the power of their organized might. And power in the last analysis is the determining factor. The workers have the power; let us crystallize it into a powerful industrial organization so that life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness will not be an empty phrase.

Direct Action

All institutions rest on a material base. Where the workers are governed is in the shop, mine, mill and factory. And our fight is on the industrial field. There, we must organize to gain control over our own lives, by gaining control over industry. We ourselves shall determine under what conditions we shall work, what wages we shall receive, and that determines our mode of life. Whether we can afford to marry, clothe our children, give them an opportunity to play and a proper education, or force them into a slave pen at a tender age—all these things are determined by conditions in industries where we work, and not at Washington, D. C., nor state capitols. Those institutions are run by the owners of industry.

In our union hall or out on the job we will make our laws and rules where every man and woman shall have full voice and vote as to action and to enforce the same on the job. This is job action—direct action—not delegating our power to another to do something for us that we ought to do for ourselves. This delegating of power by the workers to labor leaders has caused havoc in the labor movement and has made it a laughing stock of those who have placed temptation in the way of the leaders who have betrayed the workers, as was shown in the English general strike. Remember, industrial organization is the tool intelligently used by the workers and is the most potent force to free us from the damnable curse of wage slavery. We have nothing to lose only misery and want and we have a world to gain. Join the I.W.W. and be a man.

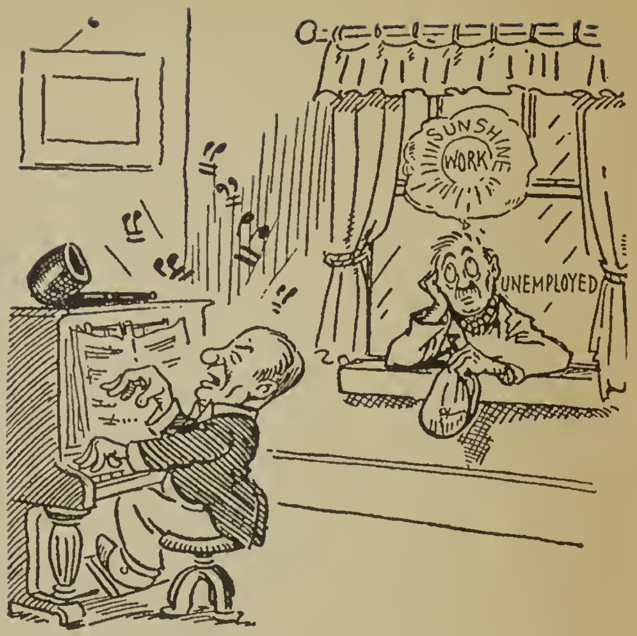
NUT HOUSE NEWS

A Skit

Prepared by Work Peoples College Drama Department



Scene: Fence with gate in it. Fence extends across stage; gateway near middle. Arch over gateway reads "NUT HOUSE": sign suspended from center of it: "No Nuts Allowed Except by Special Permission." The audience gets an eyeful of this before Hobo comes sauntering in, singing: "Hallelujah, I'm a Bum."

Hobo sees butt of cigarette on walk. Picks it up and starts re-rolling it for a smoke as Nut comes along inside fence, slowly wheeling a wheel-barrow upside down. He watches Nut and laughs.

NUT: What are you laughing at?

HOBO: You.

NUT: What's so funny about me?

HOBO: You've got your wheelbarrow upside down.

NUT: What's wrong with that?

HOBO: You can't put anything in it when it's upside down.

NUT: That's why I keep it that way. If I turn it the other way up, people may put something in it.

HOBO: You're not so crazy! What did they put you in for?

NUT: I used to keep my barrow right-side-up like you nuts.

HOBO: How come they put you in for that?

NUT: They used to fill it up that high with bricks.

HOBO: They can't put you in for that.

NUT: Well, I used to take my clothes off when at work.

HOBO: What did you do that for?

NUT: I figured that if I had to work like a horse, I might as well look like one, too.

HOBO: No—not so nutty after all.

NUT: Did you ever run one of these things? (Indicating barrow.)

HOBO: Often—I'm an expert on that thing.

NUT: Which side did you keep up?

HOBO: I kept the other side up.

NUT: I'll bet that made it hard work—but if that was the right way to run it, why didn't you keep on running it?

HOBO: The job blew up.

NUT: An explosion?

HOBO: No—it got finished. We did all the work. There wasn't anything more to do. We worked ourselves out of a job.

NUT: You should have run it like I run mine. Where are you going now?

HOBO: I'm going downtown to see if I can find some breakfast.

NUT: I ate mine a couple of hours ago. Where are you going to get it?

HOBO: I don't know, but I'll get it somewhere likely.

NUT: I think you're crazy. Where are you going to eat dinner?

HOBO: I don't know. If I can't get it in this town, I'll get it in some other town.

NUT: I get mine at sharp noon everyday. You must be goofy. Where are you going to sleep tonight?

HOBO: I don't know. Last night I found a pretty good reefer.

NUT: What's a reefer?

HOBO: It's a box car with double walls, and an icebox in each end for keeping things frozen.

NUT: And you think that's a pretty good place to sleep? I always sleep in a nice, soft, warm, clean bed.

HOBO: Say, who are you anyway?

NUT: Last week I was Napoleon, but that was by my first marriage; when I got divorced that made me General Lee; but next week I'm going to be Washington crossing the Delaware.

HOBO: You can be Napoleon if you want to, but you insult me when you say you're George Washington. He was the father of our country. Do you mean to tell me he was crazy?

NUT: Haven't you seen a picture of him crossing the Delaware?

HOBO: Sure—every good American has.

NUT: Isn't he standing up in the boat instead of sitting down?

HOBO: Yes.

NUT: Isn't that crazy?—Say, how much of this country do you own?

HOBO: I don't own any of it.

NUT: Then you're crazy to call it your country. (Starts to trundle away with barrow.) Say, when you were running a wheel barrow what were you making?

HOBO: We were building a flour mill.

NUT: What are you doing with the flour mill now?

HOBO: I'm not doing anything with it. It isn't mine.

NUT: How did you lose it?

HOBO: It never was mine.

NUT: If you fellows that built it don't own it, who does?

HOBO: Why the owners own it.

NUT: Did they work to build it?

HOBO: That kind of people never work.

NUT: The folks that didn't build it own it, and the fellows who built it don't own it. I think that's crazy.

HOBO: Why that's the way with every job. When we get through making something, we never own it. It always belongs to the people who don't work.

NUT: That's why I want the guard to turn this sign around. The way it hangs now, people would think the nuts were on this side of the fence, wouldn't they?

HOBO: That's why it's there.

NUT: But it should be turned around, for the nuts are all on the other side.(Starts to trundle barrow away, but stops.) Say, when do you think you'll start running a wheel barrow again?

HOBO: I'll get a job soon—I hear we may go to war.

NUT: That's terrible! Who are you going to kill?

HOBO: It may be the Japs and it may be the Chinks, I'm not sure who it will be.

NUT: Where are you going to kill them, in town here?

HOBO: Hell, no—we'll go over to their country and kill them.

NUT: Ever been over there?

HOBO: No.

NUT: Ever seen the fellows you're going to kill?

HOBO: No.

NUT: Did they ever hit you, or hurt you, or do anything to you?

HOBO: No.

NUT: And when you go to kill them, maybe they'll kill you?

HOBO: Sure, we've got to take that chance.

NUT: How far away do these Japs and Chinese live?

HOBO: I guess about three or four thousand miles.

NUT: So you're going three or four thousand miles to kill some poor people you never saw, who never hit you or hurt you or did anything to you, and you may be killed doing it? That is crazy . . . Or may be they're the fellows who took your flour mill away from you?

HOBO: No—those fellows live in Minneapolis.

Nut: Quick—before the guard comes—give me a hand and we'll turn this sign around.

HOBO: Maybe we ought to.

NUT: No—we can't do it now—I see the guard coming, and he won't let us.

HOBO: Don't those guards ever get afraid of you nuts?

NUT: No—I asked him once and he said that even if there were a thousand of us nuts and only four guards, they still wouldn't be afraid of us.

HOBO: Why?

NUT: He said it was because nuts never organize.

THE END OF LEADERSHIP

By ACMA

Dictatorship, red, black, or brown, is what the future holds for the workers of the world unless they organize to control the world.

In an American university students were advised to study labor history, unionism, etc. in addition to their usual studies. Their instructor in the intricate questions of floods, missing tribes, immaculate conceptions, saviors, and the "Big Apple" deemed that in the event of their not finding a flock to ride herd on from the sanctuary of the pulpit, it was but a short step from Genesis to the Preamble of the A. F. of L. and the work of "savioring" labor was almost identical with that of "savioring souls." Of course, the language is ours but the meaning is not original with us.

In fact it is not original with the professor. It is an old, old story and even Homer Martin adds but a sentence to it. Furthermore, every passing day brings us closer to the time when the final show-down between capitalism and labor will determine whether an intensified degree of class demarcation shall take place under fascism or shall labor come into its own with a classless society.

Leaders and Followers

We have had many a laugh at the expense of the "intellectual liberals" with their inane pronouncements on labor's problems and their predictions on labor's role in the future. And these swarms of ministers, professors, lecturers, leagues of this, that and the other "cause," trade unions, so-called industrial unions, alleged workers' churches, and others too numerous to mention—all belong to the category of "intellectual liberals."

Those without enough bourgeois education to be classified as intellectuals are just run-of-the-mill liberals. The raison d'etre of these fakes in the labor movement is to be found in a principle which is by no means new—the principle of "leaders and followers." Hitler adopted this soon after becoming dictator and the German "Labor Front" is a classic example of its effect when applied to labor organizations. It can be applied equally as well to the trade unions of the U.S.S.R., the Amsterdam International, Third International, and to the unions and political parties upon which those Internationals are based.

Much of the confusion existing in the labor movement of today is the result of the "predestination" assigned to it by various intellectuals of past eras. Marx has been one of the foremost offenders because he gave impetus to the politico-economic type of organization which has split on every issue presented to the working class by the ever advancing mechanization of production.

His work is of great value as far as his analysis of capitalism is concerned. No one can reasonably object to his theories of the role of private ownership, wage slavery, materialistic interpretation of history, and of how profits are made. His theories of cost, value, exchange, commodity relations, surplus value, effects of modern machinery on society, gradual elimination of the middle class, all stand the test of analysis.

But in his inflexible, centralized, authoritarian, politics-dominated organization for the correction of society's ills, he failed utterly. Today we have a dozen organizations claiming to have the only true interpretation (revelation) of Marxism. All of them—Socialist, Social Democrat, Socialist Labor, Independent Labor, Communist (which includes Stalinites, Lovetoncites, Trotskyites, P. O. U. M.ites, and several others of still lesser importances, and the Proletarian party are based on the principle of "leaders and followers." Nearly all of these organizations have seen the day when they were classified as "right wing" and another when they were called "left wing."

Marx at one time belonged to the Social-Democrat party because it was then the "left wing" party. Then it veered to the right and the Communist party came into being as the revolutionary left wing. And so it has been throughout the years. This is further illustrated by the recent swing of the same party to a point so far to the right that it is liable to "out-right" the Democratic party of the New Deal. And this the spawning bed for pinks and finks of all stripes.

Green Pastures

Why this veering from point to point? Why this paradoxical situation in which "right" becomes "wrong" and vice versa during the passage of a few years? Why have workers' unions been flooded with opportunists from the middle and professional classes—plus an overflow of saviors from their own ranks?

Do you remember the story of how Samuel Gompers and thousands of other cigar makers were thrown out of a skilled trade by a guy who invented a machine that rolled cigars by the thousands per day with the attendance of an unskilled boy? And of the Glass Blowers union members with an initiation fee of $800.00 being thrown out of work by a machine? Of thousands of sky-pilots who had their celestial wings singed and lost their balance on the cloud of economic security by the introduction of the radio? These are illustrations of the insecurity of life under capitalism.

But the labor movement! That is different! Regardless of inventions of labor displacing machines in industry, no one is going to invent a machine that will emancipate labor.

Here the "intellectuals" from the professional class, bankrupt retailers, tired farmers, graduates from colleges and theological seminaries, outcasts from the ranks of ex-skilled labor groups, and forked-tongue politicians converge on the green fields of labor unions and labor parties.

A large number may be sincere in the beginning—sincere in the sense that labor is a helluva jackass if their advice and leadership is not accepted. Ruling cliques are established in control of unions. Union members who become elected or appointed to office either conform to the machine in control or out they go. Voting is juggled by the clique through control of ballot committees or by outright murder of opponents by hired gun-men.

A recent example is the Carpenters and Joiners of America in the vote on the C.I.O. and in their juggle of votes from the S. M. & T. W. U. on representation. In the various political parties the same procedure is carried on. A few years ago the communists in the States split on a question of adherence to Moscow and the Third International. The Stalinist (Browder) faction expelled the Lovestonites, even though the majority of votes cast favored the latter group in their effort to establish naional autonomy.

So it is not strange that voting in these organizations means nothing to the rank and file. Followers from both camps have been in and out of the A.F. of L. like a revolving door since 1920. They take their orders from Moscow or other political parties and juggle their previous stands on labor questions accordingly, lest they get left out in the cold when there is some gravy to be lapped up.

Some claim that technological advances in industry, change in the set-up of State apparatus in different countries, and the rapid progress of fascism necessitates corresponding changes within the ranks of labor. They are correct in their first contention. The mechanization that has taken place within the past half century has necessitated a change from the old craft and trade union to the modern industrial union method of organization—but the relationship between master and slave remains unchanged.

Finks, Incorporated

Changes in the State set-up is caused by the need of a more efficient and co-ordinated program to protect private ownership in its struggle to maintain control over the machinery of production and distribution. Again there is no change in the "brotherly love" of capital and labor. Fascism is not an unnatural phenomena. Just as capitalism was born amidst the death pangs of feudalism, fascism is being nurtured within the womb of present day society. To say that the shadow of this bastard system alters the economic positions of employer and employe is nonsensical. Yet this shadow provides the finks and pinks with the best of all opportunities to crash the gate into labor's ranks.

The communists are again in the vanguard with the slogan of "United Front." With whom? With the whole riff-raff from the back-wash of society. Instead of having separate cliques of finks, they desire a One Big Union of these "saviors" so, like pigs at a trough, they can all get their snouts into the pockets of those who sweat for a living. They are artists at blackmailing labor into thinking that nickels, dimes, quarters and dollars donated to Leagues for Peace . . . for Democracy . . .anti-fascism . . . to aid Spain . . . to aid China . . . to aid in boycotts of Japan . . . Italy . . . Germany, etc., etc., will make great changes within the system and will be a barricade against the advance of fascism . . . That the "tremendous power of a united organization of the great A.F. of L., C.I.O., statesmen, humanists, rationalists, socialists, communists, Baptists and Holy Rollers" will sure throw a helluva scare into—well, anyone that wants to take them seriously. Let us elucidate on this "anti-Fascist Front."

Are the "leaders and followers" advocates sincere in their opposition to fascism? Let us take a glance at the "leader of the leader" faction, the Communist party. In Germany they had the impressive number of nearly 7,000,000 followers. Their half-brothers, the social-democrats, had a slight advantage in the numeric strength of their "flock." Between political trading and internicine battles for a "united front" (against fascism) in which both factions wanted to be the "leader," direct action on the part of the large German trade unions in the final show-down was thrust into the background as the term "General Strike" was regarded as general nonsense by both factions. Result, Hitler seized power without the sound of a rifle shot to mar the burial of freedom and the conversion of the trade unions to a fascist "Labor Front."

In Vienna the socialists had held sway at their favorite in-door pastime of controlling municipal councils for some years. Again the Austrian trade unions were given a back seat. When Mussolini deemed that the time had come to bring Austria into the fold of Fascist Italy, the Austrian workers wrote the cost of politico-economic unionism in their own blood. Bauer, head of the Vienna socialists, admitted afterward that a General Strike in Austria before the fascist attact took place would have given them an immense advantage . . . IF? . . . IF? . . . IF? . . . Will they not profit by such lessons? Lessons written in blood? Remember the inflexibility of Marxism before answering in the affirmative.

But what about the "Fatherland"! You say it is without doubt, against fascism? Why "without doubt"? There is no doubt about the fact that a vast majority of people believe that such is the whole truth. If it is a fact, then truth is in a hell of a hole. Compare the regime in Russia with that of Germany, or Italy. Is it not a fact that regimentation of all phases of life are similar in those three countries? Is it not a fact that free speech, free press, free association and freedom of movement are denied in all of them? Is it not a fact only a small percentage of the population of any one of these countries belongs to the party that is ruling it? Is it not true that the labor unions of these countries are of a castrated type and devoid of the power or right to function in accordance with the welfare of their members or as a determining factor in the building of society? Do you agree that the elections of representative parliamentary bodies are carried on in Italy as in Germany? You do? Then you must agree that the Russian people are being ruled in the same way, as their "elections" are of the same idiotic type as those of Germany and Italy. Do you agree that the largest representation in proportion to membership in the Russian "gas-house" is that of the police force? Such is a tragic fact . . . and in the "Utopia" of an organization which is always blatting about free speech, democracy, workers' rights, etc., etc.!

The Same in Russia

Now what is the record of this country in regard to the boycotts and "aids" which are the pet raves of the communists in North America? Russia did not boycott Hitler Germany when the "leaders" went down with the followers. Russia did not boycott Austria when the Pope and Benito backed Dolfuss in his blood-thirsty purge of working class rank and file fighters. Nor did she boycott Germany when Hitler took Austria. When Italy deliberately provoked a war with Ethiopia in order to ally the discontent of the Italian workers and to add to Roman prestige by grabbing a colony, Russia did not refuse to supply the sinews of war, oil, to the Blackshirts of fascism among other raw materials. By the way, where is Japan getting oil for her invasion of China? Take a look at a map for the Sakhalin Islands. They belong to the U.S.S.R. and oil wells are located on these islands close to Japan. Japan is getting oil from the Sakhalins.

Franco's bombers, in their daily flights over working class districts in the populous cities of Spain, flights that are followed by hundreds of graves being dug, graves which men, women and children of our class will occupy, burn gasoline manufactured in Italy from crude oil obtained from the Socialist "fatherland." This has been going on from the beginning of Franco's Italio-German invasion of Spain. But a country that will turn anti-fascist fighters over to fascist countries and certain death, as Russia has done in the case of Italian anarchists, would not stop a profitable trade balance nor stop the delivery of battleships that Italy, Fascist Italy, is building for the Russian "peepul" just because a few thousand Spaniards are slaughtered as the result.

You say that Russia has aided the Spanish people with armaments. Quite right . . . but paid for in gold at top prices . . . and included in the price is that the "leaders" have full opportunity to advocate their old theory of getting "followers." They, the leaders, agreed that in return for a cementing of the Franco-Russian military pact, they would do all in their power to prevent an establishment of a workers' Commonwealth in Spain by the anarcho-syndicalists; that they would support other political cliques in an "United Front" for the maintenance of the bourgeois Republic. For this they received the blessing of England and France, the former because of her trade routes on the Mediterranean, the latter for the protection of the Spanish-French frontier.

Anarcho-Syndication

Furthermore, France, governed at the time by a "One Big Union" of the type mentioned previously, was the first to initiate the non-intervention pact to prevent the Spanish workers from purchasing arms in the open market. This was immediately seconded by Russia because an access to arms and materials of war would result in an early victory for the anarcho-syndicalists in Spain, and then where would the leaders be?

What is the basis of anarcho-syndicalism? In a few words it is the contention that the emancipation of the working class must be accomplished by the workers within economic, direct action unions without the interference of political or reformist groups or parties. From the days when Bakunin, as an advocate of anarchism, opposed Marx in the latter's attempt to dominate the International Working Mens' Assn., (First International) this school of thought has been strangled by all organizations who subscribe to the "leadership" theory as well as by the ruling class in society.

This attempted strangulation is particularly directed against the anarcho-syndicalists by those same enemies in Spain today. From the outbreak of Franco's coup d'etat in July, 1936, the former group has formed the vanguard in revolutionary achievements; in the reorganization of economic and social life of the nation; in the collectivization of lands left by fascist sympathizers; in the confiscation of factories, transport and raw materials and, at the same time, keeping the war against the insurgents at a high level of efficiency. This was carried out, not by coercion, but by the initiative of workers and peasants and the results obtained have surprised the world . . . and even the anarchists.

The communists, on the other hand, have boosted their ranks from a few thousands of members (followers) to nearly half a million by opening their ranks to the semi-fascist elements of the middle class . . . people that even the left wing political parties in Spain would not organize. They furthered their policies of dictatorship by openly collaborating with the old line reactionaries in the restoration of private property which had been confiscated by the C.N.T.-F.A.I. By smashing the collectives in the Aragon with the Lister division, one of their army corps, but were forced to call a halt when production began to drop as a result of their action. They have murdered militant anti-fascist fighters and jailed, without trial or evidence, foreign volunteers to the Internatonal Brigade because they would not acknowledge communist leadership. Caballero was kicked out of the Cabinet because he refused to play ball with the Moscow saviors. A previous military plan to relieve the pressure against Bilbao by an attack on Franco's forces from the South was shelved by the Moscow dominated Cabinet of Negrin. So the Basques and the Asturians were sacrificed on Stalin's altar, and over all of Loyalist Spain the club decorated with a hammer and sickle was waved over the heads of all who raised their voice against a repetition of the debacle of 1917-20 in Russia—waved with the threat that armaments from Russia would be stopped unless the Popes of the Third International had their way.

It has gone on—and goes on—until when? It has gone on in Spain because the Stalinists know that the defeat of fascism would be the defeat of their own "infallible" theory of "leaders and followers." They know that Spain would not return to the status quo of republican democracy; that their dream of a "Soviet Spain" based on the Moscow plan of a social order ruled by gas-house politicians and police representatives is but a fantasy of deluded minds. As long as they can keep the "unseeing" eyes of labor focused on the Soviet Star, they will not lack followers. Let anarcho-syndicalism prevail in Spain and those "unseeing" eyes will be witness to the building of a social order wherein the unions of workers will be the determining factor; where the "leader" and the politician will be a negative factor; where there will be freedom in the fullest sense of the word for all who direct their efforts towards the work of accomplishing socialism.

Industrial Unionism

It also would swing labor away from the bureaucratic trade unions of the A.F. of L. and the C.I.O., away from politicians of all stripes and the likes of Green, Lewis, Martin, Hillman, Van Bittner and dozens of other leeches. The real industrial union would be the order of the day. And that union is the Industrial Workers of the World.

For 30 years this organization has not changed its principles; it has not veered like a weather vane in a variable wind, because it is based on a solid foundation, the foundation of a clear analysis of capitalism and the need of unions designed to give labor its fullest revolutionary expression, whether it be to bring the Standard Oil or General Motors to its knees or to refuse to handle or produce products to be used against labor abroad; and it provides, in its structure and methods, a means to emancipate labor minus the blessings of labor finks and pinks.

Look back over the pages of history, my fellow slave, study the role of leaders and see if it is to your interests to place your destiny, the destiny of your class, in the hands of proven traitors. You have been doing so—you are still doing so and a continuance of this suicidal policy will inevitably result in fascism. Leaders of all types will always go hand in hand. Look back at the reception tendered by the socialists and social-democrats to Mussolini's Fascisti when they entered Rome on the march from Bologna. Remember the collaboration of the same politicians when Horthy and his White Guards inaugurated a reign of terror against the Hungarian workers in 1919.

Another repetition when the "saviors" slaughtered the German workers when they attempted to build a more equitable social order in the same year. But the most important is the slaughter of the garrison of Kronstadt by communists under the command of "our beloved" Trotsky—and with the sanction of the late un-lamented Lenin.

The "cream of the revolution," that is what Trotsky termed those defenders of Kronstadt. Quite right—and it follows that when the Russian Revolution was liquidated it was logical that the "cream" of its fighters had to be killed so that "leadership" would have a clear path to establish a dictatorship of the workers—by the leaders. And dictatorship, either red, black, or brown, is what the future holds for workers who do not organize in rank-and-file controlled unions, industrial unions, unions of the type advocated by the I.W.W. There is no substitute, no alternative and no excuse . . . if you desire to stem the rising tide of fascism and chaos do not place your confidence in a leader dominated organization or you will write down the cost in disillusionment and blood.

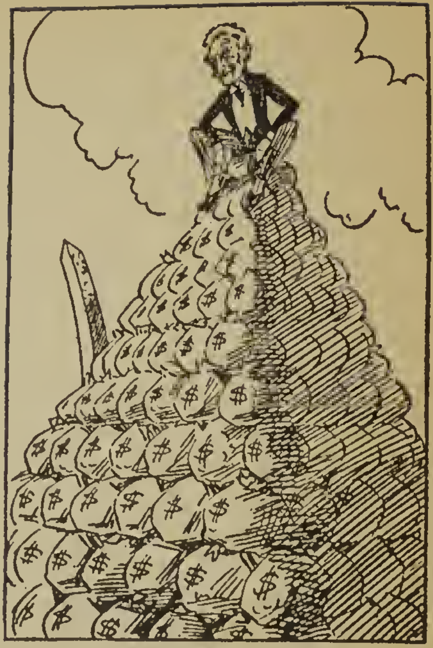
MERRY ENGLAND

"Another world war, profit for ammunition makers, misery, starvation at home —death at the front for the youth of the world."



By A. MARTIN

"This is the best country in the world; we have the money and conditions," so stated a longshoreman to me in Avenmouth, England.

Some things have improved a lot in England since the war. Lots of new homes have been built and more are being worked on. It is about 12 miles between Avenmouth and Bristol and all along the highway there are new homes, mostly two story buildings. They are buildings of two or three apartments with small flower gardens in front. In the rear there are quite large spaces for vegetable gardens.

Families are encouraged to raise their own vegetables and a special field is set aside for those who like to cultivate them. But for all these improvements England is far from being the "best country in the world," as the Avenmouth longshoreman was preaching.

Employers Attack Unions

Bristol is a city of half a million people. It is a manufacturing center for light industry—the largest undertaking being the Wills Tobacco company. It is supposed to be one of the most prosperous cities in West England.

It is a fact that the Bristol workers appear quite contented. They are well fed and well dressed. Though food prices are not much below those of New York, rent, I was told, is about $20 a month for dwellings for which one would have to pay as much as $30 and $40 in New York.

For factory workers wages are $12 to $18 a week. Skilled workers make more than that. Longshoremen get about $3.25 for an eight-hour work day and time and a half for overtime for the handling of general merchandise. For the handling of grain the pay is 18 shillings a day. Very little overtime is worked and Saturday afternoon work is indeed very rare.

Saloons are well patronized but I did not see a drunk while I was there. They close at 10 P.M. and by midnight streets are empty.

But all is not so rosy for the workers. While the longshoreman was talking about the best country in the world—on the very same day—newspapers reported that London workers employed by Messrs. Leslie and Godwin were told to leave the guild or leave their jobs. All these workers are members of the Guild of Insurance Officials. The employer's ultimatum was given when the union presented the following demands:

Recognition of the guild as the negotiating body for the insurance staffs.

Adequate salaries, including a marrying wage at marrying age.

Security of employment after probationary period and guaranteed pensions.

Equal opportunity for promotion of women.

The matter was reported to the Ministry of Labor. What the Ministry will do for these workers remains to be seen. But here is what it did for another group of workers.

No Favorable Settlements

This headline appeared in one of the papers: "MINISTRY FAILS TO END STRIKE," and it is typical. The article under this head goes on to say that the Ministry of Labor has failed to settle the strike of 120 warehouse workers at the factory of Falk, Stadleman and Co., makers of light accessories. The strike, then in its eighth week, had been called for the full recognition of the union, the National Union of Distributive and Allied Workers, and for reinstatement of the men who allegedly (newspapers use that smear word over there too) had been victimized. Support to this strike was given by dockers and railway men who refused to handle "hot" goods to and from the factory.

A previous strike, about five months before the present one, ended when the Industrial Court awarded improved wages and conditions and the present dispute arose from friction over the operation of that award, the article explained.

Many other cases that serve to illustrate the prevailing British labor unrest and the failure of official agencies to keep it down may be obtained from newspaper accounts.

A claim of pitchers and shopmen in a Smithfield meat market for a wage increase of five shillings a week is to be referred to the Industrial Court for arbitration.

Mr. L. C. Hansen of the Transport and General Workers union told the Daily Harold that apart from the wage claim, the workers had originally asked for a 42½-hour week. But the employers had insisted on the normal 45-hour week and, against that, proposed to improve overtime terms. Men making an early start would be entitled to overtime pay after nine hours of work, instead of ten hours work for straight pay. Claim for a two weeks annual vacation pay was rejected.

A deadlock in the claim for higher wages involving 20,000 public employes has been reached in the London Joint Industrial Council for the "non-trading" services—persons included therein are park employes, scavengers, sewermen, and numerous other trades of essential health protectors. On the employers' side are the London county council and the 28 metropolitan boroughs. Several authorities have increased the minimum wage from 56 shillings to 60 shillings a week, but there is no general agreement. Wage rates in London are today below those paid in many provincial areas.

Workers at the Hawkers Aircraft factory, Brookland, Surrey, are on strike against the employment of non-unionists in what was hitherto a union shop. The strike is now in its third week.

Even the co-operative societies are not free from labor troubles. The Daily Herald, April 1, reports that at a mass meeting strikers unanimously rejected proposals for a settlement of the dispute between distributive workers and the United Co-operative. At another co-operative, the Baking Society of Glasgow, about 1,500 are involved in a strike which began following the refusal of the society to grant a ten per cent wage increase.

The suggested basis of settlement was that the workers, most of them girls, should return immediately and that negotiations should be reopened, with the understanding that they should be concluded within a month, and that whatever settlement should be reached was to operate from April 1.

The above reports are picked at random from the Daily Herald, the official mouthpiece of the Labor party. They show that all is not well in England for the workers. It's not good for workers though business conditions are considered good and a huge armament program is in effect.

Want More Production

At the same time the Cabinet wants production doubled. The Prime Minister, Mr. Chamberlain, appeals to the National Confederation of Employers' Organizations, to speed up armaments.

The following is what the Government will ask employers to do:

Refuse orders which may interfere with the output of ammunitions and to extend their plants where necessary, the Government providing the money for this undertaking.

Mr. Chamberlain will assure the employers that they will not lose money by assenting to the armament speed up. He will announce that within the next 18 months the Government will place 500,000,000 pounds sterling, roughtly 2,500,000,000 dollars, for war preparations.

Many factory owners engaged in light metal production for civil work will be asked to switch a big portion of their plants over to the armament work. Factories engaged on wireless, iron mongery, metal windows, metal furniture and similar iron work, will be involved in this change.

The Prime Minister will ask the employers to engage a quarter of a million semi-skilled workers to supplement the skilled men now engaged in the manufacture of ammunitions, and he will also ask firms not participating in the munitions program to release skilled men needed by the arms firms.

Later this week, the Premier and Sir Thomas Inskip, will meet the Engineering unions and ask them to waive trade union rules which prevent night work and the employment of semi-skilled labor.

He will give them guarantees to the effect that these regulations will be restored to a peace-time basis, when the armament drive is over.

The answer that the trade union officials will give Mr. Chamberlain will no doubt be along the lines already indicated by the leaders of the Labor party. To quote Mr. James Walker, M.P., at the Labor party conference, "The British workers will fight for British institutions and the British Empire." A. V. Alexander, another M.P., in one of his Parliament speeches, said "he would be ready to consider conscription."

When a political labor fakir talks of "collective security" he is really talking for the preservation of the capitalist system, and the politicians and a raw deal to the workers in return—that is, if the workers will be foolish enough to believe them again.

Capitalism can be maintained in England only by reducing wages and through the usual unemployment benefits—in amounts that will insure capitalists a satisfactory increment of profits.

Labor Party Helps Bosses

The last Labor Government cut down the wages of the public workers, introduced the so-called "Annomalies Act," which deprived 30,000 workers of unemployment benefits, and appointed the "May Economy Commission," which recommends the Means Test. In other words, the Labor party performed a deed that the capitalist class did not dare to undertake directly. The Labor Government had become a tool of the capitalist class, to save capitalism by lowering the standard of living of the workers.

While the re-armament program will employ hundreds of thousands of workers directly, many other hundreds of thousands will be put to work, either in the production of the necessary raw material or the necessities of life upon which the wages of the first section of workers will have to be spent. This is bound to bring about an artificially created prosperity in old England.

While the politicians and labor fakirs lull the workers into a false sense of security, the capitalist class foresees the crisis when the armament program will be over.

The Independent Labor party has this to say.

"The possessing class clearly foresees that the crisis will arise and is preparing for it by preliminary steps towards fascism." This is the meaning of the Trades Disputes Act, which limits the power of the workers to strike; of the Sedition Act which seeks to prevent solidarity among the workers of the rank and file of the armed forces; the Public Order Act, under which the right of the workers to mass on the streets and to demonstrate is restricted; and of the militarization of the police force, with the object of mainaining it as a defense of private property. No thinking worker who understands the significance of such legislation can doubt that the possessing class in Great Britain is preparing to use fascist methods in any critical situation threatening its time-established privileges.

"British capitalists who tangled in the Spanish war and have been giving, secretly, unconditional support to Franco, are now beginning to realize that victory for Franco means victory for Germany and Italy, who are threatening British imperial control of Africa and India. Hitler is demanding German colonies as the price of withdrawing troops from Spain; and if such colonies will not be granted he means to colonize Spain with Nazi soldiers and their families to the tune of many thousands."

Threat of War

According to the diplomatic correspondent of the Sunday Pictorial, March 27-38, these intentions of Hitler augur trouble. France will not tolerate a fascist state on her southern frontier. Britain is alarmed at the threat to Gibraltar.

While the diplomatic front is still in a bad shape, the military is still more dangerous for France and Great Britain. This is what "John Bull," April 9, '38, has to say:

"Twenty years ago Germany lay beaten, broken and bankrupt, under the heels of the Allies, today, without the firing of even a gun or the drawing of a sword, she dominates the continent as decisively as Napoleon dominated it at the height of his power.

"During the brief five years that have elapsed since the Nazi conspiracy seized power, the whole complexion of Europe has changed. Austria has been absorbed in a night; Czechoslovakia lies helpless in the vast jaws of a greater Germany. Hitler legionaires are on the Brenner and Mussolini, having sacrificed Austria of which he had declared himself to be the guardian, for the sake of German consent to his own conquest of Abyssinia, receives them with acclamation.

"All the smaller nations are running for shelter before the storm. The Hungarian soldiery fraternize with the formidable neighbor who is now on their frontier. The King of Rumania finds reason for not paying his visit to London. Switzerland, with its large German-speaking population, sees the shadow darkening over Lake Constance. Poland, once the ally of France, is virtually making terms with the power that matters, and right through the Balkans, to the Sea of Marmora, it is the Nazi star in the ascendant.

"Von Papen, fresh from his successful intrigues in Vienna, has gone as ambassador to Turkey, which has been our friend and is the keystone in the Balkan block, and incidentally, in the Eastern Mediterranean.

"Working swiftly and under close secrecy, Germany has been building on her North Sea coast new and immensely powerful fortifications, which are the greatest menace to Britain's safety.

"The island of Sylt on the west coast of Jutland has been turned into a vast aerial and naval stronghold. The fortifications of the island include a naval harbor and aerodromes.

"The whole northern end of the island has been transformed into a mass of concrete, concealing underground hangers, and this only about 400 miles from London.

"The island fortress of Heligoland guarding the approach to Hamburg on the river Elba and the North Sea end of the Kiel canal has also been strengthened.

"The strongest of the fortifications in all Germany, the Dagbladet, in Oslo, states, now extend from Hamburg to the Baltic port of Lubeck and about 100 miles eastward along the Baltic coast to the island of Ruegen.

"Germany's hegemony of Europe is not a dream; it is a fact.

"So John Bull is turning his eyes to the Mediterranean and says we are engaged in what are called, conversations with the Italian dictator, and all must hope for a happy issue to them.

"But it would be suicidal to shut our eyes to the enormous change that has come over the situation there.

"Even in the last war, when there was no effective enemy on the Mediterranean littoral, the passage of the sea was full of perils.

"Now with Lybia on one flank of Egypt and Abyssinia on the other, with the narrow straits between Sicily and the African coast fortified so as to make the channel impassable—and with Spain and the Balearic islands falling into the hands of the protege of Hitler and Mussolini, the navigation of the Mediterranean might in certain events become unthinkable. These are bare and sinister facts with which we (Britain) are faced. And the only answer to this is armament and more armament; and another world war, profits for ammunition makers, misery, starvation at home—death at the front for the youth of the world."

ADVICE TO BOYS

By UNCLE COVAMY

(Dedicated to my adopted Nephews, Bob and Edgar Hodemaker)

When you're called to war, my son,
You will get a bomb and gun,
A helmet and a mask,
And no question you must ask;
And you must put from the start
Love and mercy from your heart;
For then your duty is to slay,
Ravish, and obey
Your superiors, my boy.
To this end you must destroy
Every ideal mother thought
She, my boy, to you had taught.
On the battlefield you will
Another good boy seek to kill;
And he will do the same to you,
Or to his country be untrue.
This your duty is,— Likewise also it is his—
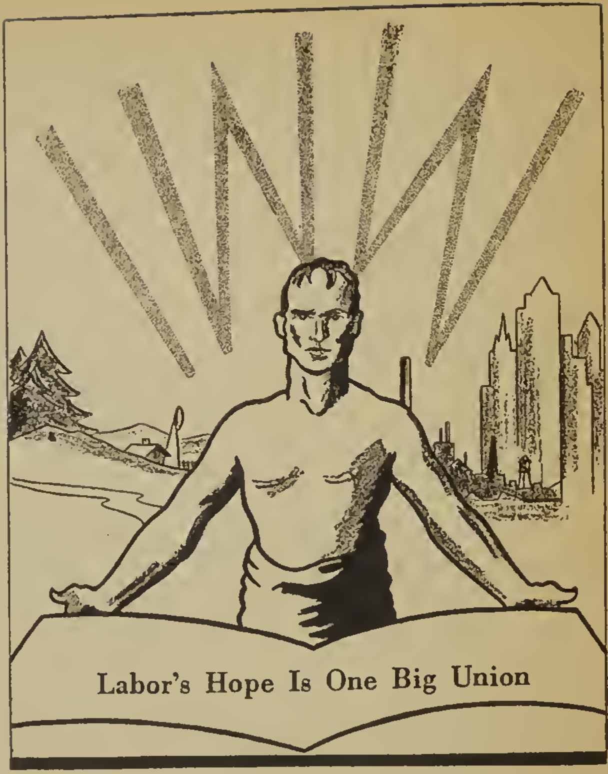
To center all your thought and will
Each the other boy to kill.
But hard as this may seem to you,
'Tis not all that you must do.
In addition, you will gas
Mothers, children, babes en masse!
You will bomb the peaceful town,
Blast its schools and steeples down;
You will gorge its streets with dead,
Far and wide will ruin spread!
You will slaughter, raze and burn—
To an insane beast you turn!
But, if you return alive,
If with honor you survive
"The crusade for democracy,"
You will, son, a hero be!
You will sit down at the feast
With the statesmen and the priest.
If so it be that you return
In a coffin or an urn,
Your very name to them unknown,
They will raise a mighty stone,—
Out of marble they will hew
A memorial for you!
And to it will come thru the years
Presidents and Profiteers,
Mourning o'er your silent dust—
Calling other boys to trust,
Urging them with glowing lies
To a devil's enterprise.

L'envoi

When you are called to serve, my son,
Remember who the last war won.
If so you do, then you will choose
To other ends your strength to use—
To cleanse the homeland of the crew
Who would make a beast of you.
That is all I have to say,
Unto you, my boy, today.

WAGE WORKERS UNITE

By MORTIMER DOWNING



Labor's Hope Is One Big Union

Wage workers are the children of the ancient serfs. Capitalism claims to have made the present producers of wealth into Freemen. But at the same moment that they made wage workers of serfs, capitalists enacted laws that for two or more to combine to raise wages constituted "restraint of trade and commerce." All their laws to this day are on that basis. What capitalism actually did at its birth was to make every wage worker a merchant—a merchant of the one supreme commodity, Human Labor Power.

Now look at yourself, Mr. Merchant. When you seek to feed clothe and shelter yourself, you go out into a legally open market, in free competition, to sell the powers of your body to the highest bidder, whose yardstick is the clock. You can not eat, clothe yourself or sleep except you find a buyer of your labor power. Your forefather, the serf, could kick against his lord as inhuman, but you are part and parcel of a system wherein you sign the contract of your own starvation. So long as you permit this system to survive, you are doomed.

What happens? You are hungry—you must find a job. You are ragged—you must find a job. You are sleepy—you must buy a bed. You have tramped long, you are weary and disheartened, then you can "buy" a job from a mancatcher. And for this you must have cash.

There is your problem and this brings the question of your existence to the last stage of the iron law of Production, Distribution, Acquisition and Consumption. In a world of possible plenty one-half of your class are ill fed, ill clothed and ill housed. You blame the laws, curse the lawmakers and do everything except unite—

"Unite to break for aye the chains
That fetter fast your brawn and brains."

With all this misery you have a remedy for your condition. What is it? Ah! Something so simple that a child of ten years can read and understand it. It has been translated into every language under the sun where wage workers sweat and suffer. All the story of your freedom from your ills is told in three hundred and fifteen simple English words, and relatively briefly in every language. It is called the Preamble of the Industrial Workers of the World.

Three hundred and fifteen words, six short paragraphs and eleven sentences frame the charter of your welfare as wage workers. Moreover it is not only your freedom but that of every other wage seller in the wide world. Mr. Merchant of human labor power, why not follow the "trusts," which you hate, in so far as organization is concerned? Blot out wars, throttle greed, exile brutality by the one act expressed in one sentence:

"Workers of the World, unite, you have nothing to lose but your chains and a world to gain."

Then the circle of Production, Distribution, Acquisition and Consumption will close for all mankind.

In January, February and March of 1938, as compared with the same months in 1937, production in the United States dropped 54 percent. Production fell more in these three months than in three years after 1929. Face this fact and realize that either the workers have to take over production for use or fare along with capitalism to world chaos.

On the inside of the front cover appears the full text of the Preamble of the Indusetrial Workers of the World.

BUTTE AGAIN

A reader criticizes "Butte," a story by Montana Slim which appeared in the April issue of the One Big Union Monthly.

Montana Slim, with the scissorbill's weakness for rushing into print, has acquired for himself the distinction of being the proverbial April fool. His villifying description of the Irish miner is written for the purpose of deluding the average reader that "Mike Finnegan" is typical of his race.

We have seen the stage Irishman in all his grotesqueness and recognized it as British propaganda to divert attention from their merciless exploitation of the Irish. Direct action was the method used to stop this slander, which consisted in wrecking such theatres which exhibited the monstrosities. The owners and managers learned a costly lesson and the scurility ceased.

Now Montana Slim ignorantly enters the already exploited field to exhibit his bigotry. He drags in Mike Finnegan as his straw man, pummels him mercilessly, finally demolishes him and emerges in a blaze of self-conceit.

According to Slim, Mike arrives from Miami, Arizona, and never saw or heard of a drilling machine nicknamed the "widow maker." For Slim's information, the "widow maker" was operated in Jerome, Bisbee and Miami long before its introduction to Butte, and was so named by the Irish miners.

Poor Mike, after his experience in the "hot holes" of Arizona, didn't know enough to get the sweaty stiffness from his "digging clothes" until, Slim relates, the other miners told him to "wash them every night."

Invincible Mike, with the help of the little Slav performs a Herculean task with a machine he had never heard of. Slim says, after several days work (not weeks or months), Mike and his partner had 1,200 feet for breaking, 1,150 for mucking, and 800 feet for timbering—not counting how much the measure-man cheated. A colossal record which only Paul Bunyan and his Blue Ox might have made. Mike evidently smuggled them into Butte in his two suitcases.

Slim says Mike was amazed at the little Slav, who wouldn't stop to get his breath but kept mucking in the terrible heat. In a succeeding paragraph he forgets himself and says, "The Slav was a little wiser because he didn't work so hard."

The story of the employment office is pure bunk. Imagine a wobbly climbing the "hill," looking for and needing a job, confessing to the manager of the "Kangaroo Court." Such a one is either dumb or has the martyr complex.

Slim takes us to the "Rose Garden" with Mike in the clutches of the law, and the wretch is given a prison sentence. Mike is a despicable slave, a drunkard, an adulterer and Slim forgets to crown the worthless character a dope fiend.

The nearest Slim ever got to a Butte mine was the vitiated atmosphere of a Park street pool room. No new arrival gets a contract as these jobs are reserved for company pets since there is a chance to make better than wages and no shift boss bothers them.

Let us remind Slim of a Butte incident.

The Pearse-Connolly club of Butte, composed of Irish revolutionists, many of them wobblies, protected and escorted the funeral of Frank Little when scissorbills hid in pool rooms and saloons, afraid to be on the street.

We also tell you that from the loins of the Molly Maguires sprang the Knights of Labor, the United Mine Workers, and the Western Federation of Miners. Incidentally, it was from the Western Federation of Miners that the I.W.W. got the three stars on its symbol.

The I.W.W. constitution particularly stresses—irrespective of race, color or creed. This Slim ignores.

We recall the old wobbly song:

Scissor Bill is down on everybody—
The Irishman, the Dutchman, and the Man in the moon.

—Goban Sayer.

I.W.W.--Non-Political Labor Union

A non-political labor union, such as the I.W.W. is particularly well adapted to the situation confronting the WPA workers as well as other unemployed men and women of many political beliefs. Some are Republicans, some Democrats, some Socialists, and some have no particular favorite party. To restrict membership in the I.W.W. to one political faith would be to isolate one group from those of other political beliefs. Working people have not a common political belief.

Working people have common interests in wages, hours, and working conditions; also in the amount of relief they get when unemployed. A republican, a democrat, and a socialist, though unemployed, could never agree on the political questions of tariff, taxes, or who is the best man for President. But they could all agree on the economic questions of higher wages, or shorter hours on WPA jobs, or more relief. Therefore the I.W.W. tells them to leave their political beliefs and differences outside th union hall so that these differences will not disturb the discussion of the union's business of shorter hours and better working conditions.

Being non-political, the I.W.W. does not endorse any political party or individual politician and we ask them not to endorse us. This is the plain common sense way of doing things too. If we endorse one politician for an office the other fellow would naturally say, "Well, if you aren't going to support me there is no use of me paying any further attention to you. I had better use what influence I have to satisfy people who might support me."

And the politician whom we might endorse would say, "Well, now that I am sure you are going to vote for me and my party there is no use in my paying any further attention to you. I had better use my influence to satisfy those persons I am not so sure will vote for me, to see if I can win them over." They wouldn't say it in so many words but that is the way they look at it. And there you are. One will work against your interests because you won't support him and the other, cock-sure you will support him anyway, will do the same.

Furthermore, unions endorsing politicians because of what they say they are going to do has proved a fruitless procedure. A politicians' platform is like the steps of a train—it is only to get in on.

Not that the members of the I.W.W. don't vote. But the members of the I.W.W. can vote as they please, without telling us or telling them. And when they vote, if they vote, they are influenced in much the same manner that other workers are They vote for the one that will do the least harm in their estimation. But as the I.W.W. does not allow politicians and their stooges to use the organization for a vote-catching machine and does not endorse any political group, it avoids any risk of the politicians tearing the union wide open in their attempts to control it.

The worker's power lies in his organized strength on the point of production and if we build up the power at that point, the politicians will be around, hat in hand, wanting to listen to our slightest desire just as they now listen to the desires of the economically powerful employing class. The I.W.W. says, "Keep politics and politicians out of the union and keep the union out of politics.—A WPA Worker.

WHY REBEL

WHY REBEL

Why bother rebelling against capitalism if it is destroying itself anyway?

It is wrecking itself, damaging the earth that nurtured it, and threatening to drag humanity into oblivion with it,

But to conserve ourselves, to conserve the world so that later generations may blossom in it, to conserve whatever is worthy in our traditions, we must rebel.

We are an enslaved and manipulated class of hired hands. Our lot is that of trying to make a living by doing what we are told to do---and by people who can not have our interests at heart. That is our destiny whether we have not learned to read and write or whether we are busy hawking our sheepskins to personnel managers. We cannot be aware of our situation and hold our heads erect if we do not rebel.

The intelligent rebel of today is concerned with somewhat different issues than was his counterpart of an earlier age. Then men rebelled against what was and what had been, The world we live in is phony and over-administered and self-destructive. We should rebel against it. But it is a world so obviously in the process of shifting and changing that today's rebel is primarily in revolt against what the world threatens to become.

Yes, capitalism is all too likely to disappear without our lifting a finger to end it. But in that case, what can we expect as a system to succeed capitalism?

Surely it will be succeeded by a society premised on those technical and traditional traits of our present order that survive it, organized and modified by the forces that have destroyed capitalism. The issue what traits survive and how they are modified and organized depends on what forces do bring capitalism to an end.

If capitalism ends primarily because of the troubles it gets itself into, or from the actions of the swollen bureaucracies it needs and engenders, or is given the final coup by the authoritarianism it seems likely to seek as a final refuge---what sort of world do we get from that?

Beware of the sort of "socialism" mankind can get without even trying. It is not only a hideous caricature of the dreams of the socialist pioneers, but it may so adroitly manipulate its antagonisms and administer its underlying population as to make itself rebellion-proof.

But---IF capitalism is brought to an end by those who rebel against it, by those who despise its exploitation of labor, by those who contemn its devices for dividing humanity into warring collectivities, by those who cannot stomach its commercialism and who revolt at its commercials, who shudder at its glad-hand peddlers of mummified smiles and instant personality, who prefer the ancient verities to its tinkling baubles, who cringe at its ugliness, its stench and its moral degrodation, but who refuse to cringe before its hireling watchdogs---then, and only then, is there a chance for a good world.

Rebel, while capitalism still makes it possible.

"THE WOBBLIES RETURN" IN CHICAGO

The recent resurgence of IWW activity in Chicago (reported a few weeks ago in a long but somewhat confused article in the Chicago Sun-Times, under the headline "The Wobblies Return") points to a general reanimation of the radical movement here, and the present situation seems to indicate a promise of continuous renewal of organization and education in several areas. Plans for the agricultural workers organization drive this summer and fall have been discussed at length in recent issues of the Industrial Worker and elsewhere in this issue of The Rebel Worker. Members of the branch have also decided to promote the Industrial Worker and various other IWW publications by arranging for sales at newsstands, factories, streetcorners and at forthcoming IWW street meetings. We've also been setting up a weekly literature table at the open-air street market on Maxwell Street.

Most recently, the Chicago IWW branch has begun seriously investigating the possibilities of organizing unemployed workers in this area into some sort of direct action, self-help program.

Strangely enough, however, it seems that the IWW is not the only group in Chicago interested in the possibilities of action by organized jobless workers. It was with considerable surprise that we noticed the emergence a couple of months ago of a rival group purporting to organize the unemployed here into an allegedly "radical" pressure group. This group calls itself Jobs Or Income Now (JOIN), and is run by the liberal Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), with substantial financial backing of the United Auto Workers and the Packinghouse Workers. Its program is almost totally political in scope (hunger marches to the Mayor's office, meetings with local politicians, etc.) except for some even more useless and ridiculous proposals (such as having the unemployed sell apples on the street: this, they claim, is a "dramatic" effort to arouse church leaders, social workers, etc.).

With such competition, the Chicago area Wobblies are reasonably confident of some success in their own organizational effort. The potential danger of this other group (which, it must be remembered, is well-financed) is that it could very well sidetrack many unemployed from the economic roots of their problem and turn them into little more than a vehicle for disrupting the Chicago political machine and replacing it with another machine which could be just as bad if not worse.

It is therefore necessary for serious militants here not only to give attention to the organizational activity of the IWW, but also to expose the ineffective and misleading political nonsense of its competitor.

We have begun our organizational effort by an intensive leafleting of the North and South sides of the city to determine the degree of unrest among the unemployed and their willingness to participate in a direct action program. These are the two greatest focal points of unemployment in Chicago, the former containing a large number of Puerto Ricans and Mexicans and the latter being the main area of Chicago's Negro ghetto. A leaflet in Spanish will be distributed on the North side in the next few weeks. Another leaflet, specifically directed to Negro workers, was distributed to participants in the second Freedom Day school boycott demonstration downtown, and is now being distributed on the South side. It was this leaflet that resulted in the aforementioned story in the Sun-Times (February 25).

The fundamental problem confronting the jobless workers and us is, naturally, what can the unemployed do? The two tasks at hand are to better the lives of the unemployed (to feed them, clothe them, house them) and simultaneously try to lay the foundation for a revolutionary workers' movement. My political socialist friends (who call themselves "realists") tell me this is impossible, that the workers aren't ready for a revolutionary movement, that all we can do now is attach ourselves to the civil rights movement and "radicalize" it, while keeping alive among ourselves the idea of socialism. We must even support reform candidates, some of them tell me, because there's nothing else. I suppose, by voting for this or that candidate (even a stalinist, if the party line happens to be "liberal" at the moment) that it might be possible to get an extra bowl of oatmeal in the morning, or the right to move into a new potential slum, or any one of a thousand other meaningless "rewards" for accepting the status quo, by blending into it, "realistically," like a chameleon. But this so-called "realism" seems to me to conceal a deep-rooted fear of real struggle, and if an actual revolutionary situation developed (in their terms), I suspect they'd still be uttering the same hesitations and postponements. Meanwhile the day-to-day struggle with the boss goes on, and the workers are looking for answers.

Considering the present situation of the labor movement, we view ourselves in the IWW primarily as a disruptive force within the existing capitalist system, seeking ways out of that system by demonstrating its uselessness and its miseries and participating in all meaningful movements of protest and liberation. Until the time rolls around when we can once again function as a union, i. e., as a collective bargaining agency (and the forthcoming agricultural workers organization drive as well as the current railroad organization on the West Coast indicate that possibility in the not-too-darkly-distant future), we see much need at this time for rebellion by small groups of workers directed toward various problems related to but not exactly traditionally part of the labor struggle. There is, at present, for instance, no organized effort at opposing the draft except by pacifists of one variety or another. Yet the occasional increases in the draft are nothing more than efforts to artificially reduce unemployment, and therefore deserve our attention. It is problems like these that we are now working on.

The next few months will probably see the branch's emphasis on the following:

Picketlines: We hope to set up intermittent picketlines at unemployment offices, accompanied by leaflets telling the unemployed what we're doing and why they should join us.

Rent Strikes: The success of these in New York, San Francisco and elsewhere makes the rent strike an inevitable aspect of a serious protest movement. Metropolitan CORE, of which a number of us are members, has begun canvassing slum apartments intending to organize a series of rent strikes here. They're also planning to set up slum tours for the middle-class to see what slums are like, etc. This isn't a bad idea, but we're thinking of turning it around and setting up "tours of slumlord's mansions," consisting of a group of slum residents who'll show up one morning in front of one of these suburban palaces, incidentally armed with picket signs denouncing slum conditions in case the "No Visitors" sign is out.

Help Yourself Demonstrations: There are hundreds, if not thousands, of children in Chicago who are hungry and undernourished. We're trying to assemble a group of these children and/or their parents to go with us into a downtown restaurant, have a good meal, and charge the bill, of course, to the President's "War on Poverty."

Street Meetings: The recent success of these in the Bay Area IWW demonstrates that this old Wobbly organizational method is still useful. We're planning a series of them all summer and fall.

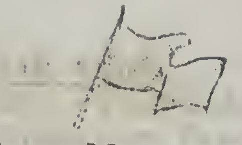
Aside from the organization of unemployed and the side-issues described above, Chicago IWW members are developing certain related tactics to bring the facts of economic exploitation into the foreground of public consideration. We have decided, for example, to picket and leaflet various factories, restaurants and stores which pay their employees a subhuman wage. There are factories and stores here which hire only Puerto Ricans, and restaurants which hire only Irish immigrant girls as waitresses, because the boss knows that these immigrants are in desperate need of employment and will work for less, and are ignored by the trade union bureaucrats who are more interested in maintaining their bowling clubs and dinners at expensive hotels. We have begun going into some of these places (such as Woolworth's, where no one makes more than a buck and a quarter an hour) talking to the workers, finding out how the wages run, etc. Until we get the IWW off the "subversive" list it's pretty damn hard to talk to these workers about joining the One Big Union. But we can start by picketing and leafleting the rat-shops where they are forced to work, letting the workers and the public know what working conditions and wages must always be when the boss is organized and the workers aren't.

Several of us are also thinking of entering some unskilled, part-time occupation (either as laundry workers or dishwashers or service station attendants, etc.) and raising hell from the inside, collectively. You must admit, if several dishwashers in different restaurants suddenly began simultaneously demanding recognition of the IWW as their collective bargaining agency, it would certainly have an appreciable impact on our fellow workers and the boss.

Unlike well-meaning but misleading liberals, we do not have such a low regard for our fellow workers as to seduce them into a time-wasting political tea-party. The workers of this country (and for that matter the world) need a labor movement. We are trying to build it. We think that many workers are ready, as we are, for some serious action now. After all, it has been said, the working people have nothing to lose but their chains, and a world to win.

Franklin ROSEMONT

MAY DAY 1964



> "May Day ought to be a glorious day for all the workers of the world. It is their international holiday; their day of universal rejoicing; their day of hope and inspiration."

These lines were written by Eugene V. Debs for the May Day 1925 number of the IWW magazine, The Industrial Pioneer. What remains of the May Day spirit today? The United States government has declared May 1 "Law Day," perverting the revolutionary workingclass spirit of May Day into an official hymn of respect for capitalist oppression. Soviet Russia and Red China similarly distort May Day with their long military parades and even longer speeches by well-paid bureaucrats.

But a new revolutionary workingclass spirit is rising from the ashes of these last few apathetic years. It is rising against the obstacles not only of capitalism but of stalinism and nationalism and other authoritarian "left" theories, as well as the official "labor movements" run by bureaucrats who have no interest in anything other than maintaining the system and their salaries. In Britain and Japan this new revolutionary workers' consciousness has already become a serious nuisance, if not a threat, to the State bureaucracies. In Spain the rising wave of protest against fascist oppression will one day soon topple the dictator Franco. In Latin America too there are signs that the working people feel they can no longer rely on the empty promises of "leaders" and must take a hand in their own destinies. In the United States, where the authoritarian socialist movement has practically collapsed (having reduced itself to excercises in Bolshevik catechism), the IWW is growing larger and stronger each day. Government bureaucrats, the press and authoritarian socialists like to pretend that the IWW no longer exists. Undoubtedly they would prefer that it didn't, for our very presence disturbs their complacent illusions and forces them to recognize that freedom remains, for some of us at least, "the only cause worth serving."

We are tired of the sterile theorizing that has exhausted the "left" these last few years. We are tired of the practice of confining revolutionary aspirations to the college campus, to the middle-class intellectual's suburban parlor, to abstruse esoteric journals. We are organizing on the job, talking to our fellow workers in stores, in restaurants, in factories and on the street. To some, who know of socialism only as an idle diversion for college students, this may seem to be a new tactic. But the IWW has been doing it for years, because it's the only way a serious revolutionary workingclass movement can be built.

This May Day we are going to picket and leaflet the Spanish Government Tourist Bureau at 23 West Jackson, between Dearborn and State, as an expression of solidarity with our Spanish fellow workers in their struggle for freedom. The spirit of May Day is coming back! Why not join us in celebrating it? And if you can't make it, the Bureau's telephone number is WA-2-0005: why not call them and give them May Day "greetings" of your own?

A LONGSHOREMAN'S CALL

(The following letter, republished from Solidarity, was written in connection with an anti-war conference held in Paris last November, sponsored by the National Committee of 100 of Great Britain, the War Resisters International, and the Zengakuren of Japan. A simultaneous meeting (also in Paris) of longshoremen, seamen, clerks, etc., was held to consider the particular possibilities of action against war at the ports. The Secretary of this meeting was John Papworth, 22 Nevern Road, London SW5, from whom further particulars can be obtained.)

Dear Brother Portworkers,

This is a plea for peace. A plea made by a dock labourer, the largest proportion of whose life must be spent amid sweat, dirt, exhaustion and sometimes blood in the never ending struggle for some sort of economic stability. A struggle which should and almost always does monopolise the whole of his consciousness and leaves no time for any original thought. This is the station in life into which I have been placed---one which, I am sure, you will easily recognize.

My position in society has been so carefully arranged by those responsible for such things that I am removed by only one week's wages from pauperism. Domestic tragedy, as you will well know, is always imminent. Sickness, accident, unemployment---the real ever-present enemies ---always there to smash our pride and destroy any vestige of character and personality we might develop in spite of all the obstacles.

Is it any wonder then that the vast majority of us concern ourselves less and less with the major international problems and grab at the fruits of labour while they are going? We look at life through half-closed eyes and leave our destinies in the hands of people who have consistently betrayed us throughout the ages---and taught us to hate other working men just like ourselves.

We British portworkers have been taught in turn to hate Germans, Italians, Japanese, Russians and Chinese---and we have complied with fervour. We have then been commanded to go out and shoot them or blow them to bits and accepted as easily as if we were doing a normal day's work.

Such is the manner in which restricted minds react to abusive propaganda. I would willingly have machine-gunned an Italian portworker even though in the course of my whole life I have never met one. I could have quite easily condoned the slaughter of German workers' wives and children in Dresden or Hamburg, although my stomach would turn at the sight of a mutilated animal. I could have applauded the decision to atomise Hiroshima when the nearest I had come to a Japanese was at a performance of Madame Butterfly. And so it goes on. Tomorrow it might be the turn of the French. The day after that the man next door. Next year my own wife and children.

Authorities are rapidly failing to ensure the continued existence of mankind. We must begin to take control from them. We must reject the hate attitudes. Portworkers may be inarticulate, but they are also vociferous. They may be humble but they can be equally as powerful. They are an essential part of any nation's economy and are in the position to terminate anyone's aggressive aspirations.

Only when we stand together as one race, mankind, can we begin to end forever man's greatest scourge.

Let us begin by starting to know each other, by meeting and talking and laughing with each other and gradually find out that we are exactly the same, with the same kind of problems, then we shall soon reject the swindle that we have been involved in for centuries and really think of each other, after the comradeship we would generate, as brothers.

Yours fraternally,

Jimmy JEWERS

The General Defense Committee

To protect the interests of workers in their revolutionary struggle for freedom the IWW long ago established its General Defense Committee, which throughout its history has paid for the defense of workers, collected and distributed strike relief, publicized trials of revolutionary workers, etc.

The need for such organized defense cannot be overestimated. In the early days of the IWW the "free speech fights" required funds and publicity. The famous strikes at Paterson and Lawrence, the Wheatland hop riots, the opposition to war and other labor struggles which catapulted the IWW into national and world prominence---all these depended in part at least on urgently needed defense activity.

Today the General Defense Committee remains at the forefront of revolutionary defense. It has recently collected and sent strike relief to the destitute miners in Hazard, Kentucky, and to the Asturian miners in Spain.

The inertness of the official trade unions and the left-wing political sects regarding these problems requires that the General Defense Committee (as the only organized defense of all workers everywhere in their struggle against oppression) maintain itself and grow to meet the demands of the new wave of protest now emerging.

Contributions to the General Defense Committee are always welcome. Membership in the Committee is open to IWW members and non-members who agree with the principles of the Committee. For further information write to:

Agricultural Workers

Agricultural workers are the most thoroughly deprived and thoroughly exploited workers in the country. Working in the hot sun for twelve or fourteen hours for a total daily income of as low as three or four dollars, with which a wife and children must be fed and clothed and housed; subjected to unhealthful and physically dangerous working conditions (agriculture is the third most hazardous industry in the United States in terms of job-connected accidents, but farm workers are unprotected even by workmen's compensation); their children given almost no opportunity for education, since they too must work in the fields: this is the lot of hundreds of thousands of workingmen and their families in the United States.

Obviously they need a union. But repeated failures by well-financed AFL-CIO "organizers" (with their Buicks and briefcases) have led some people to the conclusion that these migratory workers cannot be organized, that the obstacles are too great. When one looks into the history of agricultural workers' organization, however, one sees that the IWW Agricultural Workers Industrial Union 110 (starting in 1915 and continuing through the 20's into the 30's) consistently improved the living and working conditions of its members. The IWW is the only union that helps the agricultural worker to help himself. With this in mind, we can conclude that it is not that migratory workers cannot be organized, but that the AFL-CIO cannot possibly organize them.

This summer a number of IWW organizers are entering the harvest fields, in Michigan, in Wisconsin and in Illinois, to agitate for the organization of our migratory agricultural fellow workers. Of course, the corporation farmers didn't in the past, and probably won't now, take too kindly to Wobbly organizers, who have a reputation for raising wages and improving working conditions and thus reducing somewhat the income of the exploiters. There are "criminal syndicalism" laws in many states which can easily be revived if necessary to keep agricultural workers in "their place" (i. e., at the bottom of the ladder). There are also police, the militia, the American Legion: the whole anti-union network. We are fully aware of the obstacles awaiting us. But we are equally aware of what agricultural workers have done for themselves in the past and their even greater possibilities for today. As the old IWW song by Ralph Chaplin---Solidarity Forever---says:

> "When the Union's inspiration through the workers' blood shall run,
> There can be no power greater anywhere beneath the sun."

If YOU are entering the harvest, we need your help in our organization drive. For further information, contact:

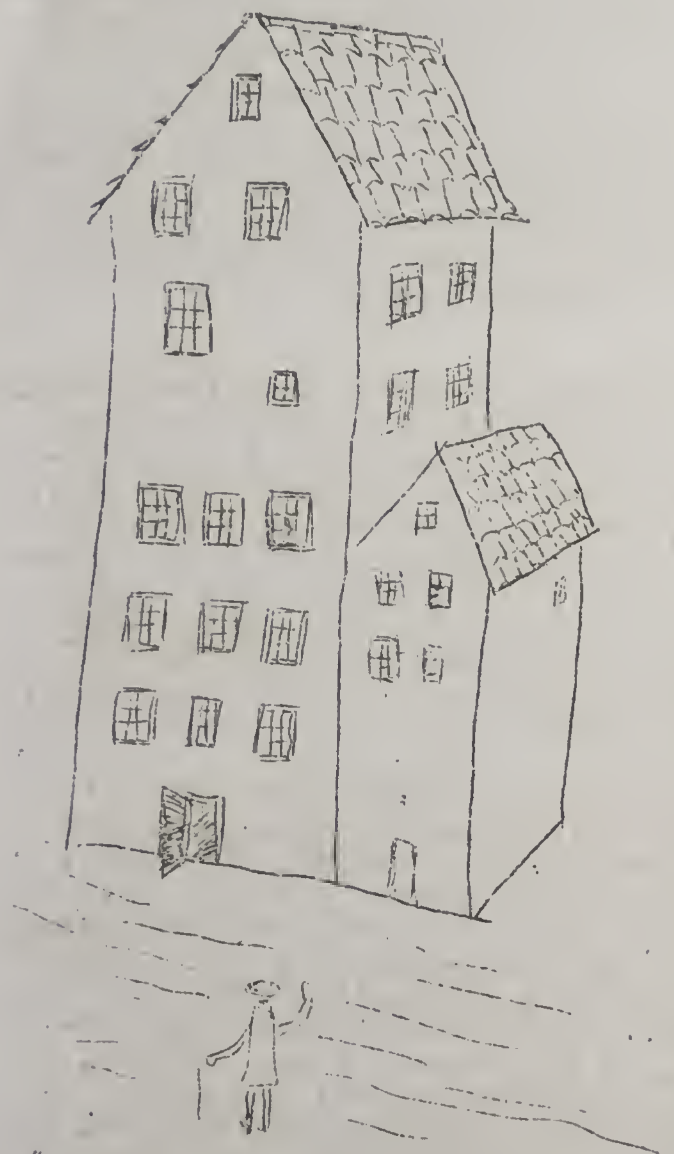
THE GREAT MAGICIAN



"he could have transmuted all the tiles of the roof into bars of gold."

There was once a powerful magician who lived in a garret in the Rue Bouffetard. He lived there in the guise of a little old clerk, tidy and punctual, and worked in a branch of the Araganais Bank on the Avenue des Gibelins. With the wave of a magic toothpick he could have transmuted all the tiles of the roof into bars of gold. But that would have been immoral, for he believed that work ennobles man. And---to some extent---even woman, he would add.

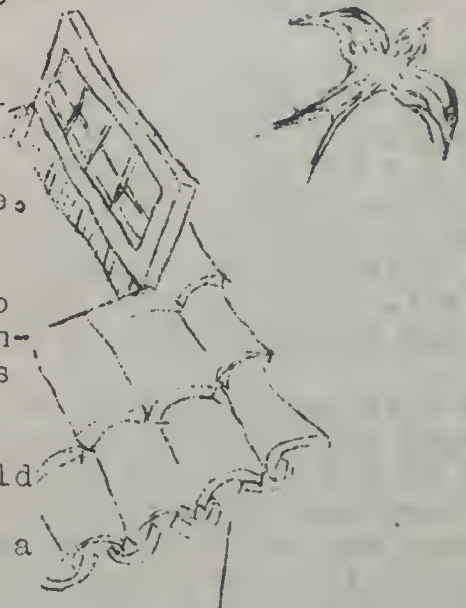
When his Aunt Ursula, an old shrew who had just been ruined by the collapse of Serbian-Bulgarian stocks, came to live with him and demanded that he take care of her, he could have transformed her at will into a pretty young princess, or into a swan harnessed to his magic chariot, or into a soft-boiled egg, or into a ladybug, or into a bus. But that would have broken with good family tradition, the backbone of society and morality. So he slept on a straw mat and would get up at six o'clock to buy Aunt Ursula her rolls and prepare her coffee; after which, he listened patiently to the daily broadside of complaints: that the coffee tasted of soap, that there was a cockroach baked into one of the rolls, that he was an unworthy nephew and would be disinherited. "Disinherited of what?" you might well wonder. But he let her talk on, knowing that if he wanted to... But Aunt Ursula must never suspect that he was a powerful magician. That might give birth to thoughts of lucre and close the gates of Paradise forever.

After that, the great magician would go down his six flights, sometimes almost breaking his neck on the murderously slippery stairs. However, he would pick himself up with a faint smile, thinking that if he wished he could change himself into a swallow and take wing through the skylight. But the neighbors might see, and so wondrous a feat would shake the very foundation of their naive but wholesome faith.

When he reached the street, he would brush the dust off his alpaca jacket at the same time taking care not to pronounce those words which would have instantly turned it into a brocade vestment. Such an act would have planted a sinister doubt in the hearts of the people passing and shaken their innocent belief in the immutability of the laws of nature.

He had his breakfast at the counter in a cafe, taking only some ersatz coffee and a bit of stale bread. Ah, if he wanted to...but in order to stop himself from making use of his supernatural powers, he would swallow five cognacs in rapid succession. The alcohol, dulling the edge of his magic powers, brought him round to a salutary humility and to the feeling that all men, including himself, were brothers. If the cashier repulsed him when he tried to kiss her, pretending it was because of his dirty beard, he would tell himself that she had no heart and understood nothing of the spirit of the gospels. At a quarter of eight, he was in his office, his sleeve-protectors on, a pen behind his ear, and a newspaper spread before him. With only a slight effort of concentration he could have known straight off the present, past and future of the entire world, but he restrained himself from using this gift. He made himself read the paper so as not to lose touch with the common language; it allowed him to communicate over an aperitif with his equals---in appearance---and guide them in the right direction. At eight o'clock, the paper scratching began, and if he made a mistake now and then, it was in order to justify the reprimands of his superiors, who otherwise would be guilty of the serious sin of having made a false accusation. And so, all day long the great magician, in the guise of an average employee, carried on his task as humanity's guide.

Poor Aunt Ursula! Whenever he returned at noon having forgotten to buy some parsley, that dear lady, instead of cracking the basin over his head, would certainly have behaved differently had she known who her nephew really was. But then she would never have had the opportunity of discovering to what extent anger is a momentary madness.



"he could change himself into a swallow and take wing through the skylight."

If he had wanted to!...Instead of dying in a hospital of an unknown disease in barely Christian fashion, leaving no more trace on earth than a moth-eaten coat in the wardrobe, an old toothbrush, and mocking memories in the ungrateful hearts of his colleagues, he could have been a pasha, an alchemist, a wizard, a nightingale, or a cedar of Lebanon. But that would have been contrary to the secret designs of Providence. No one made a speech over his grave. No one suspected who he was. And who knows---perhaps not even he himself.

Still, he was a most powerful magician.

EDUCATION: WHAT IS IT?

I am not ready to admit that the vast majority of workers are blockheads and consequently uneducable. I prefer to think that the majority of working men and women are victims of a false system of education. Educators are fond of quoting Solomon who was supposed to have said, "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it." Now, the thing that is fundamentally wrong with this formula is the fact that "the way to go" is determined by the traditional and personal prejudices of those who control the educational system, and once the minds of our youth are molded in accordance with these prejudices, intelligence ceases to function.

The character of true education seems to me quite clear and definite. It consists of first, the ability to discriminate between relative values and second, an attitude of sincere and honest doubt.

Any man or woman who possesses the two requisites mentioned in the above paragraph is an educated person regardless of age or status in our social system; and anyone who does not possess these requisites is not an educated person. It is possible under the present educational system for anyone who possesses the financial resources to obtain a diploma and any number of degrees, even the much-coveted Ph. D., and not possess either one of these requisites.

Any student who achieves superior marks in all his college courses is by necessity an extreme conformist who accepts everything on textbook and pedagogic authority, since he has not the ability to discriminate between the humbug taught by one professor or textbook and the science taught by another, If, by chance, a student readily learns that the professor he faces is a conceited clown despite all his pretensions and degrees, that student possesses all the requisites of an educated man, but he will absolutely be disqualified to receive superior scholastic marks and he will probably fail altogether.

We have been accustomed to the idea that education is a method of collecting data to be hurled at teachers and professors on an examination day or to entertain our friends in idle parlor conversation or marshal for purposes of propaganda. True education consists of knowing what to do with the tremendous volume of data that comes to us. The educated man has the power to analyze, interpret, appraise and classify data as to its relative value. He accepts none as facts unless they prove to be facts in the light of experience or by sense perception; and he knows that his senses are not always to be trusted.

The uneducated man accepts everything as fact that is in accord with his prejudices and will violently reject the evidence of facts that comes to him through his sense perceptions if it conflicts fundamentally with his prejudices.

It seems to me impossible to dissociate intelligence from education, or education from intelligence. Without intelligence there would be no education, and where intelligence is present there is always some type of education. Intelligence is the possession of innate powers or abilities, and education is the process of developing, enlarging or intensifying these powers or abilities. Therefore, a child entering school for the first time has all the requisites of an educated person even though they are only present in a small degree.

All education outside pure science is a commodity to be sold to somebody, the selling of which is justified by any method that will bring the highest price. Consequently prestige, wealth and fame rather than truth and accurate knowledge become the goals for which those who survive a college education strive for. This is why it is easier to "sell" or "teach" the false rather than the true notion about things. There is a great incentive on the part of the Board of Trustees of knowledge factories, euphemistically referred to as "institutions of higher learning," to silence a professor whose ideas are not in accord with traditional prejudices since what he says attacks a racket from which multitudes of men derive profits.

Organized societies for various reasons have always been opposed to education. It was always considered dangerous by those in authority. From the days of the medecine man in savage tribes to the big businessmen of modern democracies and functionaries in totalitarian states, authority has always been maintained by magic and hocus-pocus. The big business corporations of today and their chief mouthpieces, the political bosses, their editors and teachers are just as much witch-doctors as the medicine men of ancient societies.

Nothing so quickly dispels witchcraft and magic as the free excercise of human intelligence. When workers stop attempting to reason about their place in the world in the light of the bunkum they have been taught and begin to reason from what is obvious, that our industrial and social machine has broken down many times, that these breakdowns have caused unemployment and wars, and that the capitalist and communist alike, despite all their credentials and claims of competence have miserably failed to maintain a social order worthy of the name---when the workers realize this and begin to apply the intelligence of a fourteen-year-old boy to the situation, they will have taken the first step toward their emancipation. And, who knows, they may decide that the kind of world that would offer a fuller and more meaningful life is the kind of a world built according to the plans drawn up by the Industrial Workers of the World.

PREAMBLE
INDUSTRIAL WORKERS OF THE WORLD

The working class and the employing class having nothing in common. There can be no peace so long as hunger and want are found among millions of the working people and the few, who make up the employing class, have all the good things of life.

Between these two classes a struggle must go on until the workers of the world organize as a class, take possession of the earth and the machinery of production, and abolish the wage system.
